Il s’arrêta, frissonnant, éperdu, et retomba de la pointe du pied sur le talon. Il entendait ses artères battre dans ses tempes comme deux marteaux de forge, et il lui semblait que son souffle sortait de sa poitrine avec le bruit du vent qui sort d’une caverne. Il lui paraissait impossible que l’horrible clameur de ce gond irrité n’eût pas ébranlé toute la maison comme une secousse de tremblement de terre; la porte, poussée par lui, avait pris l’alarme et avait appelé; le vieillard allait se lever, les deux vieilles femmes allaient crier, on viendrait à l’aide; avant un quart d’heure, la ville serait en rumeur et la gendarmerie sur pied. Un moment il se crut perdu.

Il demeura où il était, pétrifié comme la statue de sel, n’osant faire un mouvement.

Quelques minutes s’écoulèrent. La porte s’était ouverte toute grande. Il se hasarda à regarder dans la chambre. Rien n’y avait bougé. Il prêta l’oreille. Rien ne remuait dans la maison. Le bruit du gond rouillé n’avait éveillé personne. Ce premier danger était passé, mais il y avait encore en lui un affreux tumulte. Il ne recula pas pourtant. Même quand il s’était cru perdu, il n’avait pas reculé. Il ne songea plus qu’à finir vite. Il fit un pas et entra dans la chambre.

Cette chambre était dans un calme parfait. On y distinguait çà et là des formes confuses et vagues qui, au jour, étaient des papiers épars sur une table, des in-folio ouverts, des volumes empilés sur un tabouret, un fauteuil chargé de vêtements, un prie-Dieu, et qui à cette heure n’étaient plus que des coins ténébreux et des places blanchâtres. Jean Valjean avança avec précaution en évitant de se heurter aux meubles. Il entendait au fond de la chambre la respiration égale et tranquille de l’évêque endormi.

Il s’arrêta tout à coup. Il était près du lit. Il y était arrivé plus tôt qu’il n’aurait cru.

La nature mêle quelquefois ses effets et ses spectacles à nos actions avec une espèce d’à-propos sombre et intelligent, comme si elle voulait nous faire réfléchir. Depuis près d’une demi-heure un grand nuage couvrait le ciel. Au moment où Jean Valjean s’arrêta en face du lit, ce nuage se déchira, comme s’il l’eût fait exprès, et un rayon de lune, traversant la longue fenêtre, vint éclairer subitement le visage pâle de l’évêque. Il dormait paisiblement. Il était presque vêtu dans son lit, à cause des nuits froides des Basses-Alpes, d’un vêtement de laine brune qui lui couvrait les bras jusqu’aux poignets. Sa tête était renversée sur l’oreiller dans l’attitude abandonnée du repos; il laissait pendre hors du lit sa main ornée de l’anneau pastoral et d’où étaient tombées tant de bonnes œuvres et de saintes actions. Toute sa face s’illuminait d’une vague expression de satisfaction, d’espérance et de béatitude. C’était plus qu’un sourire et presque un rayonnement. Il y avait sur son front l’inexprimable réverbération d’une lumière qu’on ne voyait pas. L’âme des justes pendant le sommeil contemple un ciel mystérieux.

Un reflet de ce ciel était sur l’évêque.

C’était en même temps une transparence lumineuse, car ce ciel était au dedans de lui. Ce ciel, c’était sa conscience.

Au moment où le rayon de lune vint se superposer, pour ainsi dire, à cette clarté intérieure, l’évêque endormi apparut comme dans une gloire.

Cela pourtant resta doux et voilé d’un demi-jour ineffable. Cette lune dans le ciel, cette nature assoupie, ce jardin sans un frisson, cette maison si calme, l’heure, le moment, le silence, ajoutaient je ne sais quoi de solennel et d’indicible au vénérable repos de ce sage, et enveloppaient d’une sorte d’auréole majestueuse et sereine ces cheveux blancs et ces yeux fermés, cette figure où tout était espérance et où tout était confiance, cette tête de vieillard et ce sommeil d’enfant.

Il y avait presque de la divinité dans cet homme ainsi auguste à son insu. Jean Valjean, lui, était dans l’ombre, son chandelier de fer à la main, debout, immobile, effaré de ce vieillard lumineux. Jamais il n’avait rien vu de pareil. Cette confiance l’épouvantait. Le monde moral n’a pas de plus grand spectacle que celui-là: une conscience troublée et inquiète, parvenue au bord d’une mauvaise action, et contemplant le sommeil d’un juste.

Ce sommeil, dans cet isolement, et avec un voisin tel que lui, avait quelque chose de sublime qu’il sentait vaguement, mais impérieusement.

Nul n’eût pu dire ce qui se passait en lui, pas même lui. Pour essayer de s’en rendre compte, il faut rêver ce qu’il y a de plus violent en présence de ce qu’il y a de plus doux. Sur son visage même on n’eût rien pu distinguer avec certitude. C’était une sorte d’étonnement hagard. Il regardait cela. Voilà tout. Mais quelle était sa pensée? Il eût été impossible de le deviner. Ce qui était évident, c’est qu’il était ému et bouleversé. Mais de quelle nature était cette émotion?

Son œil ne se détachait pas du vieillard. La seule chose qui se dégageât clairement de son attitude et de sa physionomie, c’était une étrange indécision. On eût dit qu’il hésitait entre les deux abîmes, celui où l’on se perd et celui où l’on se sauve. Il semblait prêt à briser ce crâne ou à baiser cette main.

Au bout de quelques instants, son bras gauche se leva lentement vers son front, et il ôta sa casquette, puis son bras retomba avec la même lenteur, et Jean Valjean rentra dans sa contemplation, sa casquette dans la main gauche, sa massue dans la main droite, ses cheveux hérissés sur sa tête farouche.

L’évêque continuait de dormir dans une paix profonde sous ce regard effrayant. Un reflet de lune faisait confusément visible au-dessus de la cheminée le crucifix qui semblait leur ouvrir les bras à tous les deux, avec une bénédiction pour l’un et un pardon pour l’autre.

Tout à coup Jean Valjean remit sa casquette sur son front, puis marcha rapidement, le long du lit, sans regarder l’évêque, droit au placard qu’il entrevoyait près du chevet; il leva le chandelier de fer comme pour forcer la serrure; la clef y était; il l’ouvrit; la première chose qui lui apparut fut le panier d’argenterie; il le prit, traversa la chambre à grands pas sans précaution et sans s’occuper du bruit, gagna la porte, rentra dans l’oratoire, ouvrit la fenêtre, saisit un bâton, enjamba l’appui du rez-de-chaussée, mit l’argenterie dans son sac, jeta le panier, franchit le jardin, sauta par-dessus le mur comme un tigre, et s’enfuit.

Chapitre XII

L'évêque travaille

Le lendemain, au soleil levant, monseigneur Bienvenu se promenait dans son jardin. Madame Magloire accourut vers lui toute bouleversée.

— Monseigneur, monseigneur, cria-t-elle, votre grandeur sait-elle où est le panier d'argenterie?

— Oui, dit l'évêque.

— Jésus-Dieu soit béni! reprit-elle. Je ne savais ce qu'il était devenu.

L'évêque venait de ramasser le panier dans une plate-bande. Il le présenta à madame Magloire.

— Le voilà.

— Eh bien? dit-elle. Rien dedans! et l'argenterie?

— Ah! repartit l'évêque. C'est donc l'argenterie qui vous occupe? Je ne sais où elle est.

— Grand bon Dieu! elle est volée! C'est l'homme d'hier soir qui l'a volée!

En un clin d'œil, avec toute sa vivacité de vieille alerte, madame Magloire courut à l'oratoire, entra dans l'alcôve et revint vers l'évêque. L'évêque venait de se baisser et considérait en soupirant un plant de cochléaria des Guillons que le panier avait brisé en tombant à travers la plate-bande. Il se redressa au cri de madame Magloire.

— Monseigneur, l'homme est parti! l'argenterie est volée!

Tout en poussant cette exclamation, ses yeux tombaient sur un angle du jardin où l'on voyait des traces d'escalade. Le chevron du mur avait été arraché.

— Tenez! c'est par là qu'il s'en est allé. Il a sauté dans la ruelle Cochefilet! Ah! l'abomination! Il nous a volé notre argenterie!

L'évêque resta un moment silencieux, puis leva son œil sérieux, et dit à madame Magloire avec douceur:

— Et d'abord, cette argenterie était-elle à nous?

Madame Magloire resta interdite. Il y eut encore un silence, puis l'évêque continua:

— Madame Magloire, je détenais à tort et depuis longtemps cette argenterie. Elle était aux pauvres. Qu'était-ce que cet homme? Un pauvre évidemment.

— Hélas Jésus! repartit madame Magloire. Ce n’est pas pour moi ni pour mademoiselle. Cela nous est bien égal. Mais c’est pour monseigneur. Dans quoi monseigneur va-t-il manger maintenant?

L’évêque la regarda d’un air étonné.

— Ah çà mais! est-ce qu’il n’y a pas des couverts d’étain?

Madame Magloire haussa les épaules.

— L’étain a une odeur.

— Alors, des couverts de fer.

Madame Magloire fit une grimace significative.

— Le fer a un goût.

— Eh bien, dit l’évêque, des couverts de bois.

Quelques instants après, il déjeunait à cette même table où Jean Valjean s’était assis la veille. Tout en déjeunant, monseigneur Bienvenu faisait gaîment remarquer à sa sœur qui ne disait rien et à madame Magloire qui grommelait sourdement qu’il n’est nullement besoin d’une cuiller ni d’une fourchette, même en bois, pour tremper un morceau de pain dans une tasse de lait.

— Aussi a-t-on idée! disait madame Magloire toute seule en allant et venant, recevoir un homme comme cela! et le loger à côté de soi! et quel bonheur encore qu’il n’ait fait que voler! Ah mon Dieu! cela fait frémir quand on songe!

Comme le frère et la sœur allaient se lever de table, on frappa à la porte.

— Entrez, dit l’évêque.

La porte s’ouvrit. Un groupe étrange et violent apparut sur le seuil. Trois hommes en tenaient un quatrième au collet. Les trois hommes étaient des gendarmes; l’autre était Jean Valjean.

Un brigadier de gendarmerie, qui semblait conduire le groupe, était près de la porte. Il entra et s’avança vers l’évêque en faisant le salut militaire.

— Monseigneur... dit-il.

À ce mot Jean Valjean, qui était morne et semblait abattu, releva la tête d’un air stupéfait.

— Monseigneur! murmura-t-il. Ce n’est donc pas le curé?...

— Silence! dit un gendarme. C’est monseigneur l’évêque.

Cependant monseigneur Bienvenu s’était approché aussi vivement que son grand âge le lui permettait.

— Ah! vous voilà! s’écria-t-il en regardant Jean Valjean. Je suis aise de vous voir. Et bien mais! je vous avais donné les chandeliers aussi, qui sont en argent comme le reste et dont vous pourrez bien avoir deux cents francs. Pourquoi ne les avez-vous pas emportés avec vos couverts?

Jean Valjean ouvrit les yeux et regarda le vénérable évêque avec une expression qu’aucune langue humaine ne pourrait rendre.

— Monseigneur, dit le brigadier de gendarmerie, ce que cet homme disait était donc vrai? Nous l’avons rencontré. Il allait comme quelqu’un qui s’en va. Nous l’avons arrêté pour voir. Il avait cette argenterie....

— Et il vous a dit, interrompit l’évêque en souriant, qu’elle lui avait été donnée par un vieux bonhomme de prêtre chez lequel il avait passé la nuit? Je vois la chose. Et vous l’avez ramené ici? C’est une méprise.

— Comme cela, reprit le brigadier, nous pouvons le laisser aller?

— Sans doute, répondit l’évêque.

Les gendarmes lâchèrent Jean Valjean qui recula.

— Est-ce que c’est vrai qu’on me laisse? dit-il d’une voix presque inarticulée et comme s’il parlait dans le sommeil.

— Oui, on te laisse, tu n’entends donc pas? dit un gendarme.

— Mon ami, reprit l’évêque, avant de vous en aller, voici vos chandeliers. Prenez-les.

Il alla à la cheminée, prit les deux flambeaux d’argent et les apporta à Jean Valjean. Les deux femmes le regardaient faire sans un mot, sans un geste, sans un regard qui pût déranger l’évêque.

Jean Valjean tremblait de tous ses membres. Il prit les deux chandeliers machinalement et d’un air égaré.

— Maintenant, dit l’évêque, allez en paix.

— À propos, quand vous reviendrez, mon ami, il est inutile de passer par le jardin. Vous pourrez toujours entrer et sortir par la porte de la rue. Elle n’est fermée qu’au loquet jour et nuit.

Puis se tournant vers la gendarmerie:

— Messieurs, vous pouvez vous retirer.

Les gendarmes s’éloignèrent.

Jean Valjean était comme un homme qui va s’évanouir.

L’évêque s’approcha de lui, et lui dit à voix basse:

— N’oubliez pas, n’oubliez jamais que vous m’avez promis d’employer cet argent à devenir honnête homme.

Jean Valjean, qui n’avait aucun souvenir d’avoir rien promis, resta interdit. L’évêque avait appuyé sur ces paroles en les prononçant. Il reprit avec une sorte de solennité:

— Jean Valjean, mon frère, vous n’appartenez plus au mal, mais au bien. C’est votre âme que je vous achète; je la retire aux pensées noires et à l’esprit de perdition, et je la donne à Dieu.

Chapitre XIII

Petit-Gervais

Jean Valjean sortit de la ville comme s'il s'échappait. Il se mit à marcher en toute hâte dans les champs, prenant les chemins et les sentiers qui se présentaient sans s'apercevoir qu'il revenait à chaque instant sur ses pas. Il erra ainsi toute la matinée, n'ayant pas mangé et n'ayant pas faim. Il était en proie à une foule de sensations nouvelles. Il se sentait une sorte de colère; il ne savait contre qui. Il n'eût pu dire s'il était touché ou humilié. Il lui venait par moments un attendrissement étrange qu'il combattait et auquel il opposait l'endurcissement de ses vingt dernières années. Cet état le fatiguait. Il voyait avec inquiétude s'ébranler au dedans de lui l'espèce de calme affreux que l'injustice de son malheur lui avait donné. Il se demandait qu'est-ce qui remplacerait cela. Parfois il eût vraiment mieux aimé être en prison avec les gendarmes, et que les choses ne se fussent point passées ainsi; cela l'eût moins agité. Bien que la saison fut assez avancée, il y avait encore çà et là dans les haies quelques fleurs tardives dont l'odeur, qu'il traversait en marchant, lui rappelait des souvenirs d'enfance. Ces souvenirs lui étaient presque insupportables, tant il y avait longtemps qu'ils ne lui étaient apparus.

Des pensées inexprimables s'amoncelèrent ainsi en lui toute la journée.

Comme le soleil déclinait au couchant, allongeant sur le sol l'ombre du moindre caillou, Jean Valjean était assis derrière un buisson dans une grande plaine rousse absolument déserte. Il n'y avait à l'horizon que les Alpes. Pas même le clocher d'un village lointain. Jean Valjean pouvait être à trois lieues de Digne. Un sentier qui coupait la plaine passait à quelques pas du buisson.

Au milieu de cette méditation qui n'eût pas peu contribué à rendre ses haillons effrayants pour quelqu'un qui l'eût rencontré, il entendit un bruit joyeux.

Il tourna la tête, et vit venir par le sentier un petit savoyard d'une dizaine d'années qui chantait, sa vielle au flanc et sa boîte à marmotte sur le dos; un de ces doux et gais enfants qui vont de pays en pays, laissant voir leurs genoux par les trous de leur pantalon.

Tout en chantant l’enfant interrompait de temps en temps sa marche et jouait aux osselets avec quelques pièces de monnaie qu’il avait dans sa main, toute sa fortune probablement. Parmi cette monnaie il y avait une pièce de quarante sous. L’enfant s’arrêta à côté du buisson sans voir Jean Valjean et fit sauter sa poignée de sous que jusque-là il avait reçue avec assez d’adresse tout entière sur le dos de sa main.

Cette fois la pièce de quarante sous lui échappa, et vint rouler vers la broussaille jusqu’à Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean posa le pied dessus.

Cependant l’enfant avait suivi sa pièce du regard, et l’avait vu.

Il ne s’étonna point et marcha droit à l’homme.

C’était un lieu absolument solitaire. Aussi loin que le regard pouvait s’étendre, il n’y avait personne dans la plaine ni dans le sentier. On n’entendait que les petits cris faibles d’une nuée d’oiseaux de passage qui traversaient le ciel à une hauteur immense. L’enfant tournait le dos au soleil qui lui mettait des fils d’or dans les cheveux et qui empourprait d’une lueur sanglante la face sauvage de Jean Valjean.

— Monsieur, dit le petit savoyard, avec cette confiance de l’enfance qui se compose d’ignorance et d’innocence, — ma pièce?

— Comment t’appelles-tu? dit Jean Valjean.

— Petit-Gervais, monsieur.

— Va-t’en, dit Jean Valjean.

— Monsieur, reprit l’enfant, rendez-moi ma pièce.

Jean Valjean baissa la tête et ne répondit pas.

L’enfant recommença:

— Ma pièce, monsieur!

L’œil de Jean Valjean resta fixé à terre.

— Ma pièce! cria l’enfant, ma pièce blanche! mon argent! Il semblait que Jean Valjean n’entendit point. L’enfant le prit au collet de sa blouse et le secoua. Et en même temps il faisait effort pour déranger le gros soulier ferré posé sur son trésor.

— Je veux ma pièce! ma pièce de quarante sous!

L’enfant pleurait. La tête de Jean Valjean se releva. Il était toujours assis. Ses yeux étaient troubles. Il considéra l’enfant avec une sorte d’étonnement, puis il étendit la main vers son bâton et cria d’une voix terrible:

— Qui est là?

— Moi, monsieur, répondit l’enfant. Petit-Gervais! moi! moi! Rendez-moi mes quarante sous, s’il vous plaît! Ôtez votre pied, monsieur, s’il vous plaît!

Puis irrité, quoique tout petit, et devenant presque menaçant:

— Ah, çà, ôterez-vous votre pied? Ôtez donc votre pied, voyons.

— Ah! c’est encore toi! dit Jean Valjean, et se dressant brusquement tout debout, le pied toujours sur la pièce d’argent, il ajouta: — Veux-tu bien te sauver!

L’enfant effaré le regarda, puis commença à trembler de la tête aux pieds, et, après quelques secondes de stupeur, se mit à s’enfuir en courant de toutes ses forces sans oser tourner le cou ni jeter un cri.

Cependant à une certaine distance l’essoufflement le força de s’arrêter, et Jean Valjean, à travers sa rêverie, l’entendit qui sanglotait.

Au bout de quelques instants l’enfant avait disparu. Le soleil s’était couché. L’ombre se faisait autour de Jean Valjean. Il n’avait pas mangé de la journée; il est probable qu’il avait la fièvre.

Il était resté debout, et n’avait pas changé d’attitude depuis que l’enfant s’était enfui. Son souffle soulevait sa poitrine à des intervalles longs et inégaux. Son regard, arrêté à dix ou douze pas devant lui, semblait étudier avec une attention profonde la forme d’un vieux tesson de faïence bleue tombé dans l’herbe. Tout à coup il tressaillit; il venait de sentir le froid du soir.

Il raffermit sa casquette sur son front, chercha machinalement à croiser et à boutonner sa blouse, fit un pas, et se baissa pour reprendre à terre son bâton. En ce moment il aperçut la pièce de quarante sous que son pied avait à demi enfoncée dans la terre et qui brillait parmi les cailloux.

Ce fut comme une commotion galvanique. Qu’est-ce que c’est que ça? dit-il entre ses dents. Il recula de trois pas, puis s’arrêta, sans pouvoir détacher son regard de ce point que son pied avait foulé l’instant d’auparavant, comme si cette chose qui luisait là dans l’obscurité eût été un œil ouvert fixé sur lui.

Au bout de quelques minutes, il s’élança convulsivement vers la pièce d’argent, la saisit, et, se redressant, se mit à regarder au loin dans la plaine, jetant à la fois ses yeux vers tous les points de l’horizon, debout et frissonnant comme une bête fauve effarée qui cherche un asile.

Il ne vit rien. La nuit tombait, la plaine était froide et vague, de grandes brumes violettes montaient dans la clarté crépusculaire.

Il dit: «Ah!» et se mit à marcher rapidement dans une certaine direction, du côté où l'enfant avait disparu. Après une centaine de pas, il s'arrêta, regarda, et ne vit rien.

Alors il cria de toute sa force: «Petit-Gervais! Petit-Gervais!»

Il se tut, et attendit.

Rien ne répondit.

La campagne était déserte et morne. Il était environné de l'étendue. Il n'y avait rien autour de lui qu'une ombre où se perdait son regard et un silence où sa voix se perdait.

Une bise glaciale soufflait, et donnait aux choses autour de lui une sorte de vie lugubre. Des arbrisseaux secouaient leurs petits bras maigres avec une furie incroyable. On eût dit qu'ils menaçaient et poursuivaient quelqu'un.

Il recommença à marcher, puis il se mit à courir, et de temps en temps il s'arrêtait, et criait dans cette solitude, avec une voix qui était ce qu'on pouvait entendre de plus formidable et de plus désolé: «Petit-Gervais! Petit-Gervais!»

Certes, si l'enfant l'eût entendu, il eût eu peur et se fût bien gardé de se montrer. Mais l'enfant était sans doute déjà bien loin.

Il rencontra un prêtre qui était à cheval. Il alla à lui et lui dit:

— Monsieur le curé, avez-vous vu passer un enfant?

— Non, dit le prêtre.

— Un nommé Petit-Gervais?

— Je n'ai vu personne.

Il tira deux pièces de cinq francs de sa sacoche et les remit au prêtre.

— Monsieur le curé, voici pour vos pauvres. — Monsieur le curé, c'est un petit d'environ dix ans qui a une marmotte, je crois, et une vielle. Il allait. Un de ces savoyards, vous savez?

— Je ne l'ai point vu.

— Petit-Gervais? il n'est point des villages d'ici? pouvez-vous me dire?

— Si c'est comme vous dites, mon ami, c'est un petit enfant étranger. Cela passe dans le pays. On ne les connaît pas.

Jean Valjean prit violemment deux autres écus de cinq francs qu'il donna au prêtre.

— Pour vos pauvres, dit-il.

Puis il ajouta avec égarement:

— Monsieur l'abbé, faites-moi arrêter. Je suis un voleur.

Le prêtre piqua des deux et s’enfuit très effrayé.

Jean Valjean se remit à courir dans la direction qu’il avait d’abord prise.

Il fit de la sorte un assez long chemin, regardant, appelant, criant, mais il ne rencontra plus personne. Deux ou trois fois il courut dans la plaine vers quelque chose qui lui faisait l’effet d’un être couché ou accroupi; ce n’étaient que des broussailles ou des roches à fleur de terre. Enfin, à un endroit où trois sentiers se croisaient, il s’arrêta. La lune s’était levée. Il promena sa vue au loin et appela une dernière fois: «Petit-Gervais! Petit-Gervais! Petit-Gervais!» Son cri s’éteignit dans la brume, sans même éveiller un écho. Il murmura encore: «Petit-Gervais!» mais d’une voix faible et presque inarticulée. Ce fut là son dernier effort; ses jarrets fléchirent brusquement sous lui comme si une puissance invisible l’accablait tout à coup du poids de sa mauvaise conscience; il tomba épuisé sur une grosse pierre, les poings dans ses cheveux et le visage dans ses genoux, et il cria: «Je suis un misérable!»

Alors son cœur creva et il se mit à pleurer. C’était la première fois qu’il pleurait depuis dix-neuf ans.

Quand Jean Valjean était sorti de chez l’évêque, on l’a vu, il était hors de tout ce qui avait été sa pensée jusque-là. Il ne pouvait se rendre compte de ce qui se passait en lui. Il se raidissait contre l’action angélique et contre les douces paroles du vieillard. «Vous m’avez promis de devenir honnête homme. Je vous achète votre âme. Je la retire à l’esprit de perversité et je la donne au bon Dieu.» Cela lui revenait sans cesse. Il opposait à cette indulgence céleste l’orgueil, qui est en nous comme la forteresse du mal. Il sentait indistinctement que le pardon de ce prêtre était le plus grand assaut et la plus formidable attaque dont il eût encore été ébranlé; que son endurcissement serait définitif s’il résistait à cette clémence; que, s’il cédait, il faudrait renoncer à cette haine dont les actions des autres hommes avaient rempli son âme pendant tant d’années, et qui lui plaisait; que cette fois il fallait vaincre ou être vaincu, et que la lutte, une lutte colossale et décisive, était engagée entre sa méchanceté à lui et la bonté de cet homme.

En présence de toutes ces lueurs, il allait comme un homme ivre. Pendant qu’il marchait ainsi, les yeux hagards, avait-il une perception distincte de ce qui pourrait résulter pour lui de son aventure à Digne? Entendait-il tous ces bourdonnements mystérieux qui avertissent ou importunent l’esprit à de certains moments de la vie? Une voix lui disait-elle à l’oreille qu’il venait de traverser l’heure solennelle de sa destinée, qu’il n’y avait plus de milieu pour lui, que si désormais il n’était pas le meilleur des hommes il en serait le pire, qu’il fallait pour ainsi dire que maintenant il montât plus haut que l’évêque ou retombât plus bas que le galérien, que s’il voulait devenir bon il fallait qu’il devînt ange; que s’il voulait rester méchant il fallait qu’il devînt monstre?

Ici encore il faut se faire ces questions que nous nous sommes déjà faites ailleurs, recueillait-il confusément quelque ombre de tout ceci dans sa pensée? Certes, le malheur, nous l’avons dit, fait l’éducation de l’intelligence; cependant il est douteux que Jean Valjean fût en état de démêler tout ce que nous indiquons ici. Si ces idées lui arrivaient, il les entrevoyait plutôt qu’il ne les voyait, et elles ne réussissaient qu’à le jeter dans un trouble insupportable et presque douloureux. Au sortir de cette chose difforme et noire qu’on appelle le bagne, l’évêque lui avait fait mal à l’âme comme une clarté trop vive lui eût fait mal aux yeux en sortant des ténèbres. La vie future, la vie possible qui s’offrait désormais à lui toute pure et toute rayonnante le remplissait de frémissements et d’anxiété. Il ne savait vraiment plus où il en était. Comme une chouette qui verrait brusquement se lever le soleil, le forçat avait été ébloui et comme aveuglé par la vertu.

Ce qui était certain, ce dont il ne se doutait pas, c’est qu’il n’était déjà plus le même homme, c’est que tout était changé en lui, c’est qu’il n’était plus en son pouvoir de faire que l’évêque ne lui eût pas parlé et ne l’eût pas touché.

Dans cette situation d’esprit, il avait rencontré Petit-Gervais et lui avait volé ses quarante sous. Pourquoi? Il n’eût assurément pu l’expliquer; était-ce un dernier effet et comme un suprême effort des mauvaises pensées qu’il avait apportées du bagne, un reste d’impulsion, un résultat de ce qu’on appelle en statique la force acquise? C’était cela, et c’était aussi peut-être moins encore que cela. Disons-le simplement, ce n’était pas lui qui avait volé, ce n’était pas l’homme, c’était la bête qui, par habitude et par instinct, avait stupidement posé le pied sur cet argent, pendant que l’intelligence se débattait au milieu de tant d’obsessions inouïes et nouvelles. Quand l’intelligence se réveilla et vit cette action de la brute, Jean Valjean recula avec angoisse et poussa un cri d’épouvante.

C’est que, phénomène étrange et qui n’était possible que dans la situation où il était, en volant cet argent à cet enfant, il avait fait une chose dont il n’était déjà plus capable.

Quoi qu’il en soit, cette dernière mauvaise action eut sur lui un effet décisif; elle traversa brusquement ce chaos qu’il avait dans l’intelligence et le dissipa, mit d’un côté les épaisseurs obscures et de l’autre la lumière, et agit sur son âme, dans l’état où elle se trouvait, comme de certains réactifs chimiques agissent sur un mélange trouble en précipitant un élément et en clarifiant l’autre.

Tout d’abord, avant même de s’examiner et de réfléchir, éperdu, comme quelqu’un qui cherche à se sauver, il tâcha de retrouver l’enfant pour lui rendre son argent, puis, quand il reconnut que cela était inutile et impossible, il s’arrêta désespéré. Au moment où il s’écria: «je suis un misérable!» il venait de s’apercevoir tel qu’il était, et il était déjà à ce point séparé de lui-même, qu’il lui semblait qu’il n’était plus qu’un fantôme, et qu’il avait là devant lui, en chair et en os, le bâton à la main, la blouse sur les reins, son sac rempli d’objets volés sur le dos, avec son visage résolu et morne, avec sa pensée pleine de projets abominables, le hideux galérien Jean Valjean.

L’excès du malheur, nous l’avons remarqué, l’avait fait en quelque sorte visionnaire. Ceci fut donc comme une vision. Il vit véritablement ce Jean Valjean, cette face sinistre devant lui. Il fut presque au moment de se demander qui était cet homme, et il en eut horreur.

Son cerveau était dans un de ces moments violents et pourtant affreusement calmes où la rêverie est si profonde qu’elle absorbe la réalité. On ne voit plus les objets qu’on a autour de soi, et l’on voit comme en dehors de soi les figures qu’on a dans l’esprit.

Il se contempla donc, pour ainsi dire, face à face, et en même temps, à travers cette hallucination, il voyait dans une profondeur mystérieuse une sorte de lumière qu’il prit d’abord pour un flambeau. En regardant avec plus d’attention cette lumière qui apparaissait à sa conscience, il reconnut qu’elle avait la forme humaine, et que ce flambeau était l’évêque.

Sa conscience considéra tour à tour ces deux hommes ainsi placés devant elle, l’évêque et Jean Valjean. Il n’avait pas fallu moins que le premier pour détremper le second. Par un de ces effets singuliers qui sont propres à ces sortes d’extases, à mesure que sa rêverie se prolongeait, l’évêque grandissait et resplendissait à ses yeux, Jean Valjean s’amoindrissait et s’effaçait. À un certain moment il ne fut plus qu’une ombre. Tout à coup il disparut. L’évêque seul était resté.

Il remplissait toute l’âme de ce misérable d’un rayonnement magnifique. Jean Valjean pleura longtemps. Il pleura à chaudes larmes, il pleura à sanglots, avec plus de faiblesse qu’une femme, avec plus d’effroi qu’un enfant.

Pendant qu’il pleurait, le jour se faisait de plus en plus dans son cerveau, un jour extraordinaire, un jour ravissant et terrible à la fois. Sa vie passée, sa première faute, sa longue expiation, son abrutissement extérieur, son endurcissement intérieur, sa mise en liberté réjouie par tant de plans de vengeance, ce qui lui était arrivé chez l’évêque, la dernière chose qu’il avait faite, ce vol de quarante sous à un enfant, crime d’autant plus lâche et d’autant plus monstrueux qu’il venait après le pardon de l’évêque, tout cela lui revint et lui apparut, clairement, mais dans une clarté qu’il n’avait jamais vue jusque-là. Il regarda sa vie, et elle lui parut horrible; son âme, et elle lui parut affreuse. Cependant un jour doux était sur cette vie et sur cette âme. Il lui semblait qu’il voyait Satan à la lumière du paradis.

Combien d’heures pleura-t-il ainsi? que fit-il après avoir pleuré? où alla-t-il? on ne l’a jamais su. Il paraît seulement avéré que, dans cette même nuit, le voiturier qui faisait à cette époque le service de Grenoble et qui arrivait à Digne vers trois heures du matin, vit en traversant la rue de l’évêché un homme dans l’attitude de la prière, à genoux sur le pavé, dans l’ombre, devant la porte de monseigneur Bienvenu.

Livre troisième — En l’année 1817

Chapitre I

L’année 1817

1817 est l’année que Louis XVIII, avec un certain aplomb royal qui ne manquait pas de fierté, qualifiait la vingt-deuxième de son règne. C’est l’année où M. Bruguière de Sorsum était célèbre. Toutes les boutiques des perruquiers, espérant la poudre et le retour de l’oiseau royal, étaient badigeonnées d’azur et fleurdelysées. C’était le temps candide où le comte Lynch siégeait tous les dimanches comme marguillier au banc d’œuvre de Saint-Germain-des-Prés en habit de pair de France, avec son cordon rouge et son long nez, et cette majesté de profil particulière à un homme qui a fait une action d’éclat. L’action d’éclat commise par M. Lynch était ceci: avoir, étant maire de Bordeaux, le 12 mars 1814, donné la ville un peu trop tôt à M. le duc d’Angoulême. De là sa pairie. En 1817, la mode engloutissait les petits garçons de quatre à six ans sous de vastes casquettes en cuir maroquiné à oreillons assez ressemblantes à des mitres d’esquimaux. L’armée française était vêtue de blanc, à l’autrichienne; les régiments s’appelaient légions; au lieu de chiffres ils portaient les noms des départements. Napoléon était à Sainte-Hélène, et, comme l’Angleterre lui refusait du drap vert, il faisait retourner ses vieux habits. En 1817, Pellegrini chantait, mademoiselle Bigottini dansait; Potier régnait; Odry n’existait pas encore. Madame Saqui succédait à Forioso. Il y avait encore des Prussiens en France. M. Delalot était un personnage. La légitimité venait de s’affirmer en coupant le poing, puis la tête, à Pleignier, à Carbonneau et à Tolleron. Le prince de Talleyrand, grand chambellan, et l’abbé Louis, ministre désigné des finances, se regardaient en riant du rire de deux augures; tous deux avaient célébré, le 14 juillet 1790, la messe de la Fédération au Champ de Mars; Talleyrand l’avait dite comme évêque, Louis l’avait servie comme diacre. En 1817, dans les contre-allées de ce même Champ de Mars, on apercevait de gros cylindres de bois, gisant sous la pluie, pourrissant dans l’herbe, peints en bleu avec des traces d’aigles et d’abeilles dédorées. C’étaient les colonnes qui, deux ans auparavant, avaient soutenu l’estrade de l’empereur au Champ-de-Mai. Elles étaient noircies çà et là de la brûlure du bivouac des Autrichiens baraqués près du Gros-Caillou. Deux ou trois de ces colonnes avaient disparu dans les feux de ces bivouacs et avaient chauffé les larges mains des kaiserlicks. Le Champ de Mai avait eu cela de remarquable qu'il avait été tenu au mois de juin et au Champ de Mars. En cette année 1817, deux choses étaient populaires: le Voltaire-Touquet et la tabatière à la Charte. L'émotion parisienne la plus récente était le crime de Dautun qui avait jeté la tête de son frère dans le bassin du Marché-aux-Fleurs. On commençait à faire au ministère de la marine une enquête sur cette fatale frégate de la Méduse qui devait couvrir de honte Chaumareix et de gloire Géricault. Le colonel Selves allait en Égypte pour y devenir Soliman pacha. Le palais des Thermes, rue de la Harpe, servait de boutique à un tonnelier. On voyait encore sur la plate-forme de la tour octogone de l'hôtel de Cluny la petite logette en planches qui avait servi d'observatoire à Messier, astronome de la marine sous Louis XVI. La duchesse de Duras lisait à trois ou quatre amis, dans son boudoir meublé d'X en satin bleu ciel, Ourika inédite. On grattait les N au Louvre. Le pont d'Austerlitz abdiquait et s'intitulait pont du Jardin du Roi, double énigme qui déguisait à la fois le pont d'Austerlitz et le jardin des Plantes. Louis XVIII, préoccupé, tout en annotant du coin de l'ongle Horace, des héros qui se font empereurs et des sabotiers qui se font dauphins, avait deux soucis: Napoléon et Mathurin Bruneau. L'académie française donnait pour sujet de prix: Le bonheur que procure l'étude. M. Bellart était officiellement éloquent. On voyait germer à son ombre ce futur avocat général de Broè, promis aux sarcasmes de Paul-Louis Courier. Il y avait un faux Chateaubriand appelé Marchangy, en attendant qu'il y eut un faux Marchangy appelé d'Arlincourt. Claire d'Albe et Malek-Adel étaient des chefs-d'œuvre; madame Cottin était déclarée le premier écrivain de l'époque. L'institut laissait rayer de sa liste l'académicien Napoléon Bonaparte. Une ordonnance royale érigeait Angoulême en école de marine, car, le duc d'Angoulême étant grand amiral, il était évident que la ville d'Angoulême avait de droit toutes les qualités d'un port de mer, sans quoi le principe monarchique eût été entamé. On agitait en conseil des ministres la question de savoir si l'on devait tolérer les vignettes représentant des voltiges qui assaisonnaient les affiches de Franconi et qui attroupaient les polissons des rues. M. Paër, auteur de l'Agnese, bonhomme à la face carrée qui avait une verrue sur la joue, dirigeait les petits concerts intimes de la marquise de Sassenaye, rue de la Ville-l'Évêque. Toutes les jeunes filles chantaient l'Ermite de Saint-Avelle, paroles d'Edmond Géraud. Le Nain jaune se transformait en Miroir. Le café Lemblin tenait pour l'empereur contre le café Valois qui tenait pour les Bourbons. On venait de marier à une princesse de Sicile M. le duc de Berry, déjà regardé du fond de l'ombre par Louvel. Il y avait un an que madame de Staël était morte. Les gardes du corps sifflaient mademoiselle Mars. Les grands journaux étaient tout petits. Le format était restreint, mais la liberté était grande. Le Constitutionnel était constitutionnel. La Minerve appelait Chateaubriand Chateaubriant. Ce t faisait beaucoup rire les bourgeois aux dépens du grand écrivain. Dans des journaux vendus, des journalistes prostitués insultaient les proscrits de 1815; David n'avait plus de talent, Arnault n'avait plus d'esprit, Carnot n'avait plus de probité; Soult n'avait gagné aucune bataille; il est vrai que Napoléon n'avait plus de génie. Personne n'ignore qu'il est assez rare que les lettres adressées par la poste à un exilé lui parviennent, les polices se faisant un religieux devoir de les intercepter. Le fait n'est point nouveau; Descartes, banni, s'en plaignait. Or, David ayant, dans un journal belge, montré quelque humeur de ne pas recevoir les lettres qu'on lui écrivait, ceci paraissait plaisant aux feuilles royalistes qui bafouaient à cette occasion le proscrit. Dire: les régicides, ou dire: les votants, dire: les ennemis, ou dire: les alliés, dire: Napoléon, ou dire: Buonaparte, cela séparait deux hommes plus qu'un abîme. Tous les gens de bons sens convenaient que l'ère des révolutions était à jamais fermée par le roi Louis XVIII, surnommé «l'immortel auteur de la charte». Au terre-plein du Pont-Neuf, on sculptait le mot Redivivus, sur le piédestal qui attendait la statue de Henri IV. M. Piet ébauchait, rue Thérèse, n° 4, son conciliabule pour consolider la monarchie. Les chefs de la droite disaient dans les conjonctures graves: «Il faut écrire à Bacot». MM. Canuel, O'Mahony et de Chappedelaine esquissaient, un peu approuvés de Monsieur, ce qui devait être plus tard «la conspiration du bord de l'eau». L'Épingle Noire complotait de son côté. Delaverderie s'abouchait avec Trogoff. M. Decazes, esprit dans une certaine mesure libéral, dominait. Chateaubriand, debout tous les matins devant sa fenêtre du n° 27 de la rue Saint-Dominique, en pantalon à pieds et en pantoufles, ses cheveux gris coiffés d'un madras, les yeux fixés sur un miroir, une trousse complète de chirurgien dentiste ouverte devant lui, se curait les dents, qu'il avait charmantes, tout en dictant des variantes de la Monarchie selon la Charte à M. Pilorge, son secrétaire. La critique faisant autorité préférait Lafon à Talma. M. de Féletz signait A.; M. Hoffmann signait Z. Charles Nodier écrivait Thérèse Aubert. Le divorce était aboli. Les lycées s'appelaient collèges. Les collégiens, ornés au collet d'une fleur de lys d'or, s'y gourmaient à propos du roi de Rome. La contre-police du château dénonçait à son altesse royale Madame le portrait, partout exposé, de M. le duc d’Orléans, lequel avait meilleure mine en uniforme de colonel général des houzards que M. le duc de Berry en uniforme de colonel général des dragons; grave inconvénient. La ville de Paris faisait redorer à ses frais le dôme des Invalides. Les hommes sérieux se demandaient ce que ferait, dans telle ou telle occasion, M. de Trinquelague; M. Clausel de Montals se séparait, sur divers points, de M. Clausel de Coussergues; M. de Salaberry n’était pas content. Le comédien Picard, qui était de l’Académie dont le comédien Molière n’avait pu être, faisait jouer les deux Philibert à l’Odéon, sur le fronton duquel l’arrachement des lettres laissait encore lire distinctement: THÉÂTRE DE L’IMPÉRATRICE. On prenait parti pour ou contre Cugnet de Montarlot. Fabvier était factieux; Bavoux était révolutionnaire. Le libraire Pélicier publiait une édition de Voltaire, sous ce titre: OEuvres de Voltaire, de l’Académie française. «Cela fait venir les acheteurs», disait cet éditeur naïf. L’opinion générale était que M. Charles Loyson, serait le génie du siècle; l’envie commençait à le mordre, signe de gloire; et l’on faisait sur lui ce vers:

Même quand Loyson vole, on sent qu’il a des pattes.

Le cardinal Fesch refusant de se démettre, M. de Pins, archevêque d’Amasie, administrait le diocèse de Lyon. La querelle de la vallée des Dappes commençait entre la Suisse et la France par un mémoire du capitaine Dufour, depuis général. Saint-Simon, ignoré, échafaudait son rêve sublime. Il y avait à l’académie des sciences un Fourier célèbre que la postérité a oublié et dans je ne sais quel grenier un Fourier obscur dont l’avenir se souviendra. Lord Byron commençait à poindre; une note d’un poème de Millevoye l’annonçait à la France en ces termes: un certain lord Baron. David d’Angers s’essayait à pétrir le marbre. L’abbé Caron parlait avec éloge, en petit comité de séminaristes, dans le cul-de-sac des Feuillantines, d’un prêtre inconnu nommé Félicité Robert qui a été plus tard Lamennais. Une chose qui fumait et clapotait sur la Seine avec le bruit d’un chien qui nage allait et venait sous les fenêtres des Tuileries, du pont Royal au pont Louis XV c’était une mécanique bonne à pas grand’chose, une espèce de joujou, une rêverie d’inventeur songe-creux, une utopie: un bateau à vapeur. Les Parisiens regardaient cette inutilité avec indifférence. M. de Vaublanc, réformateur de l’Institut par coup d’État, ordonnance et fournée, auteur distingué de plusieurs académiciens, après en avoir fait, ne pouvait parvenir à l’être. Le faubourg Saint-Germain et la pavillon Marsan souhaitaient pour préfet de police M. Delaveau, à cause de sa dévotion. Dupuytren et Récamier se prenaient de querelle à l’amphithéâtre de l’École de médecine et se menaçaient du poing à propos de la divinité de Jésus-Christ. Cuvier, un œil sur la Genèse et l’autre sur la nature, s’efforçait de plaire à la réaction bigote en mettant les fossiles d’accord avec les textes et en faisant flatter Moïse par les mastodontes. M. François de Neufchâteau, louable cultivateur de la mémoire de Parmentier, faisait mille efforts pour que pomme de terre fût prononcée parmentière, et n’y réussissait point. L’abbé Grégoire, ancien évêque, ancien conventionnel, ancien sénateur, était passé dans la polémique royaliste à l’état «d’infâme Grégoire». Cette locution que nous venons d’employer: passer à l’état de, était dénoncée comme néologisme par M. Royer-Collard. On pouvait distinguer encore à sa blancheur, sous la troisième arche du pont d’Iéna, la pierre neuve avec laquelle, deux ans auparavant, on avait bouché le trou de mine pratiqué par Blücher pour faire sauter le pont. La justice appelait à sa barre un homme qui, en voyant entrer le comte d’Artois à Notre-Dame, avait dit tout haut: Sapristi! je regrette le temps où je voyais Bonaparte et Talma entrer bras dessus bras dessous au Bal-Sauvage. Propos séditieux. Six mois de prison. Des traîtres se montraient déboutonnés; des hommes qui avaient passé à l’ennemi la veille d’une bataille ne cachaient rien de la récompense et marchaient impudiquement en plein soleil dans le cynisme des richesses et des dignités; des déserteurs de Ligny et des Quatre-Bras, dans le débraillé de leur turpitude payée, étalaient leur dévouement monarchique tout nu; oubliant ce qui est écrit en Angleterre sur la muraille intérieure des water-closets publics: Please adjust your dress before leaving.

Voilà, pêle-mêle, ce qui surnage confusément de l’année 1817, oubliée aujourd’hui. L’histoire néglige presque toutes ces particularités, et ne peut faire autrement; l’infini l’envahirait. Pourtant ces détails, qu’on appelle à tort petits — il n’y a ni petits faits dans l’humanité, ni petites feuilles dans la végétation — sont utiles. C’est de la physionomie des années que se compose la figure des siècles.

En cette année 1817, quatre jeunes Parisiens firent «une bonne farce».

Chapitre II

Double quatuor

Ces Parisiens étaient l’un de Toulouse, l’autre de Limoges, le troisième de Cahors et le quatrième de Montauban; mais ils étaient étudiants, et qui dit étudiant dit parisien; étudier à Paris, c’est naître à Paris.

Ces jeunes gens étaient insignifiants; tout le monde a vu ces figures-là; quatre échantillons du premier venu; ni bons ni mauvais, ni savants ni ignorants, ni des génies ni des imbéciles; beaux de ce charmant avril qu’on appelle vingt ans. C’étaient quatre Oscars quelconques, car à cette époque les Arthurs n’existaient pas encore. Brûlez pour lui les parfums d’Arabie, s’écriait la romance, Oscar s’avance, Oscar, je vais le voir! On sortait d’Ossian, l’élégance était scandinave et calédonienne, le genre anglais pur ne devait prévaloir que plus tard, et le premier des Arthurs, Wellington, venait à peine de gagner la bataille de Waterloo.

Ces Oscars s’appelaient l’un Félix Tholomyès, de Toulouse; l’autre Listolier, de Cahors; l’autre Fameuil, de Limoges; le dernier Blachevelle, de Montauban. Naturellement chacun avait sa maîtresse. Blachevelle aimait Favourite, ainsi nommée parce qu’elle était allée en Angleterre; Listolier adorait Dahlia, qui avait pris pour nom de guerre un nom de fleur; Fameuil idolâtrait Zéphine, abrégé de Joséphine; Tholomyès avait Fantine, dite la Blonde à cause de ses beaux cheveux couleur de soleil.

Favourite, Dahlia, Zéphine et Fantine étaient quatre ravissantes filles, parfumées et radieuses, encore un peu ouvrières, n’ayant pas tout à fait quitté leur aiguille, dérangées par les amourettes, mais ayant sur le visage un reste de la sérénité du travail et dans l’âme cette fleur d’honnêteté qui dans la femme survit à la première chute. Il y avait une des quatre qu’on appelait la jeune, parce qu’elle était la cadette; et une qu’on appelait la vieille. La vieille avait vingt-trois ans. Pour ne rien celer, les trois premières étaient plus expérimentées, plus insouciantes et plus envolées dans le bruit de la vie que Fantine la Blonde, qui en était à sa première illusion.

Dahlia, Zéphine, et surtout Favourite, n’en auraient pu dire autant. Il y avait déjà plus d’un épisode à leur roman à peine commencé, et l’amoureux, qui s’appelait Adolphe au premier chapitre, se trouvait être Alphonse au second, et Gustave au troisième. Pauvreté et coquetterie sont deux conseillères fatales, l’une gronde, l’autre flatte; et les belles filles du peuple les ont toutes les deux qui leur parlent bas à l’oreille, chacune de son côté. Ces âmes mal gardées écoutent. De là les chutes qu’elles font et les pierres qu’on leur jette. On les accable avec la splendeur de tout ce qui est immaculé et inaccessible. Hélas! si la Yungfrau avait faim?

Favourite, ayant été en Angleterre, avait pour admiratrices Zéphine et Dahlia. Elle avait eu de très bonne heure un chez-soi. Son père était un vieux professeur de mathématiques brutal et qui gasconnait; point marié, courant le cachet malgré l’âge. Ce professeur, étant jeune, avait vu un jour la robe d’une femme de chambre s’accrocher à un garde-cendre; il était tombé amoureux de cet accident. Il en était résulté Favourite. Elle rencontrait de temps en temps son père, qui la saluait. Un matin, une vieille femme à l’air béguin était entrée chez elle et lui avait dit:

— Vous ne me connaissez pas, mademoiselle?

— Non.

— Je suis ta mère.

Puis la vieille avait ouvert le buffet, bu et mangé, fait apporter un matelas qu’elle avait, et s’était installée. Cette mère, grognon et dévote, ne parlait jamais à Favourite, restait des heures sans souffler mot, déjeunait, dînait et soupait comme quatre, et descendait faire salon chez le portier, où elle disait du mal de sa fille.

Ce qui avait entraîné Dahlia vers Listolier, vers d’autres peut-être, vers l’oisiveté, c’était d’avoir de trop jolis ongles roses. Comment faire travailler ces ongles-là? Qui veut rester vertueuse ne doit pas avoir pitié de ses mains. Quant à Zéphine, elle avait conquis Fameuil par sa petite manière mutine et caressante de dire: «Oui, monsieur».

Les jeunes gens étant camarades, les jeunes filles étaient amies. Ces amours-là sont toujours doublés de ces amitiés-là.

Sage et philosophe, c’est deux; et ce qui le prouve, c’est que, toutes réserves faites sur ces petits ménages irréguliers, Favourite, Zéphine et Dahlia étaient des filles philosophes, et Fantine une fille sage.

Sage, dira-t-on? et Tholomyès? Salomon répondrait que l’amour fait partie de la sagesse. Nous nous bornons à dire que l’amour de Fantine était un premier amour, un amour unique, un amour fidèle.

Elle était la seule des quatre qui ne fût tutoyée que par un seul.

Fantine était un de ces êtres comme il en éclôt, pour ainsi dire, au fond du peuple. Sortie des plus insondables épaisseurs de l’ombre sociale, elle avait au front le signe de l’anonyme et de l’inconnu. Elle était née à Montreuil-sur-mer. De quels parents? Qui pourrait le dire? On ne lui avait jamais connu ni père ni mère. Elle se nommait Fantine. Pourquoi Fantine? On ne lui avait jamais connu d’autre nom. À l’époque de sa naissance, le Directoire existait encore. Point de nom de famille, elle n’avait pas de famille; point de nom de baptême, l’église n’était plus là. Elle s’appela comme il plut au premier passant qui la rencontra toute petite, allant pieds nus dans la rue. Elle reçut un nom comme elle recevait l’eau des nuées sur son front quand il pleuvait. On l’appela la petite Fantine. Personne n’en savait davantage. Cette créature humaine était venue dans la vie comme cela. À dix ans, Fantine quitta la ville et s’alla mettre en service chez des fermiers des environs. À quinze ans, elle vint à Paris “chercher fortune”. Fantine était belle et resta pure le plus longtemps qu’elle put. C’était une jolie blonde avec de belles dents. Elle avait de l’or et des perles pour dot, mais son or était sur sa tête et ses perles étaient dans sa bouche.

Elle travailla pour vivre; puis, toujours pour vivre, car le cœur a sa faim aussi, elle aima.

Elle aima Tholomyès.

Amourette pour lui, passion pour elle. Les rues du quartier latin, qu’emplit le fourmillement des étudiants et des grisettes, virent le commencement de ce songe. Fantine, dans ces dédales de la colline du Panthéon, où tant d’aventures se nouent et se dénouent, avait fui longtemps Tholomyès, mais de façon à le rencontrer toujours. Il y a une manière d’éviter qui ressemble à chercher. Bref, l’églogue eut lieu.

Blachevelle, Listolier et Fameuil formaient une sorte de groupe dont Tholomyès était la tête. C’était lui qui avait l’esprit.

Tholomyès était l’antique étudiant vieux; il était riche; il avait quatre mille francs de rente; quatre mille francs de rente, splendide scandale sur la montagne Sainte-Geneviève. Tholomyès était un viveur de trente ans, mal conservé. Il était ridé et édenté; et il ébauchait une calvitie dont il disait lui-même sans tristesse: crâne à trente ans, genou à quarante. Il digérait médiocrement, et il lui était venu un larmoiement à un œil. Mais à mesure que sa jeunesse s’éteignait, il allumait sa gaîté; il remplaçait ses dents par des lazzis, ses cheveux par la joie, sa santé par l’ironie, et son œil qui pleurait riait sans cesse. Il était délabré, mais tout en fleurs. Sa jeunesse, pliant bagage bien avant l’âge, battait en retraite en bon ordre, éclatait de rire, et l’on n’y voyait que du feu. Il avait eu une pièce refusée au

Vaudeville. Il faisait çà et là des vers quelconques. En outre, il doutait supérieurement de toute chose, grande force aux yeux des faibles. Donc, étant ironique et chauve, il était le chef. Iron est un mot anglais qui veut dire fer. Serait-ce de là que viendrait ironie?

Un jour Tholomyès prit à part les trois autres, fît un geste d'oracle, et leur dit:

— Il y a bientôt un an que Fantine, Dahlia, Zéphine et Favourite nous demandent de leur faire une surprise. Nous la leur avons promise solennellement. Elles nous en parlent toujours, à moi surtout. De même qu'à Naples les vieilles femmes crient à saint Janvier: Faccia gialluta, fa o miracolo. Face jaune, fais ton miracle! nos belles me disent sans cesse: «Tholomyès, quand accoucheras-tu de ta surprise?» En même temps nos parents nous écrivent. Scie des deux côtés. Le moment me semble venu. Causons.

Sur ce, Tholomyès baissa la voix, et articula mystérieusement quelque chose de si gai qu'un vaste et enthousiaste ricanement sortit des quatre bouches à la fois et que Blachevelle s'écria:

— Ça, c'est une idée!

Un estaminet plein de fumée se présenta, ils y entrèrent, et le reste de leur conférence se perdit dans l'ombre.

Le résultat de ces ténèbres fut une éblouissante partie de plaisir qui eut lieu le dimanche suivant, les quatre jeunes gens invitant les quatre jeunes filles.

Chapitre III

Quatre à quatre

Ce qu'était une partie de campagne d'étudiants et de grisettes, il y a quarante-cinq ans, on se le représente malaisément aujourd'hui. Paris n'a plus les mêmes environs; la figure de ce qu'on pourrait appeler la vie circumparisienne a complètement changé depuis un demi-siècle; où il y avait le coucou, il y a le wagon; où il y avait la patache, il y a le bateau à vapeur; on dit aujourd'hui Fécamp comme on disait Saint-Cloud. Le Paris de 1862 est une ville qui a la France pour banlieue.

Les quatre couples accomplirent consciencieusement toutes les folies champêtres possibles alors. On entrait dans les vacances, et c'était une chaude et claire journée d'été. La veille, Favourite, la seule qui sût écrire, avait écrit ceci à Tholomyès au nom des quatre: «C'est un bonne heure de sortir de bonheur.» C'est pourquoi ils se levèrent à cinq heures du matin. Puis ils allèrent à Saint-Cloud par le coche, regardèrent la cascade à sec, et s'écrièrent: «Cela doit être bien beau quand il y a de l'eau!» déjeunèrent à la Tête-Noire, où Castaing n'avait pas encore passé, se payèrent une partie de bagues au quinconce du grand bassin, montèrent à la lanterne de Diogène, jouèrent des macarons à la roulette du pont de Sèvres, cueillirent des bouquets à Puteaux, achetèrent des mirlitons à Neuilly, mangèrent partout des chaussons de pommes, furent parfaitement heureux.

Les jeunes filles bruissaient et bavardaient comme des fauvettes échappées. C'était un délire. Elles donnaient par moments de petites tapes aux jeunes gens. Ivresse matinale de la vie! Adorables années! L'aile des libellules frissonne. Oh! qui que vous soyez, vous souvenez-vous? Avez-vous marché dans les broussailles, en écartant les branches à cause de la tête charmante qui vient derrière vous? Avez-vous glissé en riant sur quelque talus mouillé par la pluie avec une femme aimée qui vous retient par la main et qui s'écrie: «Ah! mes brodequins tout neufs! dans quel état ils sont!»

Disons tout de suite que cette joyeuse contrariété, une ondée, manqua à cette compagnie de belle humeur, quoique Favourite eût dit en partant, avec un accent magistral et maternel: Les limaces se promènent dans les sentiers. Signe de pluie, mes enfants.

Toutes quatre étaient follement jolies. Un bon vieux poète classique, alors en renom, un bonhomme qui avait une Éléonore, M. le chevalier de Labouïsse, errant ce jour-là sous les marronniers de Saint-Cloud, les vit passer vers dix heures du matin; il s'écria: Il y en a une de trop, songeant aux Grâces. Favourite, l'amie de Blachevelle, celle de vingt-trois ans, la vieille, courait en avant sous les grandes branches vertes, sautait les fossés, enjambait éperdument les buissons, et présidait cette gaîté avec une verve de jeune faunesse. Zéphine et Dahlia, que le hasard avait faites belles de façon qu'elles se faisaient valoir en se rapprochant et se complétaient, ne se quittaient point, par instinct de coquetterie plus encore que par amitié, et, appuyées l'une à l'autre, prenaient des poses anglaises; les premiers keepsakes venaient de paraître, la mélancolie pointait pour les femmes, comme, plus tard, le byronisme pour les hommes, et les cheveux du sexe tendre commençaient à s'éplorer. Zéphine et Dahlia étaient coiffées en rouleaux. Listolier et Fameuil, engagés dans une discussion sur leurs professeurs, expliquaient à Fantine la différence qu'il y avait entre M. Delvincourt et M. Blondeau.

Blachevelle semblait avoir été créé expressément pour porter sur son bras le dimanche le châle-ternaux boiteux de Favourite.

Tholomyès suivait, dominant le groupe. Il était très gai, mais on sentait en lui le gouvernement; il y avait de la dictature dans sa jovialité; son ornement principal était un pantalon jambes-d'éléphant, en nankin, avec sous-pieds de tresse de cuivre; il avait un puissant rotin de deux cents francs à la main, et, comme il se permettait tout, une chose étrange appelée cigare, à la bouche. Rien n'étant sacré pour lui, il fumait.

— Ce Tholomyès est étonnant, disaient les autres avec vénération. Quels pantalons! quelle énergie!

Quant à Fantine, c'était la joie. Ses dents splendides avaient évidemment reçu de Dieu une fonction, le rire. Elle portait à sa main plus volontiers que sur sa tête son petit chapeau de paille cousue, aux longues brides blanches. Ses épais cheveux blonds, enclins à flotter et facilement dénoués et qu'il fallait rattacher sans cesse, semblaient faits pour la fuite de Galatée sous les saules. Ses lèvres roses babillaient avec enchantement. Les coins de sa bouche voluptueusement relevés, comme aux mascarons antiques d'Érigone, avaient l'air d'encourager les audaces; mais ses longs cils pleins d'ombre s'abaissaient discrètement sur ce brouhaha du bas du visage comme pour mettre le holà. Toute sa toilette avait on ne sait quoi de chantant et de flambant. Elle avait une robe de barège mauve, de petits souliers-cothurnes mordorés dont les rubans traçaient des X sur son fin bas blanc à jour, et cette espèce de spencer en mousseline, invention marseillaise, dont le nom, canezou, corruption du mot quinze août prononcé à la Canebière, signifie beau temps, chaleur et midi. Les trois autres, moins timides, nous l'avons dit, étaient décolletées tout net, ce qui, l'été, sous des chapeaux couverts de fleurs, a beaucoup de grâce et d'agacerie; mais, à côté de ces ajustements hardis, le canezou de la blonde Fantine, avec ses transparences, ses indiscrétions et ses réticences, cachant et montrant à la fois, semblait une trouvaille provocante de la décence, et la fameuse cour d'amour, présidée par la vicomtesse de Cette aux yeux vert de mer, eût peut-être donné le prix de la coquetterie à ce canezou qui concourait pour la chasteté. Le plus naïf est quelquefois le plus savant. Cela arrive.

Éclatante de face, délicate de profil, les yeux d'un bleu profond, les paupières grasses, les pieds cambrés et petits, les poignets et les chevilles admirablement emboîtés, la peau blanche laissant voir çà et là les arborescences azurées des veines, la joue puérile et franche, le cou robuste des Junons éginétiques, la nuque forte et souple, les épaules modelées comme par Coustou, ayant au centre une voluptueuse fossette visible à travers la mousseline; une gaîté glacée de rêverie; sculpturale et exquise; telle était Fantine; et l'on devinait sous ces chiffons une statue, et dans cette statue une âme.

Fantine était belle, sans trop le savoir. Les rares songeurs, prêtres mystérieux du beau, qui confrontent silencieusement toute chose à la perfection, eussent entrevu en cette petite ouvrière, à travers la transparence de la grâce parisienne, l'antique euphonie sacrée. Cette fille de l'ombre avait de la race. Elle était belle sous les deux espèces, qui sont le style et le rythme. Le style est la forme de l'idéal; le rythme en est le mouvement.

Nous avons dit que Fantine était la joie, Fantine était aussi la pudeur.

Pour un observateur qui l'eût étudiée attentivement, ce qui se dégageait d'elle, à travers toute cette ivresse de l'âge, de la saison et de l'amourette, c'était une invincible expression de retenue et de modestie. Elle restait un peu étonnée. Ce chaste étonnement-là est la nuance qui sépare Psyché de Vénus. Fantine avait les longs doigts blancs et fins de la vestale qui remue les cendres du feu sacré avec une épingle d'or. Quoiqu'elle n'eût rien refusé, on ne le verra que trop, à Tholomyès, son visage, au repos, était souverainement virginal; une sorte de dignité sérieuse et presque austère l’envahissait soudainement à de certaines heures, et rien n’était singulier et troublant comme de voir la gaîté s’y éteindre si vite et le recueillement y succéder sans transition à l’épanouissement. Cette gravité subite, parfois sévèrement accentuée, ressemblait au dédain d’une déesse. Son front, son nez et son menton offraient cet équilibre de ligne, très distinct de l’équilibre de proportion, et d’où résulte l’harmonie du visage; dans l’intervalle si caractéristique qui sépare la base du nez de la lèvre supérieure, elle avait ce pli imperceptible et charmant, signe mystérieux de la chasteté qui rendit Barberousse amoureux d’une Diane trouvée dans les fouilles d’Icône.

L’amour est une faute; soit. Fantine était l’innocence surnageant sur la faute.

Chapitre IV

Tholomyès est si joyeux qu'il chante une chanson espagnole

Cette journée-là était d'un bout à l'autre faite d'aurore. Toute la nature semblait avoir congé, et rire. Les parterres de Saint-Cloud embaumaient; le souffle de la Seine remuait vaguement les feuilles; les branches gesticulaient dans le vent; les abeilles mettaient les jasmins au pillage; toute une bohème de papillons s'ébattait dans les achillées, les trèfles et les folles avoines; il y avait dans l'auguste parc du roi de France un tas de vagabonds, les oiseaux.

Les quatre joyeux couples, mêlés au soleil, aux champs, aux fleurs, aux arbres, resplendissaient.

Et, dans cette communauté de paradis, parlant, chantant, courant, dansant, chassant aux papillons, cueillant des liserons, mouillant leurs bas à jour roses dans les hautes herbes, fraîches, folles, point méchantes, toutes recevaient un peu çà et là les baisers de tous, excepté Fantine, enfermée dans sa vague résistance rêveuse et farouche, et qui aimait.

— Toi, lui disait Favourite, tu as toujours l'air chose.

Ce sont là les joies. Ces passages de couples heureux sont un appel profond à la vie et à la nature, et font sortir de tout la caresse et la lumière. Il y avait une fois une fée qui fit les prairies et les arbres exprès pour les amoureux. De là cette éternelle école buissonnière des amants qui recommence sans cesse et qui durera tant qu'il y aura des buissons et des écoliers. De là la popularité du printemps parmi les penseurs. Le patricien et le gagne-petit, le duc et pair et le robin, les gens de la cour et les gens de la ville, comme on parlait autrefois, tous sont sujets de cette fée. On rit, on se cherche, il y a dans l'air une clarté d'apothéose, quelle transfiguration que d'aimer! Les clercs de notaire sont des dieux. Et les petits cris, les poursuites dans l'herbe, les tailles prises au vol, ces jargons qui sont des mélodies, ces adorations qui éclatent dans la façon de dire une syllabe, ces cerises arrachées d'une bouche à l'autre, tout cela flamboie et passe dans des gloires célestes. Les belles filles font un doux gaspillage d'elles-mêmes. On croit que cela ne finira jamais. Les philosophes, les poètes, les peintres regardent ces extases et ne savent qu'en faire, tant cela les éblouit. Le départ pour Cythère! s'écrie Watteau; Lancret, le peintre de la roture, contemple ses bourgeois envolés dans le bleu; Diderot tend les bras à toutes ces amourettes, et d'Urfé y mêle des druides.

Après le déjeuner les quatre couples étaient allés voir, dans ce qu'on appelait alors le carré du roi, une plante nouvellement arrivée de l'Inde, dont le nom nous échappe en ce moment, et qui à cette époque attirait tout Paris à Saint-Cloud; c'était un bizarre et charmant arbrisseau haut sur tige, dont les innombrables branches fines comme des fils, ébouriffées, sans feuilles, étaient couvertes d'un million de petites rosettes blanches; ce qui faisait que l'arbuste avait l'air d'une chevelure pouilleuse de fleurs. Il y avait toujours foule à l'admirer.

L'arbuste vu, Tholomyès s'était écrié: «J'offre des ânes!» et, prix fait avec un ânier, ils étaient revenus par Vanves et Issy. À Issy, incident. Le parc, Bien National possédé à cette époque par le munitionnaire Bourguin, était d'aventure tout grand ouvert. Ils avaient franchi la grille, visité l'anachorète mannequin dans sa grotte, essayé les petits effets mystérieux du fameux cabinet des miroirs, lascif traquenard digne d'un satyre devenu millionnaire ou de Turcaret métamorphosé en Priape. Ils avaient robustement secoué le grand filet balançoire attaché aux deux châtaigniers célébrés par l'abbé de Bernis. Tout en y balançant ces belles l'une après l'autre, ce qui faisait, parmi les rires universels, des plis de jupe envolée où Greuze eût trouvé son compte, le toulousain Tholomyès, quelque peu espagnol, Toulouse est cousine de Tolosa, chantait, sur une mélopée mélancolique, la vieille chanson gallega probablement inspirée par quelque belle fille lancée à toute volée sur une corde entre deux arbres:

Soy de Badajoz.
Amor me llama.
Toda mi alma
Es en mi ojos
Porque enseñas
À tus piernas.

Fantine seule refusa de se balancer.

— Je n'aime pas qu'on ait du genre comme ça, murmura assez aigrement Favourite.

Les ânes quittés, joie nouvelle; on passa la Seine en bateau, et de Passy, à pied, ils gagnèrent la barrière de l'Étoile. Ils étaient, on s'en souvient, debout depuis cinq heures du matin; mais, bah! il n'y a pas de lassitude le dimanche, disait Favourite; le dimanche, la fatigue ne travaille pas. Vers trois heures les quatre couples, effarés de bonheur, dégringolaient aux montagnes russes, édifice singulier qui occupait alors les hauteurs Beaujon et dont on apercevait la ligne serpentante au-dessus des arbres des Champs-Élysées.

De temps en temps Favourite s’écriait:

— Et la surprise? je demande la surprise.

— Patience, répondait Tholomyès.

Chapitre V

Chez Bombarda

Les montagnes russes épuisées, on avait songé au dîner; et le radieux huitain, enfin un peu las, s'était échoué au cabaret Bombarda, succursale qu'avait établie aux Champs-Élysées ce fameux restaurateur Bombarda, dont on voyait alors l'enseigne rue de Rivoli à côté du passage Delorme.

Une chambre grande, mais laide, avec alcôve et lit au fond (vu la plénitude du cabaret le dimanche, il avait fallu accepter ce gîte); deux fenêtres d'où l'on pouvait contempler, à travers les ormes, le quai et la rivière; un magnifique rayon d'août effleurant les fenêtres; deux tables; sur l'une une triomphante montagne de bouquets mêlés à des chapeaux d'hommes et de femmes; à l'autre les quatre couples attablés autour d'un joyeux encombrement de plats, d'assiettes, de verres et de bouteilles; des cruchons de bière mêlés à des flacons de vin; peu d'ordre sur la table, quelque désordre dessous;

Ils faisaient sous la table

Un bruit, un trique-trac de pieds épouvantable dit Molière.

Voilà où en était vers quatre heures et demie du soir la bergerade commencée à cinq heures du matin. Le soleil déclinait, l'appétit s'éteignait.

Les Champs-Élysées, pleins de soleil et de foule, n'étaient que lumière et poussière, deux choses dont se compose la gloire. Les chevaux de Marly, ces marbres hennissants, se cabraient dans un nuage d'or. Les carrosses allaient et venaient. Un escadron de magnifiques gardes du corps, clairon en tête, descendait l'avenue de Neuilly; le drapeau blanc, vaguement rose au soleil couchant, flottait sur le dôme des Tuileries. La place de la Concorde, redevenue alors place Louis XV, regorgeait de promeneurs contents. Beaucoup portaient la fleur de lys d'argent suspendue au ruban blanc moiré qui, en 1817, n'avait pas encore tout à fait disparu des boutonnières. Çà et là au milieu des passants faisant cercle et applaudissant, des rondes de petites filles jetaient au vent une bourrée bourbonienne alors célèbre, destinée à foudroyer les Cent-Jours, et qui avait pour ritournelle:

Rendez-nous notre père de Gand,

Rendez-nous notre père.

Des tas de faubouriens endimanchés, parfois même fleurdelysés comme les bourgeois, épars dans le grand carré et dans le carré Marigny, jouaient aux bagues et tournaient sur les chevaux de bois; d'autres buvaient; quelques-uns, apprentis imprimeurs, avaient des bonnets de papier; on entendait leurs rires. Tout était radieux. C'était un temps de paix incontestable et de profonde sécurité royaliste; c'était l'époque où un rapport intime et spécial du préfet de police Anglès au roi sur les faubourgs de Paris se terminait par ces lignes: «Tout bien considéré, sire, il n'y a rien à craindre de ces gens-là. Ils sont insouciants et indolents comme des chats. Le bas peuple des provinces est remuant, celui de Paris ne l'est pas. Ce sont tous petits hommes. Sire, il en faudrait deux bout à bout pour faire un de vos grenadiers. Il n'y a point de crainte du côté de la populace de la capitale. Il est remarquable que la taille a encore décru dans cette population depuis cinquante ans; et le peuple des faubourgs de Paris est plus petit qu'avant la révolution. Il n'est point dangereux. En somme, c'est de la canaille bonne.»

Qu'un chat puisse se changer en lion, les préfets de police ne le croient pas possible; cela est pourtant, et c'est là le miracle du peuple de Paris. Le chat d'ailleurs, si méprisé du comte Anglès, avait l'estime des républiques antiques; il incarnait à leurs yeux la liberté, et, comme pour servir de pendant à la Minerve aptère du Pirée, il y avait sur la place publique de Corinthe le colosse de bronze d'un chat. La police naïve de la restauration voyait trop «en beau» le peuple de Paris. Ce n'est point, autant qu'on le croit, de la «canaille bonne». Le Parisien est au Français ce que l'Athénien était au Grec; personne ne dort mieux que lui, personne n'est plus franchement frivole et paresseux que lui, personne mieux que lui n'a l'air d'oublier; qu'on ne s'y fie pas pourtant; il est propre à toute sorte de nonchalance, mais, quand il y a de la gloire au bout, il est admirable à toute espèce de furie. Donnez-lui une pique, il fera le 10 août; donnez-lui un fusil, vous aurez Austerlitz. Il est le point d'appui de Napoléon et la ressource de Danton. S'agit-il de la patrie? il s'enrôle; s'agit-il de la liberté? il dépave. Gare! ses cheveux pleins de colère sont épiques; sa blouse se drape en chlamyde. Prenez garde. De la première rue Greneta venue, il fera des fourches caudines. Si l’heure sonne, ce faubourien va grandir, ce petit homme va se lever, et il regardera d’une façon terrible, et son souffle deviendra tempête, et il sortira de cette pauvre poitrine grêle assez de vent pour déranger les plis des Alpes. C’est grâce au faubourien de Paris que la révolution, mêlée aux armées, conquiert l’Europe. Il chante, c’est sa joie. Proportionnez sa chanson à sa nature, et vous verrez! Tant qu’il n’a pour refrain que la Carmagnole, il ne renverse que Louis XVI; faites-lui chanter la Marseillaise, il délivrera le monde.

Cette note écrite en marge du rapport Anglès, nous revenons à nos quatre couples. Le dîner, comme nous l’avons dit, s’achevait.

Chapitre VI

Chapitre où l’on s’adore

Propos de table et propos d’amour; les uns sont aussi insaisissables que les autres; les propos d’amour sont des nuées, les propos de table sont des fumées.

Fameuil et Dahlia fredonnaient; Tholomyès buvait; Zéphine riait, Fantine souriait. Listolier soufflait dans une trompette de bois achetée à Saint-Cloud. Favourite regardait tendrement Blachevelle et disait:

— Blachevelle, je t’adore.

Ceci amena une question de Blachevelle:

— Qu’est-ce que tu ferais, Favourite, si je cessais de t’aimer?

— Moi! s’écria Favourite. Ah! ne dis pas cela, même pour rire! Si tu cessais de m’aimer, je te sauterais après, je te grifferais, je te gratignerais, je te jetterais de l’eau, je te ferais arrêter.

Blachevelle sourit avec la fatuité voluptueuse d’un homme chatouillé à l’amour-propre. Favourite reprit:

— Oui, je crierais à la garde! Ah! je me gênerais par exemple! Canaille!

Blachevelle, extasié, se renversa sur sa chaise et ferma orgueilleusement les deux yeux.

Dahlia, tout en mangeant, dit bas à Favourite dans le brouhaha:

— Tu l’idolâtres donc bien, ton Blachevelle?

— Moi, je le déteste, répondit Favourite du même ton en ressaisissant sa fourchette. Il est avare. J’aime le petit d’en face de chez moi. Il est très bien, ce jeune homme-là, le connais-tu? On voit qu’il a le genre d’être acteur. J’aime les acteurs. Sitôt qu’il rentre, sa mère dit: «Ah! mon Dieu! ma tranquillité est perdue. Le voilà qui va crier. Mais, mon ami, tu me casses la tête!» Parce qu’il va dans la maison, dans des greniers à rats, dans des trous noirs, si haut qu’il peut monter, — et chanter, et déclamer, est-ce que je sais, moi? qu’on l’entend d’en bas! Il gagne déjà vingt sous par jour chez un avoué à écrire de la chicane. Il est fils d’un ancien chantre de Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas. Ah! il est très bien. Il m’idolâtre tant qu’un jour qu’il me voyait faire de la pâte pour des crêpes, il m’a dit: Mamselle, faites des beignets de vos gants et je les mangerai. Il n’y a que les artistes pour dire des choses comme ça. Ah! il est très bien. Je suis en train d’être insensée de ce petit-là. C’est égal, je dis à Blachevelle que je l’adore. Comme je mens! Hein? comme je mens!

Favourite fit une pause, et continua:

— Dahlia, vois-tu, je suis triste. Il n’a fait que pleuvoir tout l’été, le vent m’agace, le vent ne décolère pas, Blachevelle est très pingre, c’est à peine s’il y a des petits pois au marché, on ne sait que manger, j’ai le spleen, comme disent les Anglais, le beurre est si cher! et puis, vois, c’est une horreur, nous dînons dans un endroit où il y a un lit, ça me dégoûte de la vie.

Chapitre VII

Sagesse de Tholomyès

Cependant, tandis que quelques-uns chantaient, les autres causaient tumultueusement, et tous ensemble; ce n'était plus que du bruit. Tholomyès intervint:

— Ne parlons point au hasard ni trop vite, s'écria-t-il. Méditons si nous voulons être éblouissants. Trop d'improvisation vide bêtement l'esprit. Bière qui coule n'amasse point de mousse. Messieurs, pas de hâte. Mêlons la majesté à la ripaille; mangeons avec recueillement; festinons lentement. Ne nous pressons pas. Voyez le printemps; s'il se dépêche, il est flambé, c'est-à-dire gelé. L'excès de zèle perd les pêchers et les abricotiers. L'excès de zèle tue la grâce et la joie des bons dîners. Pas de zèle, messieurs! Grimod de la Reynière est de l'avis de Talleyrand.

Une sourde rébellion gronda dans le groupe.

— Tholomyès, laisse-nous tranquilles, dit Blachevelle.

— À bas le tyran! dit Fameuil.

— Bombarda, Bombance et Bamboche! cria Listolier.

— Le dimanche existe, reprit Fameuil.

— Nous sommes sobres, ajouta Listolier.

— Tholomyès, fit Blachevelle, contemple mon calme.

— Tu en es le marquis, répondit Tholomyès.

Ce médiocre jeu de mots fit l'effet d'une pierre dans une mare. Le marquis de Montcalm était un royaliste alors célèbre. Toutes les grenouilles se turent.

— Amis, s'écria Tholomyès, de l'accent d'un homme qui ressaisit l'empire, remettez-vous. Il ne faut pas que trop de stupeur accueille ce calembour tombé du ciel. Tout ce qui tombe de la sorte n'est pas nécessairement digne d'enthousiasme et de respect. Le calembour est la fiente de l'esprit qui vole. Le lazzi tombe n'importe où; et l'esprit, après la ponte d'une bêtise, s'enfonce dans l'azur. Une tache blanchâtre qui s'aplatit sur le rocher n'empêche pas le condor de planer. Loin de moi l'insulte au calembour! Je l'honore dans la proportion de ses mérites; rien de plus. Tout ce qu'il y a de plus auguste, de plus sublime et de plus charmant dans l'humanité, et peut-être hors de l'humanité, a fait des jeux de mots. Jésus-

Christ a fait un calembour sur saint Pierre, Moïse sur Isaac, Eschyle sur Polynice, Cléopâtre sur Octave. Et notez que ce calembour de Cléopâtre a précédé la bataille d'Actium, et que, sans lui, personne ne se souviendrait de la ville de Toryne, nom grec qui signifie cuiller à pot. Cela concédé, je reviens à mon exhortation. Mes frères, je le répète, pas de zèle, pas de tohu-bohu, pas d'excès, même en pointes, gaîtés, liesses et jeux de mots. Écoutez-moi, j'ai la prudence d'Amphiaraüs et la calvitie de César. Il faut une limite, même aux rébus. Est modus in rebus. Il faut une limite, même aux dîners. Vous aimez les chaussons aux pommes, mesdames, n'en abusez pas. Il faut, même en chaussons, du bon sens et de l'art. La gloutonnerie châtie le glouton. Gula punit Gulax. L'indigestion est chargée par le bon Dieu de faire de la morale aux estomacs. Et, retenez ceci: chacune de nos passions, même l'amour, a un estomac qu'il ne faut pas trop remplir. En toute chose il faut écrire à temps le mot finis, il faut se contenir, quand cela devient urgent, tirer le verrou sur son appétit, mettre au violon sa fantaisie et se mener soi-même au poste. Le sage est celui qui sait à un moment donné opérer sa propre arrestation. Ayez quelque confiance en moi. Parce que j'ai fait un peu mon droit, à ce que me disent mes examens, parce que je sais la différence qu'il y a entre la question mue et la question pendante, parce que j'ai soutenu une thèse en latin sur la manière dont on donnait la torture à Rome au temps où Munatius Demens était questeur du Parricide, parce que je vais être docteur, à ce qu'il paraît, il ne s'ensuit pas de toute nécessité que je sois un imbécile. Je vous recommande la modération dans vos désirs. Vrai comme je m'appelle Félix Tholomyès, je parle bien. Heureux celui qui, lorsque l'heure a sonné, prend un parti héroïque, et abdique comme Sylla, ou Origène!

Favourite écoutait avec une attention profonde.

— Félix! dit-elle, quel joli mot! j'aime ce nom-là. C'est en latin. Ça veut dire Prosper.

Tholomyès poursuivit:

— Quirites, gentlemen, Caballeros, mes amis! voulez-vous ne sentir aucun aiguillon et vous passer de lit nuptial et braver l'amour? Rien de plus simple. Voici la recette: la limonade, l'exercice outré, le travail forcé, éreintez-vous, traînez des blocs, ne dormez pas, veillez, gorgez-vous de boissons nitreuses et de tisanes de nymphaeas, savourez des émulsions de pavots et d'agnuscastus, assaisonnez-moi cela d'une diète sévère, crevez de faim, et joignez-y les bains froids, les ceintures d'herbes, l'application d’une plaque de plomb, les lotions avec la liqueur de Saturne et les fomentations avec l’oxycrat.

— J’aime mieux une femme, dit Listolier.

— La femme! reprit Tholomyès, méfiez-vous-en. Malheur à celui qui se livre au cœur changeant de la femme! La femme est perfide et tortueuse. Elle déteste le serpent par jalousie de métier. Le serpent, c’est la boutique en face.

— Tholomyès, cria Blachevelle, tu es ivre!

— Pardieu! dit Tholomyès.

— Alors sois gai, reprit Blachevelle.

Et, remplissant son verre, il se leva:

— Gloire au vin! Nunc te, Bacche, canam! Pardon, mesdemoiselles, c’est de l’espagnol. Et la preuve, señoras, la voici: tel peuple, telle futaille. L’arrobe de Castille contient seize litres, le cantaro d’Alicante douze, l’almude des Canaries vingt-cinq, le cuartin des Baléares vingt-six, la botte du czar Pierre trente. Vive ce czar qui était grand, et vive sa botte qui était plus grande encore! Mesdames, un conseil d’ami: trompez-vous de voisin, si bon vous semble. Le propre de l’amour, c’est d’errer. L’amourette n’est pas faite pour s’accroupir et s’abrutir comme une servante anglaise qui a le calus du scrobage aux genoux. Elle n’est pas faite pour cela, elle erre gaîment, la douce amourette! On a dit: l’erreur est humaine; moi je dis: l’erreur est amoureuse. Mesdames, je vous idolâtre toutes. Ô Zéphine, ô Joséphine, figure plus que chiffonnée, vous seriez charmante, si vous n’étiez de travers. Vous avez l’air d’un joli visage sur lequel, par mégarde, on s’est assis. Quant à Favourite, ô nymphes et muses! un jour que Blachevelle passait le ruisseau de la rue Guérin-Boisseau, il vit une belle fille aux bas blancs et bien tirés qui montrait ses jambes. Ce prologue lui plut, et Blachevelle aima. Celle qu’il aima était Favourite. Ô Favourite, tu as des lèvres ioniennes. Il y avait un peintre grec, appelé Euphorion, qu’on avait surnommé le peintre des lèvres. Ce Grec seul eût été digne de peindre ta bouche! Écoute! avant toi, il n’y avait pas de créature digne de ce nom. Tu es faite pour recevoir la pomme comme Vénus ou pour la manger comme Ève. La beauté commence à toi. Je viens de parler d’Ève, c’est toi qui l’as créée. Tu mérites le brevet d’invention de la jolie femme. Ô Favourite, je cesse de vous tutoyer, parce que je passe de la poésie à la prose. Vous parliez de mon nom tout à l’heure. Cela m’a attendri; mais, qui que nous soyons, méfions-nous des noms. Ils peuvent se tromper. Je me nomme Félix et ne suis pas heureux. Les mots sont des menteurs. N’acceptons pas aveuglément les indications qu’ils nous donnent. Ce serait une erreur d’écrire à Liège pour avoir des bouchons et à Pau pour avoir des gants. Miss Dahlia, à votre place, je m’appellerais Rosa. Il faut que la fleur sente bon et que la femme ait de l’esprit. Je ne dis rien de Fantine, c’est une songeuse, une rêveuse, une pensive, une sensitive; c’est un fantôme ayant la forme d’une nymphe et la pudeur d’une nonne, qui se fourvoie dans la vie de grisette, mais qui se réfugie dans les illusions, et qui chante, et qui prie, et qui regarde l’azur sans trop savoir ce qu’elle voit ni ce qu’elle fait, et qui, les yeux au ciel, erre dans un jardin où il y a plus d’oiseaux qu’il n’en existe! Ô Fantine, sache ceci: moi Tholomyès, je suis une illusion; mais elle ne m’entend même pas, la blonde fille des chimères! Du reste, tout en elle est fraîcheur, suavité, jeunesse, douce clarté matinale. Ô Fantine, fille digne de vous appeler marguerite ou perle, vous êtes une femme du plus bel orient. Mesdames, un deuxième conseil: ne vous mariez point; le mariage est une greffe; cela prend bien ou mal; fuyez ce risque. Mais, bah! qu’est-ce que je chante là? Je perds mes paroles. Les filles sont incurables sur l’épousaille; et tout ce que nous pouvons dire, nous autres sages, n’empêchera point les giletières et les piqueuses de bottines de rêver des maris enrichis de diamants. Enfin, soit; mais, belles, retenez ceci: vous mangez trop de sucre. Vous n’avez qu’un tort, ô femmes, c’est de grignoter du sucre. Ô sexe rongeur, tes jolies petites dents blanches adorent le sucre. Or, écoutez bien, le sucre est un sel. Tout sel est desséchant. Le sucre est le plus desséchant de tous les sels. Il pompe à travers les veines les liquides du sang; de là la coagulation, puis la solidification du sang; de là les tubercules dans le poumon; de là la mort. Et c’est pourquoi le diabète confine à la phthisie. Donc ne croquez pas de sucre, et vous vivrez! Je me tourne vers les hommes. Messieurs, faites des conquêtes. Pillez-vous les uns aux autres sans remords vos bien-aimées. Chassez-croisez. En amour, il n’y a pas d’amis. Partout où il y a une jolie femme l’hostilité est ouverte. Pas de quartier, guerre à outrance! Une jolie femme est un casus belli; une jolie femme est un flagrant délit. Toutes les invasions de l’histoire sont déterminées par des cotillons. La femme est le droit de l’homme. Romulus a enlevé les Sabines, Guillaume a enlevé les Saxonnes, César a enlevé les Romaines. L’homme qui n’est pas aimé plane comme un vautour sur les amantes d’autrui; et quant à moi, à tous ces infortunés qui sont veufs, je jette la proclamation sublime de Bonaparte à l'armée d'Italie: «Soldats, vous manquez de tout. L'ennemi en a.»

Tholomyès s'interrompit.

— Souffle, Tholomyès, dit Blachevelle.

En même temps, Blachevelle, appuyé de Listolier et de Fameuil, entonna sur un air de complainte une de ces chansons d'atelier composées des premiers mots venus, rimées richement et pas du tout, vides de sens comme le geste de l'arbre et le bruit du vent, qui naissent de la vapeur des pipes et se dissipent et s'envolent avec elle. Voici par quel couplet le groupe donna la réplique à la harangue de Tholomyès:

Les pères dindons donnèrent de l'argent à un agent pour que mons Clermont-Tonnerre fût fait pape à la Saint-Jean; Mais Clermont ne put pas être fait pape, n'étant pas prêtre.

Alors leur agent rageant leur rapporta leur argent.

Ceci n'était pas fait pour calmer l'improvisation de Tholomyès; il vida son verre, le remplit, et recommença.

— À bas la sagesse! oubliez tout ce que j'ai dit. Ne soyons ni prudes, ni prudents, ni prud'hommes. Je porte un toast à l'allégresse; soyons allègres! Complétons notre cours de droit par la folie et la nourriture. Indigestion et digeste. Que Justinien soit le mâle et que Ripaille soit la femelle! Joie dans les profondeurs! Vis, ô création! Le monde est un gros diamant! Je suis heureux. Les oiseaux sont étonnants. Quelle fête partout! Le rossignol est un Elleviou gratis. Été, je te salue. Ô Luxembourg, ô Géorgiques de la rue Madame et de l'allée de l'Observatoire! Ô pioupious rêveurs! ô toutes ces bonnes charmantes qui, tout en gardant des enfants, s'amusent à en ébaucher! Les pampas de l'Amérique me plairaient, si je n'avais les arcades de l'Odéon. Mon âme s'envole dans les forêts vierges et dans les savanes. Tout est beau. Les mouches bourdonnent dans les rayons. Le soleil a éternué le colibri. Embrasse-moi, Fantine!

Il se trompa, et embrassa Favourite.

Chapitre VIII

Mort d’un cheval

— On dîne mieux chez Edon que chez Bombarda, s’écria Zéphine.

— Je préfère Bombarda à Edon, déclara Blachevelle. Il a plus de luxe. C’est plus asiatique. Voyez la salle d’en bas. Il y a des glaces sur les murs.

— J’en aime mieux dans mon assiette, dit Favourite.

Blachevelle insista:

— Regardez les couteaux. Les manches sont en argent chez Bombarda, et en os chez Edon. Or, l’argent est plus précieux que l’os.

— Excepté pour ceux qui ont un menton d’argent, observa Tholomyès.

Il regardait en cet instant-là le dôme des Invalides, visible des fenêtres de Bombarda.

Il y eut une pause.

— Tholomyès, cria Fameuil, tout à l’heure, Listolier et moi, nous avions une discussion.

— Une discussion est bonne, répondit Tholomyès, une querelle vaut mieux.

— Nous disputions philosophie.

— Soit.

— Lequel préfères-tu de Descartes ou de Spinosa?

— Désaugiers, dit Tholomyès.

Cet arrêt rendu, il but et reprit:

— Je consens à vivre. Tout n’est pas fini sur la terre, puisqu’on peut encore déraisonner. J’en rends grâces aux dieux immortels. On ment, mais on rit. On affirme, mais on doute. L’inattendu jaillit du syllogisme. C’est beau. Il est encore ici-bas des humains qui savent joyeusement ouvrir et fermer la boîte à surprises du paradoxe. Ceci, mesdames, que vous buvez d’un air tranquille, est du vin de Madère, sachez-le, du cru de Coural das Freiras qui est à trois cent dix-sept toises au-dessus du niveau de la mer! Attention en buvant! trois cent dix-sept toises! et monsieur Bombarda, le magnifique restaurateur, vous donne ces trois cent dix-sept toises pour quatre francs cinquante centimes!

Fameuil interrompit de nouveau:

— Tholomyès, tes opinions font loi. Quel est ton auteur favori?

— Ber....

— Quin?

— Non. Choux.

Et Tholomyès poursuivit:

— Honneur à Bombarda! il égalerait Munophis d’Elephanta s’il pouvait me cueillir une almée, et Thygélion de Chéronée s’il pouvait m’apporter une hétaïre! car, ô mesdames, il y avait des Bombarda en Grèce et en Égypte. C’est Apulée qui nous l’apprend. Hélas! toujours les mêmes choses et rien de nouveau. Plus rien d’inédit dans la création du créateur! Nil sub sole novum, dit Salomon; amor omnibus idem, dit Virgile; et Carabine monte avec Carabin dans la galiote de Saint-Cloud, comme Aspasie s’embarquait avec Périclès sur la flotte de Samos. Un dernier mot. Savez-vous ce que c’était qu’Aspasie, mesdames? Quoiqu’elle vécût dans un temps où les femmes n’avaient pas encore d’âme, c’était une âme; une âme d’une nuance rose et pourpre, plus embrasée que le feu, plus franche que l’aurore. Aspasie était une créature en qui se touchaient les deux extrêmes de la femme; c’était la prostituée déesse. Socrate, plus Manon Lescaut. Aspasie fut créée pour le cas où il faudrait une catin à Prométhée.

Tholomyès, lancé, se serait difficilement arrêté, si un cheval ne se fût abattu sur le quai en cet instant-là même. Du choc, la charrette et l’orateur restèrent court. C’était une jument beauceronne, vieille et maigre et digne de l’équarrisseur, qui traînait une charrette fort lourde. Parvenue devant Bombarda, la bête, épuisée et accablée, avait refusé d’aller plus loin. Cet incident avait fait de la foule. À peine le charretier, jurant et indigné, avait-il eu le temps de prononcer avec l’énergie convenable le mot sacramentel: mâtin! appuyé d’un implacable coup de fouet, que la haridelle était tombée pour ne plus se relever. Au brouhaha des passants, les gais auditeurs de Tholomyès tournèrent la tête, et Tholomyès en profita pour clore son allocution par cette strophe mélancolique:

Elle était de ce monde où coucous et carrosses
Ont le même destin,
Et, rosse, elle a vécu ce que vivent les rosses,
L’espace d’un: mâtin!

— Pauvre cheval, soupira Fantine.

Et Dahlia s’écria:

— Voilà Fantine qui va se mettre à plaindre les chevaux! Peut-on être fichue bête comme ça!

En ce moment, Favourite, croisant les bras et renversant la tête en arrière, regarda résolûment Tholomyès et dit:

— Ah çà! et la surprise?

— Justement. L’instant est arrivé, répondit Tholomyès. Messieurs, l’heure de la surprise a sonné. Mesdames, attendez-nous un moment.

— Cela commence par un baiser, dit Blachevelle.

— Sur le front, ajouta Tholomyès.

Chacun déposa gravement un baiser sur le front de sa maîtresse; puis ils se dirigèrent vers la porte tous les quatre à la file, en mettant leur doigt sur la bouche.

Favourite battit des mains à leur sortie.

— C’est déjà amusant, dit-elle.

— Ne soyez pas trop longtemps, murmura Fantine. Nous vous attendons.

Chapitre IX

Fin joyeuse de la joie

Les jeunes filles, restées seules, s'accoudèrent deux à deux sur l'appui des fenêtres, jasant, penchant leur tête et se parlant d'une croisée à l'autre.

Elles virent les jeunes gens sortir du cabaret Bombarda bras dessus bras dessous; ils se retournèrent, leur firent des signes en riant, et disparurent dans cette poudreuse cohue du dimanche qui envahit hebdomadairement les Champs-Élysées.

— Ne soyez pas longtemps! cria Fantine.

— Que vont-ils nous rapporter? dit Zéphine.

— Pour sûr ce sera joli, dit Dahlia.

— Moi, reprit Favourite, je veux que ce soit en or.

Elles furent bientôt distraites par le mouvement du bord de l'eau qu'elles distinguaient dans les branches des grands arbres et qui les divertissait fort. C'était l'heure du départ des malles-poste et des diligences. Presque toutes les messageries du midi et de l'ouest passaient alors par les Champs-Élysées. La plupart suivaient le quai et sortaient par la barrière de Passy. De minute en minute, quelque grosse voiture peinte en jaune et en noir, pesamment chargée, bruyamment attelée, difforme à force de malles, de bâches et de valises, pleine de têtes tout de suite disparues, broyant la chaussée, changeant tous les pavés en briquets, se ruait à travers la foule avec toutes les étincelles d'une forge, de la poussière pour fumée, et un air de furie. Ce vacarme réjouissait les jeunes filles. Favourite s'exclamait:

— Quel tapage! on dirait des tas de chaînes qui s'envolent.

Il arriva une fois qu'une de ces voitures qu'on distinguait difficilement dans l'épaisseur des ormes, s'arrêta un moment, puis repartit au galop. Cela étonna Fantine.

— C'est particulier! dit-elle. Je croyais que la diligence ne s'arrêtait jamais. Favourite haussa les épaules.

— Cette Fantine est surprenante. Je viens la voir par curiosité. Elle s'éblouit des choses les plus simples. Une supposition; je suis un voyageur, je dis à la diligence: je vais en avant, vous me prendrez sur le quai en passant. La diligence passe, me voit, s'arrête, et me prend. Cela se fait tous les jours. Tu ne connais pas la vie, ma chère.

Un certain temps s’écoula ainsi. Tout à coup Favourite eut le mouvement de quelqu’un qui se réveille.

— Eh bien, fit-elle, et la surprise?

— À propos, oui, reprit Dahlia, la fameuse surprise?

— Ils sont bien longtemps! dit Fantine.

Comme Fantine achevait ce soupir, le garçon qui avait servi le dîner entra. Il tenait à la main quelque chose qui ressemblait à une lettre.

— Qu’est-ce que cela? demanda Favourite.

Le garçon répondit:

— C’est un papier que ces messieurs ont laissé pour ces dames.

— Pourquoi ne l’avoir pas apporté tout de suite?

— Parce que ces messieurs, reprit le garçon, ont commandé de ne le remettre à ces dames qu’au bout d’une heure.

Favourite arracha le papier des mains du garçon. C’était une lettre en effet.

— Tiens! dit-elle. Il n’y a pas d’adresse. Mais voici ce qui est écrit dessus:

Ceci est la surprise.

Elle décacheta vivement la lettre, l’ouvrit et lut (elle savait lire):

«Ô nos amantes!

«Sachez que nous avons des parents. Des parents, vous ne connaissez pas beaucoup ça. Ça s’appelle des pères et mères dans le code civil, puéril et honnête. Or, ces parents gémissent, ces vieillards nous réclament, ces bons hommes et ces bonnes femmes nous appellent enfants prodigues, ils souhaitent nos retours, et nous offrent de tuer des veaux. Nous leur obéissons, étant vertueux. À l’heure où vous lirez ceci, cinq chevaux fougueux nous rapporteront à nos papas et à nos mamans. Nous fichons le camp, comme dit Bossuet. Nous partons, nous sommes partis. Nous fuyons dans les bras de Laffitte et sur les ailes de Caillard. La diligence de Toulouse nous arrache à l’abîme, et l’abîme c’est vous, ô nos belles petites! Nous rentrons dans la société, dans le devoir et dans l’ordre, au grand trot, à raison de trois lieues à l’heure. Il importe à la patrie que nous soyons, comme tout le monde, préfets, pères de famille, gardes champêtres et conseillers d’État. Vénérez-nous. Nous nous sacrifions. Pleurez-nous rapidement et remplacez-nous vite. Si cette lettre vous déchire, rendez-le-lui. Adieu.

«Pendant près de deux ans, nous vous avons rendues heureuses. Ne nous en gardez pas rancune.

«Signé: Blachevelle.

«Fameuil.

«Listolier.

«Félix Tholomyès

«Post-scriptum. Le dîner est payé.»

Les quatre jeunes filles se regardèrent.

Favourite rompit la première le silence.

— Eh bien! s'écria-t-elle, c'est tout de même une bonne farce.

— C'est très drôle, dit Zéphine.

— Ce doit être Blachevelle qui a eu cette idée-là, reprit Favourite. Ça me rend amoureuse de lui. Sitôt parti, sitôt aimé. Voilà l'histoire.

— Non, dit Dahlia, c'est une idée à Tholomyès. Ça se reconnaît.

— En ce cas, reprit Favourite, mort à Blachevelle et vive Tholomyès!

— Vive Tholomyès! crièrent Dahlia et Zéphine.

Et elles éclatèrent de rire.

Fantine rit comme les autres.

Une heure après, quand elle fut rentrée dans sa chambre, elle pleura. C'était, nous l'avons dit, son premier amour; elle s'était donnée à ce Tholomyès comme à un mari, et la pauvre fille avait un enfant.

Livre quatrième — Confier, c’est quelquefois livrer

Chapitre I

Une mère qui en rencontre une autre

Il y avait, dans le premier quart de ce siècle, à Montfermeil, près de Paris, une façon de gargote qui n’existe plus aujourd’hui. Cette gargote était tenue par des gens appelés Thénardier, mari et femme. Elle était située dans la ruelle du Boulanger. On voyait au-dessus de la porte une planche clouée à plat sur le mur. Sur cette planche était peint quelque chose qui ressemblait à un homme portant sur son dos un autre homme, lequel avait de grosses épaulettes de général dorées avec de larges étoiles argentées; des taches rouges figuraient du sang; le reste du tableau était de la fumée et représentait probablement une bataille. Au bas on lisait cette inscription: Au Sergent de Waterloo.

Rien n’est plus ordinaire qu’un tombereau ou une charrette à la porte d’une auberge. Cependant le véhicule ou, pour mieux dire, le fragment de véhicule qui encombrait la rue devant la gargote du Sergent de Waterloo, un soir du printemps de 1818, eût certainement attiré par sa masse l’attention d’un peintre qui eût passé là.

C’était l’avant-train d’un de ces fardiers, usités dans les pays de forêts, et qui servent à charrier des madriers et des troncs d’arbres. Cet avant-train se composait d’un massif essieu de fer à pivot où s’emboîtait un lourd timon, et que supportaient deux roues démesurées. Tout cet ensemble était trapu, écrasant et difforme. On eût dit l’affût d’un canon géant. Les ornières avaient donné aux roues, aux jantes, aux moyeux, à l’essieu et au timon, une couche de vase, hideux badigeonnage jaunâtre assez semblable à celui dont on orne volontiers les cathédrales. Le bois disparaissait sous la boue et le fer sous la rouille. Sous l’essieu pendait en draperie une grosse chaîne digne de Goliath forçat. Cette chaîne faisait songer, non aux poutres qu’elle avait fonction de transporter, mais aux mastodontes et aux mammons qu’elle eût pu atteler; elle avait un air de bagne, mais de bagne cyclopéen et surhumain, et elle semblait détachée de quelque monstre. Homère y eût lié Polyphème et Shakespeare Caliban.

Pourquoi cet avant-train de fardier était-il à cette place dans la rue? D’abord, pour encombrer la rue; ensuite pour achever de se rouiller. Il y a dans le vieil ordre social une foule d'institutions qu'on trouve de la sorte sur son passage en plein air et qui n'ont pas pour être là d'autres raisons.

Le centre de la chaîne pendait sous l'essieu assez près de terre, et sur la courbure, comme sur la corde d'une balançoire, étaient assises et groupées, ce soir-là, dans un entrelacement exquis, deux petites filles, l'une d'environ deux ans et demi, l'autre de dix-huit mois, la plus petite dans les bras de la plus grande. Un mouchoir savamment noué les empêchait de tomber. Une mère avait vu cette effroyable chaîne, et avait dit: Tiens! voilà un joujou pour mes enfants.

Les deux enfants, du reste gracieusement attifées, et avec quelque recherche, rayonnaient; on eût dit deux roses dans de la ferraille; leurs yeux étaient un triomphe; leurs fraîches joues riaient. L'une était châtain, l'autre était brune. Leurs naïfs visages étaient deux étonnements ravis; un buisson fleuri qui était près de là envoyait aux passants des parfums qui semblaient venir d'elles; celle de dix-huit mois montrait son gentil ventre nu avec cette chaste indécence de la petitesse.

Au-dessus et autour de ces deux têtes délicates, pétries dans le bonheur et trempées dans la lumière, le gigantesque avant-train, noir de rouille, presque terrible, tout enchevêtré de courbes et d'angles farouches, s'arrondissait comme un porche de caverne. À quelques pas, accroupie sur le seuil de l'auberge, la mère, femme d'un aspect peu avenant du reste, mais touchante en ce moment-là, balançait les deux enfants au moyen d'une longue ficelle, les couvant des yeux de peur d'accident avec cette expression animale et céleste propre à la maternité; à chaque va-et-vient, les hideux anneaux jetaient un bruit strident qui ressemblait à un cri de colère; les petites filles s'extasiaient, le soleil couchant se mêlait à cette joie, et rien n'était charmant comme ce caprice du hasard, qui avait fait d'une chaîne de titans une escarpolette de chérubins.

Tout en berçant ses deux petites, la mère chantonnait d'une voix fausse une romance alors célèbre:

Il le faut, disait un guerrier.

Sa chanson et la contemplation de ses filles l'empêchaient d'entendre et de voir ce qui se passait dans la rue.

Cependant quelqu'un s'était approché d'elle, comme elle commençait le premier couplet de la romance, et tout à coup elle entendit une voix qui disait très près de son oreille:

— Vous avez là deux jolis enfants, madame, répondit la mère, continuant sa romance:

À la belle et tendre Imogine.

rèpondit la mère, continuant sa romance, puis elle tourna la tête.

Une femme était devant elle, à quelques pas. Cette femme, elle aussi, avait un enfant qu’elle portait dans ses bras.

Elle portait en outre un assez gros sac de nuit qui semblait fort lourd.

L’enfant de cette femme était un des plus divins êtres qu’on pût voir. C’était une fille de deux à trois ans. Elle eût pu jouter avec les deux autres pour la coquetterie de l’ajustement; elle avait un bavolet de linge fin, des rubans à sa brassière et de la valenciennes à son bonnet. Le pli de sa jupe relevée laissait voir sa cuisse blanche, potelée et ferme. Elle était admirablement rose et bien portante. La belle petite donnait envie de mordre dans les pommes de ses joues. On ne pouvait rien dire de ses yeux, sinon qu’ils devaient être très grands et qu’ils avaient des cils magnifiques. Elle dormait.

Elle dormait de ce sommeil d’absolue confiance propre à son âge. Les bras des mères sont faits de tendresse; les enfants y dorment profondément.

Quant à la mère, l’aspect en était pauvre et triste. Elle avait la mise d’une ouvrière qui tend à redevenir paysanne. Elle était jeune. Était-elle belle? peut-être; mais avec cette mise il n’y paraissait pas. Ses cheveux, d’où s’échappait une mèche blonde, semblaient fort épais, mais disparaissaient sévèrement sous une coiffe de béguine, laide, serrée, étroite, et nouée au menton. Le rire montre les belles dents quand on en a; mais elle ne riait point. Ses yeux ne semblaient pas être secs depuis très longtemps. Elle était pâle; elle avait l’air très lasse et un peu malade; elle regardait sa fille endormie dans ses bras avec cet air particulier d’une mère qui a nourri son enfant. Un large mouchoir bleu, comme ceux où se mouchent les invalides, plié en fichu, masquait lourdement sa taille. Elle avait les mains hâlées et toutes piquées de taches de rousseur, l’index durci et déchiqueté par l’aiguille, une Mante brune de laine bourrue, une robe de toile et de gros souliers. C’était Fantine.

C’était Fantine. Difficile à reconnaître. Pourtant, à l’examiner attentivement, elle avait toujours sa beauté. Un pli triste, qui ressemblait à un commencement d’ironie, ridait sa joue droite. Quant à sa toilette, cette aérienne toilette de mousseline et de rubans qui semblait faite avec de la gaîté, de la folie et de la musique, pleine de grelots et parfumée de lilas, elle s’était évanouie comme ces beaux givres éclatants qu’on prend pour des diamants au soleil; ils fondent et laissent la branche toute noire.

Dix mois s’étaient écoulés depuis «la bonne farce».

Que s’était-il passé pendant ces dix mois? on le devine.

Après l’abandon, la gêne. Fantine avait tout de suite perdu de vue Favourite, Zéphine et Dahlia; le lien, brisé du côté des hommes, s’était défait du côté des femmes; on les eût bien étonnées, quinze jours après, si on leur eût dit qu’elles étaient amies; cela n’avait plus de raison d’être. Fantine était restée seule. Le père de son enfant parti, — hélas! ces ruptures-là sont irrévocables, — elle se trouva absolument isolée, avec l’habitude du travail de moins et le goût du plaisir de plus. Entraînée par sa liaison avec Tholomyès à dédaigner le petit métier qu’elle savait, elle avait négligé ses débouchés; ils s’étaient fermés. Nulle ressource. Fantine savait à peine lire et ne savait pas écrire; on lui avait seulement appris dans son enfance à signer son nom; elle avait fait écrire par un écrivain public une lettre à Tholomyès, puis une seconde, puis une troisième. Tholomyès n’avait répondu à aucune. Un jour, Fantine entendit des commères dire en regardant sa fille:

— Est-ce qu’on prend ces enfants-là au sérieux? on hausse les épaules de ces enfants-là!

Alors elle songea à Tholomyès qui haussait les épaules de son enfant et qui ne prenait pas cet être innocent au sérieux; et son cœur devint sombre à l’endroit de cet homme. Quel parti prendre pourtant? Elle ne savait plus à qui s’adresser. Elle avait commis une faute, mais le fond de sa nature, on s’en souvient, était pudeur et vertu. Elle sentit vaguement qu’elle était à la veille de tomber dans la détresse, et de glisser dans le pire. Il fallait du courage; elle en eut, et se roidit. L’idée lui vint de retourner dans sa ville natale, à Montreuil-sur-mer. Là quelqu’un peut-être la connaîtrait et lui donnerait du travail. Oui; mais il faudrait cacher sa faute. Et elle entrevoyait confusément la nécessité possible d’une séparation plus douloureuse encore que la première. Son cœur se serra, mais elle prit sa résolution. Fantine, on le verra, avait la farouche bravoure de la vie.

Elle avait déjà vaillamment renoncé à la parure, s’était vêtue de toile, et avait mis toute sa soie, tous ses chiffons, tous ses rubans et toutes ses dentelles sur sa fille, seule vanité qui lui restât, et sainte celle-là. Elle vendit tout ce qu’elle avait, ce qui lui produisit deux cents francs; ses petites dettes payées, elle n’eut plus que quatre-vingts francs environ. À vingt-deux ans, par une belle matinée de printemps, elle quittait Paris, emportant son enfant sur son dos. Quelqu'un qui les eût vues passer toutes les deux eût pitié. Cette femme n'avait au monde que cet enfant, et cet enfant n'avait au monde que cette femme. Fantine avait nourri sa fille; cela lui avait fatigué la poitrine, et elle toussait un peu.

Nous n'aurons plus occasion de parler de M. Félix Tholomyès. Bornons-nous à dire que, vingt ans plus tard, sous le roi Louis-Philippe, c'était un gros avoué de province, influent et riche, électeur sage et juré très sévère; toujours homme de plaisir.

Vers le milieu du jour, après avoir, pour se reposer, cheminé de temps en temps, moyennant trois ou quatre sous par lieue, dans ce qu'on appelait alors les Petites Voitures des Environs de Paris, Fantine se trouvait à Montfermeil, dans la ruelle du Boulanger.

Comme elle passait devant l'auberge Thénardier, les deux petites filles, enchantées sur leur escarpolette monstre, avaient été pour elle une sorte d'éblouissement, et elle s'était arrêtée devant cette vision de joie.

Il y a des charmes. Ces deux petites filles en furent un pour cette mère.

Elle les considérait, toute émue. La présence des anges est une annonce de paradis. Elle crut voir au dessus de cette auberge le mystérieux ICI de la providence. Ces deux petites étaient si évidemment heureuses! Elle les regardait, elle les admirait, tellement attendrie qu'au moment où la mère reprenait haleine entre deux vers de sa chanson, elle ne put s'empêcher de lui dire ce mot qu'on vient de lire:

— Vous avez là deux jolis enfants, madame.

Les créatures les plus féroces sont désarmées par la caresse à leurs petits. La mère leva la tête et remercia, et fit asseoir la passante sur le banc de la porte, elle-même étant sur le seuil. Les deux femmes causèrent.

— Je m'appelle madame Thénardier, dit la mère des deux petites. Nous tenons cette auberge.

Puis, toujours à sa romance, elle reprit entre ses dents:

Il le faut, je suis chevalier,
Et je pars pour la Palestine.

Cette madame Thénardier était une femme rousse, charnue, anguleuse; le type femme-à-soldat dans toute sa disgrâce. Et, chose bizarre, avec un air penché qu'elle devait à des lectures romanesques. C'était une minaudière hommasse. De vieux romans qui se sont éraillés sur des imaginations de gargotières ont de ces effets-là. Elle était jeune encore; elle avait à peine trente ans. Si cette femme, qui était accroupie, se fût tenue droite, peut-être sa haute taille et sa carrure de colosse ambulant propre aux foires, eussent-elles dès l'abord effarouché la voyageuse, troublé sa confiance, et fait évanouir ce que nous avons à raconter. Une personne qui est assise au lieu d'être debout, les destinées tiennent à cela.

La voyageuse raconta son histoire, un peu modifiée:

Qu'elle était ouvrière; que son mari était mort; que le travail lui manquait à Paris, et qu'elle allait en chercher ailleurs; dans son pays; qu'elle avait quitté Paris, le matin même, à pied; que, comme elle portait son enfant, se sentant fatiguée, et ayant rencontré la voiture de Villemomble, elle y était montée; que de Villemomble elle était venue à Montfermeil à pied, que la petite avait un peu marché, mais pas beaucoup, c'est si jeune, et qu'il avait fallu la prendre, et que le bijou s'était endormi.

Et sur ce mot elle donna à sa fille un baiser passionné qui la réveilla. L'enfant ouvrit les yeux, de grands yeux bleus comme ceux de sa mère, et regarda, quoi? rien, tout, avec cet air sérieux et quelquefois sévère des petits enfants, qui est un mystère de leur lumineuse innocence devant nos crépuscules de vertus. On dirait qu'ils se sentent anges et qu'ils nous savent hommes. Puis l'enfant se mit à rire, et, quoique la mère la retint, glissa à terre avec l'indomptable énergie d'un petit être qui veut courir. Tout à coup elle aperçut les deux autres sur leur balançoire, s'arrêta court, et tira la langue, signe d'admiration.

La mère Thénardier détacha ses filles, les fit descendre de l'escarpolette, et dit:

— Amusez-vous toutes les trois.

Ces âges-là s'apprivoisent vite, et au bout d'une minute les petites Thénardier jouaient avec la nouvelle venue à faire des trous dans la terre, plaisir immense.

Cette nouvelle venue était très gaie; la bonté de la mère est écrite dans la gaîté du marmot; elle avait pris un brin de bois qui lui servait de pelle, et elle creusait énergiquement une fosse bonne pour une mouche. Ce que fait le fossoyeur devient riant, fait par l'enfant.

Les deux femmes continuaient de causer.

— Comment s'appelle votre mioche?

— Cosette.

Cosette, lisez Euphrasie. La petite se nommait Euphrasie. Mais d'Euphrasie la mère avait fait Cosette, par ce doux et gracieux instinct des mères et du peuple qui change Josefa en Pepita et Françoise en Sillette. C'est là un genre de dérivés qui dérange et déconcerte toute la science des étymologistes. Nous avons connu une grand'mère qui avait réussi à faire de Théodore, Gnon.

— Quel âge a-t-elle?

— Elle va sur trois ans.

— C'est comme mon aînée.

Cependant les trois petites filles étaient groupées dans une posture d'anxiété profonde et de béatitude; un événement avait lieu; un gros ver venait de sortir de terre; et elles avaient peur, et elles étaient en extase.

Leurs fronts radieux se touchaient; on eût dit trois têtes dans une auréole.

— Les enfants, s'écria la mère Thénardier, comme ça se connaît tout de suite! les voilà qu'on jurerait trois sœurs!

Ce mot fut l'étincelle qu'attendait probablement l'autre mère. Elle saisit la main de la Thénardier, la regarda fixement, et lui dit:

— Voulez-vous me garder mon enfant?

La Thénardier eut un de ces mouvements surpris qui ne sont ni le consentement ni le refus.

La mère de Cosette poursuivit:

— Voyez-vous, je ne peux pas emmener ma fille au pays. L'ouvrage ne le permet pas. Avec un enfant, on ne trouve pas à se placer. Ils sont si ridicules dans ce pays-là. C'est le bon Dieu qui m'a fait passer devant votre auberge. Quand j'ai vu vos petites si jolies et si propres et si contentes, cela m'a bouleversée. J'ai dit: voilà une bonne mère. C'est ça; ça fera trois sœurs. Et puis, je ne serai pas longtemps à revenir. Voulez-vous me garder mon enfant?

— Il faudrait voir, dit la Thénardier.

— Je donnerais six francs par mois.

Ici une voix d'homme cria du fond de la gargote:

— Pas à moins de sept francs. Et six mois payés d'avance.

— Six fois sept quarante-deux, dit la Thénardier.

— Je les donnerai, dit la mère.

— Et quinze francs en dehors pour les premiers frais, ajouta la voix d'homme.

— Total cinquante-sept francs, dit la madame Thénardier. Et à travers ces chiffres, elle chantonnait vaguement:

Il le faut, disait un guerrier.

— Je les donnerai, dit la mère, j’ai quatre-vingts francs. Il me restera de quoi aller au pays. En allant à pied. Je gagnerai de l’argent là-bas, et dès que j’en aurai un peu, je reviendrai chercher l’amour.

La voix d’homme reprit:

— La petite a un trousseau?

— C’est mon mari, dit la Thénardier.

— Sans doute elle a un trousseau, le pauvre trésor. J’ai bien vu que c’était votre mari. Et un beau trousseau encore! un trousseau insensé. Tout par douzaines; et des robes de soie comme une dame. Il est là dans mon sac de nuit.

— Il faudra le donner, repartit la voix d’homme.

— Je crois bien que je le donnerai! dit la mère. Ce serait cela qui serait drôle si je laissais ma fille toute nue!

La face du maître apparut.

— C’est bon, dit-il.

Le marché fut conclu. La mère passa la nuit à l’auberge, donna son argent et laissa son enfant, renoua son sac de nuit dégonflé du trousseau et léger désormais, et partit le lendemain matin, comptant revenir bientôt. On arrange tranquillement ces départs-là, mais ce sont des désespoirs.

Une voisine des Thénardier rencontra cette mère comme elle s’en allait, et s’en revint en disant:

— Je viens de voir une femme qui pleure dans la rue, que c’est un déchirement.

Quand la mère de Cosette fut partie, l’homme dit à la femme:

— Cela va me payer mon effet de cent dix francs qui échoit demain. Il me manquait cinquante francs. Sais-tu que j’aurais eu l’huissier et un protêt? Tu as fait là une bonne souricière avec tes petites.

— Sans m’en douter, dit la femme.

Chapitre II

Première esquisse de deux figures louches

La souris prise était bien chétive; mais le chat se réjouit même d'une souris maigre. Qu'était-ce que les Thénardier?

Disons-en un mot dès à présent. Nous compléterons le croquis plus tard.

Ces êtres appartenaient à cette classe bâtarde composée de gens grossiers parvenus et de gens intelligents déchus, qui est entre la classe dite moyenne et la classe dite inférieure, et qui combine quelques-uns des défauts de la seconde avec presque tous les vices de la première, sans avoir le généreux élan de l'ouvrier ni l'ordre honnête du bourgeois.

C'étaient de ces natures naines qui, si quelque feu sombre les chauffe par hasard, deviennent facilement monstrueuses. Il y avait dans la femme le fond d'une brute et dans l'homme l'étoffe d'un gueux. Tous deux étaient au plus haut degré susceptibles de l'espèce de hideux progrès qui se fait dans le sens du mal. Il existe des âmes écrevisses reculant continuellement vers les ténèbres, rétrogradant dans la vie plutôt qu'elles n'y avancent, employant l'expérience à augmenter leur difformité, empirant sans cesse, et s'empreignant de plus en plus d'une noirceur croissante. Cet homme et cette femme étaient de ces âmes-là.

Le Thénardier particulièrement était gênant pour le physionomiste. On n'a qu'à regarder certains hommes pour s'en défier, on les sent ténébreux à leurs deux extrémités. Ils sont inquiets derrière eux et menaçants devant eux. Il y a en eux de l'inconnu. On ne peut pas plus répondre de ce qu'ils ont fait que de ce qu'ils feront. L'ombre qu'ils ont dans le regard les dénonce. Rien qu'en les entendant dire un mot ou qu'en les voyant faire un geste on entrevoit de sombres secrets dans leur passé et de sombres mystères dans leur avenir.

Ce Thénardier, s'il fallait l'en croire, avait été soldat; sergent, disait-il; il avait fait probablement la campagne de 1815, et s'était même comporté assez bravement, à ce qu'il paraît. Nous verrons plus tard ce qu'il en était. L'enseigne de son cabaret était une allusion à l'un de ses faits d'armes. Il l'avait peinte lui-même, car il savait faire un peu de tout; mal.

C'était l'époque où l'antique roman classique, qui, après avoir été Clélie, n'était plus que Lodoïska, toujours noble, mais de plus en plus vulgaire, tombé de mademoiselle de Scudéri à madame Barthélemy-Hadot, et de madame de Lafayette à madame Bournon-Malarme, incendiait l’âme aimante des portières de Paris et ravageait même un peu la banlieue. Madame Thénardier était juste assez intelligente pour lire ces espèces de livres. Elle s’en nourrissait. Elle y noyait ce qu’elle avait de cervelle; cela lui avait donné, tant qu’elle avait été très jeune, et même un peu plus tard, une sorte d’attitude pensive près de son mari, coquin d’une certaine profondeur, ruffian lettré à la grammaire près, grossier et fin en même temps, mais, en fait de sentimentalisme, lisant Pigault-Lebrun, et pour «tout ce qui touche le sexe», comme il disait dans son jargon, butor correct et sans mélange. Sa femme avait quelque douze ou quinze ans de moins que lui. Plus tard, quand les cheveux romanesquement pleureurs commencèrent à grisonner, quand la Mégère se dégagea de la Paméla, la Thénardier ne fut plus qu’une grosse méchante femme ayant savouré des romans bêtes. Or on ne lit pas impunément des niaiseries. Il en résulta que sa fille aînée se nomma Eponine. Quant à la cadette, la pauvre petite faillit se nommer Gulnare; elle dut à je ne sais quelle heureuse diversion faite par un roman de Ducray-Duminil, de ne s’appeler qu’Azelma.

Au reste, pour le dire en passant, tout n’est pas ridicule et superficiel dans cette curieuse époque à laquelle nous faisons ici allusion, et qu’on pourrait appeler l’anarchie des noms de baptême. À côté de l’élément romanesque, que nous venons d’indiquer, il y a le symptôme social. Il n’est pas rare aujourd’hui que le garçon bouvier se nomme Arthur, Alfred ou Alphonse, et que le vicomte — s’il y a encore des vicomtes — se nomme Thomas, Pierre ou Jacques. Ce déplacement qui met le nom «élégant» sur le plébéien et le nom campagnard sur l’aristocrate n’est autre chose qu’un remous d’égalité. L’irrésistible pénétration du souffle nouveau est là comme en tout. Sous cette discordance apparente, il y a une chose grande et profonde: la révolution française.

Chapitre III

L’Alouette

Il ne suffit pas d’être méchant pour prospérer. La gargote allait mal.

Grâce aux cinquante-sept francs de la voyageuse, Thénardier avait pu éviter un protêt et faire honneur à sa signature. Le mois suivant ils eurent encore besoin d’argent; la femme porta à Paris et engagea au Mont-de-Piété le trousseau de Cosette pour une somme de soixante francs. Dès que cette somme fut dépensée, les Thénardier s’accoutumèrent à ne plus voir dans la petite fille qu’un enfant qu’ils avaient chez eux par charité, et la traitèrent en conséquence. Comme elle n’avait plus de trousseau, on l’habilla des vieilles jupes et des vieilles chemises des petites Thénardier, c’est-à-dire de haillons.

On la nourrit des restes de tout le monde, un peu mieux que le chien et un peu plus mal que le chat. Le chat et le chien étaient du reste ses commensaux habituels; Cosette mangeait avec eux sous la table dans une écuelle de bois pareille à la leur. La mère qui s’était fixée, comme on le verra plus tard, à Montreuil-sur-mer, écrivait, ou, pour mieux dire, faisait écrire tous les mois afin d’avoir des nouvelles de son enfant. Les Thénardier répondaient invariablement: Cosette est à merveille. Les six premiers mois révolus, la mère envoya sept francs pour le septième mois, et continua assez exactement ses envois de mois en mois. L’année n’était pas finie que le Thénardier dit:

— Une belle grâce qu’elle nous fait là! que veut-elle que nous fassions avec ses sept francs?

Et il écrivit pour exiger douze francs. La mère, à laquelle ils persuadaient que son enfant était heureuse “et venait bien”, se soumit et envoya les douze francs.

Certaines natures ne peuvent aimer d’un côté sans haïr de l’autre. La mère Thénardier aimait passionnément ses deux filles à elle, ce qui fit qu’elle détesta l’étrangère. Il est triste de songer que l’amour d’une mère peut avoir de vilains aspects. Si peu de place que Cosette tînt chez elle, il lui semblait que cela était pris aux siens, et que cette petite diminuait l’air que ses filles respiraient. Cette femme, comme beaucoup de femmes de sa sorte, avait une somme de caresses et une somme de coups et d’injures à dépenser chaque jour. Si elle n’avait pas eu Cosette, il est certain que ses filles, tout idolâtrées qu’elles étaient, auraient tout reçu; mais l’étrangère leur rendit le service de détourner les coups sur elle. Ses filles n’eurent que les caresses. Cosette ne faisait pas un mouvement qui ne fît pleuvoir sur sa tête une grêle de châtiments violents et immérités. Doux être faible qui ne devait rien comprendre à ce monde ni à Dieu, sans cesse punie, grondée, rudoyée, battue et voyant à côté d’elle deux petites créatures comme elle, qui vivaient dans un rayon d’aurore!

La Thénardier étant méchante pour Cosette, Éponine et Azelma furent méchantes. Les enfants, à cet âge, ne sont que des exemplaires de la mère. Le format est plus petit, voilà tout.

Une année s’écoula, puis une autre.

On disait dans le village:

— Ces Thénardier sont de braves gens. Ils ne sont pas riches, et ils élèvent un pauvre enfant qu’on leur a abandonné chez eux!

On croyait Cosette oubliée par sa mère.

Cependant le Thénardier, ayant appris par on ne sait quelles voies obscures que l’enfant était probablement bâtard et que la mère ne pouvait l’avouer, exigea quinze francs par mois, disant que «la créature» grandissait et «mangeait», et menaçant de la renvoyer. «Quelle ne m’embête pas! s’écriait-il, je lui bombarde son mioche tout au beau milieu de ses cachotteries. Il me faut de l’augmentation.» La mère paya les quinze francs.

D’année en année, l’enfant grandit, et sa misère aussi.

Tant que Cosette fut toute petite, elle fut le souffre-douleur des deux autres enfants; dès qu’elle se mit à se développer un peu, c’est-à-dire avant même qu’elle eût cinq ans, elle devint la servante de la maison.

Cinq ans, dira-t-on, c’est invraisemblable. Hélas, c’est vrai. La souffrance sociale commence à tout âge.

N’avons-nous pas vu, récemment, le procès d’un nommé Dumolard, orphelin devenu bandit, qui, dès l’âge de cinq ans, disent les documents officiels, étant seul au monde «travaillait pour vivre, et volait.»

On fit faire à Cosette les commissions, balayer les chambres, la cour, la rue, laver la vaisselle, porter même des fardeaux. Les Thénardier se crurent d’autant plus autorisés à agir ainsi que la mère qui était toujours à Montreuil-sur-mer commença à mal payer. Quelques mois restèrent en souffrance.

Si cette mère fût revenue à Montfermeil au bout de ces trois années, elle n’eût point reconnu son enfant. Cosette, si jolie et si fraîche à son arrivée dans cette maison, était maintenant maigre et blême. Elle avait je ne sais quelle allure inquiète. Sournoise! disaient les Thénardier.

L’injustice l’avait faite hargneuse et la misère l’avait rendue laide. Il ne lui restait plus que ses beaux yeux qui faisaient peine, parce que, grands comme ils étaient, il semblait qu’on y vît une plus grande quantité de tristesse.

C’était une chose navrante de voir, l’hiver, ce pauvre enfant, qui n’avait pas encore six ans, grelottant sous de vieilles loques de toile trouées, balayer la rue avant le jour avec un énorme balai dans ses petites mains rouges et une larme dans ses grands yeux.

Dans le pays on l’appelait l’Alouette. Le peuple, qui aime les figures, s’était plu à nommer de ce nom ce petit être pas plus gros qu’un oiseau, tremblant, effarouché et frissonnant, éveillé le premier chaque matin dans la maison et dans le village, toujours dans la rue ou dans les champs avant l’aube. Seulement la pauvre Alouette ne chantait jamais.

Livre cinquième — La descente

Chapitre I

Histoire d’un progrès dans les verroteries noires

Cette mère cependant qui, au dire des gens de Montfermeil, semblait avoir abandonné son enfant, que devenait-elle? où était-elle? que faisait-elle?

Après avoir laissé sa petite Cosette aux Thénardier, elle avait continué son chemin et était arrivée à Montreuil-sur-mer.

C’était, on se le rappelle, en 1818.

Fantine avait quitté sa province depuis une dizaine d’années. Montreuil-sur-mer avait changé d’aspect. Tandis que Fantine descendait lentement de misère en misère, sa ville natale avait prospéré.

Depuis deux ans environ, il s’y était accompli un de ces faits industriels qui sont les grands événements des petits pays.

Ce détail importe, et nous croyons utile de le développer; nous dirions presque, de le souligner.

De temps immémorial, Montreuil-sur-mer avait pour industrie spéciale l’imitation des jais anglais et des verroteries noires d’Allemagne. Cette industrie avait toujours végété, à cause de la cherté des matières premières qui réagissait sur la main-d’œuvre. Au moment où Fantine revint à Montreuil-sur-mer, une transformation inouïe s’était opérée dans cette production des «articles noirs». Vers la fin de 1815, un homme, un inconnu, était venu s’établir dans la ville et avait eu l’idée de substituer, dans cette fabrication, la gomme laque à la résine et, pour les bracelets en particulier, les coulants en tôle simplement rapprochée aux coulants en tôle soudée. Ce tout petit changement avait été une révolution.

Ce tout petit changement en effet avait prodigieusement réduit le prix de la matière première, ce qui avait permis, premièrement, d’élever le prix de la main-d’œuvre, bienfait pour le pays; deuxièmement, d’améliorer la fabrication, avantage pour le consommateur; troisièmement, de vendre à meilleur marché tout en triplant le bénéfice, profit pour le manufacturier.

Ainsi pour une idée trois résultats.

En moins de trois ans, l’auteur de ce procédé était devenu riche, ce qui est bien, et avait tout fait riche autour de lui, ce qui est mieux. Il était étranger au département. De son origine, on ne savait rien; de ses commencements, peu de chose.

On contait qu’il était venu dans la ville avec fort peu d’argent, quelques centaines de francs tout au plus.

C’est de ce mince capital, mis au service d’une idée ingénieuse, fécondé par l’ordre et par la pensée, qu’il avait tiré sa fortune et la fortune de tout ce pays.

À son arrivée à Montreuil-sur-mer, il n’avait que les vêtements, la tournure et le langage d’un ouvrier.

Il paraît que, le jour même où il faisait obscurément son entrée dans la petite ville de Montreuil-sur-mer, à la tombée d’un soir de décembre, le sac au dos et le bâton d’épine à la main, un gros incendie venait d’éclater à la maison commune. Cet homme s’était jeté dans le feu, et avait sauvé, au péril de sa vie, deux enfants qui se trouvaient être ceux du capitaine de gendarmerie; ce qui fait qu’on n’avait pas songé à lui demander son passeport. Depuis lors, on avait su son nom. Il s’appelait le père Madeleine.

Chapitre II

M. Madeleine

C’était un homme d’environ cinquante ans, qui avait l’air préoccupé et qui était bon. Voilà tout ce qu’on en pouvait dire.

Grâce aux progrès rapides de cette industrie qu’il avait si admirablement remaniée, Montreuil-sur-mer était devenu un centre d’affaires considérable. L’Espagne, qui consomme beaucoup de jais noir, y commandait chaque année des achats immenses. Montreuil-sur-mer, pour ce commerce, faisait presque concurrence à Londres et à Berlin. Les bénéfices du père Madeleine étaient tels que, dès la deuxième année, il avait pu bâtir une grande fabrique dans laquelle il y avait deux vastes ateliers, l’un pour les hommes, l’autre pour les femmes. Quiconque avait faim pouvait s’y présenter, et était sûr de trouver là de l’emploi et du pain. Le père Madeleine demandait aux hommes de la bonne volonté, aux femmes des mœurs pures, à tous de la probité. Il avait divisé les ateliers afin de séparer les sexes et que les filles et les femmes pussent rester sages. Sur ce point, il était inflexible. C’était le seul où il fût en quelque sorte intolérant. Il était d’autant plus fondé à cette sévérité que, Montreuil-sur-mer étant une ville de garnison, les occasions de corruption abondaient. Du reste sa venue avait été un bienfait, et sa présence était une providence. Avant l’arrivée du père Madeleine, tout languissait dans le pays; maintenant tout y vivait de la vie saine du travail. Une forte circulation échauffait tout et pénétrait partout. Le chômage et la misère étaient inconnus. Il n’y avait pas de poche si obscure où il n’y eût un peu d’argent, pas de logis si pauvre où il n’y eût un peu de joie.

Le père Madeleine employait tout le monde. Il n’exigeait qu’une chose: soyez honnête homme! soyez honnête fille!

Comme nous l’avons dit, au milieu de cette activité dont il était la cause et le pivot, le père Madeleine faisait sa fortune, mais, chose assez singulière dans un simple homme de commerce, il ne paraissait point que ce fût là son principal souci. Il semblait qu’il songeât beaucoup aux autres et peu à lui. En 1820, on lui connaissait une somme de six cent trente mille francs placée à son nom chez Laffitte; mais avant de se réserver ces six cent trente mille francs, il avait dépensé plus d’un million pour la ville et pour les pauvres.

L’hôpital était mal doté; il y avait fondé dix lits. Montreuil-sur-mer est divisé en ville haute et ville basse. La ville basse, qu’il habitait, n’avait qu’une école, méchante masure qui tombait en ruine; il en avait construit deux, une pour les filles, l’autre pour les garçons. Il allouait de ses deniers aux deux instituteurs une indemnité double de leur maigre traitement officiel, et un jour, à quelqu’un qui s’en étonnait, il dit: «Les deux premiers fonctionnaires de l’état, c’est la nourrice et le maître d’école.» Il avait créé à ses frais une salle d’asile, chose alors presque inconnue en France, et une caisse de secours pour les ouvriers vieux et infirmes. Sa manufacture étant un centre, un nouveau quartier où il y avait bon nombre de familles indigentes avait rapidement surgi autour de lui; il y avait établi une pharmacie gratuite.

Dans les premiers temps, quand on le vit commencer, les bonnes âmes dirent: C’est un gaillard qui veut s’enrichir. Quand on le vit enrichir le pays avant de s’enrichir lui-même, les mêmes bonnes âmes dirent: C’est un ambitieux. Cela semblait d’autant plus probable que cet homme était religieux, et même pratiquait dans une certaine mesure, chose fort bien vue à cette époque. Il allait régulièrement entendre une basse messe tous les dimanches. Le député local, qui flairait partout des concurrences, ne tarda pas à s’inquiéter de cette religion. Ce député, qui avait été membre du corps législatif de l’empire, partageait les idées religieuses d’un père de l’oratoire connu sous le nom de Fouché, duc d’Otrante, dont il avait été la créature et l’ami. À huis clos il riait de Dieu doucement. Mais quand il vit le riche manufacturier Madeleine aller à la basse messe de sept heures, il entrevit un candidat possible, et résolut de le dépasser; il prit un confesseur jésuite et alla à la grand’messe et à vêpres. L’ambition en ce temps-là était, dans l’acception directe du mot, une course au clocher. Les pauvres profitèrent de cette terreur comme le bon Dieu, car l’honorable député fonda aussi deux lits à l’hôpital; ce qui fit douze.

Cependant en 1819 le bruit se répandit un matin dans la ville que, sur la présentation de M. le préfet, et en considération des services rendus au pays, le père Madeleine allait être nommé par le roi maire de Montreuil-sur-mer. Ceux qui avaient déclaré ce nouveau venu «un ambitieux», saisirent avec transport cette occasion que tous les hommes souhaitent de s’écrier: «Là! qu’est-ce que nous avions dit?» Tout Montreuil-sur-mer fut en rumeur. Le bruit était fondé. Quelques jours après, la nomination parut dans le Moniteur. Le lendemain, le père Madeleine refusa.

Dans cette même année 1819, les produits du nouveau procédé inventé par Madeleine figurèrent à l'exposition de l'industrie; sur le rapport du jury, le roi nomma l'inventeur chevalier de la Légion d'honneur. Nouvelle rumeur dans la petite ville. Eh bien! c'est la croix qu'il voulait! Le père Madeleine refusa la croix.

Décidément cet homme était une énigme. Les bonnes âmes se tirèrent d'affaire en disant: Après tout, c'est une espèce d'aventurier.

On l'a vu, le pays lui devait beaucoup, les pauvres lui devaient tout; il était si utile qu'il avait bien fallu qu'on finît par l'honorer, et il était si doux qu'il avait bien fallu qu'on finît par l'aimer; ses ouvriers en particulier l'adoraient, et il portait cette adoration avec une sorte de gravité mélancolique. Quand il fut constaté riche, «les personnes de la société» le saluèrent, et on l'appela dans la ville monsieur Madeleine; ses ouvriers et les enfants continuèrent de l'appeler le père Madeleine, et c'était la chose qui le faisait le mieux sourire. À mesure qu'il montait, les invitations pleuvaient sur lui. «La société» le réclamait. Les petits salons guindés de Montreuil-sur-mer qui, bien entendu, se fussent dans les premiers temps fermés à l'artisan, s'ouvrirent à deux battants au millionnaire. On lui fit mille avances. Il refusa.

Cette fois encore les bonnes âmes ne furent point empêchées.

— C'est un homme ignorant et de basse éducation. On ne sait d'où cela sort. Il ne saurait pas se tenir dans le monde. Il n'est pas du tout prouvé qu'il sache lire.

Quand on l'avait vu gagner de l'argent, on avait dit: c'est un marchand. Quand on l'avait vu semer son argent, on avait dit: c'est un ambitieux. Quand on l'avait vu repousser les honneurs, on avait dit: c'est un aventurier. Quand on le vit repousser le monde, on dit: c'est une brute.

En 1820, cinq ans après son arrivée à Montreuil-sur-mer, les services qu'il avait rendus au pays étaient si éclatants, le vœu de la contrée fut tellement unanime, que le roi le nomma de nouveau maire de la ville. Il refusa encore, mais le préfet résista à son refus, tous les notables vinrent le prier, le peuple en pleine rue le suppliait, l'insistance fut si vive qu'il finit par accepter. On remarqua que ce qui parut surtout le déterminer, ce fut l'apostrophe presque irritée d'une vieille femme du peuple qui lui cria du seuil de sa porte avec humeur: Un bon maire, c'est utile. Est-ce qu'on recule devant du bien qu'on peut faire?

Ce fut là la troisième phase de son ascension. Le père Madeleine était devenu monsieur Madeleine, monsieur Madeleine devint monsieur le maire.

Chapitre III

Sommes déposées chez Laffitte

Du reste, il était demeuré aussi simple que le premier jour. Il avait les cheveux gris, l’œil sérieux, le teint hâlé d’un ouvrier, le visage pensif d’un philosophe. Il portait habituellement un chapeau à bords larges et une longue redingote de gros drap, boutonnée jusqu’au menton. Il remplissait ses fonctions de maire, mais hors de là il vivait solitaire. Il parlait à peu de monde. Il se dérobait aux politesses, saluait de côté, s’esquivait vite, souriait pour se dispenser de causer, donnait pour se dispenser de sourire. Les femmes disaient de lui: Quel bon ours! Son plaisir était de se promener dans les champs.

Il prenait ses repas toujours seul, avec un livre ouvert devant lui où il lisait. Il avait une petite bibliothèque bien faite. Il aimait les livres; les livres sont des amis froids et sûrs. À mesure que le loisir lui venait avec la fortune, il semblait qu’il en profitât pour cultiver son esprit. Depuis qu’il était à Montreuil-sur-mer, on remarquait que d’année en année son langage devenait plus poli, plus choisi et plus doux.

Il emportait volontiers un fusil dans ses promenades, mais il s’en servait rarement. Quand cela lui arrivait par aventure, il avait un tir infaillible qui effrayait. Jamais il ne tuait un animal inoffensif. Jamais il ne tirait un petit oiseau. Quoiqu’il ne fût plus jeune, on contait qu’il était d’une force prodigieuse. Il offrait un coup de main à qui en avait besoin, relevait un cheval, poussait à une roue embourbée, arrêtait par les cornes un taureau échappé. Il avait toujours ses poches pleines de monnaie en sortant et vides en rentrant. Quand il passait dans un village, les marmots déguenillés couraient joyeusement après lui et l’entouraient comme une nuée de moucherons.

On croyait deviner qu’il avait dû vivre jadis de la vie des champs, car il avait toutes sortes de secrets utiles qu’il enseignait aux paysans. Il leur apprenait à détruire la teigne des blés en aspergeant le grenier et en inondant les fentes du plancher d’une dissolution de sel commun, et à chasser les charançons en suspendant partout, aux murs et aux toits, dans les héberges et dans les maisons, de l’orviot en fleur. Il avait des “recettes” pour extirper d’un champ la luzette, la nielle, la vesce, la gaverolle, la queue-de-renard, toutes les herbes parasites qui mangent le blé. Il défendait une lapinière contre les rats rien qu'avec l'odeur d'un petit cochon de Barbarie qu'il y mettait. Un jour il voyait des gens du pays très occupés à arracher des orties. Il regarda ce tas de plantes déracinées et déjà desséchées, et dit:

— C'est mort. Cela serait pourtant bon si l'on savait s'en servir. Quand l'ortie est jeune, la feuille est un légume excellent; quand elle vieillit, elle a des filaments et des fibres comme le chanvre et le lin. La toile d'ortie vaut la toile de chanvre. Hachée, l'ortie est bonne pour la volaille; broyée, elle est bonne pour les bêtes à cornes. La graine de l'ortie mêlée au fourrage donne du luisant au poil des animaux; la racine mêlée au sel produit une belle couleur jaune. C'est du reste un excellent foin qu'on peut faucher deux fois. Et que faut-il à l'ortie? Peu de terre, nul soin, nulle culture. Seulement la graine tombe à mesure qu'elle mûrit, et est difficile à récolter. Voilà tout. Avec quelque peine qu'on prendrait, l'ortie serait utile; on la néglige, elle devient nuisible. Alors on la tue. Que d'hommes ressemblent à l'ortie!

Il ajouta après un silence:

— Mes amis, retenez ceci, il n'y a ni mauvaises herbes ni mauvais hommes. Il n'y a que de mauvais cultivateurs.

Les enfants l'aimaient encore parce qu'il savait faire de charmants petits ouvrages avec de la paille et des noix de coco.

Quand il voyait la porte d'une église tendue de noir, il entrait; il recherchait un enterrement comme d'autres recherchent un baptême. Le veuvage et le malheur d'autrui l'attiraient à cause de sa grande douceur; il se mêlait aux amis en deuil, aux familles vêtues de noir, aux prêtres gémissant autour d'un cercueil. Il semblait donner volontiers pour texte à ses pensées ces psalmodies funèbres pleines de la vision d'un autre monde. L'œil au ciel, il écoutait, avec une sorte d'aspiration vers tous les mystères de l'infini, ces voix tristes qui chantent sur le bord de l'abîme obscur de la mort.

Il faisait une foule de bonnes actions en se cachant comme on se cache pour les mauvaises. Il pénétrait à la dérobée, le soir, dans les maisons; il montait furtivement des escaliers. Un pauvre diable, en rentrant dans son galetas, trouvait que sa porte avait été ouverte, quelquefois même forcée, dans son absence. Le pauvre homme se récriait: quelque malfaiteur est venu! Il entrait, et la première chose qu'il voyait, c'était une pièce d'or oubliée sur un meuble. “Le malfaiteur” qui était venu, c’était le père Madeleine.

Il était affable et triste. Le peuple disait: «Voilà un homme riche qui n’a pas l’air fier. Voilà un homme heureux qui n’a pas l’air content.»

Quelques-uns prétendaient que c’était un personnage mystérieux, et affirmaient qu’on n’entrait jamais dans sa chambre, laquelle était une vraie cellule d’anachorète meublée de sabliers ailés et enjolivée de tibias en croix et de têtes de mort. Cela se disait beaucoup, si bien que quelques jeunes femmes élégantes et malignes de Montreuil-sur-mer vinrent chez lui un jour, et lui demandèrent:

— Monsieur le maire, montrez-nous donc votre chambre. On dit que c’est une grotte.

Il sourit, et les introduisit sur-le-champ dans cette «grotte». Elles furent bien punies de leur curiosité. C’était une chambre garnie tout bonnement de meubles d’acajou assez laids comme tous les meubles de ce genre et tapissée de papier à douze sous. Elles n’y purent rien remarquer que deux flambeaux de forme vieillie qui étaient sur la cheminée et qui avaient l’air d’être en argent, «car ils étaient contrôlés». Observation pleine de l’esprit des petites villes.

On n’en continua pas moins de dire que personne ne pénétrait dans cette chambre et que c’était une caverne d’ermite, un rêvoir, un trou, un tombeau.

On se chuchotait aussi qu’il avait des sommes «immenses» déposées chez Laffitte, avec cette particularité qu’elles étaient toujours à sa disposition immédiate, de telle sorte, ajoutait-on, que M. Madeleine pourrait arriver un matin chez Laffitte, signer un reçu et emporter ses deux ou trois millions en dix minutes. Dans la réalité ces «deux ou trois millions» se réduisaient, nous l’avons dit, à six cent trente ou quarante mille francs.

Chapitre IV

M. Madeleine en deuil

Au commencement de 1821, les journaux annoncèrent la mort de M. Myriel, évêque de Digne, «surnommé monseigneur Bienvenu», et trépassé en odeur de sainteté à l'âge de quatre-vingt-deux ans.

L'évêque de Digne, pour ajouter ici un détail que les journaux omirent, était, quand il mourut, depuis plusieurs années aveugle, et content d'être aveugle, sa sœur étant près de lui.

Disons-le en passant, être aveugle et être aimé, c'est en effet, sur cette terre où rien n'est complet, une des formes les plus étrangement exquises du bonheur. Avoir continuellement à ses côtés une femme, une fille, une sœur, un être charmant, qui est là parce que vous avez besoin d'elle et parce qu'elle ne peut se passer de vous, se savoir indispensable à qui nous est nécessaire, pouvoir incessamment mesurer son affection à la quantité de présence qu'elle nous donne, et se dire: puisqu'elle me consacre tout son temps, c'est que j'ai tout son cœur; voir la pensée à défaut de la figure, constater la fidélité d'un être dans l'éclipse du monde, percevoir le frôlement d'une robe comme un bruit d'ailes, l'entendre aller et venir, sortir, rentrer, parler, chanter, et songer qu'on est le centre de ces pas, de cette parole, de ce chant, manifester à chaque minute sa propre attraction, se sentir d'autant plus puissant qu'on est plus infirme, devenir dans l'obscurité, et par l'obscurité, l'astre autour duquel gravite cet ange, peu de félicités égalent celle-là. Le suprême bonheur de la vie, c'est la conviction qu'on est aimé; aimé pour soi-même, disons mieux, aimé malgré soi-même; cette conviction, l'aveugle l'a. Dans cette détresse, être servi, c'est être caressé. Lui manque-t-il quelque chose? Non. Ce n'est point perdre la lumière qu'avoir l'amour. Et quel amour! un amour entièrement fait de vertu. Il n'y a point de cécité où il y a certitude. L'âme à tâtons cherche l'âme, et la trouve. Et cette âme trouvée et prouvée est une femme. Une main vous soutient, c'est la sienne; une bouche effleure votre front, c'est sa bouche; vous entendez une respiration tout près de vous, c'est elle. Tout avoir d'elle, depuis son culte jusqu'à sa pitié, n'être jamais quitté, avoir cette douce faiblesse qui vous secourt, s'appuyer sur ce roseau inébranlable, toucher de ses mains la providence et pouvoir la prendre dans ses bras, Dieu palpable, quel ravissement! Le cœur, cette céleste fleur obscure, entre dans un épanouissement mystérieux. On ne donnerait pas cette ombre pour toute la clarté. L'âme ange est là, sans cesse là; si elle s'éloigne, c'est pour revenir; elle s'efface comme le rêve et reparaît comme la réalité. On sent de la chaleur qui approche, la voilà. On déborde de sérénité, de gaîté et d'extase; on est un rayonnement dans la nuit. Et mille petits soins. Des riens qui sont énormes dans ce vide. Les plus ineffables accents de la voix féminine employés à vous bercer, et suppléant pour vous à l'univers évanoui. On est caressé avec de l'âme. On ne voit rien, mais on se sent adoré. C'est un paradis de ténèbres.

C'est de ce paradis que monseigneur Bienvenu était passé à l'autre.

L'annonce de sa mort fut reproduite par le journal local de Montreuil-sur-mer. M. Madeleine parut le lendemain tout en noir avec un crêpe à son chapeau.

On remarqua dans la ville ce deuil, et l'on jasa. Cela parut une lueur sur l'origine de M. Madeleine. On en conclut qu'il avait quelque alliance avec le vénérable évêque. Il drape pour l'évêque de Digne, dirent les salons; cela rehaussa fort M. Madeleine, et lui donna subitement et d'emblée une certaine considération dans le monde noble de Montreuil-sur-mer. Le microscopique faubourg Saint-Germain de l'endroit songea à faire cesser la quarantaine de M. Madeleine, parent probable d'un évêque. M. Madeleine s'aperçut de l'avancement qu'il obtenait à plus de révérences des vieilles femmes et à plus de sourires des jeunes. Un soir, une doyenne de ce petit grand monde-là, curieuse par droit d'ancienneté, se hasarda à lui demander:

— Monsieur le maire est sans doute cousin du feu évêque de Digne?

Il dit:

— Non, madame.

— Mais, reprit la douairière, vous en portez le deuil?

Il répondit:

— C'est que dans ma jeunesse j'ai été laquais dans sa famille.

Une remarque qu'on faisait encore, c'est que, chaque fois qu'il passait dans la ville un jeune savoyard courant le pays et cherchant des cheminées à ramoner, M. le maire le faisait appeler, lui demandait son nom, et lui donnait de l'argent. Les petits savoyards se le disaient, et il en passait beaucoup.

Chapitre V

Vagues éclairs à l’horizon

Peu à peu, et avec le temps, toutes les oppositions étaient tombées. Il y avait eu d’abord contre M. Madeleine, sorte de loi que subissent toujours ceux qui s’élèvent, des noirceurs et des calomnies, puis ce ne fut plus que des méchancetés, puis ce ne fut que des malices, puis cela s’évanouit tout à fait; le respect devint complet, unanime, cordial, et il arriva un moment, vers 1821, où ce mot: monsieur le maire, fut prononcé à Montreuil-sur-mer presque du même accent que ce mot: monseigneur l’évêque, était prononcé à Digne en 1815. On venait de dix lieues à la ronde consulter M. Madeleine. Il terminait les différends, il empêchait les procès, il réconciliait les ennemis. Chacun le prenait pour juge de son bon droit. Il semblait qu’il eût pour âme le livre de la loi naturelle. Ce fut comme une contagion de vénération qui, en six ou sept ans et de proche en proche, gagna tout le pays.

Un seul homme, dans la ville et dans l’arrondissement, se déroba absolument à cette contagion, et, quoi que fît le père Madeleine, y demeura rebelle, comme si une sorte d’instinct, incorruptible et imperturbable, l’éveillait et l’inquiétait. Il semblerait en effet qu’il existe dans certains hommes un véritable instinct bestial, pur et intègre comme tout instinct, qui crée les antipathies et les sympathies, qui sépare fatalement une nature d’une autre nature, qui n’hésite pas, qui ne se trouble, ne se tait et ne se dément jamais, clair dans son obscurité, infaillible, impérieux, réfractaire à tous les conseils de l’intelligence et à tous les dissolvants de la raison, et qui, de quelque façon que les destinées soient faites, avertit secrètement l’homme-chien de la présence de l’homme-chat, et l’homme-renard de la présence de l’homme-lion.

Souvent, quand M. Madeleine passait dans une rue, calme, affectueux, entouré des bénédictions de tous, il arrivait qu’un homme de haute taille, vêtu d’une redingote gris de fer, armé d’une grosse canne et coiffé d’un chapeau rabattu, se retournait brusquement derrière lui, et le suivait des yeux jusqu’à ce qu’il eût disparu, croisant les bras, secouant lentement la tête, et haussant sa lèvre supérieure avec sa lèvre inférieure jusqu’à son nez, sorte de grimace significative qui pourrait se traduire par: «Mais qu’est-ce que c'est que cet homme-là? — Pour sûr je l'ai vu quelque part. — En tout cas, je ne suis toujours pas sa dupe.»

Ce personnage, grave d'une gravité presque menaçante, était de ceux qui, même rapidement entrevus, préoccupent l'observateur.

Il se nommait Javert, et il était de la police.

Il remplissait à Montreuil-sur-mer les fonctions pénibles, mais utiles, d'inspecteur. Il n'avait pas vu les commencements de Madeleine. Javert devait le poste qu'il occupait à la protection de M. Chabouillet, le secrétaire du ministre d'État, comte Anglès, alors préfet de police à Paris. Quand Javert était arrivé à Montreuil-sur-mer, la fortune du grand manufacturier était déjà faite, et le père Madeleine était devenu monsieur Madeleine.

Certains officiers de police ont une physionomie à part et qui se complique d'un air de bassesse mêlé à un air d'autorité. Javert avait cette physionomie, moins la bassesse.

Dans notre conviction, si les âmes étaient visibles aux yeux, on verrait distinctement cette chose étrange que chacun des individus de l'espèce humaine correspond à quelqu'une des espèces de la création animale; et l'on pourrait reconnaître aisément cette vérité à peine entrevue par le penseur, que, depuis l'huître jusqu'à l'aigle, depuis le porc jusqu'au tigre, tous les animaux sont dans l'homme et que chacun d'eux est dans un homme. Quelquefois même plusieurs d'entre eux à la fois.

Les animaux ne sont autre chose que les figures de nos vertus et de nos vices, errantes devant nos yeux, les fantômes visibles de nos âmes. Dieu nous les montre pour nous faire réfléchir. Seulement, comme les animaux ne sont que des ombres, Dieu ne les a point faits éducables dans le sens complet du mot; à quoi bon? Au contraire, nos âmes étant des réalités et ayant une fin qui leur est propre, Dieu leur a donné l'intelligence, c'est-à-dire l'éducation possible. L'éducation sociale bien faite peut toujours tirer d'une âme, quelle qu'elle soit, l'utilité qu'elle contient.

Ceci soit dit, bien entendu, au point de vue restreint de la vie terrestre apparente, et sans préjuger la question profonde de la personnalité antérieure et ultérieure des êtres qui ne sont pas l'homme. Le moi visible n'autorise en aucune façon le penseur à nier le moi latent. Cette réserve faite, passons.

Maintenant, si l'on admet un moment avec nous que dans tout homme il y a une des espèces animales de la création, il nous sera facile de dire ce que c'était que l'officier de paix Javert.

Les paysans asturiens sont convaincus que dans toute portée de louve il y a un chien, lequel est tué par la mère, sans quoi en grandissant il dévorerait les autres petits.

Donnez une face humaine à ce chien fils d'une louve, et ce sera Javert.

Javert était né dans une prison d'une tireuse de cartes dont le mari était aux galères. En grandissant, il pensa qu'il était en dehors de la société et désespéra d'y rentrer jamais. Il remarqua que la société maintient irrémissiblement en dehors d'elle deux classes d'hommes, ceux qui l'attaquent et ceux qui la gardent; il n'avait le choix qu'entre ces deux classes; en même temps il se sentait je ne sais quel fond de rigidité, de régularité et de probité, compliqué d'une inexprimable haine pour cette race de bohèmes dont il était. Il entra dans la police.

Il y réussit. À quarante ans il était inspecteur.

Il avait dans sa jeunesse été employé dans les chiourmes du midi.

Avant d'aller plus loin, entendons-nous sur ce mot face humaine que nous appliquions tout à l'heure à Javert.

La face humaine de Javert consistait en un nez camard, avec deux profondes narines vers lesquelles montaient sur ses deux joues d'énormes favoris. On se sentait mal à l'aise la première fois qu'on voyait ces deux forêts et ces deux cavernes. Quand Javert riait, ce qui était rare et terrible, ses lèvres minces s'écartaient, et laissaient voir, non seulement ses dents, mais ses gencives, et il se faisait autour de son nez un plissement épaté et sauvage comme sur un mufle de bête fauve. Javert sérieux était un dogue; lorsqu'il riait, c'était un tigre. Du reste, peu de crâne, beaucoup de mâchoire, les cheveux cachant le front et tombant sur les sourcils, entre les deux yeux un froncement central permanent comme une étoile de colère, le regard obscur, la bouche pincée et redoutable, l'air du commandement féroce.

Cet homme était composé de deux sentiments très simples, et relativement très bons, mais qu'il faisait presque mauvais à force de les exagérer: le respect de l'autorité, la haine de la rébellion; et à ses yeux le vol, le meurtre, tous les crimes, n'étaient que des formes de la rébellion. Il enveloppait dans une sorte de foi aveugle et profonde tout ce qui a une fonction dans l'État, depuis le premier ministre jusqu'au garde champêtre. Il couvrait de mépris, d'aversion et de dégoût tout ce qui avait franchi une fois le seuil légal du mal. Il était absolu et n'admettait pas d'exceptions. D'une part il disait:

— Le fonctionnaire ne peut se tromper; le magistrat n’a jamais tort.

D’autre part il disait:

— Ceux-ci sont irrémédiablement perdus. Rien de bon n’en peut sortir.

Il partageait pleinement l’opinion de ces esprits extrêmes qui attribuent à la loi humaine je ne sais quel pouvoir de faire ou, si l’on veut, de constater des damnés, et qui mettent un Styx au bas de la société. Il était stoïque, sérieux, austère; rêveur triste; humble et hautain comme les fanatiques. Son regard était une vrille. Cela était froid et cela perçait. Toute sa vie tenait dans ces deux mots: veiller et surveiller. Il avait introduit la ligne droite dans ce qu’il y a de plus tortueux au monde; il avait la conscience de son utilité, la religion de ses fonctions, et il était espion comme on est prêtre. Malheur à qui tombait sous sa main! Il eût arrêté son père s’évadant du bagne et dénoncé sa mère en rupture de ban. Et il l’eût fait avec cette sorte de satisfaction intérieure que donne la vertu. Avec cela une vie de privations, l’isolement, l’abnégation, la chasteté, jamais une distraction. C’était le devoir implacable, la police comprise comme les Spartiates comprenaient Sparte, un guet impitoyable, une honnêteté farouche, un mouchard marmoréen, Brutus dans Vidocq.

Toute la personne de Javert exprimait l’homme qui épie et qui se dérobe. L’école mystique de Joseph de Maistre, laquelle à cette époque assaisonnait de haute cosmogonie ce qu’on appelait les journaux ultras, n’eût pas manqué de dire que Javert était un symbole. On ne voyait pas son front qui disparaissait sous son chapeau, on ne voyait pas ses yeux qui se perdaient sous ses sourcils, on ne voyait pas son menton qui plongeait dans sa cravate, on ne voyait pas ses mains qui rentraient dans ses manches, on ne voyait pas sa canne qu’il portait sous sa redingote. Mais l’occasion venue, on voyait tout à coup sortir de toute cette ombre, comme d’une embuscade, un front anguleux et étroit, un regard funeste, un menton menaçant, des mains énormes; et un gourdin monstrueux.

À ses moments de loisir, qui étaient peu fréquents, tout en haïssant les livres, il lisait; ce qui fait qu’il n’était pas complètement illettré. Cela se reconnaissait à quelque emphase dans la parole.

Il n’avait aucun vice, nous l’avons dit. Quand il était content de lui, il s’accordait une prise de tabac. Il tenait à l’humanité par là.

On comprendra sans peine que Javert était l’effroi de toute cette classe que la statistique annuelle du ministère de la justice désigne sous la rubrique: Gens sans aveu. Le nom de Javert prononcé les mettait en déroute; la face de Javert apparaissant les pétrifiait.

Tel était cet homme formidable.

Javert était comme un œil toujours fixé sur M. Madeleine. Œil plein de soupçon et de conjectures. M. Madeleine avait fini par s’en apercevoir, mais il sembla que cela fût insignifiant pour lui. Il ne fit pas même une question à Javert, il ne le cherchait ni ne l’évitait, et il portait, sans paraître y faire attention, ce regard gênant et presque pesant. Il traitait Javert comme tout le monde, avec aisance et bonté.

À quelques paroles échappées à Javert, on devinait qu’il avait recherché secrètement, avec cette curiosité qui tient à la race et où il entre autant d’instinct que de volonté, toutes les traces antérieures que le père Madeleine avait pu laisser ailleurs. Il paraissait savoir, et il disait parfois à mots couverts, que quelqu’un avait pris certaines informations dans un certain pays sur une certaine famille disparue. Une fois il lui arriva de dire, se parlant à lui-même:

— Je crois que je le tiens!

Puis il resta trois jours pensif sans prononcer une parole. Il paraît que le fil qu’il croyait tenir s’était rompu. Du reste, et ceci est le correctif nécessaire à ce que le sens de certains mots pourrait présenter de trop absolu, il ne peut y avoir rien de vraiment infaillible dans une créature humaine, et le propre de l’instinct est précisément de pouvoir être troublé, dépisté et dérouté. Sans quoi il serait supérieur à l’intelligence, et la bête se trouverait avoir une meilleure lumière que l’homme.

Javert était évidemment quelque peu déconcerté par le complet naturel et la tranquillité de M. Madeleine.

Un jour pourtant son étrange manière d’être parut faire impression sur M. Madeleine. Voici à quelle occasion.

Chapitre VI

Le père Fauchelevent

M. Madeleine passait un matin dans une ruelle non pavée de Montreuil-sur-mer. Il entendit du bruit et vit un groupe à quelque distance. Il y alla. Un vieux homme, nommé le père Fauchelevent, venait de tomber sous sa charrette dont le cheval s'était abattu.

Ce Fauchelevent était un des rares ennemis qu'eût encore M. Madeleine à cette époque. Lorsque Madeleine était arrivé dans le pays, Fauchelevent, ancien tabellion et paysan presque lettré, avait un commerce qui commençait à aller mal. Fauchelevent avait vu ce simple ouvrier qui s'enrichissait, tandis que lui, maître, se ruinait. Cela l'avait rempli de jalousie, et il avait fait ce qu'il avait pu en toute occasion pour nuire à Madeleine. Puis la faillite était venue, et, vieux, n'ayant plus à lui qu'une charrette et un cheval, sans famille et sans enfants du reste, pour vivre il s'était fait charretier.

Le cheval avait les deux cuisses cassées et ne pouvait se relever. Le vieillard était engagé entre les roues. La chute avait été tellement malheureuse que toute la voiture pesait sur sa poitrine. La charrette était assez lourdement chargée. Le père Fauchelevent poussait des râles lamentables. On avait essayé de le tirer, mais en vain. Un effort désordonné, une aide maladroite, une secousse à faux pouvaient l'achever. Il était impossible de le dégager autrement qu'en soulevant la voiture par-dessous. Javert, qui était survenu au moment de l'accident, avait envoyé chercher un cric.

M. Madeleine arriva. On s'écarta avec respect.

— À l'aide! criait le vieux Fauchelevent. Qui est-ce qui est bon enfant pour sauver le vieux?

M. Madeleine se tourna vers les assistants:

— A-t-on un cric?

— On en est allé quérir un, répondit un paysan.

— Dans combien de temps l'aura-t-on?

— On est allé au plus près, au lieu Flachot, où il y a un maréchal; mais c'est égal, il faudra bien un bon quart d'heure.

— Un quart d'heure! s'écria Madeleine.

Il avait plu la veille, le sol était détrempé, la charrette s’enfonçait dans la terre à chaque instant et comprimait de plus en plus la poitrine du vieux charretier. Il était évident qu’avant cinq minutes il aurait les côtes brisées.

— Il est impossible d’attendre un quart d’heure, dit Madeleine aux paysans qui regardaient.

— Il faut bien!

— Mais il ne sera plus temps! Vous ne voyez donc pas que la charrette s’enfonce?

— Dame!

— Écoutez, reprit Madeleine, il y a encore assez de place sous la voiture pour qu’un homme s’y glisse et la soulève avec son dos. Rien qu’une demi-minute, et l’on tirera le pauvre homme. Y a-t-il ici quelqu’un qui ait des reins et du cœur? Cinq louis d’or à gagner!

Personne ne bougea dans le groupe.

— Dix louis, dit Madeleine.

Les assistants baissaient les yeux. Un d’eux murmura:

— Il faudrait être diablement fort. Et puis, on risque de se faire écraser!

— Allons! recommença Madeleine, vingt louis! Même silence.

— Ce n’est pas la bonne volonté qui leur manque, dit une voix.

M. Madeleine se retourna, et reconnut Javert. Il ne l’avait pas aperçu en arrivant. Javert continua:

— C’est la force. Il faudrait être un terrible homme pour faire la chose de lever une voiture comme cela sur son dos.

Puis, regardant fixement M. Madeleine, il poursuivit en appuyant sur chacun des mots qu’il prononçait:

— Monsieur Madeleine, je n’ai jamais connu qu’un seul homme capable de faire ce que vous demandez là.

Madeleine tressaillit.

Javert ajouta avec un air d’indifférence, mais sans quitter des yeux Madeleine:

— C’était un forçat.

— Ah! dit Madeleine.

— Du bagne de Toulon.

Madeleine devint pâle.

Cependant la charrette continuait à s’enfoncer lentement. Le père Fauchelevent râlait et hurlait:

— J’étouffe! Ça me brise les côtes! Un cric! quelque chose! Ah!

Madeleine regarda autour de lui:

— Il n’y a donc personne qui veuille gagner vingt louis et sauver la vie à ce pauvre vieux?

Aucun des assistants ne remua. Javert reprit:

— Je n’ai jamais connu qu’un homme qui pût remplacer un cric. C’était ce forçat.

— Ah! voilà que ça m’écrase! cria le vieillard.

Madeleine leva la tête, rencontra l’œil de faucon de Javert toujours attaché sur lui, regarda les paysans immobiles, et sourit tristement. Puis, sans dire une parole, il tomba à genoux, et avant même que la foule eût eu le temps de jeter un cri, il était sous la voiture.

Il y eut un affreux moment d’attente et de silence.

On vit Madeleine presque à plat ventre sous ce poids effrayant essayer deux fois en vain de rapprocher ses coudes de ses genoux. On lui cria:

— Père Madeleine! retirez-vous de là!

Le vieux Fauchelevent lui-même lui dit:

— Monsieur Madeleine! allez-vous-en! C’est qu’il faut que je meure, voyez-vous! Laissez-moi! Vous allez vous faire écraser aussi!

Madeleine ne répondit pas.

Les assistants haletaient. Les roues avaient continué de s’enfoncer, et il était déjà devenu presque impossible que Madeleine sortît de dessous la voiture.

Tout à coup on vit l’énorme masse s’ébranler, la charrette se soulevait lentement, les roues sortaient à demi de l’ornière. On entendit une voix étouffée qui criait:

— Dépêchez-vous! aidez!

C’était Madeleine qui venait de faire un dernier effort.

Ils se précipitèrent. Le dévouement d’un seul avait donné de la force et du courage à tous. La charrette fut enlevée par vingt bras. Le vieux Fauchelevent était sauvé.

Madeleine se releva. Il était blême, quoique ruisselant de sueur. Ses habits étaient déchirés et couverts de boue. Tous pleuraient. Le vieillard lui baisait les genoux et l’appelait le bon Dieu. Lui, il avait sur le visage je ne sais quelle expression de souffrance heureuse et céleste, et il fixait son œil tranquille sur Javert qui le regardait toujours.

Chapitre VII

Fauchelevent devient jardinier à Paris

Fauchelevent s’était démis la rotule dans sa chute. Le père Madeleine le fit transporter dans une infirmerie qu’il avait établie pour ses ouvriers dans le bâtiment même de sa fabrique et qui était desservie par deux sœurs de charité. Le lendemain matin, le vieillard trouva un billet de mille francs sur sa table de nuit, avec ce mot de la main du père Madeleine: Je vous achète votre charrette et votre cheval. La charrette était brisée et le cheval était mort. Fauchelevent guérit, mais son genou resta ankylosé. M. Madeleine, par les recommandations des sœurs et de son curé, fit placer le bonhomme comme jardinier dans un couvent de femmes du quartier Saint-Antoine à Paris.

Quelque temps après, M. Madeleine fut nommé maire. La première fois que Javert vit M. Madeleine revêtu de l’écharpe qui lui donnait toute autorité sur la ville, il éprouva cette sorte de frémissement qu’éprouverait un dogue qui flairerait un loup sous les habits de son maître. À partir de ce moment, il l’évita le plus qu’il put. Quand les besoins du service l’exigeaient impérieusement et qu’il ne pouvait faire autrement que de se trouver avec M. le maire, il lui parlait avec un respect profond.

Cette prospérité créée à Montreuil-sur-mer par le père Madeleine avait, outre les signes visibles que nous avons indiqués, un autre symptôme qui, pour n’être pas visible, n’était pas moins significatif. Ceci ne trompe jamais.

Quand la population souffre, quand le travail manque, quand le commerce est nul, le contribuable résiste à l’impôt par pénurie, épuise et dépasse les délais, et l’état dépense beaucoup d’argent en frais de contrainte et de rentrée. Quand le travail abonde, quand le pays est heureux et riche, l’impôt se paye aisément et coûte peu à l’état. On peut dire que la misère et la richesse publiques ont un thermomètre infaillible, les frais de perception de l’impôt. En sept ans, les frais de perception de l’impôt s’étaient réduits des trois quarts dans l’arrondissement de Montreuil-sur-mer, ce qui faisait fréquemment citer cet arrondissement entre tous par M. de Villèle, alors ministre des finances.

Telle était la situation du pays, lorsque Fantine y revint. Personne ne se souvenait plus d’elle. Heureusement la porte de la fabrique de M.

Madeleine était comme un visage ami. Elle s’y présenta, et fut admise dans l’atelier des femmes. Le métier était tout nouveau pour Fantine, elle n’y pouvait être bien adroite, elle ne tirait donc de sa journée de travail que peu de chose, mais enfin cela suffisait, le problème était résolu, elle gagnait sa vie.

Chapitre VIII

Madame Victurnien dépense trente-cinq francs pour la morale

Quand Fantine vit qu’elle vivait, elle eut un moment de joie. Vivre honnêtement de son travail, quelle grâce du ciel! Le goût du travail lui revint vraiment. Elle acheta un miroir, se réjouit d’y regarder sa jeunesse, ses beaux cheveux et ses belles dents, oublia beaucoup de choses, ne songea plus qu’à sa Cosette et à l’avenir possible, et fut presque heureuse. Elle loua une petite chambre et la meubla à crédit sur son travail futur; reste de ses habitudes de désordre.

Ne pouvant pas dire qu’elle était mariée, elle s’était bien gardée, comme nous l’avons déjà fait entrevoir, de parler de sa petite fille.

En ces commencements, on l’a vu, elle payait exactement les Thénardier. Comme elle ne savait que signer, elle était obligée de leur écrire par un écrivain public.

Elle écrivait souvent. Cela fut remarqué. On commença à dire tout bas dans l’atelier des femmes que Fantine «écrivait des lettres» et qu’«elle avait des allures».

Il n’y a rien de tel pour épier les actions des gens que ceux qu’elles ne regardent pas. — Pourquoi ce monsieur ne vient-il jamais qu’à la brune? pourquoi monsieur un tel n’accroche-t-il jamais sa clef au clou le jeudi? pourquoi prend-il toujours les petites rues? pourquoi madame descend-elle toujours de son fiacre avant d’arriver à la maison? pourquoi envoie-t-elle acheter un cahier de papier à lettres, quand elle en a «plein sa papeterie?» etc., etc. — Il existe des êtres qui, pour connaître le mot de ces énigmes, lesquelles leur sont du reste parfaitement indifférentes, dépensent plus d’argent, prodiguent plus de temps, se donnent plus de peine qu’il n’en faudrait pour dix bonnes actions; et cela, gratuitement, pour le plaisir, sans être payés de la curiosité autrement que par la curiosité. Ils suivront celui-ci ou celle-là des jours entiers, feront faction des heures à des coins de rue, sous des portes d’allées, la nuit, par le froid et par la pluie, corrompront des commissionnaires, griseront des cochers de fiacre et des laquais, achèteront une femme de chambre, feront acquisition d’un portier. Pourquoi? pour rien. Pur acharnement de voir, de savoir et de pénétrer. Pure démangeaison de dire. Et souvent ces secrets connus, ces mystères publiés, ces énigmes éclairées du grand jour, entraînent des catastrophes, des duels, des faillites, des familles ruinées, des existences brisées, à la grande joie de ceux qui ont «tout découvert» sans intérêt et par pur instinct. Chose triste.

Certaines personnes sont méchantes uniquement par besoin de parler. Leur conversation, causerie dans le salon, bavardage dans l'antichambre, est comme ces cheminées qui usent vite le bois; il leur faut beaucoup de combustible; et le combustible, c'est le prochain.

On observa donc Fantine.

Avec cela, plus d'une était jalouse de ses cheveux blonds et de ses dents blanches. On constata que dans l'atelier, au milieu des autres, elle se détournait souvent pour essuyer une larme. C'étaient les moments où elle songeait à son enfant; peut-être aussi à l'homme qu'elle avait aimé.

C'est un douloureux labeur que la rupture des sombres attaches du passé.

On constata qu'elle écrivait, au moins deux fois par mois, toujours à la même adresse, et qu'elle affranchissait la lettre. On parvint à se procurer l'adresse: Monsieur, Monsieur Thénardier, aubergiste, à Montfermeil. On fit jaser au cabaret l'écrivain public, vieux bonhomme qui ne pouvait pas emplir son estomac de vin rouge sans vider sa poche aux secrets. Bref, on sut que Fantine avait un enfant. «Ce devait être une espèce de fille.» Il se trouva une commère qui fit le voyage de Montfermeil, parla aux Thénardier, et dit à son retour: «Pour mes trente-cinq francs, j'en ai eu le cœur net. J'ai vu l'enfant!»

La commère qui fit cela était une gorgone appelée madame Victurnien, gardienne et portière de la vertu de tout le monde. Madame Victurnien avait cinquante-six ans, et doublait le masque de la laideur du masque de la vieillesse. Voix chevrotante, esprit capricant. Cette vieille femme avait été jeune, chose étonnante. Dans sa jeunesse, en plein 93, elle avait épousé un moine échappé du cloître en bonnet rouge et passé des bernardins aux jacobins. Elle était sèche, rêche, revêche, pointue, épineuse, presque venimeuse; tout en se souvenant de son moine dont elle était veuve, et qui l'avait fort domptée et pliée. C'était une ortie où l'on voyait le froissement du froc. À la restauration, elle s'était faite bigote, et si énergiquement que les prêtres lui avaient pardonné son moine. Elle avait un petit bien qu'elle léguait bruyamment à une communauté religieuse. Elle était fort bien vue à l'évêché d'Arras. Cette madame Victurnien donc alla à Montfermeil, et revint en disant: «J'ai vu l'enfant».

Tout cela prit du temps. Fantine était depuis plus d’un an à la fabrique, lorsqu’un matin la surveillante de l’atelier lui remit, de la part de M. le maire, cinquante francs, en lui disant qu’elle ne faisait plus partie de l’atelier et en l’engageant, de la part de M. le maire, à quitter le pays.

C’était précisément dans ce même mois que les Thénardier, après avoir demandé douze francs au lieu de six, venaient d’exiger quinze francs au lieu de douze.

Fantine fut atterrée. Elle ne pouvait s’en aller du pays, elle devait son loyer et ses meubles. Cinquante francs ne suffisaient pas pour acquitter cette dette. Elle balbutia quelques mots suppliants. La surveillante lui signifia qu’elle eût à sortir sur-le-champ de l’atelier. Fantine n’était du reste qu’une ouvrière médiocre. Accablée de honte plus encore que de désespoir, elle quitta l’atelier et rentra dans sa chambre. Sa faute était donc maintenant connue de tous!

Elle ne se sentit plus la force de dire un mot. On lui conseilla de voir M. le maire; elle n’osa pas. M. le maire lui donnait cinquante francs, parce qu’il était bon, et la chassait, parce qu’il était juste. Elle plia sous cet arrêt.

Chapitre IX

Succès de Madame Victurnien

La veuve du moine fut donc bonne à quelque chose.

Du reste, M. Madeleine n'avait rien su de tout cela. Ce sont là de ces combinaisons d'événements dont la vie est pleine. M. Madeleine avait pour habitude de n'entrer presque jamais dans l'atelier des femmes. Il avait mis à la tête de cet atelier une vieille fille, que le curé lui avait donnée, et il avait toute confiance dans cette surveillante, personne vraiment respectable, ferme, équitable, intègre, remplie de la charité qui consiste à donner, mais n'ayant pas au même degré la charité qui consiste à comprendre et à pardonner. M. Madeleine se remettait de tout sur elle. Les meilleurs hommes sont souvent forcés de déléguer leur autorité. C'est dans cette pleine puissance et avec la conviction qu'elle faisait bien, que la surveillante avait instruit le procès, jugé, condamné et exécuté Fantine.

Quant aux cinquante francs, elle les avait donnés sur une somme que M. Madeleine lui confiait pour aumônes et secours aux ouvrières et dont elle ne rendait pas compte.

Fantine s'offrit comme servante dans le pays; elle alla d'une maison à l'autre. Personne ne voulut d'elle. Elle n'avait pu quitter la ville. Le marchand fripier auquel elle devait ses meubles, quels meubles! lui avait dit: «Si vous vous en allez, je vous fais arrêter comme voleuse.» Le propriétaire auquel elle devait son loyer, lui avait dit:

«Vous êtes jeune et jolie, vous pouvez payer.» Elle partagea les cinquante francs entre le propriétaire et le fripier, rendit au marchand les trois quarts de son mobilier, ne garda que le nécessaire, et se trouva sans travail, sans état, n'ayant plus que son lit, et devant encore environ cent francs.

Elle se mit à coudre de grosses chemises pour les soldats de la garnison, et gagnait douze sous par jour. Sa fille lui en coûtait dix. C'est en ce moment qu'elle commença à mal payer les Thénardier.

Cependant une vieille femme qui lui allumait sa chandelle quand elle rentrait le soir, lui enseigna l'art de vivre dans la misère. Derrière vivre de peu, il y a vivre de rien. Ce sont deux chambres; la première est obscure, la seconde est noire.

Fantine apprit comment on se passe tout à fait de feu en hiver, comment on renonce à un oiseau qui vous mange un liard de millet tous les deux jours, comment on fait de son jupon sa couverture et de sa couverture son jupon, comment on ménage sa chandelle en prenant son repas à la lumière de la fenêtre d'en face. On ne sait pas tout ce que certains êtres faibles, qui ont vieilli dans le dénûment et l'honnêteté, savent tirer d'un sou. Cela finit par être un talent. Fantine acquit ce sublime talent et reprit un peu de courage.

À cette époque, elle disait à une voisine:

— Bah! je me dis: en ne dormant que cinq heures et en travaillant tout le reste à mes coutures, je parviendrai bien toujours à gagner à peu près du pain. Et puis, quand on est triste, on mange moins. Eh bien! des souffrances, des inquiétudes, un peu de pain d'un côté, des chagrins de l'autre, tout cela me nourrira.

Dans cette détresse, avoir sa petite fille eût été un étrange bonheur. Elle songea à la faire venir. Mais quoi! lui faire partager son dénûment! Et puis, elle devait aux Thénardier! comment s'acquitter? Et le voyage! comment le payer?

La vieille qui lui avait donné ce qu'on pourrait appeler des leçons de vie indigente était une sainte fille nommée Marguerite, dévote de la bonne dévotion, pauvre, et charitable pour les pauvres et même pour les riches, sachant tout juste assez écrire pour signer Margueritte, et croyant en Dieu, ce qui est la science.

Il y a beaucoup de ces vertus-là en bas; un jour elles seront en haut. Cette vie a un lendemain.

Dans les premiers temps, Fantine avait été si honteuse qu'elle n'avait pas osé sortir. Quand elle était dans la rue, elle devinait qu'on se retournait derrière elle et qu'on la montrait du doigt; tout le monde la regardait et personne ne la saluait; le mépris âcre et froid des passants lui pénétrait dans la chair et dans l'âme comme une bise.

Dans les petites villes, il semble qu'une malheureuse soit nue sous les sarcasmes et la curiosité de tous. À Paris, du moins, personne ne vous connaît, et cette obscurité est un vêtement. Oh! comme elle eût souhaité venir à Paris! Impossible.

Il fallut bien s'accoutumer à la déconsidération, comme elle s'était accoutumée à l'indigence. Peu à peu elle en prit son parti. Après deux ou trois mois elle secoua la honte et se remit à sortir comme si de rien n'était.

— Cela m’est bien égal, dit-elle.

Elle alla et vint, la tête haute, avec un sourire amer, et sentit qu’elle devenait effrontée.

Madame Victurnien quelquefois la voyait passer de sa fenêtre, remarquait la détresse de «cette créature», grâce à elle “remise à sa place”, et se félicitait. Les méchants ont un bonheur noir.

L’excès du travail fatiguait Fantine, et la petite toux sèche qu’elle avait augmenta. Elle disait quelquefois à sa voisine Marguerite: «Tâtez donc comme mes mains sont chaudes.»

Cependant le matin, quand elle peignait avec un vieux peigne cassé ses beaux cheveux qui ruisselaient comme de la soie floche, elle avait une minute de coquetterie heureuse.

Chapitre X

Suite du succès

Elle avait été congédiée vers la fin de l’hiver; l’été se passa, mais l’hiver revint. Jours courts, moins de travail. L’hiver, point de chaleur, point de lumière, point de midi, le soir touche au matin, brouillard, crépuscule, la fenêtre est grise, on n’y voit pas clair. Le ciel est un soupirail. Toute la journée est une cave. Le soleil a l’air d’un pauvre. L’affreuse saison! L’hiver change en pierre l’eau du ciel et le cœur de l’homme. Ses créanciers la harcelaient.

Fantine gagnait trop peu. Ses dettes avaient grossi. Les Thénardier, mal payés, lui écrivaient à chaque instant des lettres dont le contenu la désolait et dont le port la ruinait. Un jour ils lui écrivirent que sa petite Cosette était toute nue par le froid qu’il faisait, qu’elle avait besoin d’une jupe de laine, et qu’il fallait au moins que la mère envoyât dix francs pour cela. Elle reçut la lettre, et la froissa dans ses mains tout le jour. Le soir elle entra chez un barbier qui habitait le coin de la rue, et défit son peigne. Ses admirables cheveux blonds lui tombèrent jusqu’aux reins.

— Les beaux cheveux! s’écria le barbier.

— Combien m’en donneriez-vous? dit-elle.

— Dix francs.

— Coupez-les.

Elle acheta une jupe de tricot et l’envoya aux Thénardier.

Cette jupe fit les Thénardier furieux. C’était de l’argent qu’ils voulaient. Ils donnèrent la jupe à Eponine. La pauvre Alouette continua de frissonner.

Fantine pensa: «Mon enfant n’a plus froid. Je l’ai habillée de mes cheveux.» Elle mettait de petits bonnets ronds qui cachaient sa tête tondue et avec lesquels elle était encore jolie.

Un travail ténébreux se faisait dans le cœur de Fantine. Quand elle vit qu’elle ne pouvait plus se coiffer, elle commença à tout prendre en haine autour d’elle. Elle avait longtemps partagé la vénération de tous pour le père Madeleine; cependant, à force de se répéter que c’était lui qui l’avait chassée, et qu’il était la cause de son malheur, elle en vint à le haïr lui aussi, lui surtout. Quand elle passait devant la fabrique aux heures où les ouvriers sont sur la porte, elle affectait de rire et de chanter.

Une vieille ouvrière qui la vit une fois chanter et rire de cette façon dit:

— Voilà une fille qui finira mal.

Elle prit un amant, le premier venu, un homme qu’elle n’aimait pas, par bravade, avec la rage dans le cœur. C’était un misérable, une espèce de musicien mendiant, un oisif gueux, qui la battait, et qui la quitta comme elle l’avait pris, avec dégoût. Elle adorait son enfant.

Plus elle descendait, plus tout devenait sombre autour d’elle plus ce doux petit ange rayonnait dans le fond de son âme. Elle disait. Quand je serai riche, j’aurai ma Cosette avec moi; et elle riait. La toux ne la quittait pas, et elle avait des sueurs dans le dos.

Un jour elle reçut des Thénardier une lettre ainsi conçue:

«Cosette est malade d’une maladie qui est dans le pays. Une fièvre miliaire, qu’ils appellent. Il faut des drogues chères. Cela nous ruine et nous ne pouvons plus payer. Si vous ne nous envoyez pas quarante francs avant huit jours, la petite est morte.»

Elle se mit à rire aux éclats, et elle dit à sa vieille voisine:

— Ah! ils sont bons! quarante francs! que ça! ça fait deux napoléons! Où veulent-ils que je les prenne? Sont-ils bêtes, ces paysans!

Cependant elle alla dans l’escalier près d’une lucarne et relut la lettre.

Puis elle descendit l’escalier et sortit en courant et en sautant, riant toujours. Quelqu’un qui la rencontra lui dit:

— Qu’est-ce que vous avez donc à être si gaie?

Elle répondit:

— C’est une bonne bêtise que viennent de m’écrire des gens de la campagne. Ils me demandent quarante francs. Paysans, va!

Comme elle passait sur la place, elle vit beaucoup de monde qui entourait une voiture de forme bizarre sur l’impériale de laquelle pérorait tout debout un homme vêtu de rouge. C’était un bateleur dentiste en tournée, qui offrait au public des râteliers complets, des opiats, des poudres et des élixirs.

Fantine se mêla au groupe et se mit à rire comme les autres de cette harangue où il y avait de l’argot pour la canaille et du jargon pour les gens comme il faut. L’arracheur de dents vit cette belle fille qui riait, et s’écria tout à coup:

— Vous avez de jolies dents, la fille qui riez là. Si vous voulez me vendre vos deux palettes, je vous donne de chaque un napoléon d’or.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que ça, mes palettes? demanda Fantine.

— Les palettes, reprit le professeur dentiste, c’est les dents de devant, les deux d’en haut.

— Quelle horreur! s’écria Fantine.

— Deux napoléons! grommela une vieille édentée qui était là. Qu’en voilà une qui est heureuse!

Fantine s’enfuit, et se boucha les oreilles pour ne pas entendre la voix enrouée de l’homme qui lui criait: Réfléchissez, la belle! deux napoléons, ça peut servir. Si le cœur vous en dit, venez ce soir à l’auberge du Tillac d’argent, vous m’y trouverez.

Fantine rentra, elle était furieuse et conta la chose à sa bonne voisine Marguerite:

— Comprenez-vous cela? ne voilà-t-il pas un abominable homme? comment laisse-t-on des gens comme cela aller dans le pays! M’arracher mes deux dents de devant! mais je serais horrible! Les cheveux repoussent, mais les dents! Ah! le monstre d’homme! j’aimerais mieux me jeter d’un cinquième la tête la première sur le pavé! Il m’a dit qu’il serait ce soir au Tillac d’argent.

— Et qu’est-ce qu’il offrait? demanda Marguerite.

— Deux napoléons.

— Cela fait quarante francs.

— Oui, dit Fantine, cela fait quarante francs.

Elle resta pensive, et se mit à son ouvrage. Au bout d’un quart d’heure, elle quitta sa couture et alla relire la lettre des Thénardier sur l’escalier.

En rentrant, elle dit à Marguerite qui travaillait près d’elle:

— Qu’est-ce que c’est donc que cela, une fièvre miliaire? Savez-vous?

— Oui, répondit la vieille fille, c’est une maladie.

— Ça a donc besoin de beaucoup de drogues?

— Oh! des drogues terribles.

— Où ça vous prend-il?

— C’est une maladie qu’on a comme ça.

— Cela attaque donc les enfants?

— Surtout les enfants.

— Est-ce qu’on en meurt?

— Très bien, dit Marguerite.

Fantine sortit et alla encore une fois relire la lettre sur l’escalier.

Le soir elle descendit, et on la vit qui se dirigeait du côté de la rue de Paris où sont les auberges.

Le lendemain matin, comme Marguerite entrait dans la chambre de Fantine avant le jour, car elles travaillaient toujours ensemble et de cette façon n’allumaient qu’une chandelle pour deux, elle trouva Fantine assise sur son lit, pâle, glacée. Elle ne s’était pas couchée. Son bonnet était tombé sur ses genoux. La chandelle avait brûlé toute la nuit et était presque entièrement consumée.

Marguerite s’arrêta sur le seuil, pétrifiée de cet énorme désordre, et s’écria:

— Seigneur! la chandelle qui est toute brûlée! il s’est passé des événements!

Puis elle regarda Fantine qui tournait vers elle sa tête sans cheveux.

Fantine depuis la veille avait vieilli de dix ans.

— Jésus! fit Marguerite, qu’est-ce que vous avez, Fantine?

— Je n’ai rien, répondit Fantine. Au contraire. Mon enfant ne mourra pas de cette affreuse maladie, faute de secours. Je suis contente.

En parlant ainsi, elle montrait à la vieille fille deux napoléons qui brillaient sur la table.

— Ah, Jésus Dieu! dit Marguerite. Mais c’est une fortune! Où avez-vous eu ces louis d’or?

— Je les ai eus, répondit Fantine.

En même temps elle sourit. La chandelle éclairait son visage. C’était un sourire sanglant. Une salive rougeâtre lui souillait le coin des lèvres, et elle avait un trou noir dans la bouche.

Les deux dents étaient arrachées.

Elle envoya les quarante francs à Montfermeil.

Du reste c’était une ruse des Thénardier pour avoir de l’argent. Cosette n’était pas malade.

Fantine jeta son miroir par la fenêtre. Depuis longtemps elle avait quitté sa cellule du second pour une mansarde fermée d’un loquet sous le toit; un de ces galetas dont le plafond fait angle avec le plancher et vous heurte à chaque instant la tête. Le pauvre ne peut aller au fond de sa chambre comme au fond de sa destinée qu’en se courbant de plus en plus. Elle n’avait plus de lit, il lui restait une loque qu’elle appelait sa couverture, un matelas à terre et une chaise dépaillée. Un petit rosier qu’elle avait s’était désséché dans un coin, oublié. Dans l’autre coin, il y avait un pot à beurre à mettre l’eau, qui gelait l’hiver, et où les différents niveaux de l’eau restaient longtemps marqués par des cercles de glace. Elle avait perdu la honte, elle perdit la coquetterie. Dernier signe. Elle sortait avec des bonnets sales. Soit faute de temps, soit indifférence, elle ne raccommodait plus son linge. À mesure que les talons s’usaient, elle tirait ses bas dans ses souliers. Cela se voyait à de certains plis perpendiculaires. Elle rapiéçait son corset, vieux et usé, avec des morceaux de calicot qui se déchiraient au moindre mouvement. Les gens auxquels elle devait, lui faisaient «des scènes», et ne lui laissaient aucun repos. Elle les trouvait dans la rue, elle les retrouvait dans son escalier. Elle passait des nuits à pleurer et à songer. Elle avait les yeux très brillants, et elle sentait une douleur fixe dans l’épaule, vers le haut de l’omoplate gauche. Elle toussait beaucoup. Elle haïssait profondément le père Madeleine, et ne se plaignait pas. Elle cousait dix-sept heures par jour; mais un entrepreneur du travail des prisons, qui faisait travailler les prisonnières au rabais, fit tout à coup baisser les prix, ce qui réduisit la journée des ouvrières libres à neuf sous. Dix-sept heures de travail, et neuf sous par jour! Ses créanciers étaient plus impitoyables que jamais. Le fripier, qui avait repris presque tous les meubles, lui disait sans cesse: Quand me payeras-tu, coquine? Que voulait-on d’elle, bon Dieu! Elle se sentait traquée et il se développait en elle quelque chose de la bête farouche. Vers le même temps, le Thénardier lui écrivit que décidément il avait attendu avec beaucoup trop de bonté, et qu’il lui fallait cent francs, tout de suite; sinon qu’il mettrait à la porte la petite Cosette, toute convalescente de sa grande maladie, par le froid, par les chemins, et qu’elle deviendrait ce qu’elle pourrait, et qu’elle crèverait, si elle voulait. «Cent francs, songea Fantine! Mais où y a-t-il un état à gagner cent sous par jour?»

— Allons! dit-elle, vendons le reste.

L’infortunée se fit fille publique.

Chapitre XI

Christus nos liberavit

Qu’est-ce que c’est que cette histoire de Fantine? C’est la société achetant une esclave.

À qui? À la misère.

À la faim, au froid, à l’isolement, à l’abandon, au dénûment. Marché douloureux. Une âme pour un morceau de pain. La misère offre, la société accepte.

La sainte loi de Jésus-Christ gouverne notre civilisation, mais elle ne la pénètre pas encore. On dit que l’esclavage a disparu de la civilisation européenne. C’est une erreur. Il existe toujours, mais il ne pèse plus que sur la femme, et il s’appelle prostitution.

Il pèse sur la femme, c’est-à-dire sur la grâce, sur la faiblesse, sur la beauté, sur la maternité. Ceci n’est pas une des moindres hontes de l’homme.

Au point de ce douloureux drame où nous sommes arrivés, il ne reste plus rien à Fantine de ce qu’elle a été autrefois. Elle est devenue marbre en devenant boue. Qui la touche a froid. Elle passe, elle vous subit et elle vous ignore; elle est la figure déshonorée et sévère. La vie et l’ordre social lui ont dit leur dernier mot. Il lui est arrivé tout ce qui lui arrivera. Elle a tout ressenti, tout supporté, tout éprouvé, tout souffert, tout perdu, tout pleuré. Elle est résignée de cette résignation qui ressemble à l’indifférence comme la mort ressemble au sommeil. Elle n’évite plus rien. Elle ne craint plus rien. Tombe sur elle toute la nuée et passe sur elle tout l’océan! que lui importe! c’est une éponge imbibée.

Elle le croit du moins, mais c’est une erreur de s’imaginer qu’on épuise le sort et qu’on touche le fond de quoi que ce soit.

Hélas! qu’est-ce que toutes ces destinées ainsi poussées pêle-mêle? où vont-elles? pourquoi sont-elles ainsi?

Celui qui sait cela voit toute l’ombre.

Il est seul. Il s’appelle Dieu.

Chapitre XII

Le désœuvrement de M. Bamatabois

Il y a dans toutes les petites villes, et il y avait à Montreuil-sur-mer en particulier, une classe de jeunes gens qui grignotent quinze cents livres de rente en province du même air dont leurs pareils dévorent à Paris deux cent mille francs par an. Ce sont des êtres de la grande espèce neutre; hongres, parasites, nuls, qui ont un peu de terre, un peu de sottise et un peu d’esprit, qui seraient des rustres dans un salon et se croient des gentilshommes au cabaret, qui disent: mes prés, mes bois, mes paysans, sifflent les actrices du théâtre pour prouver qu’ils sont gens de goût, querellent les officiers de la garnison pour montrer qu’ils sont gens de guerre, chassent, fument, bâillent, boivent, sentent le tabac, jouent au billard, regardent les voyageurs descendre de diligence, vivent au café, dînent à l’auberge, ont un chien qui mange les os sous la table et une maîtresse qui pose les plats dessus, tiennent à un sou, exagèrent les modes, admirent la tragédie, méprisent les femmes, usent leurs vieilles bottes, copient Londres à travers Paris et Paris à travers Pont-à-Mousson, vieillissent hébétés, ne travaillent pas, ne servent à rien et ne nuisent pas à grand’chose.

M. Félix Tholomyès, resté dans sa province et n’ayant jamais vu Paris, serait un de ces hommes-là.

S’ils étaient plus riches, on dirait: ce sont des élégants; s’ils étaient plus pauvres, on dirait: ce sont des fainéants. Ce sont tout simplement des désœuvrés. Parmi ces désœuvrés, il y a des ennuyeux, des ennuyés, des rêvasseurs, et quelques drôles.

Dans ce temps-là, un élégant se composait d’un grand col, d’une grande cravate, d’une montre à breloques, de trois gilets superposés de couleurs différentes, le bleu et le rouge en dedans, d’un habit couleur olive à taille courte, à queue de morue, à double rangée de boutons d’argent serrés les uns contre les autres et montant jusque sur l’épaule, et d’un pantalon olive plus clair, orné sur les deux coutures d’un nombre de côtes indéterminé, mais toujours impair, variant de une à onze, limite qui n’était jamais franchie. Ajoutez à cela des souliers-bottes avec de petits fers au talon, un chapeau à haute forme et à bords étroits, des cheveux en touffe, une énorme canne, et une conversation rehaussée des calembours de Potier. Sur le tout des éperons et des moustaches. À cette époque, des moustaches voulaient dire bourgeois et des éperons voulaient dire piéton.

L’élégant de province portait les éperons plus longs et les moustaches plus farouches. C’était le temps de la lutte des républiques de l’Amérique méridionale contre le roi d’Espagne, de Bolivar contre Morillo. Les chapeaux à petits bords étaient royalistes et se nommaient des morillos; les libéraux portaient des chapeaux à larges bords qui s’appelaient des bolivars.

Huit ou dix mois donc après ce qui a été raconté dans les pages précédentes, vers les premiers jours de janvier 1823, un soir qu’il avait neigé, un de ces élégants, un de ces désœuvrés, un “bien pensant”, car il avait un morillo, de plus chaudement enveloppé d’un de ces grands manteaux qui complétaient dans les temps froids le costume à la mode, se divertissait à harceler une créature qui rôdait en robe de bal et toute décolletée avec des fleurs sur la tête devant la vitre du café des officiers. Cet élégant fumait, car c’était décidément la mode.

Chaque fois que cette femme passait devant lui, il lui jetait, avec une bouffée de la fumée de son cigare, quelque apostrophe qu’il croyait spirituelle et gaie, comme: — Que tu es laide! — Veux-tu te cacher! — Tu n’as pas de dents! etc., etc. — Ce monsieur s’appelait monsieur Bamatabois. La femme, triste spectre paré qui allait et venait sur la neige, ne lui répondait pas, ne le regardait même pas, et n’en accomplissait pas moins en silence et avec une régularité sombre sa promenade qui la ramenait de cinq minutes en cinq minutes sous le sarcasme, comme le soldat condamné qui revient sous les verges. Ce peu d’effet piqua sans doute l’oisif qui, profitant d’un moment où elle se retournait, s’avança derrière elle à pas de loup et en étouffant son rire, se baissa, prit sur le pavé une poignée de neige et la lui plongea brusquement dans le dos entre ses deux épaules nues. La fille poussa un rugissement, se tourna, bondit comme une panthère, et se rua sur l’homme, lui enfonçant ses ongles dans le visage, avec les plus effroyables paroles qui puissent tomber du corps de garde dans le ruisseau. Ces injures, vomies d’une voix enrouée par l’eau-de-vie, sortaient hideusement d’une bouche à laquelle manquaient en effet les deux dents de devant. C’était la Fantine.

Au bruit que cela fit, les officiers sortirent en foule du café, les passants s’amassèrent, et il se forma un grand cercle riant, huant et applaudissant, autour de ce tourbillon composé de deux êtres où l’on avait peine à reconnaître un homme et une femme, l’homme se débattant, son chapeau à terre, la femme frappant des pieds et des poings, décoiffée, hurlant, sans dents et sans cheveux, livide de colère, horrible. Tout à coup un homme de haute taille sortit vivement de la foule, saisit la femme à son corsage de satin couvert de boue, et lui dit: Suis-moi!

La femme leva la tête; sa voix furieuse s’éteignit subitement. Ses yeux étaient vitreux, de livide elle était devenue pâle, et elle tremblait d’un tremblement de terreur. Elle avait reconnu Javert.

L’élégant avait profité de l’incident pour s’esquiver.

Chapitre XIII

Solution de quelques questions de police municipale

Javert écarta les assistants, rompit le cercle et se mit à marcher à grands pas vers le bureau de police qui est à l’extrémité de la place, traînant après lui la misérable. Elle se laissait faire machinalement. Ni lui ni elle ne disaient un mot. La nuée des spectateurs, au paroxysme de la joie, suivait avec des quolibets. La suprême misère, occasion d’obscénités. Arrivé au bureau de police qui était une salle basse chauffée par un poêle et gardée par un poste, avec une porte vitrée et grillée sur la rue, Javert ouvrit la porte, entra avec Fantine, et referma la porte derrière lui, au grand désappointement des curieux qui se haussèrent sur la pointe du pied et allongèrent le cou devant la vitre trouble du corps de garde, cherchant à voir. La curiosité est une gourmandise. Voir, c’est dévorer.

En entrant, la Fantine alla tomber dans un coin, immobile et muette, accroupie comme une chienne qui a peur.

Le sergent du poste apporta une chandelle allumée sur une table. Javert s’assit, tira de sa poche une feuille de papier timbré et se mit à écrire.

Ces classes de femmes sont entièrement remises par nos lois à la discrétion de la police. Elle en fait ce qu’elle veut, les punit comme bon lui semble, et confisque à son gré ces deux tristes choses qu’elles appellent leur industrie et leur liberté. Javert était impassible; son visage sérieux ne trahissait aucune émotion. Pourtant il était gravement et profondément préoccupé. C’était un de ces moments où il exerçait sans contrôle, mais avec tous les scrupules d’une conscience sévère, son redoutable pouvoir discrétionnaire. En cet instant, il le sentait, son escabeau d’agent de police était un tribunal. Il jugeait. Il jugeait, et il condamnait. Il appelait tout ce qu’il pouvait avoir d’idées dans l’esprit autour de la grande chose qu’il faisait. Plus il examinait le fait de cette fille, plus il se sentait révolté. Il était évident qu’il venait de voir commettre un crime. Il venait de voir, là dans la rue, la société, représentée par un propriétaire-électeur, insultée et attaquée par une créature en dehors de tout. Une prostituée avait attenté à un bourgeois. Il avait vu cela, lui Javert. Il écrivait en silence.

Quand il eut fini, il signa, plia le papier et dit au sergent du poste, en le lui remettant:

— Prenez trois hommes, et menez cette fille au bloc.

Puis se tournant vers la Fantine:

— Tu en as pour six mois.

La malheureuse tressaillit.

— Six mois! six mois de prison! Six mois à gagner sept sous par jour! Mais que deviendra Cosette? ma fille! ma fille! Mais je dois encore plus de cent francs aux Thénardier, monsieur l’inspecteur, savez-vous cela?

Elle se traîna sur la dalle mouillée par les bottes boueuses de tous ces hommes, sans se lever, joignant les mains, faisant de grands pas avec ses genoux.

— Monsieur Javert, dit-elle, je vous demande grâce. Je vous assure que je n’ai pas eu tort. Si vous aviez vu le commencement, vous auriez vu! je vous jure le bon Dieu que je n’ai pas eu tort. C’est ce monsieur le bourgeois que je ne connais pas qui m’a mis de la neige dans le dos. Est-ce qu’on a le droit de nous mettre de la neige dans le dos quand nous passons comme cela tranquillement sans faire de mal à personne? Cela m’a saisie. Je suis un peu malade, voyez-vous! Et puis il y avait déjà un peu de temps qu’il me disait des raisons. Tu es laide! tu n’as pas de dents! Je le sais bien que je n’ai plus mes dents. Je ne faisais rien, moi; je disais: c’est un monsieur qui s’amuse. J’étais honnête avec lui, je ne lui parlais pas. C’est à cet instant-là qu’il m’a mis de la neige. Monsieur Javert, mon bon monsieur l’inspecteur! est-ce qu’il n’y a personne là qui ait vu pour vous dire que c’est bien vrai? J’ai peut-être eu tort de me fâcher. Vous savez, dans le premier moment, on n’est pas maître. On a des vivacités. Et puis, quelque chose de si froid qu’on vous met dans le dos à l’heure que vous ne vous y attendez pas! J’ai eu tort d’abîmer le chapeau de ce monsieur. Pourquoi s’est-il en allé? Je lui demanderais pardon. Oh! mon Dieu, cela me serait bien égal de lui demander pardon. Faites-moi grâce pour aujourd’hui cette fois, monsieur Javert. Tenez, vous ne savez pas ça, dans les prisons on ne gagne que sept sous, ce n’est pas la faute du gouvernement, mais on gagne sept sous, et figurez-vous que j’ai cent francs à payer, ou autrement on me renverra ma petite. Ô mon Dieu! je ne peux pas l’avoir avec moi. C’est si vilain ce que je fais! Ô ma Cosette, ô mon petit ange de la bonne sainte Vierge, qu’est-ce qu’elle deviendra, pauvre loup! Je vais vous dire, c’est les Thénardier, des aubergistes, des paysans, ça n’a pas de raisonnement. Il leur faut de l’argent. Ne me mettez pas en prison! Voyez-vous, c’est une petite qu’on mettrait à même sur la grande route, va comme tu pourras, en plein cœur d’hiver, il faut avoir pitié de cette chose-là, mon bon monsieur Javert. Si c’était plus grand, ça gagnerait sa vie, mais ça ne peut pas, à ces âges-là. Je ne suis pas une mauvaise femme au fond. Ce n’est pas la lâcheté et la gourmandise qui ont fait de moi ça. J’ai bu de l’eau-de-vie, c’est par misère. Je ne l’aime pas, mais cela étourdit. Quand j’étais plus heureuse, on n’aurait eu qu’à regarder dans mes armoires, on aurait bien vu que je n’étais pas une femme coquette qui a du désordre. J’avais du linge, beaucoup de linge. Ayez pitié de moi, monsieur Javert!

Elle parlait ainsi, brisée en deux, secouée par les sanglots, aveuglée par les larmes, la gorge nue, se tordant les mains, toussant d’une toux sèche et courte, balbutiant tout doucement avec la voix de l’agonie. La grande douleur est un rayon divin et terrible qui transfigure les misérables. À ce moment-là, la Fantine était redevenue belle. À de certains instants, elle s’arrêtait et baisait tendrement le bas de la redingote du mouchard. Elle eût attendri un cœur de granit, mais on n’attendrit pas un cœur de bois.

— Allons! dit Javert, je t’ai écoutée. As-tu bien tout dit? Marche à présent! Tu as tes six mois; le Père éternel en personne n’y pourrait plus rien.

À cette solennelle parole, Le Père éternel en personne n’y pourrait plus rien, elle comprit que l’arrêt était prononcé. Elle s’affaissa sur elle-même en murmurant:

— Grâce!

Javert tourna le dos.

Les soldats la saisirent par les bras.

Depuis quelques minutes, un homme était entré sans qu’on eût pris garde à lui. Il avait refermé la porte, s’y était adossé, et avait entendu les prières désespérées de la Fantine. Au moment où les soldats mirent la main sur la malheureuse, qui ne voulait pas se lever, il fit un pas, sortit de l’ombre, et dit:

— Un instant, s’il vous plaît!

Javert leva les yeux et reconnut M. Madeleine. Il ôta son chapeau, et saluant avec une sorte de gaucherie fâchée:

— Pardon, monsieur le maire....

Ce mot, monsieur le maire, fit sur la Fantine un effet étrange. Elle se dressa debout tout d’une pièce comme un spectre qui sort de terre, repoussa les soldats des deux bras, marcha droit à M. Madeleine avant qu’on eût pu la retenir, et le regardant fixement, l’air égaré, elle cria:

— Ah! c’est donc toi qui es monsieur le maire!

Puis elle éclata de rire et lui cracha au visage.

M. Madeleine s’essuya le visage, et dit:

— Inspecteur Javert, mettez cette femme en liberté.

Javert se sentit au moment de devenir fou. Il éprouvait en cet instant, coup sur coup, et presque mêlées ensemble, les plus violentes émotions qu’il eût ressenties de sa vie. Voir une fille publique cracher au visage d’un maire, cela était une chose si monstrueuse que, dans ses suppositions les plus effroyables, il eût regardé comme un sacrilège de le croire possible. D’un autre côté, dans le fond de sa pensée, il faisait confusément un rapprochement hideux entre ce qu’était cette femme et ce que pouvait être ce maire, et alors il entrevoyait avec horreur je ne sais quoi de tout simple dans ce prodigieux attentat. Mais quand il vit ce maire, ce magistrat, s’essuyer tranquillement le visage et dire: mettez cette femme en liberté, il eut comme un éblouissement de stupeur; la pensée et la parole lui manquèrent également; la somme de l’étonnement possible était dépassée pour lui. Il resta muet.

Ce mot n’avait pas porté un coup moins étrange à la Fantine. Elle leva son bras nu et se cramponna à la clef du poêle comme une personne qui chancelle. Cependant elle regardait tout autour d’elle et elle se mit à parler à voix basse, comme si elle se parlait à elle-même.

— En liberté! qu’on me laisse aller! que je n’aille pas en prison six mois! Qui est-ce qui a dit cela? Il n’est pas possible qu’on ait dit cela. J’ai mal entendu. Ça ne peut pas être ce monstre de maire! Est-ce que c’est vous, mon bon monsieur Javert, qui avez dit qu’on me mette en liberté? Oh! voyez-vous! je vais vous dire et vous me laisserez aller. Ce monstre de maire, ce vieux gredin de maire, c’est lui qui est cause de tout. Figurez-vous, monsieur Javert, qu’il m’a chassée! à cause d’un tas de gueuses qui tiennent des propos dans l’atelier. Si ce n’est pas là une horreur! renvoyer une pauvre fille qui fait honnêtement son ouvrage! Alors je n’ai plus gagné assez, et tout le malheur est venu. D’abord il y a une amélioration que ces messieurs de la police devraient bien faire, ce serait d’empêcher les entrepreneurs des prisons de faire du tort aux pauvres gens. Je vais vous expliquer cela, voyez-vous. Vous gagnez douze sous dans les chemises, cela tombe à neuf sous, il n’y a plus moyen de vivre. Il faut donc devenir ce qu’on peut. Moi, j’avais ma petite Cosette, j’ai bien été forcée de devenir une mauvaise femme. Vous comprenez à présent, que c’est ce gueux de maire qui a tout fait le mal. Après cela, j'ai piétiné le chapeau de ce monsieur bourgeois devant le café des officiers. Mais lui, il m'avait perdu toute ma robe avec sa neige. Nous autres, nous n'avons qu'une robe de soie, pour le soir. Voyez-vous, je n'ai jamais fait de mal exprès, vrai, monsieur Javert, et je vois partout des femmes bien plus méchantes que moi qui sont bien plus heureuses. Ô monsieur Javert, c'est vous qui avez dit qu'on me mette dehors, n'est-ce pas? Prenez des informations, parlez à mon propriétaire, maintenant je paye mon terme, on vous dira bien que je suis honnête. Ah! mon Dieu, je vous demande pardon, j'ai touché, sans faire attention, à la clef du poêle, et cela fait fumer.

M. Madeleine l'écoutait avec une attention profonde. Pendant qu'elle parlait, il avait fouillé dans son gilet, en avait tiré sa bourse et l'avait ouverte. Elle était vide. Il l'avait remise dans sa poche. Il dit à la Fantine:

— Combien avez-vous dit que vous deviez?

La Fantine, qui ne regardait que Javert, se retourna de son côté:

— Est-ce que je te parle à toi!

Puis s'adressant aux soldats:

— Dites donc, vous autres, avez-vous vu comme je te vous lui ai craché à la figure? Ah! vieux scélérat de maire, tu viens ici pour me faire peur, mais je n'ai pas peur de toi. J'ai peur de monsieur Javert. J'ai peur de mon bon monsieur Javert!

En parlant ainsi elle se retourna vers l'inspecteur:

— Avec ça, voyez-vous, monsieur l'inspecteur, il faut être juste. Je comprends que vous êtes juste, monsieur l'inspecteur. Au fait, c'est tout simple, un homme qui joue à mettre un peu de neige dans le dos d'une femme, ça les faisait rire, les officiers, il faut bien qu'on se divertisse à quelque chose, nous autres nous sommes là pour qu'on s'amuse, quoi! Et puis, vous, vous venez, vous êtes bien forcé de mettre l'ordre, vous emmenez la femme qui a tort, mais en y réfléchissant, comme vous êtes bon, vous dites qu'on me mette en liberté, c'est pour la petite, parce que six mois en prison, cela m'empêcherait de nourrir mon enfant. Seulement n'y reviens plus, coquine! Oh! je n'y reviendrai plus, monsieur Javert! on me fera tout ce qu'on voudra maintenant, je ne bougerai plus. Seulement, aujourd'hui, voyez-vous, j'ai crié parce que cela m'a fait mal, je ne m'attendais pas du tout à cette neige de ce monsieur, et puis, je vous ai dit, je ne me porte pas très bien, je tousse, j'ai là dans l'estomac comme une boule qui me brûle, que le médecin me dit: soignez-vous. Tenez, tâtez, donnez votre main, n'ayez pas peur, c'est ici.

Elle ne pleurait plus, sa voix était caressante, elle appuyait sur sa gorge blanche et délicate la grosse main rude de Javert, et elle le regardait en souriant.

Tout à coup elle rajusta vivement le désordre de ses vêtements, fit retomber les plis de sa robe qui en se traînant s'était relevée presque à la hauteur du genou, et marcha vers la porte en disant à demi-voix aux soldats avec un signe de tête amical:

— Les enfants, monsieur l'inspecteur a dit qu'on me lâche, je m'en vas.

Elle mit la main sur le loquet. Un pas de plus, elle était dans la rue.

Javert jusqu'à cet instant était resté debout, immobile, l'œil fixé à terre, posé de travers au milieu de cette scène comme une statue dérangée qui attend qu'on la mette quelque part.

Le bruit que fit le loquet le réveilla. Il releva la tête avec une expression d'autorité souveraine, expression toujours d'autant plus effrayante que le pouvoir se trouve placé plus bas, féroce chez la bête fauve, atroce chez l'homme de rien.

— Sergent, cria-t-il, vous ne voyez pas que cette drôlesse s'en va! Qui est-ce qui vous a dit de la laisser aller?

— Moi, dit Madeleine.

La Fantine à la voix de Javert avait tremblé et lâché le loquet comme un voleur pris lâche l'objet volé. À la voix de Madeleine, elle se retourna, et à partir de ce moment, sans qu'elle prononçât un mot, sans qu'elle osât même laisser sortir son souffle librement, son regard alla tour à tour de Madeleine à Javert et de Javert à Madeleine, selon que c'était l'un ou l'autre qui parlait.

Il était évident qu'il fallait que Javert eût été, comme on dit, «jeté hors des gonds» pour qu'il se fût permis d'apostropher le sergent comme il l'avait fait, après l'invitation du maire de mettre Fantine en liberté. En était-il venu à oublier la présence de monsieur le maire? Avait-il fini par se déclarer à lui-même qu'il était impossible qu'une «autorité» eût donné un pareil ordre, et que bien certainement monsieur le maire avait dû dire sans le vouloir une chose pour une autre? Ou bien, devant les énormités dont il était témoin depuis deux heures, se disait-il qu'il fallait revenir aux suprêmes résolutions, qu'il était nécessaire que le petit se fit grand, que le mouchard se transformât en magistrat, que l'homme de police devînt homme de justice, et qu'en cette extrémité prodigieuse l'ordre, la loi, la morale, le gouvernement, la société tout entière, se personnifiaient en lui Javert?

Quoi qu'il en soit, quand M. Madeleine eut dit ce moi qu'on vient d'entendre, on vit l'inspecteur de police Javert se tourner vers monsieur le maire, pâle, froid, les lèvres bleues, le regard désespéré, tout le corps agité d'un tremblement imperceptible, et, chose inouïe, lui dire, l'œil baissé, mais la voix ferme:

— Monsieur le maire, cela ne se peut pas.

— Comment? dit M. Madeleine.

— Cette malheureuse a insulté un bourgeois.

— Inspecteur Javert, repartit M. Madeleine avec un accent conciliant et calme, écoutez. Vous êtes un honnête homme, et je ne fais nulle difficulté de m'expliquer avec vous. Voici le vrai. Je passais sur la place comme vous emmeniez cette femme, il y avait encore des groupes, je me suis informé, j'ai tout su, c'est le bourgeois qui a eu tort et qui, en bonne police, eût dû être arrêté.

Javert reprit:

— Cette misérable vient d'insulter monsieur le maire.

— Ceci me regarde, dit M. Madeleine. Mon injure est à moi peut-être. J'en puis faire ce que je veux.

— Je demande pardon à monsieur le maire. Son injure n'est pas à lui, elle est à la justice.

— Inspecteur Javert, répliqua M. Madeleine, la première justice, c'est la conscience. J'ai entendu cette femme. Je sais ce que je fais.

— Et moi, monsieur le maire, je ne sais pas ce que je vois.

— Alors contentez-vous d'obéir.

— J'obéis à mon devoir. Mon devoir veut que cette femme fasse six mois de prison.

M. Madeleine répondit avec douceur:

— Écoutez bien ceci. Elle n'en fera pas un jour.

À cette parole décisive, Javert osa regarder le maire fixement, et lui dit, mais avec un son de voix toujours profondément respectueux:

— Je suis au désespoir de résister à monsieur le maire, c'est la première fois de ma vie, mais il daignera me permettre de lui faire observer que je suis dans la limite de mes attributions. Je reste, puisque monsieur le maire le veut, dans le fait du bourgeois. J'étais là. C'est cette fille qui s'est jetée sur monsieur Bamatabois, qui est électeur et propriétaire de cette belle maison à balcon qui fait le coin de l'esplanade, à trois étages et toute en pierre de taille. Enfin, il y a des choses dans ce monde! Quoi qu'il en soit, monsieur le maire, cela, c'est un fait de police de la rue qui me regarde, et je retiens la femme Fantine.

Alors M. Madeleine croisa les bras et dit avec une voix sévère que personne dans la ville n'avait encore entendue:

— Le fait dont vous parlez est un fait de police municipale. Aux termes des articles neuf, onze, quinze et soixante-six du code d'instruction criminelle, j'en suis juge. J'ordonne que cette femme soit mise en liberté.

Javert voulut tenter un dernier effort.

— Mais, monsieur le maire....

— Je vous rappelle, à vous, l'article quatre-vingt-un de la loi du 13 décembre 1799 sur la détention arbitraire.

— Monsieur le maire, permettez....

— Plus un mot.

— Pourtant....

— Sortez, dit M. Madeleine.

Javert reçut le coup, debout, de face, et en pleine poitrine comme un soldat russe. Il salua jusqu'à terre monsieur le maire, et sortit.

Fantine se rangea de la porte et le regarda avec stupeur passer devant elle.

Cependant elle aussi était en proie à un bouleversement étrange. Elle venait de se voir en quelque sorte disputée par deux puissances opposées. Elle avait vu lutter devant ses yeux deux hommes tenant dans leurs mains sa liberté, sa vie, son âme, son enfant; l'un de ces hommes la tirait du côté de l'ombre, l'autre la ramenait vers la lumière. Dans cette lutte, entrevue à travers les grossissements de l'épouvante, ces deux hommes lui étaient apparus comme deux géants; l'un parlait comme son démon, l'autre parlait comme son bon ange. L'ange avait vaincu le démon, et, chose qui la faisait frissonner de la tête aux pieds, cet ange, ce libérateur, c'était précisément l'homme qu'elle abhorrait, ce maire qu'elle avait si longtemps considéré comme l'auteur de tous ses maux, ce Madeleine! et au moment même où elle venait de l'insulter d'une façon hideuse, il la sauvait! S'était-elle donc trompée? Devait-elle donc changer toute son âme?... Elle ne savait, elle tremblait. Elle écoutait éperdue, elle regardait effarée, et à chaque parole que disait M. Madeleine, elle sentait fondre et s'écrouler en elle les affreuses ténèbres de la haine et naître dans son cœur je ne sais quoi de réchauffant et d'ineffable qui était de la joie, de la confiance et de l'amour.

Quand Javert fut sorti, M. Madeleine se tourna vers elle, et lui dit avec une voix lente, ayant peine à parler comme un homme sérieux qui ne veut pas pleurer:

— Je vous ai entendue. Je ne savais rien de ce que vous avez dit. Je crois que c'est vrai, et je sens que c'est vrai. J'ignorais même que vous eussiez quitté mes ateliers. Pourquoi ne vous êtes-vous pas adressée à moi? Mais voici: je payerai vos dettes, je ferai venir votre enfant, ou vous irez la rejoindre. Vous vivrez ici, à Paris, où vous voudrez. Je me charge de votre enfant et de vous. Vous ne travaillerez plus, si vous voulez. Je vous donnerai tout l'argent qu'il vous faudra. Vous redeviendrez honnête en redevenant heureuse. Et même, écoutez, je vous le déclare dès à présent, si tout est comme vous le dites, et je n'en doute pas, vous n'avez jamais cessé d'être vertueuse et sainte devant Dieu. Oh! pauvre femme!

C'en était plus que la pauvre Fantine n'en pouvait supporter. Avoir Cosette! sortir de cette vie infâme! vivre libre, riche, heureuse, honnête, avec Cosette! voir brusquement s'épanouir au milieu de sa misère toutes ces réalités du paradis! Elle regarda comme hébétée cet homme qui lui parlait, et ne put que jeter deux ou trois sanglots: oh! oh! oh! Ses jarrets plièrent, elle se mit à genoux devant M. Madeleine, et, avant qu'il eût pu l'en empêcher, il sentit qu'elle lui prenait la main et que ses lèvres s'y posaient.

Puis elle s'évanouit.

Livre sixième — Javert

Chapitre I

Commencement du repos

M. Madeleine fit transporter la Fantine à cette infirmerie qu’il avait dans sa propre maison. Il la confia aux sœurs qui la mirent au lit. Une fièvre ardente était survenue. Elle passa une partie de la nuit à délirer et à parler haut. Cependant elle finit par s’endormir.

Le lendemain vers midi Fantine se réveilla, elle entendit une respiration tout près de son lit, elle écarta son rideau et vit M. Madeleine debout qui regardait quelque chose au-dessus de sa tête. Ce regard était plein de pitié et d’angoisse et suppliait. Elle en suivit la direction et vit qu’il s’adressait à un crucifix cloué au mur.

M. Madeleine était désormais transfiguré aux yeux de Fantine. Il lui paraissait enveloppé de lumière. Il était absorbé dans une sorte de prière. Elle le considéra longtemps sans oser l’interrompre. Enfin elle lui dit timidement:

— Que faites-vous donc là?

M. Madeleine était à cette place depuis une heure. Il attendait que Fantine se réveillât. Il lui prit la main, lui tâta le pouls, et répondit:

— Comment êtes-vous?

— Bien, j’ai dormi, dit-elle, je crois que je vais mieux. Ce ne sera rien.

Lui reprit, répondant à la question qu’elle lui avait adressée d’abord, comme s’il ne faisait que de l’entendre:

— Je priais le martyr qui est là-haut.

Et il ajouta dans sa pensée: «Pour la martyre qui est ici-bas.»

M. Madeleine avait passé la nuit et la matinée à s’informer. Il savait tout maintenant. Il connaissait dans tous ses poignants détails l’histoire de Fantine. Il continua:

— Vous avez bien souffert, pauvre mère. Oh! ne vous plaignez pas, vous avez à présent la dot des élus. C’est de cette façon que les hommes font des anges. Ce n’est point leur faute; ils ne savent pas s’y prendre autrement. Voyez-vous, cet enfer dont vous sortez est la première forme du ciel. Il fallait commencer par là.

Il soupira profondément. Elle cependant lui souriait avec ce sublime sourire auquel il manquait deux dents.

Javert dans cette même nuit avait écrit une lettre. Il remit lui-même cette lettre le lendemain matin au bureau de poste de Montreuil-sur-mer. Elle était pour Paris, et la suscription portait: À monsieur Chabouillet, secrétaire de monsieur le préfet de police. Comme l'affaire du corps de garde s'était ébruitée, la directrice du bureau de poste et quelques autres personnes qui virent la lettre avant le départ et qui reconnurent l'écriture de Javert sur l'adresse, pensèrent que c'était sa démission qu'il envoyait.

M. Madeleine se hâta d'écrire aux Thénardier. Fantine leur devait cent vingt francs. Il leur envoya trois cents francs en leur disant de se payer sur cette somme, et d'amener tout de suite l'enfant à Montreuil-sur-mer où sa mère malade la réclamait.

Ceci éblouit le Thénardier.

— Diable! dit-il à sa femme, ne lâchons pas l'enfant. Voilà que cette mauviette va devenir une vache à lait. Je devine. Quelque jocrisse se sera amouraché de la mère.

Il riposta par un mémoire de cinq cents et quelques francs fort bien fait. Dans ce mémoire figuraient pour plus de trois cents francs deux notes incontestables, l'une d'un médecin, l'autre d'un apothicaire, lesquels avaient soigné et médicamenté dans deux longues maladies Éponine et Azelma. Cosette, nous l'avons dit, n'avait pas été malade. Ce fut l'affaire d'une toute petite substitution de noms. Thénardier mit au bas du mémoire: reçu à compte trois cents francs.

M. Madeleine envoya tout de suite trois cents autres francs et écrivit: Dépêchez-vous d'amener Cosette.

— Christi! dit le Thénardier, ne lâchons pas l'enfant.

Cependant Fantine ne se rétablissait point. Elle était toujours à l'infirmerie. Les sœurs n'avaient d'abord reçu et soigné «cette fille» qu'avec répugnance. Qui a vu les bas-reliefs de Reims se souvient du gonflement de la lèvre inférieure des vierges sages regardant les vierges folles. Cet antique mépris des vestales pour les ambulaïes est un des plus profonds instincts de la dignité féminine; les sœurs l'avaient éprouvé, avec le redoublement qu'ajoute la religion. Mais, en peu de jours, Fantine les avait désarmées. Elle avait toutes sortes de paroles humbles et douces, et la mère qui était en elle attendrissait. Un jour les sœurs l'entendirent qui disait à travers la fièvre:

— J'ai été une pécheresse, mais quand j'aurai mon enfant près de moi, cela voudra dire que Dieu m'a pardonné. Pendant que j'étais dans le mal, je n’aurais pas voulu avoir ma Cosette avec moi, je n’aurais pas pu supporter ses yeux étonnés et tristes. C’était pour elle pourtant que je faisais le mal, et c’est ce qui fait que Dieu me pardonne. Je sentirai la bénédiction du bon Dieu quand Cosette sera ici. Je la regarderai, cela me fera du bien de voir cette innocente. Elle ne sait rien du tout. C’est un ange, voyez-vous, mes sœurs. À cet âge-là, les ailes, ça n’est pas encore tombé.

M. Madeleine l’allait voir deux fois par jour, et chaque fois elle lui demandait:

— Verrai-je bientôt ma Cosette?

Il lui répondait:

— Peut-être demain matin. D’un moment à l’autre elle arrivera, je l’attends.

Et le visage pâle de la mère rayonnait.

— Oh! disait-elle, comme je vais être heureuse!

Nous venons de dire qu’elle ne se rétablissait pas. Au contraire, son état semblait s’aggraver de semaine en semaine. Cette poignée de neige appliquée à nu sur la peau entre les deux omoplates avait déterminé une suppression subite de transpiration à la suite de laquelle la maladie qu’elle couvait depuis plusieurs années finit par se déclarer violemment. On commençait alors à suivre pour l’étude et le traitement des maladies de poitrine les belles indications de Laennec. Le médecin ausculta Fantine et hocha la tête.

M. Madeleine dit au médecin:

— Eh bien?

— N’a-t-elle pas un enfant qu’elle désire voir? dit le médecin.

— Oui.

— Eh bien, hâtez-vous de le faire venir.

M. Madeleine eut un tressaillement.

Fantine lui demanda:

— Qu’a dit le médecin?

M. Madeleine s’efforça de sourire.

— Il a dit de faire venir bien vite votre enfant. Que cela vous rendra la santé.

— Oh! reprit-elle, il a raison! Mais qu’est-ce qu’ils ont donc ces Thénardier à me garder ma Cosette! Oh! elle va venir. Voici enfin que je vois le bonheur tout près de moi!

Le Thénardier cependant ne «lâchait pas l’enfant» et donnait cent mauvaises raisons. Cosette était un peu souffrante pour se mettre en route l’hiver. Et puis il y avait un reste de petites dettes criardes dans le pays dont il rassemblait les factures, etc., etc.

— J’enverrai quelqu’un chercher Cosette, dit le père Madeleine. S’il le faut, j’irai moi-même.

Il écrivit sous la dictée de Fantine cette lettre qu’il lui fit signer:

«Monsieur Thénardier,

«Vous remettrez Cosette à la personne.

«On vous payera toutes les petites choses.

«J’ai l’honneur de vous saluer avec considération.

«Fantine.»

Sur ces entrefaites, il survint un grave incident. Nous avons beau tailler de notre mieux le bloc mystérieux dont notre vie est faite, la veine noire de la destinée y reparaît toujours.

Chapitre II

Comment Jean peut devenir Champ

Un matin, M. Madeleine était dans son cabinet, occupé à régler d'avance quelques affaires pressantes de la mairie pour le cas où il se déciderait à ce voyage de Montfermeil, lorsqu'on vint lui dire que l'inspecteur de police Javert demandait à lui parler. En entendant prononcer ce nom, M. Madeleine ne put se défendre d'une impression désagréable. Depuis l'aventure du bureau de police, Javert l'avait plus que jamais évité, et M. Madeleine ne l'avait point revu.

— Faites entrer, dit-il.

Javert entra.

M. Madeleine était resté assis près de la cheminée, une plume à la main, l'œil sur un dossier qu'il feuilletait et qu'il annotait, et qui contenait des procès-verbaux de contraventions à la police de la voirie. Il ne se dérangea point pour Javert. Il ne pouvait s'empêcher de songer à la pauvre Fantine, et il lui convenait d'être glacial.

Javert salua respectueusement M. le maire qui lui tournait le dos. M. le maire ne le regarda pas et continua d'annoter son dossier.

Javert fit deux ou trois pas dans le cabinet, et s'arrêta sans rompre le silence. Un physionomiste qui eût été familier avec la nature de Javert, qui eût étudié depuis longtemps ce sauvage au service de la civilisation, ce composé bizarre du Romain, du Spartiate, du moine et du caporal, cet espion incapable d'un mensonge, ce mouchard vierge, un physionomiste qui eût su sa secrète et ancienne aversion pour M. Madeleine, son conflit avec le maire au sujet de la Fantine, et qui eût considéré Javert en ce moment, se fût dit: que s'est-il passé? Il était évident, pour qui eût connu cette conscience droite, claire, sincère, probe, austère et féroce, que Javert sortait de quelque grand événement intérieur. Javert n'avait rien dans l'âme qu'il ne l'eût aussi sur le visage. Il était, comme les gens violents, sujet aux revirements brusques. Jamais sa physionomie n'avait été plus étrange et plus inattendue. En entrant, il s'était incliné devant M. Madeleine avec un regard où il n'y avait ni rancune, ni colère, ni défiance, il s'était arrêté à quelques pas derrière le fauteuil du maire; et maintenant il se tenait là, debout, dans une attitude presque disciplinaire, avec la rudesse naïve et froide d’un homme qui n’a jamais été doux et qui a toujours été patient; il attendait, sans dire un mot, sans faire un mouvement, dans une humilité vraie et dans une résignation tranquille, qu’il plût à monsieur le maire de se retourner, calme, sérieux, le chapeau à la main, les yeux baissés, avec une expression qui tenait le milieu entre le soldat devant son officier et le coupable devant son juge. Tous les sentiments comme tous les souvenirs qu’on eût pu lui supposer avaient disparu. Il n’y avait plus rien sur ce visage impénétrable et simple comme le granit, qu’une morne tristesse. Toute sa personne respirait l’abaissement et la fermeté, et je ne sais quel accablement courageux.

Enfin M. le maire posa sa plume et se tourna à demi.

— Eh bien! qu’est-ce? qu’y a-t-il, Javert?

Javert demeura un instant silencieux comme s’il se recueillait, puis éleva la voix avec une sorte de solennité triste qui n’excluait pourtant pas la simplicité:

— Il y a, monsieur le maire, qu’un acte coupable a été commis.

— Quel acte?

— Un agent inférieur de l’autorité a manqué de respect à un magistrat de la façon la plus grave. Je viens, comme c’est mon devoir, porter le fait à votre connaissance.

— Quel est cet agent? demanda M. Madeleine.

— Moi, dit Javert.

— Vous?

— Moi.

— Et quel est le magistrat qui aurait à se plaindre de l’agent?

— Vous, monsieur le maire.

M. Madeleine se dressa sur son fauteuil. Javert poursuivit, l’air sévère et les yeux toujours baissés:

— Monsieur le maire, je viens vous prier de vouloir bien provoquer près de l’autorité ma destitution.

M. Madeleine stupéfait ouvrit la bouche. Javert l’interrompit.

— Vous direz, j’aurais pu donner ma démission, mais cela ne suffit pas. Donner sa démission, c’est honorable. J’ai failli, je dois être puni. Il faut que je sois chassé.

Et après une pause, il ajouta:

— Monsieur le maire, vous avez été sévère pour moi l’autre jour injustement. Soyez-le aujourd’hui justement.

— Ah çà! pourquoi? s’écria M. Madeleine. Quel est ce galimatias? qu’est-ce que cela veut dire? où y a-t-il un acte coupable commis contre moi par vous? qu’est-ce que vous m’avez fait? quels torts avez-vous envers moi? Vous vous accusez, vous voulez être remplacé....

— Chassé, dit Javert.

— Chassé, soit. C’est fort bien. Je ne comprends pas.

— Vous allez comprendre, monsieur le maire.

Javert soupira du fond de sa poitrine et reprit toujours froidement et tristement:

— Monsieur le maire, il y a six semaines, à la suite de cette scène pour cette fille, j’étais furieux, je vous ai dénoncé.

— Dénoncé!

— À la préfecture de police de Paris.

M. Madeleine, qui ne riait pas beaucoup plus souvent que Javert, se mit à rire.

— Comme maire ayant empiété sur la police?

— Comme ancien forçat.

Le maire devint livide.

Javert, qui n’avait pas levé les yeux, continua:

— Je le croyais. Depuis longtemps j’avais des idées.

Une ressemblance, des renseignements que vous avez fait prendre à Faverolles, votre force des reins, l’aventure du vieux Fauchelevent, votre adresse au tir, votre jambe qui traîne un peu, est-ce que je sais, moi? des bêtises! mais enfin je vous prenais pour un nommé Jean Valjean.

— Un nommé?... Comment dites-vous ce nom-là?

— Jean Valjean. C’est un forçat que j’avais vu il y a vingt ans quand j’étais adjudant-garde-chiourme à Toulon. En sortant du bagne, ce Jean Valjean avait, à ce qu’il paraît, volé chez un évêque, puis il avait commis un autre vol à main armée, dans un chemin public, sur un petit savoyard. Depuis huit ans il s’était dérobé, on ne sait comment, et on le cherchait. Moi je m’étais figuré... Enfin, j’ai fait cette chose! La colère m’a décidé, je vous ai dénoncé à la préfecture.

M. Madeleine, qui avait ressaisi le dossier depuis quelques instants, reprit avec un accent de parfaite indifférence:

— Et que vous a-t-on répondu?

— Que j’étais fou.

— Eh bien?

— Eh bien, on avait raison.

— C’est heureux que vous le reconnaissiez!

— Il faut bien, puisque le véritable Jean Valjean est trouvé.

La feuille que tenait M. Madeleine lui échappa des mains, il leva la tête, regarda fixement Javert, et dit avec un accent inexprimable:

— Ah!

Javert poursuivit:

— Voilà ce que c’est, monsieur le maire. Il paraît qu’il y avait dans le pays, du côté d’Ailly-le-Haut-Clocher, une espèce de bonhomme qu’on appelait le père Champmathieu. C’était très misérable. On n’y faisait pas attention. Ces gens-là, on ne sait pas de quoi cela vit. Dernièrement, cet automne, le père Champmathieu a été arrêté pour un vol de pommes à cidre, commis chez... — enfin n’importe! Il y a eu vol, mur escaladé, branches de l’arbre cassées. On a arrêté mon Champmathieu. Il avait encore la branche de pommier à la main. On coffre le drôle. Jusqu’ici ce n’est pas beaucoup plus qu’une affaire correctionnelle. Mais voici qui est de la providence. La geôle étant en mauvais état, monsieur le juge d’instruction trouve à propos de faire transférer Champmathieu à Arras où est la prison départementale. Dans cette prison d’Arras, il y a un ancien forçat nommé Brevet qui est détenu pour je ne sais quoi et qu’on a fait guichetier de chambrée parce qu’il se conduit bien. Monsieur le maire, Champmathieu n’est pas plus tôt débarqué que voilà Brevet qui s’écrie: «Eh mais! je connais cet homme-là. C’est un fagot. Regardez-moi donc, bonhomme! Vous êtes Jean Valjean! — Jean Valjean! qui ça Jean Valjean? Le Champmathieu joue l’étonné. — Ne fais donc pas le sinvre, dit Brevet. Tu es Jean Valjean! Tu as été au bagne de Toulon. Il y a vingt ans. Nous y étions ensemble. — Le Champmathieu nie. Parbleu! vous comprenez. On approfondit. On me fouille cette aventure-là. Voici ce qu’on trouve: ce Champmathieu, il y a une trentaine d’années, a été ouvrier émondeur d’arbres dans plusieurs pays, notamment à Faverolles. Là on perd sa trace. Longtemps après, on le revoit en Auvergne, puis à Paris, où il dit avoir été charron et avoir eu une fille blanchisseuse, mais cela n’est pas prouvé; enfin dans ce pays-ci. Or, avant d’aller au bagne pour vol qualifié, qu’était Jean Valjean? émondeur. Où? à Faverolles. Autre fait. Ce Valjean s’appelait de son nom de baptême Jean et sa mère se nommait de son nom de famille Mathieu. Quoi de plus naturel que de penser qu’en sortant du bagne il aura pris le nom de sa mère pour se cacher et se sera fait appeler Jean Mathieu? Il va en Auvergne. De Jean la prononciation du pays fait Chan, on l’appelle Chan Mathieu. Notre homme se laisse faire et le voilà transformé en Champmathieu. Vous me suivez, n’est-ce pas? On s’informe à Faverolles. La famille de Jean Valjean n’y est plus. On ne sait plus où elle est. Vous savez, dans ces classes-là, il y a souvent de ces évanouissements d’une famille. On cherche, on ne trouve plus rien. Ces gens-là, quand ce n’est pas de la boue, c’est de la poussière. Et puis, comme le commencement de ces histoires date de trente ans, il n’y a plus personne à Faverolles qui ait connu Jean Valjean. On s’informe à Toulon. Avec Brevet, il n’y a plus que deux forçats qui aient vu Jean Valjean. Ce sont les condamnés à vie Cochepaille et Chenildieu. On les extrait du bagne et on les fait venir. On les confronte au prétendu Champmathieu. Ils n’hésitent pas. Pour eux comme pour Brevet, c’est Jean Valjean. Même âge, il a cinquante-quatre ans, même taille, même air, même homme enfin, c’est lui. C’est en ce moment-là même que j’envoyais ma dénonciation à la préfecture de Paris. On me répond que je perds l’esprit et que Jean Valjean est à Arras au pouvoir de la justice. Vous concevez si cela m’étonne, moi qui croyais tenir ici ce même Jean Valjean! J’écris à monsieur le juge d’instruction. Il me fait venir, on m’amène le Champmathieu....

— Eh bien? interrompit M. Madeleine.

Javert répondit avec son visage incorruptible et triste:

— Monsieur le maire, la vérité est la vérité. J’en suis fâché, mais c’est cet homme-là qui est Jean Valjean. Moi aussi je l’ai reconnu.

M. Madeleine reprit d’une voix très basse:

— Vous êtes sûr?

Javert se mit à rire de ce rire douloureux qui échappe à une conviction profonde:

— Oh, sûr!

Il demeura un moment pensif, prenant machinalement des pincées de poudre de bois dans la sébille à sécher l’encre qui était sur la table, et il ajouta:

— Et même, maintenant que je vois le vrai Jean Valjean, je ne comprends pas comment j’ai pu croire autre chose. Je vous demande pardon, monsieur le maire.

En adressant cette parole suppliante et grave à celui qui, six semaines auparavant, l’avait humilié en plein corps de garde et lui avait dit: «sortez!» Javert, cet homme hautain, était à son insu plein de simplicité et de dignité. M. Madeleine ne répondit à sa prière que par cette question brusque:

— Et que dit cet homme?

— Ah, dame! monsieur le maire, l’affaire est mauvaise. Si c’est Jean Valjean, il y a récidive. Enjamber un mur, casser une branche, chiper des pommes, pour un enfant, c’est une polissonnerie; pour un homme, c’est un délit; pour un forçat, c’est un crime. Escalade et vol, tout y est. Ce n’est plus la police correctionnelle, c’est la cour d’assises. Ce n’est plus quelques jours de prison, ce sont les galères à perpétuité. Et puis, il y a l’affaire du petit savoyard que j’espère bien qui reviendra. Diable! il y a de quoi se débattre, n’est-ce pas? Oui, pour un autre que Jean Valjean. Mais Jean Valjean est un sournois. C’est encore là que je le reconnais. Un autre sentirait que cela chauffe; il se démènerait, il crierait, la bouilloire chante devant le feu, il ne voudrait pas être Jean Valjean, et caetera. Lui, il n’a pas l’air de comprendre, il dit: Je suis Champmathieu, je ne sors pas de là! Il a l’air étonné, il fait la brute, c’est bien mieux. Oh! le drôle est habile. Mais c’est égal, les preuves sont là. Il est reconnu par quatre personnes, le vieux coquin sera condamné. C’est porté aux assises, à Arras. Je vais y aller pour témoigner. Je suis cité.

M. Madeleine s’était remis à son bureau, avait ressaisi son dossier, et le feuilletait tranquillement, lisant et écrivant tour à tour comme un homme affairé. Il se tourna vers Javert:

— Assez, Javert. Au fait, tous ces détails m’intéressent fort peu. Nous perdons notre temps, et nous avons des affaires pressées. Javert, vous allez vous rendre sur-le-champ chez la bonne femme Buseaupied qui vend des herbes là-bas au coin de la rue Saint-Saulve. Vous lui direz de déposer sa plainte contre le charretier Pierre Chesnelong. Cet homme est un brutal qui a failli écraser cette femme et son enfant. Il faut qu’il soit puni. Vous irez ensuite chez M. Charcellay, rue Montre-de-Champigny. Il se plaint qu’il y a une gouttière de la maison voisine qui verse l’eau de la pluie chez lui, et qui affouille les fondations de sa maison. Après vous constaterez des contraventions de police qu’on me signale rue Guibourg chez la veuve Doris, et rue du Garraud-Blanc chez madame Renée Le Bossé, et vous dresserez procès-verbal. Mais je vous donne là beaucoup de besogne. N’allez-vous pas être absent? ne m’avez-vous pas dit que vous alliez à Arras pour cette affaire dans huit ou dix jours?...

— Plus tôt que cela, monsieur le maire.

— Quel jour donc?

— Mais je croyais avoir dit à monsieur le maire que cela se jugeait demain et que je partais par la diligence cette nuit.

M. Madeleine fit un mouvement imperceptible.

— Et combien de temps durera l’affaire?

— Un jour tout au plus. L’arrêt sera prononcé au plus tard demain dans la nuit. Mais je n’attendrai pas l’arrêt, qui ne peut manquer. Sitôt ma déposition faite, je reviendrai ici.

— C’est bon, dit M. Madeleine.

Et il congédia Javert d’un signe de main. Javert ne s’en alla pas.

— Pardon, monsieur le maire, dit-il.

— Qu’est-ce encore? demanda M. Madeleine.

— Monsieur le maire, il me reste une chose à vous rappeler.

— Laquelle?

— C’est que je dois être destitué.

M. Madeleine se leva.

— Javert, vous êtes un homme d’honneur, et je vous estime. Vous vous exagérez votre faute. Ceci d’ailleurs est encore une offense qui me concerne. Javert, vous êtes digne de monter et non de descendre. J’entends que vous gardiez votre place.

Javert regarda M. Madeleine avec sa prunelle candide au fond de laquelle il semblait qu’on vit cette conscience peu éclairée, mais rigide et chaste, et il dit d’une voix tranquille:

— Monsieur le maire, je ne puis vous accorder cela.

— Je vous répète, répliqua M. Madeleine, que la chose me regarde.

Mais Javert, attentif à sa seule pensée, continua:

— Quant à exagérer, je n’exagère point. Voici comment je raisonne. Je vous ai soupçonné injustement. Cela, ce n’est rien. C’est notre droit à nous autres de soupçonner, quoiqu’il y ait pourtant abus à soupçonner au-dessus de soi. Mais, sans preuves, dans un accès de colère, dans le but de me venger, je vous ai dénoncé comme forçat, vous, un homme respectable, un maire, un magistrat! ceci est grave. Très grave. J’ai offensé l’autorité dans votre personne, moi, agent de l’autorité! Si l’un de mes subordonnés avait fait ce que j’ai fait, je l’aurais déclaré indigne du service, et chassé. Eh bien?

Tenez, monsieur le maire, encore un mot. J’ai souvent été sévère dans ma vie. Pour les autres. C’était juste. Je faisais bien. Maintenant, si je n’étais pas sévère pour moi, tout ce que j’ai fait de juste deviendrait injuste.

Est-ce que je dois m’épargner plus que les autres? Non. Quoi! je n’aurais été bon qu’à châtier autrui, et pas moi! mais je serais un misérable! mais ceux qui disent: ce gueux de Javert! auraient raison! Monsieur le maire, je ne souhaite pas que vous me traitiez avec bonté, votre bonté m’a fait faire assez de mauvais sang quand elle était pour les autres. Je n’en veux pas pour moi. La bonté qui consiste à donner raison à la fille publique contre le bourgeois, à l’agent de police contre le maire, à celui qui est en bas contre celui qui est en haut, c’est ce que j’appelle de la mauvaise bonté. C’est avec cette bonté-là que la société se désorganise. Mon Dieu! c’est bien facile d’être bon, le malaisé c’est d’être juste. Allez! si vous aviez été ce que je croyais, je n’aurais pas été bon pour vous, moi! vous auriez vu! Monsieur le maire, je dois me traiter comme je traiterais tout autre. Quand je réprimais des malfaiteurs, quand je sévissais sur des gredins, je me suis souvent dit à moi-même: toi, si tu bronches, si jamais je te prends en faute, sois tranquille! — J’ai bronché, je me prends en faute, tant pis! Allons, renvoyé, cassé, chassé! c’est bon. J’ai des bras, je travaillerai à la terre, cela m’est égal. Monsieur le maire, le bien du service veut un exemple. Je demande simplement la destitution de l’inspecteur Javert.

Tout cela était prononcé d’un accent humble, fier, désespéré et convaincu qui donnait je ne sais quelle grandeur bizarre à cet étrange honnête homme.

— Nous verrons, fit M. Madeleine.

Et il lui tendit la main.

Javert recula, et dit d’un ton farouche:

— Pardon, monsieur le maire, mais cela ne doit pas être. Un maire ne donne pas la main à un mouchard.

Il ajouta entre ses dents:

— Mouchard, oui; du moment où j’ai médusé de la police, je ne suis plus qu’un mouchard. Puis il salua profondément, et se dirigea vers la porte. Là il se retourna, et, les yeux toujours baissés:

— Monsieur le maire, dit-il, je continuerai le service jusqu’à ce que je sois remplacé.

Il sortit. M. Madeleine resta rêveur, écoutant ce pas ferme et assuré qui s’éloignait sur le pavé du corridor.

Livre septième — L’affaire Champmathieu

Chapitre I

La sœur Simplice

Les incidents qu’on va lire n’ont pas tous été connus à Montreuil-sur-mer, mais le peu qui en a percé a laissé dans cette ville un tel souvenir, que ce serait une grave lacune dans ce livre si nous ne les racontions dans leurs moindres détails.

Dans ces détails, le lecteur rencontrera deux ou trois circonstances invraisemblables que nous maintenons par respect pour la vérité.

Dans l’après-midi qui suivit la visite de Javert, M. Madeleine alla voir la Fantine comme d’habitude.

Avant de pénétrer près de Fantine, il fit demander la sœur Simplice. Les deux religieuses qui faisaient le service de l’infirmerie, dames lazaristes comme toutes les sœurs de charité, s’appelaient sœur Perpétue et sœur Simplice.

La sœur Perpétue était la première villageoise venue, grossièrement sœur de charité, entrée chez Dieu comme on entre en place. Elle était religieuse comme on est cuisinière. Ce type n’est point très rare. Les ordres monastiques acceptent volontiers cette lourde poterie paysanne, aisément façonnée en capucin ou en ursuline. Ces rusticités s’utilisent pour les grosses besognes de la dévotion. La transition d’un bouvier à un carme n’a rien de heurté; l’un devient l’autre sans grand travail; le fond commun d’ignorance du village et du cloître est une préparation toute faite, et met tout de suite le campagnard de plain-pied avec le moine. Un peu d’ampleur au sarrau, et voilà un froc. La sœur Perpétue était une forte religieuse, de Marines, près Pontoise, patoisant, psalmodiant, bougonnant, sucrant la tisane selon le bigotisme ou l’hypocrisie du grabataire, brusquant les malades, bourrue avec les mourants, leur jetant presque Dieu au visage, lapidant l’agonie avec des prières en colère, hardie, honnête et rougeaude.

La sœur Simplice était blanche d’une blancheur de cire. Près de sœur Perpétue, c’était le cierge à côté de la chandelle. Vincent de Paul a divinement fixé la figure de la sœur de charité dans ces admirables paroles où il mêle tant de liberté à tant de servitude: «Elles n’auront pour monastère que la maison des malades, pour cellule qu’une chambre de louage, pour chapelle que l’église de leur paroisse, pour cloître que les rues de la ville ou les salles des hôpitaux, pour clôture que l’obéissance, pour grille que la crainte de Dieu, pour voile que la modestie.» Cet idéal était vivant dans la sœur Simplice. Personne n’eût pu dire l’âge de la sœur Simplice; elle n’avait jamais été jeune et semblait ne devoir jamais être vieille. C’était une personne — nous n’osons dire une femme — calme, austère, de bonne compagnie, froide, et qui n’avait jamais menti. Elle était si douce qu’elle paraissait fragile; plus solide d’ailleurs que le granit. Elle touchait aux malheureux avec de charmants doigts fins et purs. Il y avait, pour ainsi dire, du silence dans sa parole; elle parlait juste le nécessaire, et elle avait un son de voix qui eût tout à la fois édifié un confessionnal et enchanté un salon. Cette délicatesse s’accommodait de la robe de bure, trouvant à ce rude contact un rappel continuel du ciel et de Dieu. Insistons sur un détail. N’avoir jamais menti, n’avoir jamais dit, pour un intérêt quelconque, même indifféremment, une chose qui ne fût la vérité, la sainte vérité, c’était le trait distinctif de la sœur Simplice; c’était l’accent de sa vertu. Elle était presque célèbre dans la congrégation pour cette véracité imperturbable. L’abbé Sicard parle de la sœur Simplice dans une lettre au sourd-muet Massieu. Si sincères, si loyaux et si purs que nous soyons, nous avons tous sur notre candeur au moins la fêlure du petit mensonge innocent. Elle, point. Petit mensonge, mensonge innocent, est-ce que cela existe? Mentir, c’est l’absolu du mal. Peu mentir n’est pas possible; celui qui ment, ment tout le mensonge; mentir, c’est la face même du démon; Satan a deux noms, il s’appelle Satan et il s’appelle Mensonge. Voilà ce qu’elle pensait. Et comme elle pensait, elle pratiquait. Il en résultait cette blancheur dont nous avons parlé, blancheur qui couvrait de son rayonnement même ses lèvres et ses yeux. Son sourire était blanc, son regard était blanc. Il n’y avait pas une toile d’araignée, pas un grain de poussière à la vitre de cette conscience. En entrant dans l’obédience de saint Vincent de Paul, elle avait pris le nom de Simplice par choix spécial. Simplice de Sicile, on le sait, est cette sainte qui aima mieux se laisser arracher les deux seins que de répondre, étant née à Syracuse, qu’elle était née à Ségeste, mensonge qui la sauvait. Cette patronne convenait à cette âme.

La sœur Simplice, en entrant dans l’ordre, avait deux défauts dont elle s’était peu à peu corrigée; elle avait eu le goût des friandises et elle avait aimé à recevoir des lettres. Elle ne lisait jamais qu’un livre de prières en gros caractères et en latin. Elle ne comprenait pas le latin, mais elle comprenait le livre.

La pieuse fille avait pris en affection Fantine, y sentant probablement de la vertu latente, et s'était dévouée à la soigner presque exclusivement.

M. Madeleine emmena à part la sœur Simplice et lui recommanda Fantine avec un accent singulier dont la sœur se souvint plus tard.

En quittant la sœur, il s'approcha de Fantine.

Fantine attendait chaque jour l'apparition de M. Madeleine comme on attend un rayon de chaleur et de joie. Elle disait aux sœurs:

— Je ne vis que lorsque monsieur le maire est là.

Elle avait ce jour-là beaucoup de fièvre. Dès qu'elle vit M. Madeleine, elle lui demanda:

— Et Cosette?

Il répondit en souriant:

— Bientôt.

M. Madeleine fut avec Fantine comme à l'ordinaire. Seulement il resta une heure au lieu d'une demi-heure, au grand contentement de Fantine. Il fît mille instances à tout le monde pour que rien ne manquât à la malade. On remarqua qu'il y eut un moment où son visage devint très sombre. Mais cela s'expliqua quand on sut que le médecin s'était penché à son oreille et lui avait dit:

— Elle baisse beaucoup.

Puis il rentra à la mairie, et le garçon de bureau le vit examiner avec attention une carte routière de France qui était suspendue dans son cabinet. Il écrivit quelques chiffres au crayon sur un papier.

Chapitre II

Perspicacité de maître Scaufflaire

De la mairie il se rendit au bout de la ville chez un Flamand, maître Scaufflaër, francisé Scaufflaire, qui louait des chevaux et des «cabriolets à volonté».

Pour aller chez ce Scaufflaire, le plus court était de prendre une rue peu fréquentée où était le presbytère de la paroisse que M. Madeleine habitait. Le curé était, disait-on, un homme digne et respectable, et de bon conseil. À l'instant où M. Madeleine arriva devant le presbytère, il n'y avait dans la rue qu'un passant, et ce passant remarqua ceci: M. le maire, après avoir dépassé la maison curiale, s'arrêta, demeura immobile, puis revint sur ses pas et rebroussa chemin jusqu'à la porte du presbytère, qui était une porte bâtarde avec marteau de fer. Il mit vivement la main au marteau, et le souleva; puis il s'arrêta de nouveau, et resta court, et comme pensif, et, après quelques secondes, au lieu de laisser bruyamment retomber le marteau, il le reposa doucement et reprit son chemin avec une sorte de hâte qu'il n'avait pas auparavant.

M. Madeleine trouva maître Scaufflaire chez lui occupé à repiquer un harnais.

— Maître Scaufflaire, demanda-t-il, avez-vous un bon cheval?

— Monsieur le maire, dit le Flamand, tous mes chevaux sont bons. Qu'entendez-vous par un bon cheval?

— J'entends un cheval qui puisse faire vingt lieues en un jour.

— Diable! fit le Flamand, vingt lieues!

— Oui.

— Attelé à un cabriolet?

— Oui.

— Et combien de temps se reposera-t-il après la course?

— Il faut qu'il puisse au besoin repartir le lendemain.

— Pour refaire le même trajet?

— Oui.

— Diable! diable! et c'est vingt lieues? M. Madeleine tira de sa poche le papier où il avait crayonné des chiffres. Il les montra au Flamand. C'étaient les chiffres 5, 6, 8-1/2.

— Vous voyez, dit-il. Total, dix-neuf et demi, autant dire vingt lieues.

— Monsieur le maire, reprit le Flamand, j’ai votre affaire. Mon petit cheval blanc. Vous avez dû le voir passer quelquefois. C’est une petite bête du bas Boulonnais. C’est plein de feu. On a voulu d’abord en faire un cheval de selle. Bah! il ruait, il flanquait tout le monde par terre. On le croyait vicieux, on ne savait qu’en faire. Je l’ai acheté. Je l’ai mis au cabriolet. Monsieur, c’est cela qu’il voulait; il est doux comme une fille, il va le vent. Ah! par exemple, il ne faudrait pas lui monter sur le dos. Ce n’est pas son idée d’être cheval de selle. Chacun a son ambition. Tirer, oui, porter, non; il faut croire qu’il s’est dit ça.

— Et il fera la course?

— Vos vingt lieues. Toujours au grand trot, et en moins de huit heures. Mais voici à quelles conditions.

— Dites.

— Premièrement, vous le ferez souffler une heure à moitié chemin; il mangera, et on sera là pendant qu’il mangera pour empêcher le garçon de l’auberge de lui voler son avoine; car j’ai remarqué que dans les auberges l’avoine est plus souvent bue par les garçons d’écurie que mangée par les chevaux.

— On sera là.

— Deuxièmement.... Est-ce pour monsieur le maire le cabriolet?

— Oui.

— Monsieur le maire sait conduire?

— Oui.

— Eh bien, monsieur le maire voyagera seul et sans bagage afin de ne point charger le cheval.

— Convenu.

— Mais monsieur le maire, n’ayant personne avec lui, sera obligé de prendre la peine de surveiller lui-même l’avoine.

— C’est dit.

— Il me faudra trente francs par jour. Les jours de repos payés. Pas un liard de moins, et la nourriture de la bête à la charge de monsieur le maire.

M. Madeleine tira trois napoléons de sa bourse et les mit sur la table.

— Voilà deux jours d’avance.

— Quatrièmement, pour une course pareille sur cabriolet serait trop lourd et fatiguerait le cheval. Il faudrait que monsieur le maire consentît à voyager dans un petit tilbury que j’ai.

— J’y consens.

— C’est léger, mais c’est découvert.

— Cela m’est égal.

— Monsieur le maire a-t-il réfléchi que nous sommes en hiver?...

M. Madeleine ne répondit pas. Le Flamand reprit:

— Qu’il fait très froid?

M. Madeleine garda le silence. Maître Scaufflaire continua:

— Qu’il peut pleuvoir?

M. Madeleine leva la tête et dit:

— Le tilbury et le cheval seront devant ma porte demain à quatre heures et demie du matin.

— C’est entendu, monsieur le maire, répondit Scaufflaire, puis, grattant avec l’ongle de son pouce une tache qui était dans le bois de la table, il reprit de cet air insouciant que les Flamands savent si bien mêler à leur finesse:

— Mais voilà que j’y songe à présent! monsieur le maire ne me dit pas où il va. Où est-ce que va monsieur le maire?

Il ne songeait pas à autre chose depuis le commencement de la conversation, mais il ne savait pourquoi il n’avait pas osé faire cette question.

— Votre cheval a-t-il de bonnes jambes de devant? dit M. Madeleine.

— Oui, monsieur le maire. Vous le soutiendrez un peu dans les descentes. Y a-t-il beaucoup de descentes d’ici où vous allez?

— N’oubliez pas d’être à ma porte à quatre heures et demie du matin, très précises, répondit M. Madeleine; et il sortit.

Le Flamand resta «tout bête», comme il disait lui-même quelque temps après.

Monsieur le maire était sorti depuis deux ou trois minutes, lorsque la porte se rouvrit; c’était M. le maire. Il avait toujours le même air impassible et préoccupé.

— Monsieur Scaufflaire, dit-il, à quelle somme estimez-vous le cheval et le tilbury que vous me louerez, l’un portant l’autre?

— L’un traînant l’autre, monsieur le maire, dit le Flamand avec un gros rire.

— Soit. Eh bien!

— Est-ce que monsieur le maire veut me les acheter?

— Non, mais à tout événement, je veux vous les garantir. À mon retour vous me rendrez la somme. Combien estimez-vous cabriolet et cheval?

— À cinq cents francs, monsieur le maire.

— Les voici.

M. Madeleine posa un billet de banque sur la table, puis sortit et cette fois ne rentra plus.

Maître Scaufflaire regretta affreusement de n’avoir point dit mille francs. Du reste le cheval et le tilbury, en bloc, valaient cent écus.

Le Flamand appela sa femme, et lui conta la chose. Où diable monsieur le maire peut-il aller? Ils tinrent conseil.

— Il va à Paris, dit la femme.

— Je ne crois pas, dit le mari.

M. Madeleine avait oublié sur la cheminée le papier où il avait tracé des chiffres. Le Flamand le prit et l’étudia.

— Cinq, six, huit et demi? cela doit marquer des relais de poste.

Il se tourna vers sa femme.

— J’ai trouvé.

— Comment?

— Il y a cinq lieues d’ici à Hesdin, six de Hesdin à Saint-Pol, huit et demie de Saint-Pol à Arras. Il va à Arras.

Cependant M. Madeleine était rentré chez lui.

Pour revenir de chez maître Scaufflaire, il avait pris le plus long, comme si la porte du presbytère avait été pour lui une tentation, et qu’il eût voulu l’éviter. Il était monté dans sa chambre et s’y était enfermé, ce qui n’avait rien que de simple, car il se couchait volontiers de bonne heure. Pourtant la concierge de la fabrique, qui était en même temps l’unique servante de M. Madeleine, observa que sa lumière s’éteignit à huit heures et demie, et elle le dit au caissier qui rentrait, en ajoutant:

— Est-ce que monsieur le maire est malade? je lui ai trouvé l’air un peu singulier.

Ce caissier habitait une chambre située précisément au-dessous de la chambre de M. Madeleine. Il ne prit point garde aux paroles de la portière, se coucha et s’endormit. Vers minuit, il se réveilla brusquement; il avait entendu à travers son sommeil un bruit au-dessus de sa tête. Il écouta. C’était un pas qui allait et venait, comme si l’on marchait dans la chambre en haut. Il écouta plus attentivement, et reconnut le pas de M. Madeleine. Cela lui parut étrange; habituellement aucun bruit ne se faisait dans la chambre de M. Madeleine avant l’heure de son lever. Un moment après le caissier entendit quelque chose qui ressemblait à une armoire qu’on ouvre et qu’on referme. Puis on dérangea un meuble, il y eut un silence, et le pas recommença. Le caissier se dressa sur son séant, s’éveilla tout à fait, regarda, et à travers les vitres de sa croisée aperçut sur le mur d’en face la réverbération rougeâtre d’une fenêtre éclairée. À la direction des rayons, ce ne pouvait être que la fenêtre de la chambre de M. Madeleine. La réverbération tremblait comme si elle venait plutôt d’un feu allumé que d’une lumière. L’ombre des châssis vitrés ne s’y dessinait pas, ce qui indiquait que la fenêtre était toute grande ouverte. Par le froid qu’il faisait, cette fenêtre ouverte était surprenante. Le caissier se rendormit. Une heure ou deux après, il se réveilla encore. Le même pas, lent et régulier, allait et venait toujours au-dessus de sa tête.

La réverbération se dessinait toujours sur le mur, mais elle était maintenant pâle et paisible comme le reflet d’une lampe ou d’une bougie. La fenêtre était toujours ouverte. Voici ce qui se passait dans la chambre de M. Madeleine.

Chapitre III

Une tempête sous un crâne

Le lecteur a sans doute deviné que M. Madeleine n’est autre que Jean Valjean.

Nous avons déjà regardé dans les profondeurs de cette conscience; le moment est venu d’y regarder encore. Nous ne le faisons pas sans émotion et sans tremblement. Il n’existe rien de plus terrifiant que cette sorte de contemplation. L’œil de l’esprit ne peut trouver nulle part plus d’éblouissements ni plus de ténèbres que dans l’homme; il ne peut se fixer sur aucune chose qui soit plus redoutable, plus compliquée, plus mystérieuse et plus infinie. Il y a un spectacle plus grand que la mer, c’est le ciel; il y a un spectacle plus grand que le ciel, c’est l’intérieur de l’âme.

Faire le poème de la conscience humaine, ne fût-ce qu’à propos d’un seul homme, ne fût-ce qu’à propos du plus infime des hommes, ce serait fondre toutes les épopées dans une épopée supérieure et définitive. La conscience, c’est le chaos des chimères, des convoitises et des tentatives, la fournaise des rêves, l’antre des idées dont on a honte; c’est le pandémonium des sophismes, c’est le champ de bataille des passions. À de certaines heures, pénétrez à travers la face livide d’un être humain qui réfléchit, et regardez derrière, regardez dans cette âme, regardez dans cette obscurité. Il y a là, sous le silence extérieur, des combats de géants comme dans Homère, des mêlées de dragons et d’hydres et des nuées de fantômes comme dans Milton, des spirales visionnaires comme chez Dante. Chose sombre que cet infini que tout homme porte en soi et auquel il mesure avec désespoir les volontés de son cerveau et les actions de sa vie!

Alighieri rencontra un jour une sinistre porte devant laquelle il hésita. En voici une aussi devant nous, au seuil de laquelle nous hésitons. Entrons pourtant.

Nous n’avons que peu de chose à ajouter à ce que le lecteur connaît déjà de ce qui était arrivé à Jean Valjean depuis l’aventure de Petit-Gervais. À partir de ce moment, on l’a vu, il fut un autre homme. Ce que l’évêque avait voulu faire de lui, il l’exécuta. Ce fut plus qu’une transformation, ce fut une transfiguration.

Il réussit à disparaître, vendit l’argenterie de l’évêque, ne gardant que les flambeaux, comme souvenir, se glissa de ville en ville, traversa la France, vint à Montreuil-sur-mer, eut l’idée que nous avons dite, accomplit ce que nous avons raconté, parvint à se faire insaisissable et inaccessible, et désormais, établi à Montreuil-sur-mer, heureux de sentir sa conscience attristée par son passé et la première moitié de son existence démentie par la dernière, il vécut paisible, rassuré et espérant, n’ayant plus que deux pensées: cacher son nom, et sanctifier sa vie; échapper aux hommes, et revenir à Dieu.

Ces deux pensées étaient si étroitement mêlées dans son esprit qu’elles n’en formaient qu’une seule; elles étaient toutes deux également absorbantes et impérieuses, et dominaient ses moindres actions. D’ordinaire elles étaient d’accord pour régler la conduite de sa vie; elles le tournaient vers l’ombre; elles le faisaient bienveillant et simple; elles lui conseillaient les mêmes choses. Quelquefois cependant il y avait conflit entre elles. Dans ce cas-là, on s’en souvient, l’homme que tout le pays de Montreuil-sur-mer appelait M. Madeleine ne balançait pas à sacrifier la première à la seconde, sa sécurité à sa vertu. Ainsi, en dépit de toute réserve et de toute prudence, il avait gardé les chandeliers de l’évêque, porté son deuil, appelé et interrogé tous les petits savoyards qui passaient, pris des renseignements sur les familles de Faverolles, et sauvé la vie au vieux Fauchelevent, malgré les inquiétantes insinuations de Javert. Il semblait, nous l’avons déjà remarqué, qu’il pensât, à l’exemple de tous ceux qui ont été sages, saints et justes, que son premier devoir n’était pas envers lui.

Toutefois, il faut le dire, jamais rien de pareil ne s’était encore présenté. Jamais les deux idées qui gouvernaient le malheureux homme dont nous racontons les souffrances n’avaient engagé une lutte si sérieuse. Il le comprit confusément, mais profondément, dès les premières paroles que prononça Javert, en entrant dans son cabinet.

Au moment où fut si étrangement articulé ce nom qu’il avait enseveli sous tant d’épaisseurs, il fut saisi de stupeur et comme enivré par la sinistre bizarrerie de sa destinée, et, à travers cette stupeur, il eut ce tressaillement qui précède les grandes secousses; il se courba comme un chêne à l’approche d’un orage, comme un soldat à l’approche d’un assaut. Il sentit venir sur sa tête des ombres pleines de foudres et d’éclairs. Tout en écoutant parler Javert, il eut une première pensée d’aller, de courir, de se dénoncer, de tirer ce Champmathieu de prison et de s’y mettre; cela fut douloureux et poignant comme une incision dans la chair vive, puis cela passa, et il se dit: «Voyons! voyons!» Il réprima ce premier mouvement généreux et recula devant l'héroïsme.

Sans doute, il serait beau qu'après les saintes paroles de l'évêque, après tant d'années de repentir et d'abnégation, au milieu d'une pénitence admirablement commencée, cet homme, même en présence d'une si terrible conjoncture, n'eût pas bronché un instant et eût continué de marcher du même pas vers ce précipice ouvert au fond duquel était le ciel; cela serait beau, mais cela ne fut pas ainsi. Il faut bien que nous rendions compte des choses qui s'accomplissaient dans cette âme, et nous ne pouvons dire que ce qui y était. Ce qui l'emporta tout d'abord, ce fut l'instinct de la conservation; il rallia en hâte ses idées, étouffa ses émotions, considéra la présence de Javert, ce grand péril, ajourna toute résolution avec la fermeté de l'épouvante, s'étourdit sur ce qu'il y avait à faire, et reprit son calme comme un lutteur ramasse son bouclier.

Le reste de la journée il fut dans cet état, un tourbillon au dedans, une tranquillité profonde au dehors; il ne prit que ce qu'on pourrait appeler «les mesures conservatoires». Tout était encore confus et se heurtait dans son cerveau; le trouble y était tel qu'il ne voyait distinctement la forme d'aucune idée; et lui-même n'aurait pu rien dire de lui-même, si ce n'est qu'il venait de recevoir un grand coup. Il se rendit comme d'habitude près du lit de douleur de Fantine et prolongea sa visite, par un instinct de bonté, se disant qu'il fallait agir ainsi et la bien recommander aux sœurs pour le cas où il arriverait qu'il eût à s'absenter. Il sentit vaguement qu'il faudrait peut-être aller à Arras, et, sans être le moins du monde décidé à ce voyage, il se dit qu'à l'abri de tout soupçon comme il l'était, il n'y avait point d'inconvénient à être témoin de ce qui se passerait, et il retint le tilbury de Scaufflaire, afin d'être préparé à tout événement.

Il dîna avec assez d'appétit.

Rentré dans sa chambre il se recueillit.

Il examina la situation et la trouva inouïe; tellement inouïe qu'au milieu de sa rêverie, par je ne sais quelle impulsion d'anxiété presque inexplicable, il se leva de sa chaise et ferma sa porte au verrou. Il craignait qu'il n'entrât encore quelque chose. Il se barricadait contre le possible.

Un moment après il souffla sa lumière. Elle le gênait.

Il lui semblait qu'on pouvait le voir.

Qui, on?

Hélas! ce qu’il voulait mettre à la porte était entré ce qu’il voulait aveugler, le regardait. Sa conscience.

Sa conscience, c’est-à-dire Dieu.

Pourtant, dans le premier moment, il se fit illusion; il eut un sentiment de sûreté et de solitude; le verrou tiré, il se crut imprenable; la chandelle éteinte, il se sentit invisible. Alors il prit possession de lui-même; il posa ses coudes sur la table, appuya la tête sur sa main, et se mit à songer dans les ténèbres.

— Où en suis-je? — Est-ce que je ne rêve pas? Que m’a-t-on dit? — Est-il bien vrai que j’aie vu ce Javert et qu’il m’ait parlé ainsi? — Que peut être ce Champmathieu? — Il me ressemble donc? — Est-ce possible? — Quand je pense qu’hier j’étais si tranquille et si loin de me douter de rien! — Qu’est-ce que je faisais donc hier à pareille heure? — Qu’y a-t-il dans cet incident? — Comment se dénouera-t-il? — Que faire?

Voilà dans quelle tourmente il était. Son cerveau avait perdu la force de retenir ses idées, elles passaient comme des ondes, et il prenait son front dans ses deux mains pour les arrêter.

De ce tumulte qui bouleversait sa volonté et sa raison, et dont il cherchait à tirer une évidence et une résolution, rien ne se dégageait que l’angoisse.

Sa tête était brûlante. Il alla à la fenêtre et l’ouvrit toute grande. Il n’y avait pas d’étoiles au ciel. Il revint s’asseoir près de la table.

La première heure s’écoula ainsi.

Peu à peu cependant des linéaments vagues commencèrent à se former et à se fixer dans sa méditation, et il put entrevoir avec la précision de la réalité, non l’ensemble de la situation, mais quelques détails.

Il commença par reconnaître que, si extraordinaire et si critique que fût cette situation, il en était tout à fait le maître.

Sa stupeur ne fit que s’en accroître.

Indépendamment du but sévère et religieux que se proposaient ses actions, tout ce qu’il avait fait jusqu’à ce jour n’était autre chose qu’un trou qu’il creusait pour y enfouir son nom. Ce qu’il avait toujours le plus redouté, dans ses heures de repli sur lui-même, dans ses nuits d’insomnie, c’était d’entendre jamais prononcer ce nom; il se disait que ce serait là pour lui la fin de tout; que le jour où ce nom reparaîtrait, il ferait évanouir autour de lui sa vie nouvelle, et qui sait même peut-être? au dedans de lui sa nouvelle âme. Il frémissait de la seule pensée que c’était possible. Certes, si quelqu’un lui eût dit en ces moments-là qu’une heure viendrait où ce nom retentirait à son oreille, où ce hideux mot, Jean Valjean, sortirait tout à coup de la nuit et se dresserait devant lui, où cette lumière formidable faite pour dissiper le mystère dont il s'enveloppait resplendirait subitement sur sa tête; et que ce nom ne le menacerait pas, que cette lumière ne produirait qu'une obscurité plus épaisse, que ce voile déchiré accroîtrait le mystère; que ce tremblement de terre consoliderait son édifice, que ce prodigieux incident n'aurait d'autre résultat, si bon lui semblait, à lui, que de rendre son existence à la fois plus claire et plus impénétrable, et que, de sa confrontation avec le fantôme de Jean Valjean, le bon et digne bourgeois monsieur Madeleine sortirait plus honoré, plus paisible et plus respecté que jamais, — si quelqu'un lui eût dit cela, il eût hoché la tête et regardé ces paroles comme insensées. Eh bien! tout cela venait précisément d'arriver, tout cet entassement de l'impossible était un fait, et Dieu avait permis que ces choses folles devinssent des choses réelles!

Sa rêverie continuait de s'éclaircir. Il se rendait de plus en plus compte de sa position. Il lui semblait qu'il venait de s'éveiller de je ne sais quel sommeil, et qu'il se trouvait glissant sur une pente au milieu de la nuit, debout, frissonnant, reculant en vain, sur le bord extrême d'un abîme. Il entrevoyait distinctement dans l'ombre un inconnu, un étranger, que la destinée prenait pour lui et poussait dans le gouffre à sa place. Il fallait, pour que le gouffre se refermât, que quelqu'un y tombât, lui ou l'autre.

Il n'avait qu'à laisser faire.

La clarté devint complète, et il s'avoua ceci: — Que sa place était vide aux galères, qu'il avait beau faire, qu'elle l'y attendait toujours, que le vol de Petit-Gervais l'y ramenait, que cette place vide l'attendrait et l'attirerait jusqu'à ce qu'il y fût, que cela était inévitable et fatal. — Et puis il se dit: — Qu'en ce moment il avait un remplaçant, qu'il paraissait qu'un nommé Champmathieu avait cette mauvaise chance, et que, quant à lui, présent désormais au bagne dans la personne de ce Champmathieu, présent dans la société sous le nom de M. Madeleine, il n'avait plus rien à redouter, pourvu qu'il n'empêchât pas les hommes de sceller sur la tête de ce Champmathieu cette pierre de l'infamie qui, comme la pierre du sépulcre, tombe une fois et ne se relève jamais.

Tout cela était si violent et si étrange qu'il se fit soudain en lui cette espèce de mouvement indescriptible qu'aucun homme n'éprouve plus de deux ou trois fois dans sa vie, sorte de convulsion de la conscience qui remue tout ce que le cœur a de douteux, qui se compose d'ironie, de joie et de désespoir, et qu'on pourrait appeler un éclat de rire intérieur.

Il ralluma brusquement sa bougie.

— Eh bien quoi! se dit-il, de quoi est-ce que j'ai peur? qu'est-ce que j'ai à songer comme cela? Me voilà sauvé. Tout est fini. Je n'avais plus qu'une porte entr'ouverte par laquelle mon passé pouvait faire irruption dans ma vie; cette porte, la voilà murée! à jamais! Ce Javert qui me trouble depuis si longtemps, ce redoutable instinct qui semblait m'avoir deviné, qui m'avait deviné, pardieu! et qui me suivait partout, cet affreux chien de chasse toujours en arrêt sur moi, le voilà dérouté, occupé ailleurs, absolument dépisté! Il est satisfait désormais, il me laissera tranquille, il tient son Jean Valjean! Qui sait même, il est probable qu'il voudra quitter la ville! Et tout cela s'est fait sans moi! Et je n'y suis pour rien! Ah çà, mais! qu'est-ce qu'il y a de malheureux dans ceci? Des gens qui me verraient, parole d'honneur! croiraient qu'il m'est arrivé une catastrophe! Après tout, s'il y a du mal pour quelqu'un, ce n'est aucunement de ma faute. C'est la providence qui a tout fait. C'est qu'elle veut cela apparemment!

Ai-je le droit de déranger ce qu'elle arrange? Qu'est-ce que je demande à présent? De quoi est-ce que je vais me mêler? Cela ne me regarde pas. Comment! je ne suis pas content! Mais qu'est-ce qu'il me faut donc? Le but auquel j'aspire depuis tant d'années, le songe de mes nuits, l'objet de mes prières au ciel, la sécurité, je l'atteins! C'est Dieu qui le veut. Je n'ai rien à faire contre la volonté de Dieu. Et pourquoi Dieu le veut-il? Pour que je continue ce que j'ai commencé, pour que je fasse le bien, pour que je sois un jour un grand et encourageant exemple, pour qu'il soit dit qu'il y a eu enfin un peu de bonheur attaché à cette pénitence que j'ai subie et à cette vertu où je suis revenu! Vraiment je ne comprends pas pourquoi j'ai eu peur tantôt d'entrer chez ce brave curé et de tout lui raconter comme à un confesseur, et de lui demander conseil, c'est évidemment là ce qu'il m'aurait dit. C'est décidé, laissons aller les choses! laissons faire le bon Dieu!

Il se parlait ainsi dans les profondeurs de sa conscience, penché sur ce qu'on pourrait appeler son propre abîme. Il se leva de sa chaise, et se mit à marcher dans la chambre. — Allons, dit-il, n'y pensons plus. Voilà une résolution prise! — Mais il ne sentit aucune joie.

Au contraire.

On n’empêche pas plus la pensée de revenir à une idée que la mer de revenir à un rivage. Pour le matelot, cela s’appelle la marée; pour le coupable, cela s’appelle le remords. Dieu soulève l’âme comme l’océan.

Au bout de peu d’instants, il eut beau faire, il reprit ce sombre dialogue dans lequel c’était lui qui parlait et lui qui écoutait, disant ce qu’il eût voulu taire, écoutant ce qu’il n’eût pas voulu entendre, cédant à cette puissance mystérieuse qui lui disait: pense! comme elle disait il y a deux mille ans à un autre condamné, marche!

Avant d’aller plus loin et pour être pleinement compris, insistons sur une observation nécessaire.

Il est certain qu’on se parle à soi-même, il n’est pas un être pensant qui ne l’ait éprouvé. On peut dire même que le verbe n’est jamais un plus magnifique mystère que lorsqu’il va, dans l’intérieur d’un homme, de la pensée à la conscience et qu’il retourne de la conscience à la pensée. C’est dans ce sens seulement qu’il faut entendre les mots souvent employés dans ce chapitre, il dit, il s’écria. On se dit, on se parle, on s’écrie en soi-même, sans que le silence extérieur soit rompu. Il y a un grand tumulte; tout parle en nous, excepté la bouche. Les réalités de l’âme, pour n’être point visibles et palpables, n’en sont pas moins des réalités.

Il se demanda donc où il en était. Il s’interrogea sur cette «résolution prise». Il se confessa à lui-même que tout ce qu’il venait d’arranger dans son esprit était monstrueux, que «laisser aller les choses, laisser faire le bon Dieu», c’était tout simplement horrible. Laisser s’accomplir cette méprise de la destinée et des hommes, ne pas l’empêcher, s’y prêter par son silence, ne rien faire enfin, c’était faire tout! c’était le dernier degré de l’indignité hypocrite! c’était un crime bas, lâche, sournois, abject, hideux!

Pour la première fois depuis huit années, le malheureux homme venait de sentir la saveur amère d’une mauvaise pensée et d’une mauvaise action.

Il la recracha avec dégoût.

Il continua de se questionner. Il se demanda sévèrement ce qu’il avait entendu par ceci: “Mon but est atteint!” Il se déclara que sa vie avait un but en effet. Mais quel but? cacher son nom? tromper la police? Était-ce pour une chose si petite qu’il avait fait tout ce qu’il avait fait? Est-ce qu’il n’avait pas un autre but, qui était le grand, qui était le vrai? Sauver, non sa personne, mais son âme. Redevenir honnête et bon. Être un juste! est-ce que ce n’était pas là surtout, là uniquement, ce qu’il avait toujours voulu, ce que l’évêque lui avait ordonné? — Fermer la porte à son passé? Mais il ne la fermait pas, grand Dieu! il la rouvrait en faisant une action infâme! mais il redevenait un voleur, et le plus odieux des voleurs! il volait à un autre son existence, sa vie, sa paix, sa place au soleil! il devenait un assassin! il tuait, il tuait moralement un misérable homme, il lui infligeait cette affreuse mort vivante, cette mort à ciel ouvert, qu'on appelle le bagne! Au contraire, se livrer, sauver cet homme frappé d'une si lugubre erreur, reprendre son nom, redevenir par devoir le forçat Jean Valjean, c'était là vraiment achever sa résurrection, et fermer à jamais l'enfer d'où il sortait! Y retomber en apparence, c'était en sortir en réalité! Il fallait faire cela! il n'avait rien fait s'il ne faisait pas cela! toute sa vie était inutile, toute sa pénitence était perdue, et il n'y avait plus qu'à dire: à quoi bon? Il sentait que l'évêque était là, que l'évêque était d'autant plus présent qu'il était mort, que l'évêque le regardait fixement, que désormais le maire Madeleine avec toutes ses vertus lui serait abominable, et que le galérien Jean Valjean serait admirable et pur devant lui. Que les hommes voyaient son masque, mais que l'évêque voyait sa face. Que les hommes voyaient sa vie, mais que l'évêque voyait sa conscience. Il fallait donc aller à Arras, délivrer le faux Jean Valjean, dénoncer le véritable! Hélas! c'était là le plus grand des sacrifices, la plus poignante des victoires, le dernier pas à franchir; mais il le fallait. Douloureuse destinée! il n'entrerait dans la sainteté aux yeux de Dieu que s'il rentrait dans l'infamie aux yeux des hommes!

— Eh bien, dit-il, prenons ce parti! faisons notre devoir! sauvons cet homme!

Il prononça ces paroles à haute voix, sans s'apercevoir qu'il parlait tout haut.

Il prit ses livres, les vérifia et les mit en ordre. Il jeta au feu une liasse de créances qu'il avait sur de petits commerçants gênés. Il écrivit une lettre qu'il cacheta et sur l'enveloppe de laquelle on aurait pu lire, s'il y avait eu quelqu'un dans sa chambre en cet instant: À Monsieur Laffitte, banquier, rue d'Artois, à Paris.

Il tira d'un secrétaire un portefeuille qui contenait quelques billets de banque et le passeport dont il s'était servi cette même année pour aller aux élections.

Qui l'eût vu pendant qu'il accomplissait ces divers actes auxquels se mêlait une méditation si grave, ne se fût pas douté de ce qui se passait en lui. Seulement par moments ses lèvres remuaient; dans d'autres instants il relevait la tête et fixait son regard sur un point quelconque de la muraille, comme s’il y avait précisément là quelque chose qu’il voulait éclaircir ou interroger.

La lettre à M. Laffitte terminée, il la mit dans sa poche ainsi que le portefeuille, et recommença à marcher.

Sa rêverie n’avait point dévié. Il continuait de voir clairement son devoir écrit en lettres lumineuses qui flamboyaient devant ses yeux et se déplaçaient avec son regard: — Va! nomme-toi! dénonce-toi!

Il voyait de même, et comme si elles se fussent mues devant lui avec des formes sensibles, les deux idées qui avaient été jusque-là la double règle de sa vie: cacher son nom, sanctifier son âme. Pour la première fois, elles lui apparaissaient absolument distinctes, et il voyait la différence qui les séparait. Il reconnaissait que l’une de ces idées était nécessairement bonne, tandis que l’autre pouvait devenir mauvaise; que celle-là était le dévouement et que celle-ci était la personnalité; que l’une disait: le prochain, et que l’autre disait: moi; que l’une venait de la lumière et que l’autre venait de la nuit.

Elles se combattaient, il les voyait se combattre. À mesure qu’il songeait, elles avaient grandi devant l’œil de son esprit; elles avaient maintenant des statures colossales; et il lui semblait qu’il voyait lutter au dedans de lui-même, dans cet infini dont nous parlions tout à l’heure, au milieu des obscurités et des lueurs, une déesse et une géante.

Il était plein d’épouvante, mais il lui semblait que la bonne pensée l’emportait.

Il sentait qu’il touchait à l’autre moment décisif de sa conscience et de sa destinée; que l’évêque avait marqué la première phase de sa vie nouvelle, et que ce Champmathieu en marquait la seconde. Après la grande crise, la grande épreuve.

Cependant la fièvre, un instant apaisée, lui revenait peu à peu. Mille pensées le traversaient, mais elles continuaient de le fortifier dans sa résolution.

Un moment il s’était dit: — qu’il prenait peut-être la chose trop vivement, qu’après tout ce Champmathieu n’était pas intéressant, qu’en somme il avait volé.

Il se répondit: — Si cet homme a en effet volé quelques pommes, c’est un mois de prison. Il y a loin de là aux galères. Et qui sait même? a-t-il volé? est-ce prouvé? Le nom de Jean Valjean l’accable et semble dispenser de preuves. Les procureurs du roi n'agissent-ils pas habituellement ainsi? On le croit voleur, parce qu'on le sait forçat.

Dans un autre instant, cette idée lui vint que, lorsqu'il se serait dénoncé, peut-être on considérerait l'héroïsme de son action, et sa vie honnête depuis sept ans, et ce qu'il avait fait pour le pays, et qu'on lui ferait grâce.

Mais cette supposition s'évanouit bien vite, et il sourit amèrement en songeant que le vol des quarante sous à Petit-Gervais le faisait récidiviste, que cette affaire reparaîtrait certainement et, aux termes précis de la loi, le ferait passible des travaux forcés à perpétuité.

Il se détourna de toute illusion, se détacha de plus en plus de la terre et chercha la consolation et la force ailleurs. Il se dit qu'il fallait faire son devoir; que peut-être même ne serait-il pas plus malheureux après avoir fait son devoir qu'après l'avoir éludé; que s'il laissait faire, s'il restait à Montreuil-sur-mer, sa considération, sa bonne renommée, ses bonnes œuvres, la déférence, la vénération, sa charité, sa richesse, sa popularité, sa vertu, seraient assaisonnées d'un crime; et quel goût auraient toutes ces choses saintes liées à cette chose hideuse! tandis que, s'il accomplissait son sacrifice, au bagne, au poteau, au carcan, au bonnet vert, au travail sans relâche, à la honte sans pitié, il se mêlerait une idée céleste!

Enfin il se dit qu'il y avait nécessité, que sa destinée était ainsi faite, qu'il n'était pas maître de déranger les arrangements d'en haut, que dans tous les cas il fallait choisir: ou la vertu au dehors et l'abomination au dedans, ou la sainteté au dedans et l'infamie au dehors.

À remuer tant d'idées lugubres, son courage ne défaillait pas, mais son cerveau se fatiguait. Il commençait à penser malgré lui à d'autres choses, à des choses indifférentes. Ses artères battaient violemment dans ses tempes. Il allait et venait toujours. Minuit sonna d'abord à la paroisse, puis à la maison de ville. Il compta les douze coups aux deux horloges, et il compara le son des deux cloches. Il se rappela à cette occasion que quelques jours auparavant il avait vu chez un marchand de ferrailles une vieille cloche à vendre sur laquelle ce nom était écrit: Antoine Albin de Romainville.

Il avait froid. Il alluma un peu de feu. Il ne songea pas à fermer la fenêtre.

Cependant il était retombé dans sa stupeur. Il lui fallait faire un assez grand effort pour se rappeler à quoi il songeait avant que minuit sonnât. Il y parvint enfin.

— Ah! oui, se dit-il, j'avais pris la résolution de me dénoncer.

Et puis tout à coup il pensa à la Fantine.

— Tiens! dit-il, et cette pauvre femme!

Ici une crise nouvelle se déclara.

Fantine, apparaissant brusquement dans sa rêverie, y fut comme un rayon d’une lumière inattendue. Il lui sembla que tout changeait d’aspect autour de lui, il s’écria:

— Ah çà, mais! jusqu’ici je n’ai considéré que moi! je n’ai eu égard qu’à ma convenance! Il me convient de me taire ou de me dénoncer, — cacher ma personne ou sauver mon âme, — être un magistrat méprisable et respecté ou un galérien infâme et vénérable, c’est moi, c’est toujours moi, ce n’est que moi! Mais, mon Dieu, c’est de l’égoïsme tout cela! Ce sont des formes diverses de l’égoïsme, mais c’est de l’égoïsme! Si je songeais un peu aux autres? La première sainteté est de penser à autrui. Voyons, examinons. Moi excepté, moi effacé, moi oublié, qu’arrivera-t-il de tout ceci? — Si je me dénonce? on me prend. On lâche ce Champmathieu, on me remet aux galères, c’est bien. Et puis? Que se passe-t-il ici? Ah! ici, il y a un pays, une ville, des fabriques, une industrie, des ouvriers, des hommes, des femmes, des vieux grands-pères, des enfants, des pauvres gens! J’ai créé tout ceci, je fais vivre tout cela; partout où il y a une cheminée qui fume, c’est moi qui ai mis le tison dans le feu et la viande dans la marmite; j’ai fait l’aisance, la circulation, le crédit; avant moi il n’y avait rien; j’ai relevé, vivifié, animé, fécondé, stimulé, enrichi tout le pays; moi de moins, c’est l’âme de moins. Je m’ôte, tout meurt. — Et cette femme qui a tant souffert, qui a tant de mérites dans sa chute, dont j’ai causé sans le vouloir tout le malheur! Et cet enfant que je voulais aller chercher, que j’ai promis à la mère! Est-ce que je ne dois pas aussi quelque chose à cette femme, en réparation du mal que je lui ai fait? Si je disparais, qu’arrive-t-il? La mère meurt. L’enfant devient ce qu’il peut. Voilà ce qui se passe, si je me dénonce. — Si je ne me dénonce pas? Voyons, si je ne me dénonce pas? Après s’être fait cette question, il s’arrêta; il eut comme un moment d’hésitation et de tremblement; mais ce moment dura peu, et il se répondit avec calme:

— Eh bien, cet homme va aux galères, c’est vrai, mais, que diable! il a volé! J’ai beau me dire qu’il n’a pas volé, il a volé! Moi, je reste ici, je continue. Dans dix ans j’aurai gagné dix millions, je les répands dans le pays, je n’ai rien à moi, qu’est-ce que cela me fait? Ce n’est pas pour moi ce que je fais! La prospérité de tous va croissant, les industries s’éveillent et s’excitent, les manufactures et les usines se multiplient, les familles, cent familles, mille familles! sont heureuses; la contrée se peuple; il naît des villages où il n’y a que des fermes, il naît des fermes où il n’y a rien; la misère disparaît, et avec la misère disparaissent la débauche, la prostitution, le vol, le meurtre, tous les vices, tous les crimes! Et cette pauvre mère élève son enfant! et voilà tout un pays riche et honnête! Ah çà, j’étais fou, j’étais absurde, qu’est-ce que je parlais donc de me dénoncer? Il faut faire attention, vraiment, et ne rien précipiter. Quoi! parce qu’il m’aura plu de faire le grand et le généreux, — c’est du mélodrame, après tout! — parce que je n’aurai songé qu’à moi, qu’à moi seul, quoi! pour sauver d’une punition peut-être un peu exagérée, mais juste au fond, on ne sait qui, un voleur, un drôle évidemment, il faudra que tout un pays périsse! il faudra qu’une pauvre femme crève à l’hôpital! qu’une pauvre petite fille crève sur le pavé! comme des chiens! Ah! mais c’est abominable! Sans même que la mère ait revu son enfant! sans que l’enfant ait presque connu sa mère! Et tout ça pour ce vieux gredin de voleur de pommes qui, à coup sûr, a mérité les galères pour autre chose, si ce n’est pour cela! Beaux scrupules qui sauvent un coupable et qui sacrifient des innocents, qui sauvent un vieux vagabond, lequel n’a plus que quelques années à vivre au bout du compte et ne sera guère plus malheureux au bagne que dans sa masure, et qui sacrifient toute une population, mères, femmes, enfants! Cette pauvre petite Cosette qui n’a que moi au monde et qui est sans doute en ce moment toute bleue de froid dans le bouge de ces Thénardier! Voilà encore des canailles ceux-là! Et je manquerais à mes devoirs envers tous ces pauvres êtres! Et je m’en irais me dénoncer! Et je ferais cette inepte sottise! Mettons tout au pis. Supposons qu’il y ait une mauvaise action pour moi dans ceci et que ma conscience me la reproche un jour, accepter, pour le bien d’autrui, ces reproches qui ne chargent que moi, cette mauvaise action qui ne compromet que mon âme, c’est là qu’est le dévouement, c’est là qu’est la vertu.

Il se leva, il se remit à marcher. Cette fois il lui semblait qu’il était content. On ne trouve les diamants que dans les ténèbres de la terre; on ne trouve les vérités que dans les profondeurs de la pensée. Il lui semblait qu’après être descendu dans ces profondeurs, après avoir longtemps tâtonné au plus noir de ces ténèbres, il venait enfin de trouver un de ces diamants, une de ces vérités, et qu’il la tenait dans sa main; et il s’éblouissait à la regarder.

— Oui, pensa-t-il, c’est cela. Je suis dans le vrai. J’ai la solution. Il faut finir par s’en tenir à quelque chose. Mon parti est pris. Laissons faire! Ne vacillons plus, ne reculons plus. Ceci est dans l’intérêt de tous, non dans le mien. Je suis Madeleine, je reste Madeleine. Malheur à celui qui est Jean Valjean! Ce n’est plus moi. Je ne connais pas cet homme, je ne sais plus ce que c’est, s’il se trouve que quelqu’un est Jean Valjean à cette heure, qu’il s’arrange! cela ne me regarde pas. C’est un nom de fatalité qui flotte dans la nuit, s’il s’arrête et s’abat sur une tête, tant pis pour elle!

Il se regarda dans le petit miroir qui était sur sa cheminée, et dit:

— Tiens! cela m’a soulagé de prendre une résolution! Je suis tout autre à présent.

Il marcha encore quelques pas, puis il s’arrêta court:

— Allons! dit-il, il ne faut hésiter devant aucune des conséquences de la résolution prise. Il y a encore des fils qui m’attachent à ce Jean Valjean. Il faut les briser! Il y a ici, dans cette chambre même, des objets qui m’accuseraient, des choses muettes qui seraient des témoins, c’est dit, il faut que tout cela disparaisse.

Il fouilla dans sa poche, en tira sa bourse, l’ouvrit, et y prit une petite clef.

Il introduisit cette clef dans une serrure dont on voyait à peine le trou, perdu qu’il était dans les nuances les plus sombres du dessin qui couvrait le papier collé sur le mur. Une cachette s’ouvrit, une espèce de fausse armoire ménagée entre l’angle de la muraille et le manteau de la cheminée. Il n’y avait dans cette cachette que quelques guenilles, un sarrau de toile bleue, un vieux pantalon, un vieux havresac, et un gros bâton d’épine ferré aux deux bouts. Ceux qui avaient vu Jean Valjean à l’époque où il traversait Digne, en octobre 1815, eussent aisément reconnu toutes les pièces de ce misérable accoutrement.

Il les avait conservées comme il avait conservé les chandeliers d’argent, pour se rappeler toujours son point de départ. Seulement il cachait ceci qui venait du bagne, et il laissait voir les flambeaux qui venaient de l’évêque.

Il jeta un regard furtif vers la porte, comme s’il eût craint qu’elle ne s’ouvrît malgré le verrou qui la fermait; puis d’un mouvement vif et brusque et d’une seule brassée, sans même donner un coup d’œil à ces choses qu’il avait si religieusement et si périlleusement gardées pendant tant d’années, il prit tout, haillons, bâton, havresac, et jeta tout au feu. Il referma la fausse armoire, et, redoublant de précautions, désormais inutiles puisqu’elle était vide, en cacha la porte derrière un gros meuble qu’il y poussa.

Au bout de quelques secondes, la chambre et le mur d’en face furent éclairés d’une grande réverbération rouge et tremblante. Tout brûlait. Le bâton d’épine pétillait et jetait des étincelles jusqu’au milieu de la chambre.

Le havresac, en se consumant avec d’affreux chiffons qu’il contenait, avait mis à nu quelque chose qui brillait dans la cendre. En se penchant, on eût aisément reconnu une pièce d’argent. Sans doute la pièce de quarante sous volée au petit savoyard.

Lui ne regardait pas le feu et marchait, allant et venant toujours du même pas.

Tout à coup ses yeux tombèrent sur les deux flambeaux d’argent que la réverbération faisait reluire vaguement sur la cheminée.

— Tiens! pensa-t-il, tout Jean Valjean est encore là-dedans. Il faut aussi détruire cela.

Il prit les deux flambeaux.

Il y avait assez de feu pour qu’on pût les déformer promptement et en faire une sorte de lingot méconnaissable.

Il se pencha sur le foyer et s’y chauffa un instant. Il eut un vrai bien-être. — La bonne chaleur! dit-il.

Il remua le brasier avec un des deux chandeliers. Une minute de plus, et ils étaient dans le feu. En ce moment il lui sembla qu’il entendait une voix qui criait au dedans de lui:

— Jean Valjean! Jean Valjean!

Ses cheveux se dressèrent, il devint comme un homme qui écoute une chose terrible.

— Oui, c’est cela, achève! disait la voix. Complète ce que tu fais! détruis ces flambeaux! anéantis ce souvenir! oublie l’évêque! oublie tout! perds ce Champmathieu! va, c’est bien. Applaudis-toi! Ainsi, c’est convenu, c’est résolu, c’est dit, voilà un homme, voilà un vieillard qui ne sait ce qu’on lui veut, qui n’a rien fait peut-être, un innocent, dont ton nom fait tout le malheur, sur qui ton nom pèse comme un crime, qui va être pris pour toi, qui va être condamné, qui va finir ses jours dans l’abjection et dans l’horreur! c’est bien. Sois honnête homme, toi. Reste monsieur le maire, reste honorable et honoré, enrichis la ville, nourris des indigents, élève des orphelins, vis heureux, vertueux et admiré, et pendant ce temps-là, pendant que tu seras ici dans la joie et dans la lumière, il y aura quelqu’un qui aura ta casaque rouge, qui portera ton nom dans l’ignominie et qui traînera ta chaîne au bagne! Oui, c’est bien arrangé ainsi! Ah! misérable!

La sueur lui coulait du front. Il attachait sur les flambeaux un œil hagard. Cependant ce qui parlait en lui n’avait pas fini. La voix continuait:

— Jean Valjean! il y aura autour de toi beaucoup de voix qui feront un grand bruit, qui parleront bien haut, et qui te béniront, et une seule que personne n’entendra et qui te maudira dans les ténèbres. Eh bien! écoute, infâme! toutes ces bénédictions retomberont avant d’arriver au ciel, et il n’y aura que la malédiction qui montera jusqu’à Dieu! Cette voix, d’abord toute faible et qui s’était élevée du plus obscur de sa conscience, était devenue par degrés éclatante et formidable, et il l’entendait maintenant à son oreille. Il lui semblait qu’elle était sortie de lui-même et qu’elle parlait à présent en dehors de lui. Il crut entendre les dernières paroles si distinctement qu’il regarda dans la chambre avec une sorte de terreur.

— Y a-t-il quelqu’un ici? demanda-t-il à haute voix, et tout égaré.

Puis il reprit avec un rire qui ressemblait au rire d’un idiot:

— Que je suis bête! il ne peut y avoir personne.

Il y avait quelqu’un; mais celui qui y était n’était pas de ceux que l’œil humain peut voir.

Il posa les flambeaux sur la cheminée.

Alors il reprit cette marche monotone et lugubre qui troublait dans ses rêves et réveillait en sursaut l’homme endormi au-dessous de lui.

Cette marche le soulageait et l’enivrait en même temps. Il semble que parfois dans les occasions suprêmes on se remue pour demander conseil à tout ce qu’on peut rencontrer en se déplaçant. Au bout de quelques instants il ne savait plus où il en était.

Il reculait maintenant avec une égale épouvante devant les deux résolutions qu’il avait prises tour à tour. Les deux idées qui le conseillaient lui paraissaient aussi funestes l’une que l’autre. — Quelle fatalité! quelle rencontre que ce Champmathieu pris pour lui! Être précipité justement par le moyen que la providence paraissait d’abord avoir employé pour l’affermir!

Il y eut un moment où il considéra l’avenir. Se dénoncer, grand Dieu! se livrer! Il envisagea avec un immense désespoir tout ce qu’il faudrait quitter, tout ce qu’il faudrait reprendre. Il faudrait donc dire adieu à cette existence si bonne, si pure, si radieuse, à ce respect de tous, à l’honneur, à la liberté! Il n’irait plus se promener dans les champs, il n’entendrait plus chanter les oiseaux au mois de mai, il ne ferait plus l’aumône aux petits enfants! Il ne sentirait plus la douceur des regards de reconnaissance et d’amour fixés sur lui! Il quitterait cette maison qu’il avait bâtie, cette chambre, cette petite chambre! Tout lui paraissait charmant à cette heure. Il ne lirait plus dans ces livres, il n’écrirait plus sur cette petite table de bois blanc! Sa vieille portière, la seule servante qu’il eût, ne lui monterait plus son café le matin. Grand Dieu! au lieu de cela, la chiourme, le carcan, la veste rouge, la chaîne au pied, la fatigue, le cachot, le lit de camp, toutes ces horreurs connues! À son âge, après avoir été ce qu’il était! Si encore il était jeune! Mais, vieux, être tutoyé par le premier venu, être fouillé par le garde-chiourme, recevoir le coup de bâton de l’argousin! avoir les pieds nus dans des souliers ferrés! tendre matin et soir sa jambe au marteau du rondier qui visite la manille! subir la curiosité des étrangers auxquels on dirait: Celui-là, c’est le fameux Jean Valjean, qui a été maire à Montreuil-sur-mer! Le soir, ruisselant de sueur, accablé de lassitude, le bonnet vert sur les yeux, remonter deux à deux, sous le fouet du sergent, l’escalier-échelle du bagne flottant! Oh! quelle misère! La destinée peut-elle donc être méchante comme un être intelligent et devenir monstrueuse comme le cœur humain!

Et, quoi qu’il fît, il retombait toujours sur ce poignant dilemme qui était au fond de sa rêverie: — rester dans le paradis, et y devenir démon! rentrer dans l’enfer, et y devenir ange!

Que faire, grand Dieu! que faire?

La tourmente dont il était sorti avec tant de peine se déchaîna de nouveau en lui. Ses idées recommencèrent à se mêler. Elles prirent ce je ne sais quoi de stupéfié et de machinal qui est propre au désespoir. Ce nom de Romainville lui revenait sans cesse à l’esprit avec deux vers d’une chanson qu’il avait entendue autrefois. Il songeait que Romainville est un petit bois près Paris où les jeunes gens amoureux vont cueillir des lilas au mois d’avril.

Il chancelait au dehors comme au dedans. Il marchait comme un petit enfant qu’on laisse aller seul.

À de certains moments, luttant contre sa lassitude, il faisait effort pour ressaisir son intelligence. Il tâchait de se poser une dernière fois, et définitivement, le problème sur lequel il était en quelque sorte tombé d’épuisement. Faut-il se dénoncer? Faut-il se taire? — Il ne réussissait à rien voir de distinct. Les vagues aspects de tous les raisonnements ébauchés par sa rêverie tremblaient et se dissipaient l’un après l’autre en fumée.

Seulement il sentait que, à quelque parti qu’il s’arrêtât, nécessairement, et sans qu’il fût possible d’y échapper, quelque chose de lui allait mourir; qu’il entrait dans un sépulcre à droite comme à gauche; qu’il accomplissait une agonie, l’agonie de son bonheur ou l’agonie de sa vertu.

Hélas! toutes ses irrésolutions l’avaient repris. Il n’était pas plus avancé qu’au commencement.

Ainsi se débattait sous l’angoisse cette malheureuse âme. Dix-huit cents ans avant cet homme infortuné, l’être mystérieux, en qui se résument toutes les saintetés et toutes les souffrances de l’humanité, avait aussi lui, pendant que les oliviers frémissaient au vent farouche de l’infini, longtemps écarté de la main l’effrayant calice qui lui apparaissait ruisselant d’ombre et débordant de ténèbres dans des profondeurs pleines d’étoiles.

Chapitre IV

Formes que prend la souffrance pendant le sommeil

Trois heures du matin venaient de sonner, et il y avait cinq heures qu'il marchait ainsi, presque sans interruption lorsqu'il se laissa tomber sur sa chaise.

Il s'y endormit et fit un rêve.

Ce rêve, comme la plupart des rêves, ne se rapportait à la situation que par je ne sais quoi de funeste et de poignant, mais il lui fit impression. Ce cauchemar le frappa tellement que plus tard il l'a écrit. C'est un des papiers écrits de sa main qu'il a laissés. Nous croyons devoir transcrire ici cette chose textuellement.

Quel que soit ce rêve, l'histoire de cette nuit serait incomplète si nous l'omettions. C'est la sombre aventure d'une âme malade.

Le voici. Sur l'enveloppe nous trouvons cette ligne écrite: Le rêve que j'ai eu cette nuit-là.

«J'étais dans une campagne. Une grande campagne triste où il n'y avait pas d'herbe. Il ne me semblait pas qu'il fît jour ni qu'il fît nuit.

«Je me promenais avec mon frère, le frère de mes années d'enfance, ce frère auquel je dois dire que je ne pense jamais et dont je ne me souviens presque plus.

«Nous causions, et nous rencontrions des passants. Nous parlions d'une voisine que nous avions eue autrefois, et qui, depuis qu'elle demeurait sur la rue, travaillait la fenêtre toujours ouverte. Tout en causant, nous avions froid à cause de cette fenêtre ouverte.

«Il n'y avait pas d'arbres dans la campagne.

«Nous vîmes un homme qui passa près de nous. C'était un homme tout nu, couleur de cendre, monté sur un cheval couleur de terre. L'homme n'avait pas de cheveux; on voyait son crâne et des veines sur son crâne. Il tenait à la main une baguette qui était souple comme un sarment de vigne et lourde comme du fer. Ce cavalier passa et ne nous dit rien.

«Mon frère me dit: Prenons par le chemin creux.

«Il y avait un chemin creux où l'on ne voyait pas une broussaille ni un brin de mousse. Tout était couleur de terre, même le ciel. Au bout de quelques pas, on ne me répondit plus quand je parlais. Je m’aperçus que mon frère n’était plus avec moi.

«J’entrai dans un village que je vis. Je songeai que ce devait être là Romainville (pourquoi Romainville?).

«La première rue où j’entrai était déserte. J’entrai dans une seconde rue. Derrière l’angle que faisaient les deux rues, il y avait un homme debout contre le mur. Je dis à cet homme: — Quel est ce pays? où suis-je? L’homme ne répondit pas. Je vis la porte d’une maison ouverte, j’y entrai.

«La première chambre était déserte. J’entrai dans la seconde. Derrière la porte de cette chambre, il y avait un homme debout contre le mur. Je demandai à cet homme: — À qui est cette maison? où suis-je? L’homme ne répondit pas. La maison avait un jardin.

«Je sortis de la maison et j’entrai dans le jardin. Le jardin était désert. Derrière le premier arbre, je trouvai un homme qui se tenait debout. Je dis à cet homme: — Quel est ce jardin? où suis-je? L’homme ne répondit pas.

«J’errai dans le village, et je m’aperçus que c’était une ville. Toutes les rues étaient désertes, toutes les portes étaient ouvertes. Aucun être vivant ne passait dans les rues, ne marchait dans les chambres ou ne se promenait dans les jardins. Mais il y avait derrière chaque angle de mur, derrière chaque porte, derrière chaque arbre, un homme debout qui se taisait. On n’en voyait jamais qu’un à la fois. Ces hommes me regardaient passer.

«Je sortis de la ville et je me mis à marcher dans les champs.

«Au bout de quelque temps, je me retournai, et je vis une grande foule qui venait derrière moi. Je reconnus tous les hommes que j’avais vus dans la ville. Ils avaient des têtes étranges. Ils ne semblaient pas se hâter, et cependant ils marchaient plus vite que moi. Ils ne faisaient aucun bruit en marchant. En un instant, cette foule me rejoignit et m’entoura. Les visages de ces hommes étaient couleur de terre.

«Alors le premier que j’avais vu et questionné en entrant dans la ville me dit: — Où allez-vous? Est-ce que vous ne savez pas que vous êtes mort depuis longtemps?

«J’ouvris la bouche pour répondre, et je m’aperçus qu’il n’y avait personne autour de moi.»

Il se réveilla. Il était glacé. Un vent qui était froid comme le vent du matin faisait tourner dans leurs gonds les châssis de la croisée restée ouverte. Le feu s’était éteint. La bougie touchait à sa fin. Il était encore nuit noire.

Il se leva, il alla à la fenêtre. Il n’y avait toujours pas d’étoiles au ciel.

De sa fenêtre on voyait la cour de la maison et la rue. Un bruit sec et dur qui résonna tout à coup sur le sol lui fit baisser les yeux.

Il vit au-dessous de lui deux étoiles rouges dont les rayons s’allongeaient et se raccourcissaient bizarrement dans l’ombre.

Comme sa pensée était encore à demi submergée dans la brume des rêves. — tiens! songea-t-il, il n’y en a pas dans le ciel. Elles sont sur la terre maintenant.

Cependant ce trouble se dissipa, un second bruit pareil au premier acheva de le réveiller; il regarda, et il reconnut que ces deux étoiles étaient les lanternes d’une voiture. À la clarté qu’elles jetaient, il put distinguer la forme de cette voiture. C’était un tilbury attelé d’un petit cheval blanc. Le bruit qu’il avait entendu, c’étaient les coups de pied du cheval sur le pavé.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que cette voiture? se dit-il. Qui est-ce qui vient donc si matin? En ce moment on frappa un petit coup à la porte de sa chambre.

Il frissonna de la tête aux pieds, et cria d’une voix terrible:

— Qui est là?

Quelqu’un répondit:

— Moi, monsieur le maire.

Il reconnut la voix de la vieille femme, sa portière.

— Eh bien, reprit-il, qu’est-ce que c’est?

— Monsieur le maire, il est tout à l’heure cinq heures du matin.

— Qu’est-ce que cela me fait?

— Monsieur le maire, c’est le cabriolet.

— Quel cabriolet?

— Le tilbury.

— Quel tilbury?

— Est-ce que monsieur le maire n’a pas fait demander un tilbury?

— Non, dit-il.

— Le cocher dit qu’il vient chercher monsieur le maire.

— Quel cocher?

— Le cocher de M. Scaufflaire.

— M. Scaufflaire?

Ce nom le fit tressaillir comme si un éclair lui eût passé devant la face.

— Ah! oui! reprit-il, M. Scaufflaire.

Si la vieille femme l’eût pu voir en ce moment, elle eût été épouvantée.

Il se fit un assez long silence. Il examinait d’un air stupide la flamme de la bougie et prenait autour de la mèche de la cire brûlante qu’il roulait dans ses doigts.

La vieille attendait. Elle se hasarda pourtant à élever encore la voix:

— Monsieur le maire, que faut-il que je réponde?

— Dites que c’est bien, et que je descends.

Chapitre V

Bâtons dans les roues

Le service des postes d’Arras à Montreuil-sur-mer se faisait encore à cette époque par de petites malles du temps de l’empire. Ces malles étaient des cabriolets à deux roues, tapissés de cuir fauve au dedans, suspendus sur des ressorts à pompe, et n’ayant que deux places, l’une pour le courrier, l’autre pour le voyageur. Les roues étaient armées de ces longs moyeux offensifs qui tiennent les autres voitures à distance et qu’on voit encore sur les routes d’Allemagne. Le coffre aux dépêches, immense boîte oblongue, était placé derrière le cabriolet et faisait corps avec lui. Ce coffre était peint en noir et le cabriolet en jaune.

Ces voitures, auxquelles rien ne ressemble aujourd’hui, avaient je ne sais quoi de difforme et de bossu, et, quand on les voyait passer de loin et ramper dans quelque route à l’horizon, elles ressemblaient à ces insectes qu’on appelle, je crois, termites, et qui, avec un petit corsage, traînent un gros arrière-train. Elles allaient, du reste, fort vite. La malle partie d’Arras toutes les nuits à une heure, après le passage du courrier de Paris, arrivait à Montreuil-sur-mer un peu avant cinq heures du matin.

Cette nuit-là, la malle qui descendait à Montreuil-sur-mer par la route de Hesdin accrocha, au tournant d’une rue, au moment où elle entrait dans la ville, un petit tilbury attelé d’un cheval blanc, qui venait en sens inverse et dans lequel il n’y avait qu’une personne, un homme enveloppé d’un manteau. La roue du tilbury reçut un choc assez rude. Le courrier cria à cet homme d’arrêter, mais le voyageur n’écouta pas, et continua sa route au grand trot.

— Voilà un homme diablement pressé! dit le courrier.

L’homme qui se hâtait ainsi, c’est celui que nous venons de voir se débattre dans des convulsions dignes à coup sûr de pitié.

Où allait-il? Il n’eût pu le dire. Pourquoi se hâtait-il? Il ne savait. Il allait au hasard devant lui. Où? À Arras sans doute; mais il allait peut-être ailleurs aussi. Par moments il le sentait, et il tressaillait.

Il s’enfonçait dans cette nuit comme dans un gouffre. Quelque chose le poussait, quelque chose l’attirait. Ce qui se passait en lui, personne ne pourrait le dire, tous le comprendront. Quel homme n'est entré, au moins une fois en sa vie, dans cette obscure caverne de l'inconnu?

Du reste il n'avait rien résolu, rien décidé, rien arrêté, rien fait. Aucun des actes de sa conscience n'avait été définitif. Il était plus que jamais comme au premier moment. Pourquoi allait-il à Arras?

Il se répétait ce qu'il s'était déjà dit en retenant le cabriolet de Scaufflaire, — que, quel que dût être le résultat, il n'y avait aucun inconvénient à voir de ses yeux, à juger les choses par lui-même; — que cela même était prudent, qu'il fallait savoir ce qui se passerait; qu'on ne pouvait rien décider sans avoir observé et scruté; — que de loin on se faisait des montagnes de tout; qu'au bout du compte, lorsqu'il aurait vu ce Champmathieu, quelque misérable, sa conscience serait probablement fort soulagée de le laisser aller au bagne à sa place; — qu'à la vérité il y aurait là Javert, et ce Brevet, ce Chenildieu, ce Cochepaille, anciens forçats qui l'avaient connu; mais qu'à coup sûr ils ne le reconnaîtraient pas; — bah! quelle idée! — que Javert en était à cent lieues; — que toutes les conjectures et toutes les suppositions étaient fixées sur ce Champmathieu, et que rien n'est entêté comme les suppositions et les conjectures; — qu'il n'y avait donc aucun danger. Que sans doute c'était un moment noir, mais qu'il en sortirait; — qu'après tout il tenait sa destinée, si mauvaise qu'elle voulût être, dans sa main; — qu'il en était le maître. Il se cramponnait à cette pensée.

Au fond, pour tout dire, il eût mieux aimé ne point aller à Arras.

Cependant il y allait.

Tout en songeant, il fouettait le cheval, lequel trottait de ce bon trot réglé et sûr qui fait deux lieues et demie à l'heure.

À mesure que le cabriolet avançait, il sentait quelque chose en lui qui reculait.

Au point du jour il était en rase campagne; la ville de Montreuil-sur-mer était assez loin derrière lui. Il regarda l'horizon blanchir; il regarda, sans les voir, passer devant ses yeux toutes les froides figures d'une aube d'hiver. Le matin a ses spectres comme le soir. Il ne les voyait pas, mais, à son insu, et par une sorte de pénétration presque physique, ces noires silhouettes d'arbres et de collines ajoutaient à l'état violent de son âme je ne sais quoi de morne et de sinistre.

Chaque fois qu'il passait devant une de ces maisons isolées qui côtoient parfois les routes, il se disait: il y a pourtant là-dedans des gens qui dorment!

Le trot du cheval, les grelots du harnais, les roues sur le pavé, faisaient un bruit doux et monotone. Ces choses-là sont charmantes quand on est joyeux et lugubres quand on est triste. Il était grand jour lorsqu'il arriva à Hesdin. Il s'arrêta devant une auberge pour laisser souffler le cheval et lui faire donner l'avoine.

Ce cheval était, comme l'avait dit Scaufflaire, de cette petite race du Boulonnais qui a trop de tête, trop de ventre et pas assez d'encolure, mais qui a le poitrail ouvert, la croupe large, la jambe sèche et fine et le pied solide; race laide, mais robuste et saine. L'excellente bête avait fait cinq lieues en deux heures et n'avait pas une goutte de sueur sur la croupe.

Il n'était pas descendu du tilbury. Le garçon d'écurie qui apportait l'avoine se baissa tout à coup et examina la roue de gauche.

— Allez-vous loin comme cela? dit cet homme.

Il répondit, presque sans sortir de sa rêverie:

— Pourquoi?

— Venez-vous de loin? reprit le garçon.

— De cinq lieues d'ici.

— Ah!

— Pourquoi dites-vous: ah?

Le garçon se pencha de nouveau, resta un moment silencieux, l'œil fixé sur la roue, puis se redressa en disant:

— C'est que voilà une roue qui vient de faire cinq lieues, c'est possible, mais qui à coup sûr ne fera pas maintenant un quart de lieue.

Il sauta à bas du tilbury.

— Que dites-vous là, mon ami?

— Je dis que c'est un miracle que vous ayez fait cinq lieues sans rouler, vous et votre cheval, dans quelque fossé de la grande route. Regardez plutôt.

La roue en effet était gravement endommagée. Le choc de la malle-poste avait fendu deux rayons et labouré le moyeu dont l'écrou ne tenait plus.

— Mon ami, dit-il au garçon d'écurie, il y a un charron ici?

— Sans doute, monsieur.

— Rendez-moi le service de l'aller chercher.

— Il est là, à deux pas. Hé! maître Bourgaillard!

Maître Bourgaillard, le charron, était sur le seuil de sa porte. Il vint examiner la roue et fit la grimace d'un chirurgien qui considère une jambe cassée.

— Pouvez-vous raccommoder cette roue sur-le-champ?

— Oui, monsieur.

— Quand pourrai-je repartir?

— Demain.

— Demain!

— Il y a une grande journée d’ouvrage. Est-ce que monsieur est pressé?

— Très pressé. Il faut que je reparte dans une heure au plus tard.

— Impossible, monsieur.

— Je payerai tout ce qu’on voudra.

— Impossible.

— Eh bien! dans deux heures.

— Impossible pour aujourd’hui. Il faut refaire deux rais et un moyeu. Monsieur ne pourra repartir avant demain.

— L’affaire que j’ai ne peut attendre à demain. Si, au lieu de raccommoder cette roue, on la remplaçait?

— Comment cela?

— Vous êtes charron?

— Sans doute, monsieur.

— Est-ce que vous n’auriez pas une roue à me vendre? Je pourrais repartir tout de suite.

— Une roue de rechange?

— Oui.

— Je n’ai pas une roue toute faite pour votre cabriolet. Deux roues font la paire. Deux roues ne vont pas ensemble au hasard.

— En ce cas, vendez-moi une paire de roues.

— Monsieur, toutes les roues ne vont pas à tous les essieux.

— Essayez toujours.

— C’est inutile, monsieur. Je n’ai à vendre que des roues de charrette. Nous sommes un petit pays ici.

— Auriez-vous un cabriolet à me louer?

Le maître charron, du premier coup d’œil, avait reconnu que le tilbury était une voiture de louage. Il haussa les épaules.

— Vous les arrangez bien, les cabriolets qu’on vous loue! j’en aurais un que je ne vous le louerais pas.

— Eh bien, à me vendre?

— Je n’en ai pas.

— Quoi! pas une carriole? Je ne suis pas difficile, comme vous voyez.

— Nous sommes un petit pays. J’ai bien là sous la remise, ajouta le charron, une vieille calèche qui est à un bourgeois de la ville qui me l’a donnée en garde et qui s’en sert tous les trente-six du mois. Je vous la louerais bien, qu’est-ce que cela me fait? mais il ne faudrait pas que le bourgeois la vît passer; et puis, c’est une calèche, il faudrait deux chevaux.

— Je prendrai des chevaux de poste.

— Où va monsieur?

— À Arras.

— Et monsieur veut arriver aujourd’hui?

— Mais oui.

— En prenant des chevaux de poste?

— Pourquoi pas?

— Est-il égal à monsieur d’arriver cette nuit à quatre heures du matin?

— Non certes.

— C’est que, voyez-vous bien, il y a une chose à dire, en prenant des chevaux de poste....

— Monsieur a son passeport?

— Oui.

— Eh bien, en prenant des chevaux de poste, monsieur n’arrivera pas à Arras avant demain. Nous sommes un chemin de traverse. Les relais sont mal servis, les chevaux sont aux champs. C’est la saison des grandes charrues qui commence, il faut de forts attelages, et l’on prend les chevaux partout, à la poste comme ailleurs. Monsieur attendra au moins trois ou quatre heures à chaque relais. Et puis on va au pas. Il y a beaucoup de côtes à monter.

— Allons, j’irai à cheval. Dételez le cabriolet. On me vendra bien une selle dans le pays.

— Sans doute. Mais ce cheval-ci endure-t-il la selle?

— C’est vrai, vous m’y faites penser. Il ne l’endure pas.

— Alors....

— Mais je trouverai bien dans le village un cheval à louer?

— Un cheval pour aller à Arras d’une traite!

— Oui.

— Il faudrait un cheval comme on n’en a pas dans nos endroits. Il faudrait l’acheter d’abord, car on ne vous connaît pas. Mais ni à vendre ni à louer, ni pour cinq cents francs, ni pour mille, vous ne le trouveriez pas!

— Comment faire?

— Le mieux, là, en honnête homme, c’est que je raccommode la roue et que vous remettiez votre voyage à demain.

— Demain il sera trop tard.

— Dame!

— N’y a-t-il pas la malle-poste qui va à Arras? Quand passe-t-elle?

— La nuit prochaine. Les deux malles font le service la nuit, celle qui monte comme celle qui descend.

— Comment! il vous faut une journée pour raccommoder cette roue?

— Une journée, et une bonne!

— En mettant deux ouvriers?

— En en mettant dix!

— Si on liait les rayons avec des cordes?

— Les rayons, oui; le moyeu, non. Et puis la jante aussi est en mauvais état.

— Y a-t-il un loueur de voitures dans la ville?

— Non.

— Y a-t-il un autre charron?

Le garçon d’écurie et le maître charron répondirent en même temps en hochant la tête.

— Non.

Il sentit une immense joie.

Il était évident que la providence s’en mêlait. C’était elle qui avait brisé la roue du tilbury et qui l’arrêtait en route. Il ne s’était pas rendu à cette espèce de première sommation; il venait de faire tous les efforts possibles pour continuer son voyage; il avait loyalement et scrupuleusement épuisé tous les moyens; il n’avait reculé ni devant la saison, ni devant la fatigue, ni devant la dépense; il n’avait rien à se reprocher. S’il n’allait pas plus loin, cela ne le regardait plus. Ce n’était plus sa faute, c’était, non le fait de sa conscience, mais le fait de la providence.

Il respira. Il respira librement et à pleine poitrine pour la première fois depuis la visite de Javert. Il lui semblait que le poignet de fer qui lui serrait le cœur depuis vingt heures venait de le lâcher.

Il lui paraissait que maintenant Dieu était pour lui, et se déclarait.

Il se dit qu’il avait fait tout ce qu’il pouvait, et qu’à présent il n’avait qu’à revenir sur ses pas, tranquillement.

Si sa conversation avec le charron eût eu lieu dans une chambre de l’auberge, elle n’eût point eu de témoins, personne ne l’eût entendue, les choses en fussent restées là, et il est probable que nous n’aurions eu à raconter aucun des événements qu’on va lire; mais cette conversation s’était faite dans la rue. Tout colloque dans la rue produit inévitablement un cercle. Il y a toujours des gens qui ne demandent qu’à être spectateurs. Pendant qu’il questionnait le charron, quelques allants et venants s’étaient arrêtés autour d’eux. Après avoir écouté pendant quelques minutes, un jeune garçon, auquel personne n’avait pris garde, s’était détaché du groupe en courant.

Au moment où le voyageur, après la délibération intérieure que nous venons d’indiquer, prenait la résolution de rebrousser chemin, cet enfant revenait. Il était accompagné d’une vieille femme.

— Monsieur, dit la femme, mon garçon me dit que vous avez envie de louer un cabriolet. Cette simple parole, prononcée par une vieille femme que conduisait un enfant, lui fit ruisseler la sueur dans les reins. Il crut voir la main qui l’avait lâché reparaître dans l’ombre derrière lui, toute prête à le reprendre.

Il répondit:

— Oui, bonne femme, je cherche un cabriolet à louer.

Et il se hâta d’ajouter:

— Mais il n’y en a pas dans le pays.

— Si fait, dit la vieille.

— Où ça donc? reprit le charron.

— Chez moi, répliqua la vieille.

Il tressaillit. La main fatale l’avait ressaisi.

La vieille avait en effet sous un hangar une façon de carriole en osier. Le charron et le garçon d’auberge, désolés que le voyageur leur échappât, intervinrent.

— C’était une affreuse guimbarde, — cela était posé à cru sur l’essieu, — il est vrai que les banquettes étaient suspendues à l’intérieur avec des lanières de cuir, — il pleuvait dedans, — les roues étaient rouillées et rongées d’humidité, — cela n’irait pas beaucoup plus loin que le tilbury, — une vraie patache! — Ce monsieur aurait bien tort de s’y embarquer, — etc., etc.

Tout cela était vrai, mais cette guimbarde, cette patache, cette chose, quelle qu’elle fût, roulait sur ses deux roues et pouvait aller à Arras.

Il paya ce qu'on voulut, laissa le tilbury à réparer chez le charron pour l'y retrouver à son retour, fit atteler le cheval blanc à la carriole, y monta, et reprit la route qu'il suivait depuis le matin.

Au moment où la carriole s'ébranla, il s'avoua qu'il avait eu l'instant d'auparavant une certaine joie de songer qu'il n'irait point où il allait. Il examina cette joie avec une sorte de colère et la trouva absurde. Pourquoi de la joie à revenir en arrière? Après tout, il faisait ce voyage librement. Personne ne l'y forçait. Et, certainement, rien n'arriverait que ce qu'il voudrait bien.

Comme il sortait de Hesdin, il entendit une voix qui lui criait: arrêtez! arrêtez! Il arrêta la carriole d'un mouvement vif dans lequel il y avait encore je ne sais quoi de fébrile et de convulsif qui ressemblait à de l'espérance.

C'était le petit garçon de la vieille.

— Monsieur, dit-il, c'est moi qui vous ai procuré la carriole.

— Eh bien!

— Vous ne m'avez rien donné.

Lui qui donnait à tous et si facilement, il trouva cette prétention exorbitante et presque odieuse.

— Ah! c'est toi, drôle? dit-il, tu n'auras rien!

Il fouetta le cheval et repartit au grand trot.

Il avait perdu beaucoup de temps à Hesdin, il eût voulu le rattraper. Le petit cheval était courageux et tirait comme deux; mais on était au mois de février, il avait plu, les routes étaient mauvaises. Et puis, ce n'était plus le tilbury. La carriole était dure et très lourde. Avec cela force montées.

Il mit près de quatre heures pour aller de Hesdin à Saint-Pol. Quatre heures pour cinq lieues.

À Saint-Pol il détela à la première auberge venue, et fit mener le cheval à l'écurie. Comme il l'avait promis à Scaufflaire, il se tint près du râtelier pendant que le cheval mangeait. Il songeait à des choses tristes et confuses.

La femme de l'aubergiste entre dans l'écurie.

— Est-ce que monsieur ne veut pas déjeuner?

— Tiens, c'est vrai, dit-il, j'ai même bon appétit. Il suivit cette femme qui avait une figure fraîche et réjouie. Elle le conduisit dans une salle basse où il y avait des tables ayant pour nappes des toiles cirées.

— Dépêchez-vous, reprit-il, il faut que je reparte. Je suis pressé.

Une grosse servante flamande mit son couvert en toute hâte. Il regardait cette fille avec un sentiment de bien-être.

— C'est là ce que j'avais, pensa-t-il. Je n'avais pas déjeuné.

On le servit. Il se jeta sur le pain, mordit une bouchée, puis le reposa lentement sur la table et n'y toucha plus.

Un routier mangeait à une autre table. Il dit à cet homme:

— Pourquoi leur pain est-il donc si amer?

Le routier était allemand et n'entendit pas.

Il retourna dans l'écurie près du cheval.

Une heure après, il avait quitté Saint-Pol et se dirigeait vers Tinques qui n'est qu'à cinq lieues d'Arras.

Que faisait-il pendant ce trajet? À quoi pensait-il? Comme le matin, il regardait passer les arbres, les toits de chaume, les champs cultivés, et les évanouissements du paysage qui se disloque à chaque coude du chemin. C'est là une contemplation qui suffit quelquefois à l'âme et qui la dispense presque de penser. Voir mille objets pour la première et pour la dernière fois, quoi de plus mélancolique et de plus profond! Voyager, c'est naître et mourir à chaque instant. Peut-être, dans la région la plus vague de son esprit, faisait-il des rapprochements entre ces horizons changeants et l'existence humaine. Toutes les choses de la vie sont perpétuellement en fuite devant nous. Les obscurcissements et les clartés s'entremêlent: après un éblouissement, une éclipse; on regarde, on se hâte, on tend les mains pour saisir ce qui passe; chaque événement est un tournant de la route; et tout à coup on est vieux. On sent comme une secousse, tout est noir, on distingue une porte obscure, ce sombre cheval de la vie qui vous traînait s'arrête, et l'on voit quelqu'un de voilé et d'inconnu qui le dételle dans les ténèbres.

Le crépuscule tombait au moment où des enfants qui sortaient de l'école regardèrent ce voyageur entrer dans Tinques. Il est vrai qu'on était encore aux jours courts de l'année. Il ne s'arrêta pas à Tinques. Comme il débouchait du village, un cantonnier qui empierrait la route dressa la tête et dit:

— Voilà un cheval bien fatigué.

La pauvre bête en effet n'allait plus qu'au pas.

— Est-ce que vous allez à Arras? ajouta le cantonnier.

— Oui.

— Si vous allez de ce train, vous n'y arriverez pas de bonne heure.

Il arrêta le cheval et demanda au cantonnier:

— Combien y a-t-il encore d’ici à Arras?

— Près de sept grandes lieues.

— Comment cela? le livre de poste ne marque que cinq lieues et un quart.

— Ah! reprit le cantonnier, vous ne savez donc pas que la route est en réparation? Vous allez la trouver coupée à un quart d’heure d’ici. Pas moyen d’aller plus loin.

— Vraiment.

— Vous prendrez à gauche, le chemin qui va à Carency, vous passerez la rivière; et, quand vous serez à Camblin, vous tournerez à droite; c’est la route de Mont-Saint-Éloy qui va à Arras.

— Mais voilà la nuit, je me perdrai.

— Vous n’êtes pas du pays?

— Non.

— Avec ça, c’est tout chemins de traverse. Tenez, Monsieur, reprit le cantonnier, voulez-vous que je vous donne un conseil? Votre cheval est las, rentrez dans Tinques. Il y a une bonne auberge. Couchez-y. Vous irez demain à Arras.

— Il faut que j’y sois ce soir.

— C’est différent. Alors allez tout de même à cette auberge et prenez-y un cheval de renfort. Le garçon du cheval vous guidera dans la traverse.

Il suivit le conseil du cantonnier, rebroussa chemin, et une demi-heure après il repassait au même endroit, mais au grand trot, avec un bon cheval de renfort. Un garçon d’écurie qui s’intitulait postillon était assis sur le brancard de la carriole.

Cependant il sentait qu’il perdait du temps.

Il faisait tout à fait nuit.

Ils s’engagèrent dans la traverse. La route devint affreuse. La carriole tombait d’une ornière dans l’autre. Il dit au postillon:

— Toujours au trot, et double pourboire.

Dans un cahot le palonnier cassa.

— Monsieur, dit le postillon, voilà le palonnier cassé, je ne sais plus comment atteler mon cheval, cette route-ci est bien mauvaise la nuit; si vous vouliez revenir coucher à Tinques, nous pourrions être demain matin de bonne heure à Arras.

Il répondit:

— As-tu un bout de corde et un couteau?

— Oui, monsieur.

Il coupa une branche d’arbre et en fit un palonnier.

Ce fut encore une perte de vingt minutes; mais ils repartirent au galop.

La plaine était ténébreuse. Des brouillards bas, courts et noirs rampaient sur les collines et s’en arrachaient comme des fumées. Il y avait des lueurs blanchâtres dans les nuages. Un grand vent qui venait de la mer faisait dans tous les coins de l’horizon le bruit de quelqu’un qui remue des meubles. Tout ce qu’on entrevoyait avait des attitudes de terreur. Que de choses frissonnent sous ces vastes souffles de la nuit!

Le froid le pénétrait. Il n’avait pas mangé depuis la veille. Il se rappelait vaguement son autre course nocturne dans la grande plaine aux environs de Digne. Il y avait huit ans; et cela lui semblait hier.

Une heure sonna à quelque clocher lointain. Il demanda au garçon:

— Quelle est cette heure?

— Sept heures, monsieur. Nous serons à Arras à huit. Nous n’avons plus que trois lieues. En ce moment il fit pour la première fois cette réflexion — en trouvant étrange qu’elle ne lui fût pas venue plus tôt — que c’était peut-être inutile, toute la peine qu’il prenait; qu’il ne savait seulement pas l’heure du procès; qu’il aurait dû au moins s’en informer; qu’il était extravagant d’aller ainsi devant soi sans savoir si cela servirait à quelque chose. — Puis il ébaucha quelques calculs dans son esprit: — qu’ordinairement les séances des cours d’assises commençaient à neuf heures du matin; — que cela ne devait pas être long, cette affaire-là; — que le vol de pommes, ce serait très court; — qu’il n’y aurait plus ensuite qu’une question d’identité; — quatre ou cinq dépositions, peu de chose à dire pour les avocats; — qu’il allait arriver lorsque tout serait fini!

Le postillon fouettait les chevaux. Ils avaient passé la rivière et laissé derrière eux Mont-Saint-Éloy.

La nuit devenait de plus en plus profonde.

Chapitre VI

La sœur Simplice mise à l’épreuve

Cependant, en ce moment-là même, Fantine était dans la joie.

Elle avait passé une très mauvaise nuit. Toux affreuse, redoublement de fièvre; elle avait eu des songes. Le matin, à la visite du médecin, elle délirait. Il avait eu l’air alarmé et avait recommandé qu’on le prévînt dès que M. Madeleine viendrait.

Toute la matinée elle fut morne, parla peu, et fit des plis à ses draps en murmurant à voix basse des calculs qui avaient l’air d’être des calculs de distances. Ses yeux étaient caves et fixes. Ils paraissaient presque éteints, et puis, par moments, ils se rallumaient et resplendissaient comme des étoiles. Il semble qu’aux approches d’une certaine heure sombre, la clarté du ciel emplisse ceux que quitte la clarté de la terre.

Chaque fois que la sœur Simplice lui demandait comment elle se trouvait, elle répondait invariablement:

— Bien. Je voudrais voir monsieur Madeleine.

Quelques mois auparavant, à ce moment où Fantine venait de perdre sa dernière pudeur, sa dernière honte et sa dernière joie, elle était l’ombre d’elle-même; maintenant elle en était le spectre. Le mal physique avait complété l’œuvre du mal moral. Cette créature de vingt-cinq ans avait le front ridé, les joues flasques, les narines pincées, les dents déchaussées, le teint plombé, le cou osseux, les clavicules saillantes, les membres chétifs, la peau terreuse, et ses cheveux blonds poussaient mêlés de cheveux gris. Hélas! comme la maladie improvise la vieillesse! À midi, le médecin revint, il fit quelques prescriptions, s’informa si M. le maire avait paru à l’infirmerie, et branla la tête.

M. Madeleine venait d’habitude à trois heures voir la malade. Comme l’exactitude était de la bonté, il était exact.

Vers deux heures et demie, Fantine commença à s’agiter. Dans l’espace de vingt minutes, elle demanda plus de dix fois à la religieuse:

— Ma sœur, quelle heure est-il?

Trois heures sonnèrent. Au troisième coup, Fantine se dressa sur son séant, elle qui d’ordinaire pouvait à peine remuer dans son lit; elle joignit dans une sorte d’étreinte convulsive ses deux mains décharnées et jaunes, et la religieuse entendit sortir de sa poitrine un de ces soupirs profonds qui semblent soulever un accablement. Puis Fantine se tourna et regarda la porte.

Personne n’entra; la porte ne s’ouvrit point.

Elle resta ainsi un quart d’heure, l’œil attaché sur la porte, immobile et comme retenant son haleine. La sœur n’osait lui parler. L’église sonna trois heures un quart. Fantine se laissa retomber sur l’oreiller.

Elle ne dit rien et se remit à faire des plis à son drap. La demi-heure passa, puis l’heure. Personne ne vint.

Chaque fois que l’horloge sonnait, Fantine se dressait et regardait du côté de la porte, puis elle retombait.

On voyait clairement sa pensée, mais elle ne prononçait aucun nom, elle ne se plaignait pas, elle n’accusait pas. Seulement elle toussait d’une façon lugubre. On eût dit que quelque chose d’obscur s’abaissait sur elle. Elle était livide et avait les lèvres bleues. Elle souriait par moments.

Cinq heures sonnèrent. Alors la sœur l’entendit qui disait très bas et doucement:

— Mais puisque je m’en vais demain, il a tort de ne pas venir aujourd’hui!

La sœur Simplice elle-même était surprise du retard de M. Madeleine.

Cependant Fantine regardait le ciel de son lit. Elle avait l’air de chercher à se rappeler quelque chose. Tout à coup elle se mit à chanter d’une voix faible comme un souffle. La religieuse écouta. Voici ce que Fantine chantait:

Nous achèterons de bien belles choses
En nous promenant le long des faubourgs.
Les bleuets sont bleus, les roses sont roses,
Les bleuets sont bleus, j’aime mes amours.
La vierge Marie auprès de mon poêle
Est venue hier en manteau brodé,
Et m’a dit: — Voici, caché sous mon voile,
Le petit qu’un jour tu m’as demandé.
Courez à la ville, ayez de la toile,
Achetez du fil, achetez un dé.
Nous achèterons de bien belles choses
En nous promenant le long des faubourgs.
Bonne sainte Vierge, auprès de mon poêle

J’ai mis un berceau de rubans orné
Dieu me donnerait sa plus belle étoile,
J’aime mieux l’enfant que tu m’as donné.
— Madame, que faire avec cette toile?
— Faites un trousseau pour mon nouveau-né.
Les bleuets sont bleus, les roses sont roses,
Les bleuets sont bleus, j’aime mes amours.
— Lavez cette toile.
— Où? — Dans la rivière.
Faites-en, sans rien gâter ni salir,
Une belle jupe avec sa brassière
Que je veux broder et de fleurs emplir.
— L’enfant n’est plus là, madame, qu’en faire?
— Faites-en un drap pour m’ensevelir.
Nous achèterons de bien belles choses
En nous promenant le long des faubourgs.
Les bleuets sont bleus, les roses sont roses,
Les bleuets sont bleus, j’aime mes amours.

Cette chanson était une vieille romance de berceuse avec laquelle autrefois elle endormait sa petite Cosette, et qui ne s’était pas offerte à son esprit depuis cinq ans qu’elle n’avait plus son enfant. Elle chantait cela d’une voix si triste et sur un air si doux que c’était à faire pleurer, même une religieuse. La sœur, habituée aux choses austères, sentit une larme lui venir.

L’horloge sonna six heures. Fantine ne parut pas entendre. Elle semblait ne plus faire attention à aucune chose autour d’elle.

La sœur Simplice envoya une fille de service s’informer près de la portière de la fabrique si M. le maire était rentré et s’il ne monterait pas bientôt à l’infirmerie. La fille revint au bout de quelques minutes.

Fantine était toujours immobile et paraissait attentive à des idées qu’elle avait.

La servante raconta très bas à la sœur Simplice que M. le maire était parti le matin même avant six heures dans un petit tilbury attelé d’un cheval blanc, par le froid qu’il faisait, qu’il était parti seul, pas même de cocher, qu’on ne savait pas le chemin qu’il avait pris, que des personnes disaient l’avoir vu tourner par la route d’Arras, que d’autres assuraient l’avoir rencontré sur la route de Paris. Qu’en s’en allant il avait été comme à l'ordinaire très doux, et qu'il avait seulement dit à la portière qu'on ne l'attendît pas cette nuit.

Pendant que les deux femmes, le dos tourné au lit de la Fantine, chuchotaient, la sœur questionnant, la servante conjecturant, la Fantine, avec cette vivacité fébrile de certaines maladies organiques qui mêle les mouvements libres de la santé à l'effrayante maigreur de la mort, s'était mise à genoux sur son lit, ses deux poings crispés appuyés sur le traversin, et, la tête passée par l'intervalle des rideaux, elle écoutait. Tout à coup elle cria:

— Vous parlez là de monsieur Madeleine! pourquoi parlez-vous tout bas? Qu'est-ce qu'il fait? Pourquoi ne vient-il pas?

Sa voix était si brusque et si rauque que les deux femmes crurent entendre une voix d'homme; elles se retournèrent effrayées.

— Répondez donc! cria Fantine.

La servante balbutia:

— La portière m'a dit qu'il ne pourrait pas venir aujourd'hui.

— Mon enfant, dit la sœur, tenez-vous tranquille, recouchez-vous.

Fantine, sans changer d'attitude, reprit d'une voix haute et avec un accent tout à la fois impérieux et déchirant:

— Il ne pourra venir? Pourquoi cela? Vous savez la raison. Vous la chuchotiez là entre vous. Je veux la savoir.

La servante se hâta de dire à l'oreille de la religieuse:

— Répondez qu'il est occupé au conseil municipal.

La sœur Simplice rougit légèrement; c'était un mensonge que la servante lui proposait. D'un autre côté il lui semblait bien que dire la vérité à la malade ce serait sans doute lui porter un coup terrible et que cela était grave dans l'état où était Fantine. Cette rougeur dura peu. La sœur leva sur Fantine son œil calme et triste, et dit:

— Monsieur le maire est parti.

Fantine se redressa et s'assit sur ses talons. Ses yeux étincelèrent. Une joie inouïe rayonna sur cette physionomie douloureuse.

— Parti! s'écria-t-elle. Il est allé chercher Cosette!

Puis elle tendit ses deux mains vers le ciel et tout son visage devint ineffable. Ses lèvres remuaient; elle priait à voix basse.

Quand sa prière fut finie:

— Ma sœur, dit-elle, je veux bien me recoucher, je vais faire tout ce qu'on voudra; tout à l'heure j'ai été méchante, je vous demande pardon d’avoir parlé si haut, c’est très mal de parler haut, je le sais bien, ma bonne sœur, mais voyez-vous, je suis très contente. Le bon Dieu est bon, monsieur Madeleine est bon, figurez-vous qu’il est allé chercher ma petite Cosette à Montfermeil.

Elle se recoucha, aida la religieuse à arranger l’oreiller et baisa une petite croix d’argent qu’elle avait au cou et que la sœur Simplice lui avait donnée.

— Mon enfant, dit la sœur, tâchez de reposer maintenant, et ne parlez plus.

Fantine prit dans ses mains moites la main de la sœur, qui souffrait de lui sentir cette sueur.

— Il est parti ce matin pour aller à Paris. Au fait il n’a pas même besoin de passer par Paris. Montfermeil, c’est un peu à gauche en venant. Vous rappelez-vous comme il me disait hier quand je lui parlais de Cosette: bientôt, bientôt? C’est une surprise qu’il veut me faire. Vous savez? il m’avait fait signer une lettre pour la reprendre aux Thénardier. Ils n’auront rien à dire, pas vrai? Ils rendront Cosette. Puisqu’ils sont payés. Les autorités ne souffriraient pas qu’on garde un enfant quand on est payé. Ma sœur, ne me faites pas signe qu’il ne faut pas que je parle. Je suis extrêmement heureuse, je vais très bien, je n’ai plus de mal du tout, je vais revoir Cosette, j’ai même très faim. Il y a près de cinq ans que je ne l’ai vue. Vous ne vous figurez pas, vous, comme cela vous tient, les enfants! Et puis elle sera si gentille, vous verrez! Si vous saviez, elle a de si jolis petits doigts roses! D’abord elle aura de très belles mains. À un an, elle avait des mains ridicules. Ainsi! — Elle doit être grande à présent. Cela vous a sept ans. C’est une demoiselle. Je l’appelle Cosette, mais elle s’appelle Euphrasie. Tenez, ce matin, je regardais de la poussière qui était sur la cheminée et j’avais bien l’idée comme cela que je reverrais bientôt Cosette. Mon Dieu! comme on a tort d’être des années sans voir ses enfants! on devrait bien réfléchir que la vie n’est pas éternelle! Oh! comme il est bon d’être parti, monsieur le maire! C’est vrai ça, qu’il fait bien froid? avait-il son manteau au moins? Il sera ici demain, n’est-ce pas? Ce sera demain fête. Demain matin, ma sœur, vous me ferez penser à mettre mon petit bonnet qui a de la dentelle. Montfermeil, c’est un pays. J’ai fait cette route-là, à pied, dans le temps. Il y a eu bien loin pour moi. Mais les diligences vont très vite! Il sera ici demain avec Cosette. Combien y a-t-il d’ici Montfermeil?

La sœur, qui n’avait aucune idée des distances, répondit:

— Oh! je crois bien qu'il pourra être ici demain.

— Demain! demain! dit Fantine, je verrai Cosette demain! Voyez-vous, bonne sœur du bon Dieu, je ne suis plus malade. Je suis folle. Je danserais, si on voulait.

Quelqu'un qui l'eût vue un quart d'heure auparavant n'y eût rien compris. Elle était maintenant toute rose, elle parlait d'une voix vive et naturelle, toute sa figure n'était qu'un sourire. Par moments elle riait en se parlant tout bas. Joie de mère, c'est presque joie d'enfant.

— Eh bien, reprit la religieuse, vous voilà heureuse, obéissez-moi, ne parlez plus.

Fantine posa sa tête sur l'oreiller et dit à demi-voix:

— Oui, recouche-toi, sois sage puisque tu vas avoir ton enfant. Elle a raison, sœur Simplice. Tous ceux qui sont ici ont raison.

Et puis, sans bouger, sans remuer la tête, elle se mit à regarder partout avec ses yeux tout grands ouverts et un air joyeux, et elle ne dit plus rien.

La sœur referma ses rideaux, espérant qu'elle s'assoupirait.

Entre sept et huit heures le médecin vint. N'entendant aucun bruit, il crut que Fantine dormait, entra doucement et s'approcha du lit sur la pointe du pied. Il entrouvrit les rideaux, et à la lueur de la veilleuse il vit les grands yeux calmes de Fantine qui le regardaient.

Elle lui dit:

— Monsieur, n'est-ce pas, on me laissera la coucher à côté de moi dans un petit lit?

Le médecin crut qu'elle délirait. Elle ajouta:

— Regardez plutôt, il y a juste de la place.

Le médecin prit à part la sœur Simplice qui lui expliqua la chose, que M. Madeleine était absent pour un jour ou deux, et que, dans le doute, on n'avait pas cru devoir détromper la malade qui croyait monsieur le maire parti pour Montfermeil; qu'il était possible en somme qu'elle eût deviné juste. Le médecin approuva.

Il se rapprocha du lit de Fantine, qui reprit:

— C'est que, voyez-vous, le matin, quand elle s'éveillera, je lui dirai bonjour à ce pauvre chat, et la nuit, moi qui ne dors pas, je l'entendrai dormir. Sa petite respiration si douce, cela me fera du bien.

— Donnez-moi votre main, dit le médecin.

Elle tendit son bras, et s'écria en riant.

— Ah! tiens! au fait, c’est vrai, vous ne savez pas c’est que je suis guérie. Cosette arrive demain.

Le médecin fut surpris. Elle était mieux. L’oppression était moindre. Le pouls avait repris de la force. Une sorte de vie survenue tout à coup ranimait ce pauvre être épuisé.

— Monsieur le docteur, reprit-elle, la sœur vous a-t-elle dit que monsieur le maire était allé chercher le chiffon?

Le médecin recommanda le silence et qu’on évitât toute émotion pénible. Il prescrivit une infusion de quinquina pur, et, pour le cas où la fièvre reprendrait dans la nuit, une potion calmante. En s’en allant, il dit à la sœur:

— Cela va mieux. Si le bonheur voulait qu’en effet monsieur le maire arrivât demain avec l’enfant, qui sait? il y a des crises si étonnantes, on a vu de grandes joies arrêter court des maladies; je sais bien que celle-ci est une maladie organique, et bien avancée, mais c’est un tel mystère que tout cela! Nous la sauverions peut-être.

Chapitre VII

Le voyageur arrivé prend ses précautions pour repartir.

Il était près de huit heures du soir quand la carriole que nous avons laissée en route entra sous la porte cochère de l'hôtel de la Poste à Arras. L'homme que nous avons suivi jusqu'à ce moment en descendit, répondit d'un air distrait aux empressements des gens de l'auberge, renvoya le cheval de renfort, et conduisit lui-même le petit cheval blanc à l'écurie; puis il poussa la porte d'une salle de billard qui était au rez-de-chaussée, s'y assit, et s'accouda sur une table. Il avait mis quatorze heures à ce trajet qu'il comptait faire en six. Il se rendait la justice que ce n'était pas sa faute; mais au fond il n'en était pas fâché.

La maîtresse de l'hôtel entra.

— Monsieur couche-t-il? monsieur soupe-t-il?

Il fit un signe de tête négatif.

— Le garçon d'écurie dit que le cheval de monsieur est bien fatigué!

Ici il rompit le silence.

— Est-ce que le cheval ne pourra pas repartir demain matin?

— Oh! monsieur! il lui faut au moins deux jours de repos.

Il demanda:

— N'est-ce pas ici le bureau de poste?

— Oui, monsieur.

L'hôtesse le mena à ce bureau; il montra son passeport et s'informa s'il y avait moyen de revenir cette nuit même à Montreuil-sur-mer par la malle; la place à côté du courrier était justement vacante; il la retint et la paya.

— Monsieur, dit le buraliste, ne manquez pas d'être ici pour partir à une heure précise du matin.

Cela fait, il sortit de l'hôtel et se mit à marcher dans la ville.

Il ne connaissait pas Arras, les rues étaient obscures, et il allait au hasard. Cependant il semblait s'obstiner à ne pas demander son chemin aux passants. Il traversa la petite rivière Crinchon et se trouva dans un dédale de ruelles étroites où il se perdit. Un bourgeois cheminait avec un falot. Après quelque hésitation, il prit le parti de s'adresser à ce bourgeois, non sans avoir d'abord regardé devant et derrière lui, comme s'il craignait que quelqu'un n'entendit la question qu'il allait faire.

— Monsieur, dit-il, le palais de justice, s’il vous plaît?

— Vous n’êtes pas de la ville, monsieur? répondit le bourgeois qui était un assez vieux homme, eh bien, suivez-moi. Je vais précisément du côté du palais de justice, c’est-à-dire du côté de l’hôtel de la préfecture. Car on répare en ce moment le palais, et provisoirement les tribunaux ont leurs audiences à la préfecture.

— Est-ce là, demanda-t-il, qu’on tient les assises?

— Sans doute, monsieur. Voyez-vous, ce qui est la préfecture aujourd’hui était l’évêché avant la révolution. Monsieur de Conzié, qui était évêque en quatre-vingt-deux, y a fait bâtir une grande salle. C’est dans cette grande salle qu’on juge.

Chemin faisant, le bourgeois lui dit:

— Si c’est un procès que monsieur veut voir, il est un peu tard. Ordinairement les séances finissent à six heures.

Cependant, comme ils arrivaient sur la grande place, le bourgeois lui montra quatre longues fenêtres éclairées sur la façade d’un vaste bâtiment ténébreux.

— Ma foi, monsieur, vous arrivez à temps, vous avez du bonheur. Voyez-vous ces quatre fenêtres? c’est la cour d’assises. Il y a de la lumière. Donc ce n’est pas fini. L’affaire aura traîné en longueur et on fait une audience du soir. Vous vous intéressez à cette affaire? Est-ce que c’est un procès criminel? Est-ce que vous êtes témoin?

Il répondit:

— Je ne viens pour aucune affaire, j’ai seulement à parler à un avocat.

— C’est différent, dit le bourgeois. Tenez, monsieur, voici la porte. Où est le factionnaire. Vous n’aurez qu’à monter le grand escalier.

Il se conforma aux indications du bourgeois, et, quelques minutes après, il était dans une salle où il y avait beaucoup de monde et où des groupes mêlés d’avocats en robe chuchotaient çà et là.

C’est toujours une chose qui serre le cœur de voir ces attroupements d’hommes vêtus de noir qui murmurent entre eux à voix basse sur le seuil des chambres de justice. Il est rare que la charité et la pitié sortent de toutes ces paroles. Ce qui en sort le plus souvent, ce sont des condamnations faites d’avance. Tous ces groupes semblent à l’observateur qui passe et qui rêve autant de ruches sombres où des espèces d’esprits bourdonnants construisent en commun toutes sortes d’édifices ténébreux.

Cette salle, spacieuse et éclairée d’une seule lampe, était une ancienne antichambre de l’évêché et servait de salle des pas perdus. Une porte à deux battants, fermée en ce moment, la séparait de la grande chambre où siégeait la cour d’assises.

L’obscurité était telle qu’il ne craignit pas de s’adresser au premier avocat qu’il rencontra.

— Monsieur, dit-il, où en est-on?

— C’est fini, dit l’avocat.

— Fini!

Ce mot fut répété d’un tel accent que l’avocat se retourna.

— Pardon, monsieur, vous êtes peut-être un parent?

— Non. Je ne connais personne ici. Et y a-t-il eu condamnation?

— Sans doute. Cela n’était guère possible autrement.

— Aux travaux forcés?...

— À perpétuité.

Il reprit d’une voix tellement faible qu’on l’entendait à peine:

— L’identité a donc été constatée?

— Quelle identité? répondit l’avocat. Il n’y avait pas d’identité à constater. L’affaire était simple. Cette femme avait tué son enfant, l’infanticide a été prouvé, le jury a écarté la préméditation, on l’a condamnée à vie.

— C’est donc une femme? dit-il.

— Mais sûrement. La fille Limosin. De quoi me parlez-vous donc?

— De rien. Mais puisque c’est fini, comment se fait-il que la salle soit encore éclairée?

— C’est pour l’autre affaire qu’on a commencée il y a à peu près deux heures.

— Quelle autre affaire?

— Oh! celle-là est claire aussi. C’est une espèce de gueux, un récidiviste, un galérien, qui a volé. Je ne sais plus trop son nom. En voilà un qui vous a une mine de bandit. Rien que pour avoir cette figure-là, je l’enverrais aux galères.

— Monsieur, demanda-t-il, y a-t-il moyen de pénétrer dans la salle?

— Je ne crois vraiment pas. Il y a beaucoup de foule. Cependant l’audience est suspendue. Il y a des gens qui sont sortis, et, à la reprise de l’audience, vous pourrez essayer.

— Par où entre-t-on?

— Par cette grande porte.

L’avocat le quitta. En quelques instants, il avait éprouvé, presque en même temps, presque mêlées, toutes les émotions possibles. Les paroles de cet indifférent lui avaient tour à tour traversé le cœur comme des aiguilles de glace et comme des lames de feu. Quand il vit que rien n’était terminé, il respira; mais il n’eût pu dire si ce qu’il ressentait était du contentement ou de la douleur.

Il s’approcha de plusieurs groupes et il écouta ce qu’on disait. Le rôle de la session étant très chargé, le président avait indiqué pour ce même jour deux affaires simples et courtes. On avait commencé par l’infanticide, et maintenant on en était au forçat, au récidiviste, au “cheval de retour”. Cet homme avait volé des pommes, mais cela ne paraissait pas bien prouvé; ce qui était prouvé, c’est qu’il avait été déjà aux galères à Toulon. C’est ce qui faisait son affaire mauvaise. Du reste, l’interrogatoire de l’homme était terminé et les dépositions des témoins; mais il y avait encore les plaidoiries de l’avocat et le réquisitoire du ministère public; cela ne devait guère finir avant minuit. L’homme serait probablement condamné; l’avocat général était très bon — et ne manquait pas ses accusés — c’était un garçon d’esprit qui faisait des vers.

Un huissier se tenait debout près de la porte qui communiquait avec la salle des assises. Il demanda à cet huissier:

— Monsieur, la porte va-t-elle bientôt s’ouvrir?

— Elle ne s’ouvrira pas, dit l’huissier.

— Comment! on ne l’ouvrira pas à la reprise de l’audience? est-ce que l’audience n’est pas suspendue?

— L’audience vient d’être reprise, répondit l’huissier, mais la porte ne se rouvrira pas.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce que la salle est pleine.

— Quoi? il n’y a plus une place?

— Plus une seule. La porte est fermée. Personne ne peut plus entrer.

L’huissier ajouta après un silence:

— Il y a bien encore deux ou trois places derrière monsieur le président, mais monsieur le président n’y admet que les fonctionnaires publics.

Cela dit, l’huissier lui tourna le dos.

Il se retira la tête baissée, traversa l’antichambre et redescendit l’escalier lentement, comme hésitant à chaque marche. Il est probable qu’il tenait conseil avec lui-même. Le violent combat qui se livrait en lui depuis la veille n’était pas fini; et, à chaque instant, il en traversait quelque nouvelle péripétie. Arrivé sur le palier de l’escalier, il s’adossa à la rampe et croisa les bras. Tout à coup il ouvrit sa redingote, prit son portefeuille, en tira un crayon, déchira une feuille, et écrivit rapidement sur cette feuille à la lueur du réverbère cette ligne: — M. Madeleine, maire de Montreuil-sur-mer. Puis il remonta l’escalier à grands pas, fendit la foule, marcha droit à l’huissier, lui remit le papier, et lui dit avec autorité:

— Portez ceci à monsieur le président.

L’huissier prit le papier, y jeta un coup d’œil et obéit.

Chapitre VIII

Entrée de faveur

Sans qu'il s'en doutât, le maire de Montreuil-sur-mer avait une sorte de célébrité. Depuis sept ans que sa réputation de vertu remplissait tout le bas Boulonnais, elle avait fini par franchir les limites d'un petit pays et s'était répandue dans les deux ou trois départements voisins. Outre le service considérable qu'il avait rendu au chef-lieu en y restaurant l'industrie des verroteries noires, il n'était pas une des cent quarante et une communes de l'arrondissement de Montreuil-sur-mer qui ne lui dût quelque bienfait. Il avait su même au besoin aider et féconder les industries des autres arrondissements. C'est ainsi qu'il avait dans l'occasion soutenu de son crédit et de ses fonds la fabrique de tulle de Boulogne, la filature de lin à la mécanique de Frévent et la manufacture hydraulique de toiles de Boubers-sur-Canche. Partout on prononçait avec vénération le nom de M. Madeleine. Arras et Douai enviaient son maire à l'heureuse petite ville de Montreuil-sur-mer.

Le conseiller à la cour royale de Douai, qui présidait cette session des assises à Arras, connaissait comme tout le monde ce nom si profondément et si universellement honoré. Quand l'huissier, ouvrant discrètement la porte qui communiquait de la chambre du conseil à l'audience, se pencha derrière le fauteuil du président et lui remit le papier où était écrite la ligne qu'on vient de lire, en ajoutant: Ce monsieur désire assister à l'audience, le président fit un vif mouvement de déférence, saisit une plume, écrivit quelques mots au bas du papier, et le rendit à l'huissier en lui disant: Faites entrer.

L'homme malheureux dont nous racontons l'histoire était resté près de la porte de la salle à la même place et dans la même attitude où l'huissier l'avait quitté. Il entendit, à travers sa rêverie, quelqu'un qui lui disait: Monsieur veut-il bien me faire l'honneur de me suivre? C'était ce même huissier qui lui avait tourné le dos l'instant d'auparavant et qui maintenant le saluait jusqu'à terre. L'huissier en même temps lui remit le papier. Il le déplia, et, comme il se rencontrait qu'il était près de la lampe, il put lire:

«Le président de la cour d'assises présente son respect à M. Madeleine.»

Il froissa le papier entre ses mains, comme si ces quelques mots eussent eu pour lui un arrière-goût étrange et amer.

Il suivit l'huissier.

Quelques minutes après, il se trouvait seul dans une espèce de cabinet lambrissé, d'un aspect sévère, éclairé par deux bougies posées sur une table à tapis vert. Il avait encore dans l'oreille les dernières paroles de l'huissier qui venait de le quitter — «Monsieur, vous voici dans la chambre du conseil; vous n'avez qu'à tourner le bouton de cuivre de cette porte, et vous vous trouverez dans l'audience derrière le fauteuil de monsieur le président.» — Ces paroles se mêlaient dans sa pensée à un souvenir vague de corridors étroits et d'escaliers noirs qu'il venait de parcourir.

L'huissier l'avait laissé seul. Le moment suprême était arrivé. Il cherchait à se recueillir sans pouvoir y parvenir. C'est surtout aux heures où l'on aurait le plus besoin de les rattacher aux réalités poignantes de la vie que tous les fils de la pensée se rompent dans le cerveau. Il était dans l'endroit même où les juges délibèrent et condamnent. Il regardait avec une tranquillité stupide cette chambre paisible et redoutable où tant d'existences avaient été brisées, où son nom allait retentir tout à l'heure, et que sa destinée traversait en ce moment. Il regardait la muraille, puis il se regardait lui-même, s'étonnant que ce fût cette chambre et que ce fût lui.

Il n'avait pas mangé depuis plus de vingt-quatre heures, il était brisé par les cahots de la carriole, mais il ne le sentait pas; il lui semblait qu'il ne sentait rien.

Il s'approcha d'un cadre noir qui était accroché au mur et qui contenait sous verre une vieille lettre autographe de Jean-Nicolas Pache, maire de Paris et ministre, datée, sans doute par erreur, du 9 juin an II, et dans laquelle Pache envoyait à la commune la liste des ministres et des députés tenus en arrestation chez eux. Un témoin qui l'eût pu voir et qui l'eût observé en cet instant eût sans doute imaginé Fantine et Cosette.

Tout en rêvant, il se retourna, et ses yeux rencontrèrent le bouton de cuivre de la porte qui le séparait de la salle des assises. Il avait presque oublié cette porte. Son regard, d'abord calme, s'y arrêta, resta attaché à ce bouton de cuivre, puis devint effaré et fixe, et s'empreignit peu à peu d'épouvante. Des gouttes de sueur lui sortaient d'entre les cheveux et ruisselaient sur ses tempes.

À un certain moment, il fit avec une sorte d'autorité mêlée de rébellion ce geste indescriptible qui veut dire et qui dit si bien: Pardieu! qui est-ce qui m’y force? Puis il se tourna vivement, vit devant lui la porte par laquelle il était entré, y alla, l’ouvrit, et sortit. Il n’était plus dans cette chambre, il était dehors, dans un corridor, un corridor long, étroit, coupé de degrés et de guichets, faisant toutes sortes d’angles, éclairé çà et là de réverbères pareils à des veilleuses de malades, le corridor par où il était venu. Il respira, il écouta; aucun bruit derrière lui, aucun bruit devant lui; il se mit à fuir comme si on le poursuivait.

Quand il eut doublé plusieurs des coudes de ce couloir, il écouta encore. C’était toujours le même silence et la même ombre autour de lui. Il était essoufflé, il chancelait, il s’appuya au mur. La pierre était froide, sa sueur était glacée sur son front, il se redressa en frissonnant.

Alors, là, seul, debout dans cette obscurité, tremblant de froid et d’autre chose peut-être, il songea.

Il avait songé toute la nuit, il avait songé toute la journée; il n’entendait plus en lui qu’une voix qui disait: hélas!

Un quart d’heure s’écoula ainsi. Enfin, il pencha la tête, soupira avec angoisse, laissa pendre ses bras, et revint sur ses pas. Il marchait lentement et comme accablé. Il semblait que quelqu’un l’eût atteint dans sa fuite et le ramenât.

Il rentra dans la chambre du conseil. La première chose qu’il aperçut, ce fut la gâchette de la porte. Cette gâchette, ronde et en cuivre poli, resplendissait pour lui comme une effroyable étoile. Il la regardait comme une brebis regarderait l’œil d’un tigre.

Ses yeux ne pouvaient s’en détacher.

De temps en temps il faisait un pas et se rapprochait de la porte.

S’il eût écouté, il eût entendu, comme une sorte de murmure confus, le bruit de la salle voisine; mais il n’écoutait pas, et il n’entendait pas.

Tout à coup, sans qu’il sût lui-même comment, il se trouva près de la porte. Il saisit convulsivement le bouton; la porte s’ouvrit.

Il était dans la salle d’audience.

Chapitre IX

Un lieu où des convictions sont en train de se former

Il fit un pas, referma machinalement la porte derrière lui, et resta debout, considérant ce qu'il voyait.

C'était une assez vaste enceinte à peine éclairée, tantôt pleine de rumeur, tantôt pleine de silence, où tout l'appareil d'un procès criminel se développait avec sa gravité mesquine et lugubre au milieu de la foule.

À un bout de la salle, celui où il se trouvait, des juges à l'air distrait, en robe usée, se rongeant les ongles ou fermant les paupières; à l'autre bout, une foule en haillons; des avocats dans toutes sortes d'attitudes; des soldats au visage honnête et dur; de vieilles boiseries tachées, un plafond sale, des tables couvertes d'une serge plutôt jaune que verte, des portes noircies par les mains; à des clous plantés dans le lambris, des quinquets d'estaminet donnant plus de fumée que de clarté; sur les tables, des chandelles dans des chandeliers de cuivre; l'obscurité, la laideur, la tristesse; et de tout cela se dégageait une impression austère et auguste, car on y sentait cette grande chose humaine qu'on appelle la loi et cette grande chose divine qu'on appelle la justice.

Personne dans cette foule ne fit attention à lui. Tous les regards convergeaient vers un point unique, un banc de bois adossé à une petite porte, le long de la muraille, à gauche du président. Sur ce banc, que plusieurs chandelles éclairaient, il y avait un homme entre deux gendarmes.

Cet homme, c'était l'homme.

Il ne le chercha pas, il le vit. Ses yeux allèrent là naturellement, comme s'ils avaient su d'avance où était cette figure.

Il crut se voir lui-même, vieilli, non pas sans doute absolument semblable de visage, mais tout pareil d'attitude et d'aspect, avec ces cheveux hérissés, avec cette prunelle fauve et inquiète, avec cette blouse, tel qu'il était le jour où il entrait à Digne, plein de haine et cachant dans son âme ce hideux trésor de pensées affreuses qu'il avait mis dix-neuf ans à ramasser sur le pavé du bagne.

Il se dit avec un frémissement:

— Mon Dieu! est-ce que je redeviendrai ainsi?

Cet être paraissait au moins soixante ans. Il avait je ne sais quoi de rude, de stupide et d’effarouché.

Au bruit de la porte, on s’était rangé pour lui faire place, le président avait tourné la tête, et comprenant que le personnage qui venait d’entrer était M. le maire de Montreuil-sur-mer, il l’avait salué. L’avocat général, qui avait vu M. Madeleine à Montreuil-sur-mer où des opérations de son ministère l’avaient plus d’une fois appelé, le reconnut, et salua également. Lui s’en aperçut à peine. Il était en proie à une sorte d’hallucination; il regardait.

Des juges, un greffier, des gendarmes, une foule de têtes cruellement curieuses, il avait déjà vu cela une fois, autrefois, il y avait vingt-sept ans. Ces choses funestes, il les retrouvait; elles étaient là, elles remuaient, elles existaient. Ce n’était plus un effort de sa mémoire, un mirage de sa pensée, c’étaient de vrais gendarmes et de vrais juges, une vraie foule et de vrais hommes en chair et en os. C’en était fait, il voyait reparaître et revivre autour de lui, avec tout ce que la réalité a de formidable, les aspects monstrueux de son passé.

Tout cela était béant devant lui.

Il en eut horreur, il ferma les yeux, et s’écria au plus profond de son âme: jamais!

Et par un jeu tragique de la destinée qui faisait trembler toutes ses idées et le rendait presque fou, c’était un autre lui-même qui était là! Cet homme qu’on jugeait, tous l’appelaient Jean Valjean!

Il avait sous les yeux, vision inouïe, une sorte de représentation du moment le plus horrible de sa vie, jouée par son fantôme.

Tout y était, c’était le même appareil, la même heure de nuit, presque les mêmes faces de juges, de soldats et de spectateurs. Seulement, au-dessus de la tête du président, il y avait un crucifix, chose qui manquait aux tribunaux du temps de sa condamnation. Quand on l’avait jugé, Dieu était absent.

Une chaise était derrière lui; il s’y laissa tomber, terrifié de l’idée qu’on pouvait le voir. Quand il fut assis, il profita d’une pile de cartons qui était sur le bureau des juges pour dérober son visage à toute la salle. Il pouvait maintenant voir sans être vu. Peu à peu il se remit. Il rentra pleinement dans le sentiment du réel; il arriva à cette phase de calme où l’on peut écouter.

M. Bamatabois était au nombre des jurés. Il chercha Javert, mais il ne le vit pas. Le banc des témoins lui était caché par la table du greffier. Et puis, nous venons de le dire, la salle était à peine éclairée.

Au moment où il était entré, l’avocat de l’accusé achevait sa plaidoirie. L’attention de tous était excitée au plus haut point; l’affaire durait depuis trois heures. Depuis trois heures, cette foule regardait plier peu à peu sous le poids d’une vraisemblance terrible un homme, un inconnu, une espèce d’être misérable, profondément stupide ou profondément habile. Cet homme, on le sait déjà, était un vagabond qui avait été trouvé dans un champ, emportant une branche chargée de pommes mûres, cassée à un pommier dans un clos voisin, appelé le clos Pierron. Qui était cet homme? Une enquête avait eu lieu; des témoins venaient d’être entendus, ils avaient été unanimes, des lumières avaient jailli de tout le débat. L’accusation disait:

— Nous ne tenons pas seulement un voleur de fruits, un maraudeur; nous tenons là, dans notre main, un bandit, un relaps en rupture de ban, un ancien forçat, un scélérat des plus dangereux, un malfaiteur appelé Jean Valjean que la justice recherche depuis longtemps, et qui, il y a huit ans, en sortant du bagne de Toulon, a commis un vol de grand chemin à main armée sur la personne d’un enfant savoyard appelé Petit-Gervais, crime prévu par l’article 383 du code pénal, pour lequel nous nous réservons de le poursuivre ultérieurement, quand l’identité sera judiciairement acquise. Il vient de commettre un nouveau vol. C’est un cas de récidive. Condamnez-le pour le fait nouveau; il sera jugé plus tard pour le fait ancien.

Devant cette accusation, devant l’unanimité des témoins, l’accusé paraissait surtout étonné. Il faisait des gestes et des signes qui voulaient dire non, ou bien il considérait le plafond. Il parlait avec peine, répondait avec embarras, mais de la tête aux pieds toute sa personne niait. Il était comme un idiot en présence de toutes ces intelligences rangées en bataille autour de lui, et comme un étranger au milieu de cette société qui le saisissait. Cependant il y allait pour lui de l’avenir le plus menaçant, la vraisemblance croissait à chaque minute, et toute cette foule regardait avec plus d’anxiété que lui-même cette sentence pleine de calamités qui penchait sur lui de plus en plus. Une éventualité laissait même entrevoir, outre le bagne, la peine de mort possible, si l’identité était reconnue et si l’affaire Petit-Gervais se terminait plus tard par une condamnation. Qu’était-ce que cet homme? De quelle nature était son apathie? Etait-ce imbécillité ou ruse? Comprenait-il trop, ou ne comprenait-il pas du tout? Questions qui divisaient la foule et semblaient partager le jury. Il y avait dans ce procès ce qui effraye et ce qui intrigue; le drame n’était pas seulement sombre, il était obscur. Le défenseur avait assez bien plaidé, dans cette langue de province qui a longtemps constitué l'éloquence du barreau et dont usaient jadis tous les avocats, aussi bien à Paris qu'à Romorantin ou à Montbrison, et qui aujourd'hui, étant devenue classique, n'est plus guère parlée que par les orateurs officiels du parquet, auxquels elle convient par sa sonorité grave et son allure majestueuse; langue où un mari s'appelle un époux, une femme, une épouse, Paris, le centre des arts et de la civilisation, le roi, le monarque, monseigneur l'évêque, un saint pontife, l'avocat général, l'éloquent interprète de la vindicte, la plaidoirie, les accents qu'on vient d'entendre, le siècle de Louis XIV, le grand siècle, un théâtre, le temple de Melpomène, la famille régnante, l'auguste sang de nos rois, un concert, une solennité musicale, monsieur le général commandant le département, l'illustre guerrier qui, etc., les élèves du séminaire, ces tendres lévites, les erreurs imputées aux journaux, l'imposture qui distille son venin dans les colonnes de ces organes, etc., etc. — L'avocat donc avait commencé par s'expliquer sur le vol des pommes, — chose malaisée en beau style; mais Bénigne Bossuet lui-même a été obligé de faire allusion à une poule en pleine oraison funèbre, et il s'en est tiré avec pompe. L'avocat avait établi que le vol de pommes n'était pas matériellement prouvé. — Son client, qu'en sa qualité de défenseur, il persistait à appeler Champmathieu, n'avait été vu de personne escaladant le mur ou cassant la branche. On l'avait arrêté nanti de cette branche (que l'avocat appelait plus volontiers rameau); mais il disait l'avoir trouvée à terre et ramassée. Où était la preuve du contraire? — Sans doute cette branche avait été cassée et dérobée après escalade, puis jetée là par le maraudeur alarmé; sans doute il y avait un voleur. Mais qu'est-ce qui prouvait que ce voleur était Champmathieu? Une seule chose. Sa qualité d'ancien forçat. L'avocat ne niait pas que cette qualité ne parût malheureusement bien constatée; l'accusé avait résidé à Faverolles; l'accusé y avait été émondeur; le nom de Champmathieu pouvait bien avoir pour origine Jean Mathieu; tout cela était vrai; enfin quatre témoins reconnaissaient sans hésiter et positivement Champmathieu pour être le galérien Jean Valjean; à ces indications, à ces témoignages, l'avocat ne pouvait opposer que la dénégation de son client, dénégation intéressée; mais en supposant qu'il fût le forçat Jean Valjean, cela prouvait-il qu'il fût le voleur des pommes? C'était une présomption, tout au plus; non une preuve. L'accusé, cela était vrai, et le défenseur «dans sa bonne foi» devait en convenir, avait adopté «un mauvais système de défense» — Il s'obstinait à nier tout, le vol et sa qualité de forçat. Un aveu sur ce dernier point eût mieux valu, à coup sûr, et lui eût concilié l’indulgence de ses juges; l’avocat le lui avait conseillé; mais l’accusé s’y était refusé obstinément, croyant sans doute sauver tout en n’avouant rien. C’était un tort; mais ne fallait-il pas considérer la brièveté de cette intelligence? Cet homme était visiblement stupide. Un long malheur au bagne, une longue misère hors du bagne, l’avaient abruti, etc., etc. Il se défendait mal, était-ce une raison pour le condamner? Quant à l’affaire Petit-Gervais, l’avocat n’avait pas à la discuter, elle n’était point dans la cause. L’avocat concluait en suppliant le jury et la cour, si l’identité de Jean Valjean leur paraissait évidente, de lui appliquer les peines de police qui s’adressent au condamné en rupture de ban, et non le châtiment épouvantable qui frappe le forçat récidiviste.

L’avocat général répliqua au défenseur. Il fut violent et fleuri, comme sont habituellement les avocats généraux.

Il félicita le défenseur de sa «loyauté», et profita habilement de cette loyauté. Il atteignit l’accusé par toutes les concessions que l’avocat avait faites. L’avocat semblait accorder que l’accusé était Jean Valjean. Il en prit acte. Cet homme était donc Jean Valjean. Ceci était acquis à l’accusation et ne pouvait plus se contester. Ici, par une habile antonomase, remontant aux sources et aux causes de la criminalité, l’avocat général tonna contre l’immoralité de l’école romantique, alors à son aurore sous le nom d’école satanique que lui avaient décerné les critiques de l’Oriflamme et de la Quotidienne, il attribua, non sans vraisemblance, à l’influence de cette littérature perverse le délit de Champmathieu, ou pour mieux dire, de Jean Valjean. Ces considérations épuisées, il passa à Jean Valjean lui-même. Qu’était-ce que Jean Valjean? Description de Jean Valjean. Un monstre vomi, etc. Le modèle de ces sortes de descriptions est dans le récit de Théramène, lequel n’est pas utile à la tragédie, mais rend tous les jours de grands services à l’éloquence judiciaire. L’auditoire et les jurés «frémirent». La description achevée, l’avocat général reprit, dans un mouvement oratoire fait pour exciter au plus haut point le lendemain matin l’enthousiasme du Journal de la Préfecture:

Et c’est un pareil homme, etc., etc., etc., vagabond, mendiant, sans moyens d’existence, etc., etc., — accoutumé par sa vie passée aux actions coupables et peu corrigé par son séjour au bagne, comme le prouve le crime commis sur Petit-Gervais, etc., etc., — c’est un homme pareil qui, trouvé sur la voie publique en flagrant délit de vol, à quelques pas d’un mur escaladé, tenant encore à la main l’objet volé, nie le flagrant délit, le vol, l’escalade, nie tout, nie jusqu’à son nom, nie jusqu’à son identité! Outre cent autres preuves sur lesquelles nous ne revenons pas, quatre témoins le reconnaissent, Javert, l’intègre inspecteur de police Javert, et trois de ses anciens compagnons d’ignominie, les forçats Brevet, Chenildieu et Cochepaille. Qu’oppose-t-il à cette unanimité foudroyante? Il nie. Quel endurcissement! Vous ferez justice, messieurs les jurés, etc., etc.

Pendant que l’avocat général parlait, l’accusé écoutait, la bouche ouverte, avec une sorte d’étonnement où il entrait bien quelque admiration. Il était évidemment surpris qu’un homme pût parler comme cela. De temps en temps, aux moments les plus «énergiques» du réquisitoire, dans ces instants où l’éloquence, qui ne peut se contenir, déborde dans un flux d’épithètes flétrissantes et enveloppe l’accusé comme un orage, il remuait lentement la tête de droite à gauche et de gauche à droite, sorte de protestation triste et muette dont il se contentait depuis le commencement des débats. Deux ou trois fois les spectateurs placés le plus près de lui l’entendirent dire à demi-voix:

— Voilà ce que c’est, de n’avoir pas demandé à M. Baloup!

L’avocat général fit remarquer au jury cette attitude hébétée, calculée évidemment, qui dénotait, non l’imbécillité, mais l’adresse, la ruse, l’habitude de tromper la justice, et qui mettait dans tout son jour «la profonde perversité» de cet homme. Il termina en faisant ses réserves pour l’affaire Petit-Gervais, et en réclamant une condamnation sévère.

C’était, pour l’instant, on s’en souvient, les travaux forcés à perpétuité.

Le défenseur se leva, commença par complimenter «monsieur l’avocat général» sur son «admirable parole», puis répliqua comme il put, mais il faiblissait; le terrain évidemment se dérobait sous lui.

Chapitre X

Le système de dénégations

L’instant de clore les débats était venu. Le président fit lever l’accusé et lui adressa la question d’usage:

— Avez-vous quelque chose à ajouter à votre défense?

L’homme, debout, roulant dans ses mains un affreux bonnet qu’il avait, sembla ne pas entendre.

Le président répéta la question.

Cette fois l’homme entendit. Il parut comprendre, il fit le mouvement de quelqu’un qui se réveille, promena ses yeux autour de lui, regarda le public, les gendarmes, son avocat, les jurés, la cour, posa son poing monstrueux sur le rebord de la boiserie placée devant son banc, regarda encore, et tout à coup, fixant sont regard sur l’avocat général, il se mit à parler. Ce fut comme une éruption. Il sembla, à la façon dont les paroles s’échappaient de sa bouche, incohérentes, impétueuses, heurtées, pêle-mêle, qu’elles s’y pressaient toutes à la fois pour sortir en même temps. Il dit:

— J’ai à dire ça. Que j’ai été charron à Paris, même que c’était chez monsieur Baloup. C’est un état dur. Dans la chose de charron, on travaille toujours en plein air, dans des cours, sous des hangars chez les bons maîtres, jamais dans des ateliers fermés, parce qu’il faut des espaces, voyez-vous. L’hiver, on a si froid qu’on se bat les bras pour se réchauffer; mais les maîtres ne veulent pas, ils disent que cela perd du temps. Manier du fer quand il y a de la glace entre les pavés, c’est rude. Ça vous use vite un homme. On est vieux tout jeune dans cet état-là. À quarante ans, un homme est fini. Moi, j’en avais cinquante-trois, j’avais bien du mal. Et puis c’est si méchant les ouvriers! Quand un bonhomme n’est plus jeune, on vous l’appelle pour tout vieux serin, vieille bête! Je ne gagnais plus que trente sous par jour, on me payait le moins cher qu’on pouvait, les maîtres profitaient de mon âge. Avec ça, j’avais ma fille qui était blanchisseuse à la rivière. Elle gagnait un peu de son côté. À nous deux, cela allait. Elle avait de la peine aussi. Toute la journée dans un baquet jusqu’à mi-corps, à la pluie, à la neige, avec le vent qui vous coupe la figure; quand il gèle, c’est tout de même, il faut laver; il y a des personnes qui n’ont pas beaucoup de linge et qui attendent après; si on ne lavait pas, on perdrait des pratiques.

Les planches sont mal jointes et il vous tombe des gouttes d'eau partout. On a ses jupes toutes mouillées, dessus et dessous. Ça pénètre. Elle a aussi travaillé au lavoir des Enfants-Rouges, où l'eau arrive par des robinets. On n'est pas dans le baquet. On lave devant soi au robinet et on rince derrière soi dans le bassin. Comme c'est fermé, on a moins froid au corps. Mais il y a une buée d'eau chaude qui est terrible et qui vous perd les yeux. Elle revenait à sept heures du soir, et se couchait bien vite; elle était si fatiguée. Son mari la battait. Elle est morte. Nous n'avons pas été bien heureux. C'était une brave fille qui n'allait pas au bal, qui était bien tranquille. Je me rappelle un mardi gras où elle était couchée à huit heures. Voilà. Je dis vrai. Vous n'avez qu'à demander. Ah, bien oui, demander! que je suis bête! Paris, c'est un gouffre. Qui est-ce qui connaît le père Champmathieu? Pourtant je vous dis monsieur Baloup. Voyez chez monsieur Baloup. Après ça, je ne sais pas ce qu'on me veut.

L'homme se tut, et resta debout. Il avait dit ces choses d'une voix haute, rapide, rauque, dure et enrouée, avec une sorte de naïveté irritée et sauvage. Une fois il s'était interrompu pour saluer quelqu'un dans la foule. Les espèces d'affirmations qu'il semblait jeter au hasard devant lui, lui venaient comme des hoquets, et il ajoutait à chacune d'elles le geste d'un bûcheron qui fend du bois. Quand il eut fini, l'auditoire éclata de rire. Il regarda le public, et voyant qu'on riait, et ne comprenant pas, il se mit à rire lui-même.

Cela était sinistre.

Le président, homme attentif et bienveillant, éleva la voix.

Il rappela à «messieurs les jurés» que «le sieur Baloup, l'ancien maître charron chez lequel l'accusé disait avoir servi, avait été inutilement cité. Il était en faillite, et n'avait pu être retrouvé.» Puis se tournant vers l'accusé, il l'engagea à écouter ce qu'il allait lui dire et ajouta:

— Vous êtes dans une situation où il faut réfléchir. Les présomptions les plus graves pèsent sur vous et peuvent entraîner des conséquences capitales. Accusé, dans votre intérêt, je vous interpelle une dernière fois, expliquez-vous clairement sur ces deux faits: — Premièrement, avez-vous, oui ou non, franchi le mur du clos Pierron, cassé la branche et volé les pommes, c'est-à-dire commis le crime de vol avec escalade? Deuxièmement, oui ou non, êtes-vous le forçat libéré Jean Valjean?

L'accusé secoua la tête d'un air capable, comme un homme qui a bien compris et qui sait ce qu'il va répondre. Il ouvrit la bouche, se tourna vers le président et dit:

— D’abord....

Puis il regarda son bonnet, il regarda le plafond, et se tut.

— Accusé, reprit l’avocat général d’une voix sévère, faites attention. Vous ne répondez à rien de ce qu’on vous demande. Votre trouble vous condamne. Il est évident que vous ne vous appelez pas Champmathieu, que vous êtes le forçat Jean Valjean caché d’abord sous le nom de Jean Mathieu qui était le nom de sa mère, que vous êtes allé en Auvergne, que vous êtes né à Faverolles où vous avez été émondeur. Il est évident que vous avez volé avec escalade des pommes mûres dans le clos Pierron. Messieurs les jurés apprécieront.

L’accusé avait fini par se rasseoir; il se leva brusquement quand l’avocat général eut fini, et s’écria:

— Vous êtes très méchant, vous! Voilà ce que je voulais dire. Je ne trouvais pas d’abord. Je n’ai rien volé. Je suis un homme qui ne mange pas tous les jours. Je venais d’Ailly, je marchais dans le pays après une ondée qui avait fait la campagne toute jaune, même que les mares débordaient et qu’il ne sortait plus des sables que de petits brins d’herbe au bord de la route, j’ai trouvé une branche cassée par terre où il y avait des pommes, j’ai ramassé la branche sans savoir qu’elle me ferait arriver de la peine. Il y a trois mois que je suis en prison et qu’on me trimballe. Après ça, je ne peux pas dire, on parle contre moi, on me dit: répondez! le gendarme, qui est bon enfant, me pousse le coude et me dit tout bas: réponds donc. Je ne sais pas expliquer, moi, je n’ai pas fait les études, je suis un pauvre homme. Voilà ce qu’on a tort de ne pas voir. Je n’ai pas volé, j’ai ramassé par terre des choses qu’il y avait. Vous dites Jean Valjean, Jean Mathieu! Je ne connais pas ces personnes-là. C’est des villageois. J’ai travaillé chez monsieur Baloup, boulevard de l’Hôpital. Je m’appelle Champmathieu. Vous êtes bien malins de me dire où je suis né. Moi, je l’ignore. Tout le monde n’a pas des maisons pour y venir au monde. Ce serait trop commode. Je crois que mon père et ma mère étaient des gens qui allaient sur les routes. Je ne sais pas d’ailleurs. Quand j’étais enfant, on m’appelait Petit, maintenant, on m’appelle Vieux. Voilà mes noms de baptême. Prenez ça comme vous voudrez. J’ai été en Auvergne, j’ai été à Faverolles, pardi! Eh bien? est-ce qu’on ne peut pas avoir été en Auvergne et avoir été à Faverolles sans avoir été aux galères? Je vous dis que je n’ai pas volé, et que je suis le père Champmathieu. J’ai été chez monsieur Baloup, j’ai été domicilié. Vous m’ennuyez avec vos bêtises à la fin! Pourquoi donc est-ce que le monde est après moi comme des acharnés!

L’avocat général était demeuré debout; il s’adressa au président:

— Monsieur le président, en présence des dénégations confuses, mais fort habiles de l’accusé, qui voudrait bien se faire passer pour idiot, mais qui n’y parviendra pas — nous l’en prévenons — nous requérons qu’il vous plaise et qu’il plaise à la cour appeler de nouveau dans cette enceinte les condamnés Brevet, Cochepaille et Chenildieu et l’inspecteur de police Javert, et les interpeller une dernière fois sur l’identité de l’accusé avec le forçat Jean Valjean.

— Je fais remarquer à monsieur l’avocat général, dit le président, que l’inspecteur de police Javert, rappelé par ses fonctions au chef-lieu d’un arrondissement voisin, a quitté l’audience et même la ville, aussitôt sa déposition faite. Nous lui en avons accordé l’autorisation, avec l’agrément de monsieur l’avocat général et du défenseur de l’accusé.

— C’est juste, monsieur le président, reprit l’avocat général. En l’absence du sieur Javert, je crois devoir rappeler à messieurs les jurés ce qu’il a dit ici-même, il y a peu d’heures. Javert est un homme estimé qui honore par sa rigoureuse et stricte probité des fonctions inférieures, mais importantes. Voici en quels termes il a déposé: — «Je n’ai pas même besoin des présomptions morales et des preuves matérielles qui démentent les dénégations de l’accusé. Je le reconnais parfaitement. Cet homme ne s’appelle pas Champmathieu; c’est un ancien forçat très méchant et très redouté nommé Jean Valjean. On ne l’a libéré à l’expiration de sa peine qu’avec un extrême regret. Il a subi dix-neuf ans de travaux forcés pour vol qualifié. Il avait cinq ou six fois tenté de s’évader. Outre le vol Petit-Gervais et le vol Pierron, je le soupçonne encore d’un vol commis chez sa grandeur le défunt évêque de Digne. Je l’ai souvent vu, à l’époque où j’étais adjudant garde-chiourme au bagne de Toulon. Je répète que je le reconnais parfaitement.» Cette déclaration si précise parut produire une vive impression sur le public et le jury. L’avocat général termina en insistant pour qu’à défaut de Javert, les trois témoins Brevet, Chenildieu et Cochepaille fussent entendus de nouveau et interpellés solennellement.

Le président transmit un ordre à un huissier, et un moment après la porte de la chambre des témoins s’ouvrit. L’huissier, accompagné d’un gendarme prêt à lui prêter main-forte, introduisit le condamné Brevet. L’auditoire était en suspens et toutes les poitrines palpitaient comme si elles n'eussent eu qu'une seule âme.

L'ancien forçat Brevet portait la veste noire et grise des maisons centrales. Brevet était un personnage d'une soixantaine d'années qui avait une espèce de figure d'homme d'affaires et l'air d'un coquin. Cela va quelquefois ensemble. Il était devenu, dans la prison où de nouveaux méfaits l'avaient ramené, quelque chose comme guichetier. C'était un homme dont les chefs disaient: Il cherche à se rendre utile. Les aumôniers portaient bon témoignage de ses habitudes religieuses. Il ne faut pas oublier que ceci se passait sous la restauration.

— Brevet, dit le président, vous avez subi une condamnation infamante et vous ne pouvez prêter serment....

Brevet baissa les yeux.

— Cependant, reprit le président, même dans l'homme que la loi a dégradé, il peut rester, quand la pitié divine le permet, un sentiment d'honneur et d'équité. C'est à ce sentiment que je fais appel à cette heure décisive. S'il existe encore en vous, et je l'espère, réfléchissez avant de me répondre, considérez d'une part cet homme qu'un mot de vous peut perdre, d'autre part la justice qu'un mot de vous peut éclairer. L'instant est solennel, et il est toujours temps de vous rétracter, si vous croyez vous être trompé. — Accusé, levez-vous.

— Brevet, regardez bien l'accusé, recueillez vos souvenirs, et dites-nous, en votre âme et conscience, si vous persistez à reconnaître cet homme pour votre ancien camarade de bagne Jean Valjean.

Brevet regarda l'accusé, puis se retourna vers la cour.

— Oui, monsieur le président. C'est moi qui l'ai reconnu le premier et je persiste. Cet homme est Jean Valjean. Entré à Toulon en 1796 et sorti en 1815. Je suis sorti l'an d'après. Il a l'air d'une brute maintenant, alors ce serait que l'âge l'a abruti; au bagne il était sournois. Je le reconnais positivement.

— Allez vous asseoir, dit le président. Accusé, restez debout.

On introduisit Chenildieu, forçat à vie, comme l'indiquaient sa casaque rouge et son bonnet vert. Il subissait sa peine au bagne de Toulon, d'où on l'avait extrait pour cette affaire. C'était un petit homme d'environ cinquante ans, vif, ridé, chétif, jaune, effronté, fiévreux, qui avait dans tous ses membres et dans toute sa personne une sorte de faiblesse maladive et dans le regard une force immense. Ses compagnons du bagne l’avaient surnommé Je-nie-Dieu.

Le président lui adressa à peu près les mêmes paroles qu’à Brevet. Au moment où il lui rappela que son infamie lui ôtait le droit de prêter serment, Chenildieu leva la tête et regarda la foule en face. Le président l’invita à se recueillir et lui demanda, comme à Brevet, s’il persistait à reconnaître l’accusé.

Chenildieu éclata de rire.

— Pardine! si je le reconnais! nous avons été cinq ans attachés à la même chaîne. Tu boudes donc, mon vieux?

— Allez vous asseoir, dit le président.

L’huissier amena Cochepaille. Cet autre condamné à perpétuité, venu du bagne et vêtu de rouge comme Chenildieu, était un paysan de Lourdes et un demi-ours des Pyrénées. Il avait gardé des troupeaux dans la montagne, et de pâtre il avait glissé brigand. Cochepaille n’était pas moins sauvage et paraissait plus stupide encore que l’accusé. C’était un de ces malheureux hommes que la nature a ébauchés en bêtes fauves et que la société termine en galériens.

Le président essaya de le remuer par quelques paroles pathétiques et graves et lui demanda, comme aux deux autres, s’il persistait, sans hésitation et sans trouble, à reconnaître l’homme debout devant lui.

— C’est Jean Valjean, dit Cochepaille. Même qu’on l’appelait Jean-le-Cric, tant il était fort.

Chacune des affirmations de ces trois hommes, évidemment sincères et de bonne foi, avait soulevé dans l’auditoire un murmure de fâcheux augure pour l’accusé, murmure qui croissait et se prolongeait plus longtemps chaque fois qu’une déclaration nouvelle venait s’ajouter à la précédente. L’accusé, lui, les avait écoutées avec ce visage étonné qui, selon l’accusation, était son principal moyen de défense. À la première, les gendarmes ses voisins l’avaient entendu grommeler entre ses dents: Ah bien! en voilà un! Après la seconde il dit un peu plus haut, d’un air presque satisfait: Bon! À la troisième il s’écria: Fameux!

Le président l’interpella.

— Accusé, vous avez entendu. Qu’avez-vous à dire?

Il répondit:

— Je dis — Fameux!

Une rumeur éclata dans le public et gagna presque le jury. Il était évident que l’homme était perdu.

— Huissiers, dit le président, faites faire silence. Je vais clore les débats.

En ce moment un mouvement se fit tout à côté du président. On entendit une voix qui criait:

— Brevet, Chenildieu, Cochepaille! regardez de ce côté-ci.

Tous ceux qui entendirent cette voix se sentirent glacés, tant elle était lamentable et terrible. Les yeux se tournèrent vers le point d’où elle venait. Un homme, placé parmi les spectateurs privilégiés qui étaient assis derrière la cour, venait de se lever, avait poussé la porte à hauteur d’appui qui séparait le tribunal du prétoire, et était debout au milieu de la salle. Le président, l’avocat général, M. Bamatabois, vingt personnes, le reconnurent, et s’écrièrent à la fois:

— Monsieur Madeleine!

Chapitre XI

Champmathieu de plus en plus étonné

C’était lui en effet. La lampe du greffier éclairait son visage. Il tenait son chapeau à la main, il n’y avait aucun désordre dans ses vêtements, sa redingote était boutonnée avec soin. Il était très pâle et il tremblait légèrement. Ses cheveux, gris encore au moment de son arrivée à Arras, étaient maintenant tout à fait blancs. Ils avaient blanchi depuis une heure qu’il était là.

Toutes les têtes se dressèrent. La sensation fut indescriptible. Il y eut dans l’auditoire un instant d’hésitation. La voix avait été si poignante, l’homme qui était là paraissait si calme, qu’au premier abord on ne comprit pas. On se demanda qui avait crié. On ne pouvait croire que ce fût cet homme tranquille qui eût jeté ce cri effrayant.

Cette indécision ne dura que quelques secondes. Avant même que le président et l’avocat général eussent pu dire un mot, avant que les gendarmes et les huissiers eussent pu faire un geste, l’homme que tous appelaient encore en ce moment M. Madeleine s’était avancé vers les témoins Cochepaille, Brevet et Chenildieu.

— Vous ne me reconnaissez pas? dit-il.

Tous trois demeurèrent interdits et indiquèrent par un signe de tête qu’ils ne le connaissaient point. Cochepaille intimidé fit le salut militaire. M. Madeleine se tourna vers les jurés et vers la cour et dit d’une voix douce:

— Messieurs les jurés, faites relâcher l’accusé. Monsieur le président, faites-moi arrêter. L’homme que vous cherchez, ce n’est pas lui, c’est moi. Je suis Jean Valjean. Pas une bouche ne respirait. À la première commotion de l’étonnement avait succédé un silence de sépulcre. On sentait dans la salle cette espèce de terreur religieuse qui saisit la foule lorsque quelque chose de grand s’accomplit.

Cependant le visage du président s’était empreint de sympathie et de tristesse; il avait échangé un signe rapide avec l’avocat et quelques paroles à voix basse avec les conseillers assesseurs. Il s’adressa au public, et demanda avec un accent qui fut compris de tous:

— Y a-t-il un médecin ici?

L’avocat général prit la parole:

— Messieurs les jurés, l’incident si étrange et si inattendu qui trouble l’audience ne nous inspire, ainsi qu’à vous, qu’un sentiment que nous n’avons pas besoin d’exprimer. Vous connaissez tous, au moins de réputation, l’honorable M. Madeleine, maire de Montreuil-sur-mer. S’il y a un médecin dans l’auditoire, nous nous joignons à monsieur le président pour le prier de vouloir bien assister monsieur Madeleine et le reconduire à sa demeure.

M. Madeleine ne laissa point achever l’avocat général.

Il l’interrompit d’un accent plein de mansuétude et d’autorité. Voici les paroles qu’il prononça; les voici littéralement, telles qu’elles furent écrites immédiatement après l’audience par un des témoins de cette scène; telles qu’elles sont encore dans l’oreille de ceux qui les ont entendues, il y a près de quarante ans aujourd’hui.

— Je vous remercie, monsieur l’avocat général, mais je ne suis pas fou. Vous allez voir. Vous étiez sur le point de commettre une grande erreur, lâchez cet homme, j’accomplis un devoir, je suis ce malheureux condamné. Je suis le seul qui voie clair ici, et je vous dis la vérité. Ce que je fais en ce moment, Dieu, qui est là-haut, le regarde, et cela suffit. Vous pouvez me prendre, puisque me voilà. J’avais pourtant fait de mon mieux. Je me suis caché sous un nom; je suis devenu riche, je suis devenu maire; j’ai voulu rentrer parmi les honnêtes gens. Il paraît que cela ne se peut pas. Enfin, il y a bien des choses que je ne puis pas dire, je ne vais pas vous raconter ma vie, un jour on saura. J’ai volé monseigneur l’évêque, cela est vrai; j’ai volé Petit-Gervais, cela est vrai. On a eu raison de vous dire que Jean Valjean était un malheureux très méchant. Toute la faute n’est peut-être pas à lui. Écoutez, messieurs les juges, un homme aussi abaissé que moi n’a pas de remontrance à faire à la providence ni de conseil à donner à la société; mais, voyez-vous, l’infamie d’où j’avais essayé de sortir est une chose nuisible. Les galères font le galérien. Recueillez cela, si vous voulez.

Avant le bagne, j’étais un pauvre paysan très peu intelligent, une espèce d’idiot; le bagne m’a changé. J’étais stupide, je suis devenu méchant; j’étais bûche, je suis devenu tison. Plus tard l’indulgence et la bonté m’ont sauvé, comme la sévérité m’avait perdu. Mais, pardon, vous ne pouvez pas comprendre ce que je dis là. Vous trouverez chez moi, dans les cendres de la cheminée, la pièce de quarante sous que j’ai volée il y a sept ans à Petit-Gervais. Je n’ai plus rien à ajouter. Prenez-moi. Mon Dieu! monsieur l’avocat général remue la tête, vous dites: M. Madeleine est devenu fou, vous ne me croyez pas! Voilà qui est affligeant. N'allez point condamner cet homme au moins! Quoi! ceux-ci ne me reconnaissent pas! Je voudrais que Javert fût ici. Il me reconnaîtrait, lui!

Rien ne pourrait rendre ce qu'il y avait de mélancolie bienveillante et sombre dans l'accent qui accompagnait ces paroles.

Il se tourna vers les trois forçats:

— Eh bien, je vous reconnais, moi! Brevet! vous rappelez-vous?...

Il s'interrompit, hésita un moment, et dit:

— Te rappelles-tu ces bretelles en tricot à damier que tu avais au bagne?

Brevet eut comme une secousse de surprise et le regarda de la tête aux pieds d'un air effrayé. Lui continua:

— Chenildieu, qui te surnommais toi-même Je-nie-Dieu, tu as toute l'épaule droite brûlée profondément, parce que tu t'es couché un jour l'épaule sur un réchaud plein de braise, pour effacer les trois lettres T. F. P., qu'on y voit toujours cependant. Réponds, est-ce vrai?

— C'est vrai, dit Chenildieu.

Il s'adressa à Cochepaille:

— Cochepaille, tu as près de la saignée du bras gauche une date gravée en lettres bleues avec de la poudre brûlée. Cette date, c'est celle du débarquement de l'empereur à Cannes, 1er mars 1815. Relève ta manche.

Cochepaille releva sa manche, tous les regards se penchèrent autour de lui sur son bras nu. Un gendarme approcha une lampe; la date y était.

Le malheureux homme se tourna vers l'auditoire et vers les juges avec un sourire dont ceux qui l'ont vu sont encore navrés lorsqu'ils y songent. C'était le sourire du triomphe, c'était aussi le sourire du désespoir.

— Vous voyez bien, dit-il, que je suis Jean Valjean.

Il n'y avait plus dans cette enceinte ni juges, ni accusateurs, ni gendarmes; il n'y avait que des yeux fixes et des cœurs émus. Personne ne se rappelait plus le rôle que chacun pouvait avoir à jouer; l'avocat général oubliait qu'il était là pour requérir, le président qu'il était là pour présider, le défenseur qu'il était là pour défendre. Chose frappante, aucune question ne fut faite, aucune autorité n'intervint. Le propre des spectacles sublimes, c'est de prendre toutes les âmes et de faire de tous les témoins des spectateurs. Aucun peut-être ne se rendait compte de ce qu'il éprouvait; aucun, sans doute, ne se disait qu'il voyait resplendir là une grande lumière; tous intérieurement se sentaient éblouis.

Il était évident qu’on avait sous les yeux Jean Valjean. Cela rayonnait. L’apparition de cet homme avait suffi pour remplir de clarté cette aventure si obscure le moment d’auparavant. Sans qu’il fût besoin d’aucune explication désormais, toute cette foule, comme par une sorte de révélation électrique, comprit tout de suite et d’un seul coup d’œil cette simple et magnifique histoire d’un homme qui se livrait pour qu’un autre homme ne fût pas condamné à sa place. Les détails, les hésitations, les petites résistances possibles se perdirent dans ce vaste fait lumineux.

Impression qui passa vite, mais qui dans l’instant fut irrésistible.

— Je ne veux pas déranger davantage l’audience, reprit Jean Valjean. Je m’en vais, puisqu’on ne m’arrête pas. J’ai plusieurs choses à faire. Monsieur l’avocat général sait qui je suis, il sait où je vais, il me fera arrêter quand il voudra.

Il se dirigea vers la porte de sortie. Pas une voix ne s’éleva, pas un bras ne s’étendit pour l’empêcher. Tous s’écartèrent. Il avait en ce moment ce je ne sais quoi de divin qui fait que les multitudes reculent et se rangent devant un homme. Il traversa la foule à pas lents. On n’a jamais su qui ouvrit la porte, mais il est certain que la porte se trouva ouverte lorsqu’il y parvint. Arrivé là, il se retourna et dit:

— Monsieur l’avocat général, je reste à votre disposition.

Puis il s’adressa à l’auditoire:

— Vous tous, tous ceux qui sont ici, vous me trouvez digne de pitié, n’est-ce pas? Mon Dieu! quand je pense à ce que j’ai été sur le point de faire, je me trouve digne d’envie. Cependant j’aurais mieux aimé que tout ceci n’arrivât pas.

Il sortit, et la porte se referma comme elle avait été ouverte, car ceux qui font de certaines choses souveraines sont toujours sûrs d’être servis par quelqu’un dans la foule.

Moins d’une heure après, le verdict du jury déchargeait de toute accusation le nommé Champmathieu; et Champmathieu, mis en liberté immédiatement, s’en allait stupéfait, croyant tous les hommes fous et ne comprenant rien à cette vision.

Livre huitième — Contre-coup

Chapitre I

Dans quel miroir M. Madeleine regarde ses cheveux

Le jour commençait à poindre. Fantine avait eu une nuit de fièvre et d’insomnie, pleine d’ailleurs d’images heureuses; au matin, elle s’endormit. La sœur Simplice qui l’avait veillée profita de ce sommeil pour aller préparer une nouvelle potion de quinquina. La digne sœur était depuis quelques instants dans le laboratoire de l’infirmerie, penchée sur ses drogues et sur ses fioles et regardant de très près à cause de cette brume que le crépuscule répand sur les objets. Tout à coup elle tourna la tête et fit un léger cri. M. Madeleine était devant elle. Il venait d’entrer silencieusement.

— C’est vous, monsieur le maire! s’écria-t-elle.

Il répondit, à voix basse:

— Comment va cette pauvre femme?

— Pas mal en ce moment. Mais nous avons été bien inquiets, allez!

Elle lui expliqua ce qui s’était passé, que Fantine était bien mal la veille et que maintenant elle était mieux, parce qu’elle croyait que monsieur le maire était allé chercher son enfant à Montfermeil. La sœur n’osa pas interroger monsieur le maire, mais elle vit bien à son air que ce n’était point de là qu’il venait.

— Tout cela est bien, dit-il, vous avez eu raison de ne pas la détromper.

— Oui, reprit la sœur, mais maintenant, monsieur le maire, qu’elle va vous voir et qu’elle ne verra pas son enfant, que lui dirons-nous?

Il resta un moment rêveur.

— Dieu nous inspirera, dit-il.

— On ne pourrait cependant pas mentir, murmura la sœur à demi-voix.

Le plein jour s’était fait dans la chambre. Il éclairait en face le visage de M. Madeleine. Le hasard fit que la sœur leva les yeux.

— Mon Dieu, monsieur! s’écria-t-elle, que vous est-il donc arrivé? vos cheveux sont tout blancs!

— Blancs! dit-il.

La sœur Simplice n’avait point de miroir; elle fouilla dans une trousse et en tira une petite glace dont se servait le médecin de l’infirmerie pour constater qu’un malade était mort et ne respirait plus. M. Madeleine prit la glace, y considéra ses cheveux, et dit:

— Tiens!

Il prononça ce mot avec indifférence et comme s’il pensait à autre chose.

La sœur se sentit glacée par je ne sais quoi d’inconnu qu’elle entrevoyait dans tout ceci.

Il demanda:

— Puis-je la voir?

— Est-ce que monsieur le maire ne lui fera pas revenir son enfant? dit la sœur, osant à peine hasarder une question.

— Sans doute, mais il faut au moins deux ou trois jours.

— Si elle ne voyait pas monsieur le maire d’ici là, reprit timidement la sœur, elle ne saurait pas que monsieur le maire est de retour, il serait aisé de lui faire prendre patience, et quand l’enfant arriverait elle penserait tout naturellement que monsieur le maire est arrivé avec l’enfant. On n’aurait pas de mensonge à faire.

M. Madeleine parut réfléchir quelques instants, puis il dit avec sa gravité calme:

— Non, ma sœur, il faut que je la voie. Je suis peut-être pressé.

La religieuse ne sembla pas remarquer ce mot «peut-être», qui donnait un sens obscur et singulier aux paroles de M. le maire. Elle répondit en baissant les yeux et la voix respectueusement:

— En ce cas, elle repose, mais monsieur le maire peut entrer.

Il fit quelques observations sur une porte qui fermait mal, et dont le bruit pouvait réveiller la malade, puis il entra dans la chambre de Fantine, s’approcha du lit et entrouvrit les rideaux. Elle dormait. Son souffle sortait de sa poitrine avec ce bruit tragique qui est propre à ces maladies, et qui navre les pauvres mères lorsqu’elles veillent la nuit près de leur enfant condamné et endormi. Mais cette respiration pénible troublait à peine une sorte de sérénité ineffable, répandue sur son visage, qui la transfigurait dans son sommeil. Sa pâleur était devenue de la blancheur; ses joues étaient vermeilles. Ses longs cils blonds, la seule beauté qui lui fût restée de sa virginité et de sa jeunesse, palpitaient tout en demeurant clos et baissés. Toute sa personne tremblait de je ne sais quel déploiement d’ailes prêtes à s’entrouvrir et à l’emporter, qu’on sentait frémir, mais qu’on ne voyait pas. À la voir ainsi, on n’eût jamais pu croire que c’était là une malade presque désespérée. Elle ressemblait plutôt à ce qui va s’envoler qu’à ce qui va mourir.

La branche, lorsqu’une main s’approche pour détacher la fleur, frissonne, et semble à la fois se dérober et s’offrir. Le corps humain a quelque chose de ce tressaillement, quand arrive l’instant où les doigts mystérieux de la mort vont cueillir l’âme.

M. Madeleine resta quelque temps immobile près de ce lit, regardant tour à tour la malade et le crucifix, comme il faisait deux mois auparavant, le jour où il était venu pour la première fois la voir dans cet asile. Ils étaient encore là tous les deux dans la même attitude, elle dormant, lui priant; seulement maintenant, depuis ces deux mois écoulés, elle avait des cheveux gris et lui des cheveux blancs.

La sœur n’était pas entrée avec lui. Il se tenait près de ce lit, debout, le doigt sur la bouche, comme s’il y eût eu dans la chambre quelqu’un à faire taire.

Elle ouvrit les yeux, le vit, et dit paisiblement, avec un sourire:

— Et Cosette?

Chapitre II

Fantine heureuse

Elle n’eut pas un mouvement de surprise, ni un mouvement de joie; elle était la joie même. Cette simple question: «Et Cosette?» fut faite avec une foi si profonde, avec tant de certitude, avec une absence si complète d’inquiétude et de doute, qu’il ne trouva pas une parole. Elle continua:

— Je savais que vous étiez là. Je dormais, mais je vous voyais. Il y a longtemps que je vous vois. Je vous ai suivi des yeux toute la nuit. Vous étiez dans une gloire et vous aviez autour de vous toutes sortes de figures célestes.

Il leva son regard vers le crucifix.

— Mais, reprit-elle, dites-moi donc où est Cosette? Pourquoi ne l’avoir pas mise sur mon lit pour le moment où je m’éveillerais?

Il répondit machinalement quelque chose qu’il n’a jamais pu se rappeler plus tard.

Heureusement le médecin, averti, était survenu. Il vint en aide à M. Madeleine.

— Mon enfant, dit le médecin, calmez-vous. Votre enfant est là.

Les yeux de Fantine s’illuminèrent et couvrirent de clarté tout son visage. Elle joignit les mains avec une expression qui contenait tout ce que la prière peut avoir à la fois de plus violent et de plus doux.

— Oh! s’écria-t-elle, apportez-la-moi!

Touchante illusion de mère! Cosette était toujours pour elle le petit enfant qu’on apporte.

— Pas encore, reprit le médecin, pas en ce moment. Vous avez un reste de fièvre. La vue de votre enfant vous agiterait et vous ferait du mal. Il faut d’abord vous guérir. Elle l’interrompit impétueusement.

— Mais je suis guérie! je vous dis que je suis guérie! Est-il âne, ce médecin! Ah çà! je veux voir mon enfant, moi!

— Vous voyez, dit le médecin, comme vous vous emportez. Tant que vous serez ainsi, je m’opposerai à ce que vous ayez votre enfant. Il ne suffit pas de la voir, il faut vivre pour elle. Quand vous serez raisonnable, je vous l’amènerai moi-même.

La pauvre mère courba la tête.

— Monsieur le médecin, je vous demande pardon, je vous demande vraiment bien pardon. Autrefois, je n'aurais pas parlé comme je viens de faire, il m'est arrivé tant de malheurs que quelquefois je ne sais plus ce que je dis. Je comprends, vous craignez l'émotion, j'attendrai tant que vous voudrez, mais je vous jure que cela ne m'aurait pas fait de mal de voir ma fille. Je la vois, je ne la quitte pas des yeux depuis hier au soir. Savez-vous? on me l'apporterait maintenant que je me mettrais à lui parler doucement. Voilà tout. Est-ce que ce n'est pas bien naturel que j'aie envie de voir mon enfant qu'on a été me chercher exprès à Montfermeil? Je ne suis pas en colère. Je sais bien que je vais être heureuse. Toute la nuit j'ai vu des choses blanches et des personnes qui me souriaient. Quand monsieur le médecin voudra, il m'apportera ma Cosette. Je n'ai plus de fièvre, puisque je suis guérie; je sens bien que je n'ai plus rien du tout; mais je vais faire comme si j'étais malade et ne pas bouger pour faire plaisir aux dames d'ici. Quand on verra que je suis bien tranquille, on dira: il faut lui donner son enfant.

M. Madeleine s'était assis sur une chaise qui était à côté du lit. Elle se tourna vers lui; elle faisait visiblement effort pour paraître calme et «bien sage», comme elle disait dans cet affaiblissement de la maladie qui ressemble à l'enfance, afin que, la voyant si paisible, on ne fît pas difficulté de lui amener Cosette. Cependant, tout en se contenant, elle ne pouvait s'empêcher d'adresser à M. Madeleine mille questions.

— Avez-vous fait un bon voyage, monsieur le maire? Oh! comme vous êtes bon d'avoir été me la chercher! Dites-moi seulement comment elle est. A-t-elle bien supporté la route? Hélas! elle ne me reconnaîtra pas! Depuis le temps, elle m'a oubliée, pauvre chou! Les enfants, cela n'a pas de mémoire. C'est comme des oiseaux. Aujourd'hui cela voit une chose et demain une autre, et cela ne pense plus à rien. Avait-elle du linge blanc seulement? Ces Thénardier la tenaient-ils proprement? Comment la nourrissait-on? Oh! comme j'ai souffert, si vous saviez! de me faire toutes ces questions-là dans le temps de ma misère! Maintenant, c'est passé. Je suis joyeuse. Oh! que je voudrais donc la voir! Monsieur le maire, l'avez-vous trouvée jolie? N'est-ce pas qu'elle est belle, ma fille? Vous devez avoir eu bien froid dans cette diligence! Est-ce qu'on ne pourrait pas l'amener rien qu'un petit moment? On la remporterait tout de suite après. Dites! vous qui êtes le maître, si vous vouliez!

Il lui prit la main:

— Cosette est belle, dit-il, Cosette se porte bien, vous la verrez bientôt, mais apaisez-vous. Vous parlez trop vivement, et puis vous sortez vos bras du lit, et cela vous fait tousser.

En effet, des quintes de toux interrompaient Fantine presque à chaque mot.

Fantine ne murmura pas, elle craignait d’avoir compromis par quelques plaintes trop passionnées la confiance qu’elle voulait inspirer, et elle se mit à dire des paroles indifférentes.

— C’est assez joli, Montfermeil, n’est-ce-pas? L’été, on va y faire des parties de plaisir. Ces Thénardier font-ils de bonnes affaires? Il ne passe pas grand monde dans leur pays. C’est une espèce de gargote que cette auberge-là.

M. Madeleine lui tenait toujours la main, il la considérait avec anxiété; il était évident qu’il était venu pour lui dire des choses devant lesquelles sa pensée hésitait maintenant. Le médecin, sa visite faite, s’était retiré. La sœur Simplice était seule restée auprès d’eux.

Cependant, au milieu de ce silence, Fantine s’écria:

— Je l’entends! mon Dieu! je l’entends!

Elle étendit le bras pour qu’on se tût autour d’elle, retint son souffle, et se mit à écouter avec ravissement.

Il y avait un enfant qui jouait dans la cour; l’enfant de la portière ou d’une ouvrière quelconque. C’est là un de ces hasards qu’on retrouve toujours et qui semblent faire partie de la mystérieuse mise en scène des événements lugubres. L’enfant, c’était une petite fille, allait, venait, courait pour se réchauffer, riait et chantait à haute voix. Hélas! à quoi les jeux des enfants ne se mêlent-ils pas! C’était cette petite fille que Fantine entendait chanter.

— Oh! reprit-elle, c’est ma Cosette! je reconnais sa voix!

L’enfant s’éloigna comme il était venu, la voix s’éteignit, Fantine écouta encore quelque temps, puis son visage s’assombrit, et M. Madeleine l’entendit qui disait à voix basse:

— Comme ce médecin est méchant de ne pas me laisser voir ma fille! Il a une mauvaise figure, cet homme-là!

Cependant le fond riant de ses idées revint. Elle continua de se parler à elle-même, la tête sur l’oreiller.

— Comme nous allons être heureuses! Nous aurons un petit jardin, d’abord! M. Madeleine me l’a promis. Ma fille jouera dans le jardin. Elle doit savoir ses lettres maintenant. Je la ferai épeler. Elle courra dans l’herbe après les papillons. Je la regarderai. Et puis elle fera sa première communion. Ah çà! quand fera-t-elle sa première communion? Elle se mit à compter sur ses doigts.

— ... Un, deux, trois, quatre... elle a sept ans. Dans cinq ans. Elle aura un voile blanc, des bas à jour, elle aura l’air d’une petite femme. Ô ma bonne sœur, vous ne savez pas comme je suis bête, voilà que je pense à la première communion de ma fille! Et elle se mit à rire.

Il avait quitté la main de Fantine. Il écoutait ces paroles comme on écoute un vent qui souffle, les yeux à terre, l’esprit plongé dans des réflexions sans fond. Tout à coup elle cessa de parler, cela lui fit lever machinalement la tête. Fantine était devenue effrayante.

Elle ne parlait plus, elle ne respirait plus; elle s’était soulevée à demi sur son séant, son épaule maigre sortait de sa chemise, son visage, radieux le moment d’auparavant, était blême, et elle paraissait fixer sur quelque chose de formidable, devant elle, à l’autre extrémité de la chambre, son œil agrandi par la terreur.

— Mon Dieu! s’écria-t-il. Qu’avez-vous, Fantine?

Elle ne répondit pas, elle ne quitta point des yeux l’objet quelconque qu’elle semblait voir, elle lui toucha le bras d’une main et de l’autre lui fit signe de regarder derrière lui.

Il se retourna, et vit Javert.

Chapitre III

Javert content

Voici ce qui s’était passé.

Minuit et demi venait de sonner, quand M. Madeleine était sorti de la salle des assises d’Arras. Il était rentré à son auberge juste à temps pour repartir par la malle-poste où l’on se rappelle qu’il avait retenu sa place. Un peu avant six heures du matin, il était arrivé à Montreuil-sur-mer, et son premier soin avait été de jeter à la poste sa lettre à M. Laffitte, puis d’entrer à l’infirmerie et de voir Fantine.

Cependant, à peine avait-il quitté la salle d’audience de la cour d’assises, que l’avocat général, revenu du premier saisissement, avait pris la parole pour déplorer l’acte de folie de l’honorable maire de Montreuil-sur-mer, déclarer que ses convictions n’étaient en rien modifiées par cet incident bizarre qui s’éclaircirait plus tard, et requérir, en attendant, la condamnation de ce Champmathieu, évidemment le vrai Jean Valjean. La persistance de l’avocat général était visiblement en contradiction avec le sentiment de tous, du public, de la cour et du jury. Le défenseur avait eu peu de peine à réfuter cette harangue et à établir que, par suite des révélations de M. Madeleine, c’est-à-dire du vrai Jean Valjean, la face de l’affaire était bouleversée de fond en comble, et que le jury n’avait plus devant les yeux qu’un innocent. L’avocat avait tiré de là quelques épiphonèmes, malheureusement peu neufs, sur les erreurs judiciaires, etc., etc., le président dans son résumé s’était joint au défenseur, et le jury en quelques minutes avait mis hors de cause Champmathieu.

Cependant il fallait un Jean Valjean à l’avocat général, et, n’ayant plus Champmathieu, il prit Madeleine.

Immédiatement après la mise en liberté de Champmathieu, l’avocat général s’enferma avec le président. Ils conférèrent «de la nécessité de se saisir de la personne de M. le maire de Montreuil-sur-mer». Cette phrase, où il y a beaucoup de de, est de M. l’avocat général, entièrement écrite de sa main sur la minute de son rapport au procureur général. La première émotion passée, le président fit peu d’objections. Il fallait bien que justice eût son cours. Et puis, pour tout dire, quoique le président fût homme bon et assez intelligent, il était en même temps fort royaliste et presque ardent, et il avait été choqué que le maire de Montreuil-sur-mer, en parlant du débarquement à Cannes, eût dit l’empereur et non Buonaparte.

L’ordre d’arrestation fut donc expédié. L’avocat général l’envoya à Montreuil-sur-mer par un exprès, à franc étrier, et en chargea l’inspecteur de police Javert.

On sait que Javert était revenu à Montreuil-sur-mer immédiatement après avoir fait sa déposition.

Javert se levait au moment où l’exprès lui remit l’ordre d’arrestation et le mandat d’amener.

L’exprès était lui-même un homme de police fort entendu qui, en deux mots, mit Javert au fait de ce qui était arrivé à Arras. L’ordre d’arrestation, signé de l’avocat général, était ainsi conçu: — L’inspecteur Javert appréhendera au corps le sieur Madeleine, maire de Montreuil-sur-mer, qui, dans l’audience de ce jour, a été reconnu pour être le forçat libéré Jean Valjean.

Quelqu’un qui n’eût pas connu Javert et qui l’eût vu au moment où il pénétra dans l’antichambre de l’infirmerie n’eût pu rien deviner de ce qui se passait, et lui eût trouvé l’air le plus ordinaire du monde. Il était froid, calme, grave, avait ses cheveux gris parfaitement lissés sur les tempes et venait de monter l’escalier avec sa lenteur habituelle. Quelqu’un qui l’eût connu à fond et qui l’eût examiné attentivement eût frémi. La boucle de son col de cuir, au lieu d’être sur sa nuque, était sur son oreille gauche. Ceci révélait une agitation inouïe.

Javert était un caractère complet, ne laissant faire de pli ni à son devoir, ni à son uniforme; méthodique avec les scélérats, rigide avec les boutons de son habit.

Pour qu’il eût mal mis la boucle de son col, il fallait qu’il y eût en lui une de ces émotions qu’on pourrait appeler des tremblements de terre intérieurs.

Il était venu simplement, avait requis un caporal et quatre soldats au poste voisin, avait laissé les soldats dans la cour, et s’était fait indiquer la chambre de Fantine par la portière sans défiance, accoutumée qu’elle était à voir des gens armés demander monsieur le maire.

Arrivé à la chambre de Fantine, Javert tourna la clef, poussa la porte avec une douceur de garde-malade ou de mouchard, et entra.

À proprement parler, il n’entra pas. Il se tint debout dans la porte entrebâillée, le chapeau sur la tête, la main gauche dans sa redingote fermée jusqu’au menton. Dans le pli du coude on pouvait voir le pommeau de plomb de son énorme canne, laquelle disparaissait derrière lui.

Il resta ainsi près d’une minute sans qu’on s’aperçût de sa présence. Tout à coup Fantine leva les yeux, le vit, et fit retourner M. Madeleine.

À l’instant où le regard de Madeleine rencontra le regard de Javert, Javert, sans bouger, sans remuer, sans approcher, devint épouvantable. Aucun sentiment humain ne réussit à être effroyable comme la joie.

Ce fut le visage d’un démon qui vient de retrouver son damné.

La certitude de tenir enfin Jean Valjean fit apparaître sur sa physionomie tout ce qu’il avait dans l’âme. Le fond remué monta à la surface. L’humiliation d’avoir un peu perdu la piste et de s’être mépris quelques minutes sur ce Champmathieu, s’effaçait sous l’orgueil d’avoir si bien deviné d’abord et d’avoir eu si longtemps un instinct juste. Le contentement de Javert éclata dans son attitude souveraine. La difformité du triomphe s’épanouit sur ce front étroit. Ce fut tout le déploiement d’horreur que peut donner une figure satisfaite.

Javert en ce moment était au ciel. Sans qu’il s’en rendit nettement compte, mais pourtant avec une intuition confuse de sa nécessité et de son succès, il personnifiait, lui Javert, la justice, la lumière et la vérité dans leur fonction céleste d’écrasement du mal. Il avait derrière lui et autour de lui, à une profondeur infinie, l’autorité, la raison, la chose jugée, la conscience légale, la vindicte publique, toutes les étoiles; il protégeait l’ordre, il faisait sortir de la loi la foudre, il vengeait la société, il prêtait main-forte à l’absolu; il se dressait dans une gloire; il y avait dans sa victoire un reste de défi et de combat; debout, altier, éclatant, il étalait en plein azur la bestialité surhumaine d’un archange féroce; l’ombre redoutable de l’action qu’il accomplissait faisait visible à son poing crispé le vague flamboiement de l’épée sociale; heureux et indigné, il tenait sous son talon le crime, le vice, la rébellion, la perdition, l’enfer, il rayonnait, il exterminait, il souriait et il y avait une incontestable grandeur dans ce saint Michel monstrueux.

Javert, effroyable, n’avait rien d’ignoble.

La probité, la sincérité, la candeur, la conviction, l’idée du devoir, sont des choses qui, en se trompant, peuvent devenir hideuses, mais qui, même hideuses, restent grandes; leur majesté, propre à la conscience humaine, persiste dans l’horreur. Ce sont des vertus qui ont un vice, l’erreur. L’impitoyable joie honnête d’un fanatique en pleine atrocité conserve on ne sait quel rayonnement lugubrement vénérable. Sans qu’il s’en doutât, Javert, dans son bonheur formidable, était à plaindre comme tout ignorant qui triomphe. Rien n'était poignant et terrible comme cette figure où se montrait ce qu'on pourrait appeler tout le mauvais du bon.

Chapitre IV

L’autorité reprend ses droits

La Fantine n’avait point vu Javert depuis le jour où M. le maire l’avait arrachée à cet homme. Son cerveau malade ne se rendit compte de rien, seulement elle ne douta pas qu’il ne revint la chercher. Elle ne put supporter cette figure affreuse, elle se sentit expirer, elle cacha son visage de ses deux mains et cria avec angoisse:

— Monsieur Madeleine, sauvez-moi!

Jean Valjean — nous ne le nommerons plus désormais autrement — s’était levé. Il dit à Fantine de sa voix la plus douce et la plus calme:

— Soyez tranquille. Ce n’est pas pour vous qu’il vient.

Puis il s’adressa à Javert et lui dit:

— Je sais ce que vous voulez.

Javert répondit:

— Allons, vite!

Il y eut dans l’inflexion qui accompagna ces deux mots je ne sais quoi de fauve et de frénétique. Javert ne dit pas: «Allons, vite!» il dit: «Allonouaite!» Aucune orthographe ne pourrait rendre l’accent dont cela fut prononcé; ce n’était plus une parole humaine, c’était un rugissement.

Il ne fit point comme d’habitude; il n’entra point en matière; il n’exhiba point de mandat d’amener. Pour lui, Jean Valjean était une sorte de combattant mystérieux et insaisissable, un lutteur ténébreux qu’il étreignait depuis cinq ans sans pouvoir le renverser. Cette arrestation n’était pas un commencement, mais une fin. Il se borna à dire: «Allons, vite!»

En parlant ainsi, il ne fit point un pas; il lança sur Jean Valjean ce regard qu’il jetait comme un crampon, et avec lequel il avait coutume de tirer violemment les misérables à lui.

C’était ce regard que la Fantine avait senti pénétrer jusque dans la moelle de ses os deux mois auparavant.

Au cri de Javert, Fantine avait rouvert les yeux. Mais M. le maire était là. Que pouvait-elle craindre?

Javert avança au milieu de la chambre et cria:

— Ah çà! viendras-tu?

La malheureuse regarda autour d'elle. Il n'y avait personne que la religieuse et monsieur le maire. À qui pouvait s'adresser ce tutoiement abject? elle seulement. Elle frissonna.

Alors elle vit une chose inouïe, tellement inouïe que jamais rien de pareil ne lui était apparu dans les plus noirs délires de la fièvre.

Elle vit le mouchard Javert saisir au collet monsieur le maire; elle vit monsieur le maire courber la tête. Il lui sembla que le monde s'évanouissait.

Javert, en effet, avait pris Jean Valjean au collet.

— Monsieur le maire! cria Fantine.

Javert éclata de rire, de cet affreux rire qui lui déchaussait toutes les dents.

— Il n'y a plus de monsieur le maire ici!

Jean Valjean n'essaya pas de déranger la main qui tenait le col de sa redingote. Il dit:

— Javert....

Javert l'interrompit:

— Appelle-moi monsieur l'inspecteur.

— Monsieur, reprit Jean Valjean, je voudrais vous dire un mot en particulier.

— Tout haut! parle tout haut! répondit Javert; on me parle tout haut à moi!

Jean Valjean continua en baissant la voix:

— C'est une prière que j'ai à vous faire....

— Je te dis de parler tout haut.

— Mais cela ne doit être entendu que de vous seul....

— Qu'est-ce que cela me fait? je n'écoute pas!

Jean Valjean se tourna vers lui et lui dit rapidement et très bas:

— Accordez-moi trois jours! trois jours pour aller chercher l'enfant de cette malheureuse femme! Je payerai ce qu'il faudra. Vous m'accompagnerez si vous voulez.

— Tu veux rire! cria Javert. Ah çà! je ne te croyais pas bête! Tu me demandes trois jours pour t'en aller! Tu dis que c'est pour aller chercher l'enfant de cette fille! Ah! ah! c'est bon! voilà qui est bon! Fantine eut un tremblement.

— Mon enfant! s'écria-t-elle, aller chercher mon enfant! Elle n'est donc pas ici! Ma sœur, répondez-moi, où est Cosette? Je veux mon enfant! Monsieur Madeleine! monsieur le maire!

Javert frappa du pied.

— Voilà l’autre, à présent! Te tairas-tu, drôlesse! Gredin de pays où les galériens sont magistrats et où les filles publiques sont soignées comme des comtesses! Ah mais! tout ça va changer; il était temps!

Il regarda fixement Fantine et ajouta en reprenant à poignée la cravate, la chemise et le collet de Jean Valjean:

— Je te dis qu’il n’y a point de monsieur Madeleine et qu’il n’y a point de monsieur le maire. Il y a un voleur, il y a un brigand, il y a un forçat appelé Jean Valjean! c’est lui que je tiens! voilà ce qu’il y a!

Fantine se dressa en sursaut, appuyée sur ses bras roides et sur ses deux mains, elle regarda Jean Valjean, elle regarda Javert, elle regarda la religieuse, elle ouvrit la bouche comme pour parler, un râle sortit du fond de sa gorge, ses dents claquèrent, elle étendit les bras avec angoisse, ouvrant convulsivement les mains, et cherchant autour d’elle comme quelqu’un qui se noie, puis elle s’affaissa subitement sur l’oreiller. Sa tête heurta le chevet du lit et vint retomber sur sa poitrine, la bouche béante, les yeux ouverts et éteints.

Elle était morte.

Jean Valjean posa sa main sur la main de Javert qui le tenait, et l’ouvrit comme il eût ouvert la main d’un enfant, puis il dit à Javert:

— Vous avez tué cette femme.

— Finirons-nous! cria Javert furieux. Je ne suis pas ici pour entendre des raisons. Économisons tout ça. La garde est en bas. Marchons tout de suite, ou les poucettes!

Il y avait dans un coin de la chambre un vieux lit en fer en assez mauvais état qui servait de lit de camp aux sœurs quand elles veillaient. Jean Valjean alla à ce lit, disloqua en un clin d’œil le chevet déjà fort délabré, chose facile à des muscles comme les siens, saisit à poigne-main la maîtresse-tringle, et considéra Javert. Javert recula vers la porte.

Jean Valjean, sa barre de fer au poing, marcha lentement vers le lit de Fantine. Quand il y fut parvenu, il se retourna, et dit à Javert d’une voix qu’on entendait à peine:

— Je ne vous conseille pas de me déranger en ce moment.

Ce qui est certain, c’est que Javert tremblait.

Il eut l’idée d’aller appeler la garde, mais Jean Valjean pouvait profiter de cette minute pour s’évader. Il resta donc, saisit sa canne par le petit bout, et s’adossa au chambranle de la porte sans quitter du regard Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean posa son coude sur la pomme du chevet du lit et son front sur sa main, et se mit à contempler Fantine immobile et étendue. Il demeura ainsi, absorbé, muet, et ne songeant évidemment plus à aucune chose de cette vie. Il n’y avait plus rien sur son visage et dans son attitude qu’une inexprimable pitié. Après quelques instants de cette rêverie, il se pencha vers Fantine et lui parla à voix basse.

Que lui dit-il? Que pouvait dire cet homme qui était réprouvé à cette femme qui était morte? Qu’était-ce que ces paroles? Personne sur la terre ne les a entendues. La morte les entendit-elle? Il y a des illusions touchantes qui sont peut-être des réalités sublimes. Ce qui est hors de doute, c’est que la sœur Simplice, unique témoin de la chose qui se passait, a souvent raconté qu’au moment où Jean Valjean parla à l’oreille de Fantine, elle vit distinctement poindre un ineffable sourire sur ces lèvres pâles et dans ces prunelles vagues, pleines de l’étonnement du tombeau.

Jean Valjean prit dans ses deux mains la tête de Fantine et l’arrangea sur l’oreiller comme une mère eût fait pour son enfant, il lui rattacha le cordon de sa chemise et rentra ses cheveux sous son bonnet. Cela fait, il lui ferma les yeux.

La face de Fantine en cet instant semblait étrangement éclairée.

La mort, c’est l’entrée dans la grande lueur.

La main de Fantine pendait hors du lit. Jean Valjean s’agenouilla devant cette main, la souleva doucement, et la baisa.

Puis il se redressa, et, se tournant vers Javert:

— Maintenant, dit-il, je suis à vous.

Chapitre V

Tombeau convenable

Javert déposa Jean Valjean à la prison de la ville.

L’arrestation de M. Madeleine produisit à Montreuil-sur-mer une sensation, ou pour mieux dire une commotion extraordinaire. Nous sommes triste de ne pouvoir dissimuler que sur ce seul mot: c’était un galérien, tout le monde à peu près l’abandonna. En moins de deux heures tout le bien qu’il avait fait fut oublié, et ce ne fut plus «qu’un galérien». Il est juste de dire qu’on ne connaissait pas encore les détails de l’événement d’Arras. Toute la journée on entendait dans toutes les parties de la ville des conversations comme celle-ci:

— Vous ne savez pas? c’était un forçat libéré! Qui ça? — Le maire. — Bah! M. Madeleine? — Oui. Vraiment? — Il ne s’appelait pas Madeleine, il a un affreux nom, Béjean, Bojean, Boujean. — Ah, mon Dieu! — Il est arrêté. — Arrêté! — En prison à la prison de la ville, en attendant qu’on le transfère. — Qu’on le transfère! On va le transférer! Où va-t-on le transférer? — Il va passer aux assises pour un vol de grand chemin qu’il a fait autrefois. — Eh bien! je m’en doutais. Cet homme était trop bon, trop parfait, trop confit. Il refusait la croix, il donnait des sous à tous les petits drôles qu’il rencontrait. J’ai toujours pensé qu’il y avait là-dessous quelque mauvaise histoire.

«Les salons» surtout abondèrent dans ce sens.

Une vieille dame, abonnée au Drapeau blanc, fit cette réflexion dont il est presque impossible de sonder la profondeur:

— Je n’en suis pas fâchée. Cela apprendra aux buonapartistes!

C’est ainsi que ce fantôme qui s’était appelé M. Madeleine se dissipa à Montreuil-sur-mer. Trois ou quatre personnes seulement dans toute la ville restèrent fidèles à cette mémoire. La vieille portière qui l’avait servi fut du nombre. Le soir de ce même jour, cette digne vieille était assise dans sa loge, encore tout effarée et réfléchissant tristement. La fabrique avait été fermée toute la journée, la porte cochère était verrouillée, la rue était déserte. Il n’y avait dans la maison que deux religieuses, sœur Perpétue et sœur Simplice, qui veillaient près du corps de Fantine.

Vers l’heure où M. Madeleine avait coutume de rentrer, la brave portière se leva machinalement, prit la clef de la chambre de M. Madeleine dans un tiroir et le bougeoir dont il se servait tous les soirs pour monter chez lui, puis elle accrocha la clef au clou où il la prenait d’habitude, et plaça le bougeoir à côté, comme si elle l’attendait. Ensuite elle se rassit sur sa chaise et se remit à songer. La pauvre bonne vieille avait fait tout cela sans en avoir conscience.

Ce ne fut qu’au bout de plus de deux heures qu’elle sortit de sa rêverie et s’écria: «Tiens! mon bon Dieu Jésus! moi qui ai mis sa clef au clou!»

En ce moment la vitre de la loge s’ouvrit, une main passa par l’ouverture, saisit la clef et le bougeoir et alluma la bougie à la chandelle qui brûlait.

La portière leva les yeux et resta béante, avec un cri dans le gosier qu’elle retint. Elle connaissait cette main, ce bras, cette manche de redingote.

C’était M. Madeleine.

Elle fut quelques secondes avant de pouvoir parler, saisie, comme elle le disait elle-même plus tard en racontant son aventure.

— Mon Dieu, monsieur le maire, s’écria-t-elle enfin, je vous croyais....

Elle s’arrêta, la fin de sa phrase eût manqué de respect au commencement. Jean Valjean était toujours pour elle monsieur le maire.

Il acheva sa pensée.

— En prison, dit-il. J’y étais. J’ai brisé un barreau d’une fenêtre, je me suis laissé tomber du haut d’un toit, et me voici. Je monte à ma chambre, allez me chercher la sœur Simplice. Elle est sans doute près de cette pauvre femme.

La vieille obéit en toute hâte.

Il ne lui fit aucune recommandation; il était bien sûr qu’elle le garderait mieux qu’il ne se garderait lui-même.

On n’a jamais su comment il avait réussi à pénétrer dans la cour sans faire ouvrir la porte cochère. Il avait, et portait toujours sur lui, un passe-partout qui ouvrait une petite porte latérale; mais on avait dû le fouiller et lui prendre son passe-partout. Ce point n’a pas été éclairci.

Il monta l’escalier qui conduisait à sa chambre. Arrivé en haut, il laissa son bougeoir sur les dernières marches de l’escalier, ouvrit sa porte avec peu de bruit, et alla fermer à tâtons sa fenêtre et son volet, puis il revint prendre sa bougie et rentra dans sa chambre.

La précaution était utile; on se souvient que sa fenêtre pouvait être aperçue de la rue. Il jeta un coup d’œil autour de lui, sur sa table, sur sa chaise, sur son lit qui n’avait pas été défait depuis trois jours. Il ne restait aucune trace du désordre de l’avant-dernière nuit. La portière avait «fait la chambre». Seulement elle avait ramassé dans les cendres et posé proprement sur la table les deux bouts du bâton ferré et la pièce de quarante sous noircie par le feu.

Il prit une feuille de papier sur laquelle il écrivit: Voici les deux bouts de mon bâton ferré et la pièce de quarante sous volée à Petit-Gervais dont j’ai parlé à la cour d’assises, et il posa sur cette feuille la pièce d’argent et les deux morceaux de fer, de façon que ce fût la première chose qu’on aperçût en entrant dans la chambre. Il tira d’une armoire une vieille chemise à lui qu’il déchira. Cela fit quelques morceaux de toile dans lesquels il emballa les deux flambeaux d’argent. Du reste il n’avait ni hâte ni agitation, et, tout en emballant les chandeliers de l’évêque, il mordait dans un morceau de pain noir. Il est probable que c’était le pain de la prison qu’il avait emporté en s’évadant.

Ceci a été constaté par les miettes de pain qui furent trouvées sur le carreau de la chambre, lorsque la justice plus tard fit une perquisition.

On frappa deux petits coups à la porte.

— Entrez, dit-il.

C’était la sœur Simplice.

Elle était pâle, elle avait les yeux rouges, la chandelle qu’elle tenait vacillait dans sa main. Les violences de la destinée ont cela de particulier que, si perfectionnés ou si refroidis que nous soyons, elles nous tirent du fond des entrailles la nature humaine et la forcent de reparaître au dehors. Dans les émotions de cette journée, la religieuse était redevenue femme. Elle avait pleuré, et elle tremblait.

Jean Valjean venait d’écrire quelques lignes sur un papier qu’il tendit à la religieuse en disant:

— Ma sœur, vous remettrez ceci à monsieur le curé.

Le papier était déplié. Elle y jeta les yeux.

— Vous pouvez lire, dit-il.

Elle lut. — «Je prie monsieur le curé de veiller sur tout ce que je laisse ici. Il voudra bien payer là-dessus les frais de mon procès et l’enterrement de la femme qui est morte aujourd’hui. Le reste sera aux pauvres.»

La sœur voulut parler, mais elle put à peine balbutier quelques sons inarticulés. Elle parvint cependant à dire:

— Est-ce que monsieur le maire ne désire pas revoir une dernière fois cette pauvre malheureuse?

— Non, dit-il, on est à ma poursuite, on n'aurait qu'à m'arrêter dans sa chambre, cela la troublerait.

Il achevait à peine qu'un grand bruit se fit dans l'escalier. Ils entendirent un tumulte de pas qui montaient, et la vieille portière qui disait de sa voix la plus haute et la plus perçante:

— Mon bon monsieur, je vous jure le bon Dieu qu'il n'est entré personne ici de toute la journée ni de toute la soirée, que même je n'ai pas quitté ma porte!

Un homme répondit:

— Cependant il y a de la lumière dans cette chambre.

Ils reconnurent la voix de Javert.

La chambre était disposée de façon que la porte en s'ouvrant masquait l'angle du mur à droite. Jean Valjean souffla la bougie et se mit dans cet angle.

La sœur Simplice tomba à genoux près de la table.

La porte s'ouvrit.

Javert entra.

On entendait le chuchotement de plusieurs hommes et les protestations de la portière dans le corridor.

La religieuse ne leva pas les yeux. Elle priait.

La chandelle était sur la cheminée et ne donnait que peu de clarté.

Javert aperçut la sœur et s'arrêta interdit.

On se rappelle que le fond même de Javert, son élément, son milieu respirable, c'était la vénération de toute autorité. Il était tout d'une pièce et n'admettait ni objection, ni restriction. Pour lui, bien entendu, l'autorité ecclésiastique était la première de toutes. Il était religieux, superficiel et correct sur ce point comme sur tous. À ses yeux un prêtre était un esprit qui ne se trompe pas, une religieuse était une créature qui ne pèche pas. C'étaient des âmes murées à ce monde avec une seule porte qui ne s'ouvrait jamais que pour laisser sortir la vérité.

En apercevant la sœur, son premier mouvement fut de se retirer.

Cependant il y avait aussi un autre devoir qui le tenait, et qui le poussait impérieusement en sens inverse. Son second mouvement fut de rester, et de hasarder au moins une question.

C’était cette sœur Simplice qui n’avait menti de sa vie. Javert le savait, et la vénérait particulièrement à cause de cela.

— Ma sœur, dit-il, êtes-vous seule dans cette chambre?

Il y eut un moment affreux pendant lequel la pauvre portière se sentit défaillir.

La sœur leva les yeux et répondit:

— Oui.

— Ainsi, reprit Javert, excusez-moi si j’insiste, c’est mon devoir, vous n’avez pas vu ce soir une personne, un homme. Il s’est évadé, nous le cherchons, ce nommé Jean Valjean, vous ne l’avez pas vu?

La sœur répondit:

— Non.

Elle mentit. Elle mentit deux fois de suite, coup sur coup, sans hésiter, rapidement, comme on se dévoue.

— Pardon, dit Javert, et il se retira en saluant profondément.

Ô sainte fille! vous n’êtes plus de ce monde depuis beaucoup d’années; vous avez rejoint dans la lumière vos sœurs les vierges et vos frères les anges; que ce mensonge vous soit compté dans le paradis!

L’affirmation de la sœur fut pour Javert quelque chose de si décisif qu’il ne remarqua même pas la singularité de cette bougie qu’on venait de souffler et qui fumait sur la table.

Une heure après, un homme, marchant à travers les arbres et les brumes, s’éloignait rapidement de Montreuil-sur-mer dans la direction de Paris. Cet homme était Jean Valjean. Il a été établi, par le témoignage de deux ou trois rouliers qui l’avaient rencontré, qu’il portait un paquet et qu’il était vêtu d’une blouse. Où avait-il pris cette blouse? On ne l’a jamais su. Cependant un vieux ouvrier était mort quelques jours auparavant à l’infirmerie de la fabrique, ne laissant que sa blouse. C’était peut-être celle-là.

Un dernier mot sur Fantine.

Nous avons tous une mère, la terre. On rendit Fantine à cette mère.

Le curé crut bien faire, et fit bien peut-être, en réservant, sur ce que Jean Valjean avait laissé, le plus d’argent possible aux pauvres. Après tout, de qui s’agissait-il? d’un forçat et d’une fille publique. C’est pourquoi il simplifia l’enterrement de Fantine, et le réduisit à ce strict nécessaire qu’on appelle la fosse commune.

Fantine fut donc enterrée dans ce coin gratis du cimetière qui est à tous et à personne, et où l’on perd les pauvres. Heureusement Dieu sait où retrouver l’âme. On coucha Fantine dans les ténèbres parmi les premiers os venus; elle subit la promiscuité des cendres. Elle fut jetée à la fosse publique. Sa tombe ressembla à son lit.

Livre premier — Waterloo

Chapitre I

Ce qu'on rencontre en venant de Nivelles

L'an dernier (1861), par une belle matinée de mai, un passant, celui qui raconte cette histoire, arrivait de Nivelles et se dirigeait vers La Hulpe. Il allait à pied. Il suivait, entre deux rangées d'arbres, une large chaussée pavée ondulant sur des collines qui viennent l'une après l'autre, soulèvent la route et la laissent retomber, et font là comme des vagues énormes. Il avait dépassé Lillois et Bois-Seigneur-Isaac. Il apercevait, à l'ouest, le clocher d'ardoise de Braine-l'Alleud qui a la forme d'un vase renversé. Il venait de laisser derrière lui un bois sur une hauteur, et, à l'angle d'un chemin de traverse, à côté d'une espèce de potence vermoulue portant l'inscription: Ancienne barrière no 4, un cabaret ayant sur sa façade cet écriteau: Au quatre vents. Échabeau, café de particulier.

Un demi-quart de lieue plus loin que ce cabaret, il arriva au fond d'un petit vallon où il y a de l'eau qui passe sous une arche pratiquée dans le remblai de la route. Le bouquet d'arbres, clairsemé mais très vert, qui emplit le vallon d'un côté de la chaussée, s'éparpille de l'autre dans les prairies et s'en va avec grâce et comme en désordre vers Braine-l'Alleud.

Il y avait là, à droite, au bord de la route, une auberge, une charrette à quatre roues devant la porte, un grand faisceau de perches à houblon, une charrue, un tas de broussailles sèches près d'une haie vive, de la chaux qui fumait dans un trou carré, une échelle le long d'un vieux hangar à cloisons de paille. Une jeune fille sarclait dans un champ où une grande affiche jaune, probablement du spectacle forain de quelque kermesse, volait au vent. À l'angle de l'auberge, à côté d'une mare où naviguait une flottille de canards, un sentier mal pavé s'enfonçait dans les broussailles. Ce passant y entra.

Au bout d'une centaine de pas, après avoir longé un mur du quinzième siècle surmonté d'un pignon aigu à briques contrariées, il se trouva en présence d'une grande porte de pierre cintrée, avec imposte rectiligne, dans le grave style de Louis XIV, accostée de deux médaillons planes. Une façade sévère dominait cette porte; un mur perpendiculaire à la façade venait presque toucher la porte et la flanquait d'un brusque angle droit. Sur le pré devant la porte gisaient trois herses à travers lesquelles poussaient pêle-mêle toutes les fleurs de mai. La porte était fermée. Elle avait pour clôture deux battants décrépits ornés d’un vieux marteau rouillé.

Le soleil était charmant; les branches avaient ce doux frémissement de mai qui semble venir des nids plus encore que du vent. Un brave petit oiseau, probablement amoureux, vocalisait éperdument dans un grand arbre.

Le passant se courba et considéra dans la pierre à gauche, au bas du pied-droit de la porte, une assez large excavation circulaire ressemblant à l’alvéole d’une sphère. En ce moment les battants s’écartèrent et une paysanne sortit.

Elle vit le passant et aperçut ce qu’il regardait.

— C’est un boulet français qui a fait ça, lui dit-elle. Et elle ajouta:

— Ce que vous voyez là, plus haut, dans la porte, près d’un clou, c’est le trou d’un gros biscayen. Le biscayen n’a pas traversé le bois.

— Comment s’appelle cet endroit-ci? demanda le passant.

— Hougomont, dit la paysanne.

Le passant se redressa. Il fit quelques pas et s’en alla regarder au-dessus des haies. Il aperçut à l’horizon à travers les arbres une espèce de monticule et sur ce monticule quelque chose qui, de loin, ressemblait à un lion.

Il était dans le champ de bataille de Waterloo.

Chapitre II

Hougomont

Hougomont, ce fut là un lieu funèbre, le commencement de l’obstacle, la première résistance que rencontra à Waterloo ce grand bûcheron de l’Europe qu’on appelait Napoléon; le premier nœud sous le coup de hache.

C’était un château, ce n’est plus qu’une ferme. Hougomont, pour l’antiquaire, c’est Hugomons. Ce manoir fut bâti par Hugo, sire de Somerel, le même qui dota la sixième chapellenie de l’abbaye de Villers.

Le passant poussa la porte, coudoya sous un porche une vieille calèche, et entra dans la cour.

La première chose qui le frappa dans ce préau, ce fut une porte du seizième siècle qui y simule une arcade, tout étant tombé autour d’elle. L’aspect monumental naît souvent de la ruine. Auprès de l’arcade s’ouvre dans un mur une autre porte avec claveaux du temps de Henri IV, laissant voir les arbres d’un verger. À côté de cette porte un trou à fumier, des pioches et des pelles, quelques charrettes, un vieux puits avec sa dalle et son tourniquet de fer, un poulain qui saute, un dindon qui fait la roue, une chapelle que surmonte un petit clocher, un poirier en fleur en espalier sur le mur de la chapelle, voilà cette cour dont la conquête fut un rêve de Napoléon. Ce coin de terre, s’il eût pu le prendre, lui eût peut-être donné le monde. Des poules y éparpillent du bec la poussière. On entend un grondement; c’est un gros chien qui montre les dents et qui remplace les Anglais.

Les Anglais là ont été admirables. Les quatre compagnies des gardes de Cooke y ont tenu tête pendant sept heures à l’achar-nement d’une armée.

Hougomont, vu sur la carte, en plan géométral, bâtiments et enclos compris, présente une espèce de rectangle irrégulier dont un angle aurait été entaillé. C’est à cet angle qu’est la porte méridionale, gardée par ce mur qui la fusille à bout portant. Hougomont a deux portes: la porte méridionale, celle du château, et la porte septentrionale, celle de la ferme. Napoléon envoya contre Hougomont son frère Jérôme; les divisions Guilleminot, Foy et Bachelu s’y heurtèrent, presque tout le corps de Reille y fut employé et y échoua, les boulets de Kellermann s’épuisèrent sur cet héroïque pan de mur.

Ce ne fut pas trop de la brigade Bauduin pour forcer Hougomont au nord, et la brigade Soye ne put que l’entamer au sud, sans le prendre.

Les bâtiments de la ferme bordent la cour au sud. Un morceau de la porte nord, brisée par les Français, pend accroché au mur. Ce sont quatre planches clouées sur deux traverses, et où l’on distingue les balafres de l’attaque.

La porte septentrionale, enfoncée par les Français, et à laquelle on a mis une pièce pour remplacer le panneau suspendu à la muraille, s’entre-bâille au fond du préau; elle est coupée carrément dans un mur, de pierre en bas, de brique en haut, qui ferme la cour au nord. C’est une simple porte charretière comme il y en a dans toutes les métairies, deux larges battants faits de planches rustiques; au delà, des prairies. La dispute de cette entrée a été furieuse. On a longtemps vu sur le montant de la porte toutes sortes d’empreintes de mains sanglantes. C’est là que Bauduin fut tué.

L’orage du combat est encore dans cette cour; l’horreur y est visible; le bouleversement de la mêlée s’y est pétrifié; cela vit, cela meurt; c’était hier. Les murs agonisent, les pierres tombent, les brèches crient; les trous sont des plaies; les arbres penchés et frissonnants semblent faire effort pour s’enfuir.

Cette cour, en 1815, était plus bâtie qu’elle ne l’est aujourd’hui. Des constructions qu’on a depuis jetées bas y faisaient des redans, des angles et des coudes d’équerre.

Les Anglais s’y étaient barricadés; les Français y pénétrèrent, mais ne purent s’y maintenir. À côté de la chapelle, une aile du château, le seul débris qui reste du manoir d’Hougomont, se dresse écroulée, on pourrait dire éventrée. Le château servit de donjon, la chapelle servit de blockhaus. On s’y extermina. Les Français, arquebuses de toutes parts, de derrière les murailles, du haut des greniers, du fond des caves, par toutes les croisées, par tous les soupiraux, par toutes les fentes des pierres, apportèrent des fascines et mirent le feu aux murs et aux hommes; la mitraille eut pour réplique l’incendie.

On entrevoit dans l’aile ruinée, à travers des fenêtres garnies de barreaux de fer, les chambres démantelées d’un corps de logis en brique; les gardes anglaises étaient embusquées dans ces chambres; la spirale de l’escalier, crevassé du rez-de-chaussée jusqu’au toit, apparaît comme l’intérieur d’un coquillage brisé. L’escalier a deux étages; les Anglais, assiégés dans l’escalier, et massés sur les marches supérieures, avaient coupé les marches inférieures. Ce sont de larges dalles de pierre bleue qui font un monceau dans les orties. Une dizaine de marches tiennent encore au mur; sur la première est entaillée l'image d'un trident. Ces degrés inaccessibles sont solides dans leurs alvéoles. Tout le reste ressemble à une mâchoire édentée. Deux vieux arbres sont là; l'un est mort, l'autre est blessé au pied, et reverdit en avril. Depuis 1815, il s'est mis à pousser à travers l'escalier.

On s'est massacré dans la chapelle. Le dedans, redevenu calme, est étrange. On n'y a plus dit la messe depuis le carnage. Pourtant l'autel y est resté, un autel de bois grossier adossé à un fond de pierre brute. Quatre murs lavés au lait de chaux, une porte vis-à-vis l'autel, deux petites fenêtres cintrées, sur la porte un grand crucifix de bois, au-dessus du crucifix un soupirail carré bouché d'une botte de foin, dans un coin, à terre, un vieux châssis vitré tout cassé, telle est cette chapelle. Près de l'autel est clouée une statue en bois de sainte Anne, du quinzième siècle; la tête de l'enfant Jésus a été emportée par un biscayen. Les Français, maîtres un moment de la chapelle, puis délogés, l'ont incendiée. Les flammes ont rempli cette masure; elle a été fournaise; la porte a brûlé, le plancher a brûlé, le Christ en bois n'a pas brûlé. Le feu lui a rongé les pieds dont on ne voit plus que les moignons noircis, puis s'est arrêté. Miracle, au dire des gens du pays. L'enfant Jésus, décapité, n'a pas été aussi heureux que le Christ.

Les murs sont couverts d'inscriptions. Près des pieds du Christ on lit ce nom: Henquinez. Puis ces autres: Conde de Rio Maïor. Marques y Marquesa de Almagro (Habana). Il y a des noms français avec des points d'exclamation, signes de colère. On a reblanchi le mur en 1849. Les nations s'y insultaient.

C'est à la porte de cette chapelle qu'a été ramassé un cadavre qui tenait une hache à la main. Ce cadavre était le sous-lieutenant Legros.

On sort de la chapelle, et à gauche, on voit un puits. Il y en a deux dans cette cour. On demande: pourquoi n'y a-t-il pas de seau et de poulie à celui-ci? C'est qu'on n'y puise plus d'eau. Pourquoi n'y puise-t-on plus d'eau? Parce qu'il est plein de squelettes.

Le dernier qui ait tiré de l'eau de ce puits se nommait Guillaume Van Kylsom. C'était un paysan qui habitait Hougomont et y était jardinier. Le 18 juin 1815, sa famille prit la fuite et s'alla cacher dans les bois.

La forêt autour de l'abbaye de Villers abrita pendant plusieurs jours et plusieurs nuits toutes ces malheureuses populations dispersées. Aujourd'hui encore de certains vestiges reconnaissables, tels que de vieux troncs d’arbres brûlés, mar-quent la place de ces pauvres bivouacs tremblants au fond des halliers.

Guillaume Van Kylsom demeura à Hougomont «pour garder le château» et se blottit dans une cave. Les Anglais l’y découvrirent. On l’arracha de sa cachette, et, à coups de plat de sabre, les combattants se firent servir par cet homme effrayé. Ils avaient soif; ce Guillaume leur portait à boire. C’est à ce puits qu’il puisait l’eau. Beaucoup burent là leur dernière gorgée. Ce puits, où burent tant de morts, devait mourir lui aussi.

Après l’action, on eut une hâte, enterrer les cadavres. La mort a une façon à elle de harceler la victoire, et elle fait suivre la gloire par la peste. Le typhus est une annexe du triomphe. Ce puits était profond, on en fit un sépulcre. On y jeta trois cents morts. Peut-être avec trop d’empressement. Tous étaient-ils morts? la légende dit non. Il parait que, la nuit qui suivit l’ensevelissement, on entendit sortir du puits des voix faibles qui appelaient.

Ce puits est isolé au milieu de la cour. Trois murs mi-partis pierre et brique, repliés comme les feuilles d’un paravent et simulant une tourelle carrée, l’entourent de trois côtés. Le quatrième côté est ouvert. C’est par là qu’on puisait l’eau. Le mur du fond a une façon d’œil-de-bœuf informe, peut-être un trou d’obus. Cette tourelle avait un plafond dont il ne reste que les poutres. La ferrure de soutènement du mur de droite dessine une croix. On se penche, et l’œil se perd dans un profond cylindre de brique qu’emplit un entassement de ténèbres. Tout autour du puits, le bas des murs disparaît dans les orties.

Ce puits n’a point pour devanture la large dalle bleue qui sert de tablier à tous les puits de Belgique. La dalle bleue y est remplacée par une traverse à laquelle s’appuient cinq ou six difformes tronçons de bois noueux et ankylosés qui ressemblent à de grands ossements. Il n’a plus ni seau, ni chaîne, ni poulie; mais il a encore la cuvette de pierre qui servait de déversoir. L’eau des pluies s’y amasse, et de temps en temps un oiseau des forêts voisines vient y boire et s’envole.

Une maison dans cette ruine, la maison de la ferme, est encore habitée. La porte de cette maison donne sur la cour. À côté d’une jolie plaque de serrure gothique il y a sur cette porte une poignée de fer à trèfles, posée de biais. Au moment où le lieutenant hanovrien Wilda saisissait cette poignée pour se réfugier dans la ferme, un sapeur français lui abattit la main d’un coup de hache.

La famille qui occupe la maison a pour grand-père l’ancien jardinier Van Kylsom, mort depuis longtemps. Une femme en cheveux gris vous dit: «J’étais là. J’avais trois ans. Ma sœur, plus grande, avait peur et pleurait. On nous a emportées dans les bois. J’étais dans les bras de ma mère. On se collait l’oreille à terre pour écouter. Moi, j’imitais le canon, et je faisais boum, boum.»

Une porte de la cour, à gauche, nous l’avons dit, donne dans le verger.

Le verger est terrible.

Il est en trois parties, on pourrait presque dire en trois actes. La première partie est un jardin, la deuxième est le verger, la troisième est un bois. Ces trois parties ont une enceinte commune, du côté de l’entrée les bâtiments du château et de la ferme, à gauche une haie, à droite un mur, au fond un mur. Le mur de droite est en brique, le mur du fond est en pierre. On entre dans le jardin d’abord. Il est en contrebas, planté de groseilliers, encombré de végétations sauvages, fermé d’un terrassement monumental en pierre de taille avec balustres à double renflement. C’était un jardin seigneurial dans ce premier style français qui a précédé Lenôtre; ruine et ronce aujourd’hui. Les pilastres sont surmontés de globes qui semblent des boulets de pierre. On compte encore quarante-trois balustres sur leurs dés; les autres sont couchés dans l’herbe. Presque tous ont des éraflures de mousqueterie. Un balustre brisé est posé sur l’étrave comme une jambe cassée.

C’est dans ce jardin, plus bas que le verger, que six voltigeurs du 1er léger, ayant pénétré là et n’en pouvant plus sortir, pris et traqués comme des ours dans leur fosse, acceptèrent le combat avec deux compagnies hanovriennes, dont une était armée de carabines. Les hanovriens bordaient ces balustres et tiraient d’en haut. Ces voltigeurs, ripostant d’en bas, six contre deux cents, intrépides, n’ayant pour abri que les groseilliers, mirent un quart d’heure à mourir.

On monte quelques marches, et du jardin on passe dans le verger proprement dit. Là, dans ces quelques toises carrées, quinze cents hommes tombèrent en moins d’une heure. Le mur semble prêt à recommencer le combat. Les trente-huit meurtrières percées par les Anglais à des hauteurs irrégulières, y sont encore. Devant la seizième sont couchées deux tombes anglaises en granit. Il n’y a de meurtrières qu’au mur sud; l’attaque principale venait de là. Ce mur est caché au dehors par une grande haie vive; les Français arrivèrent, croyant n’avoir affaire qu’à la haie, la franchirent, et trouvèrent ce mur, obstacle et embuscade, les gardes anglaises derrière, les trente-huit meurtrières faisant feu à la fois, un orage de mitraille et de balles; et la brigade Soye s’y brisa. Waterloo commença ainsi.

Le verger pourtant fut pris. On n’avait pas d’échelles, les Français grimpèrent avec les ongles. On se battit corps à corps sous les arbres. Toute cette herbe a été mouillée de sang. Un bataillon de Nassau, sept cents hommes, fut foudroyé là. Au dehors le mur, contre lequel furent braquées les deux batteries de Kellermann, est rongé par la mitraille.

Ce verger est sensible comme un autre au mois de mai. Il a ses boutons d’or et ses pâquerettes, l’herbe y est haute, des chevaux de charrue y paissent, des cordes de crin où sèche du linge traversent les intervalles des arbres et font baisser la tête aux passants, on marche dans cette friche et le pied enfonce dans les trous de taupes. Au milieu de l’herbe on remarque un tronc déraciné, gisant, verdissant. Le major Blackman s’y est adossé pour expirer. Sous un grand arbre voisin est tombé le général allemand Duplat, d’une famille française réfugiée à la révocation de l’édit de Nantes. Tout à côté se penche un vieux pommier malade pansé avec un bandage de paille et de terre glaise. Presque tous les pommiers tombent de vieillesse. Il n’y en a pas un qui n’ait sa balle ou son biscaïen. Les squelettes d’arbres morts abondent dans ce verger. Les corbeaux volent dans les branches, au fond il y a un bois plein de violettes.

Bauduin tué, Foy blessé, l’incendie, le massacre, le carnage, un ruisseau fait de sang anglais, de sang allemand et de sang français, furieusement mêlés, un puits comblé de cadavres, le régiment de Nassau et le régiment de Brunswick détruits, Duplat tué, Blackman tué, les gardes anglaises mutilées, vingt bataillons français, sur les quarante du corps de Reille, décimés, trois mille hommes, dans cette seule masure de Hougomont, sabrés, écharpés, égorgés, fusillés, brûlés; et tout cela pour qu’aujourd’hui un paysan dise à un voyageur: Monsieur, donnez-moi trois francs; si vous aimez, je vous expliquerai la chose de Waterloo!

Chapitre III

Le 18 juin 1815

Retournons en arrière, c’est un des droits du narrateur, et replaçons-nous en l’année 1815, et même un peu avant l’époque où commence l’action racontée dans la première partie de ce livre.

S’il n’avait pas plu dans la nuit du 17 au 18 juin 1815, l’avenir de l’Europe était changé. Quelques gouttes d’eau de plus ou de moins ont fait pencher Napoléon. Pour que Waterloo fût la fin d’Austerlitz, la providence n’a eu besoin que d’un peu de pluie, et un nuage traversant le ciel à contre-sens de la saison a suffi pour l’écroulement d’un monde.

La bataille de Waterloo, et ceci a donné à Blücher le temps d’arriver, n’a pu commencer qu’à onze heures et demie. Pourquoi? Parce que la terre était mouillée. Il a fallu attendre un peu de raffermissement pour que l’artillerie pût manœuvrer.

Napoléon était officier d’artillerie, et il s’en ressentait. Le fond de ce prodigieux capitaine, c’était l’homme qui, dans le rapport au Directoire sur Aboukir, disait: Tel de nos boulets a tué six hommes. Tous ses plans de bataille sont faits pour le projectile. Faire converger l’artillerie sur un point donné, c’était là sa clef de victoire. Il traitait la stratégie du général ennemi comme une citadelle, et il la battait en brèche. Il accablait le point faible de mitraille; il nouait et dénouait les batailles avec le canon. Il y avait du tir dans son génie. Enfoncer les carrés, pulvériser les régiments, rompre les lignes, broyer et disperser les masses, tout pour lui était là, frapper, frapper, frapper sans cesse, et il confiait cette besogne au boulet. Méthode redoutable, et qui, jointe au génie, a fait invincible pendant quinze ans ce sombre athlète du pugilat de la guerre.

Le 18 juin 1815, il comptait d’autant plus sur l’artillerie qu’il avait pour lui le nombre. Wellington n’avait que cent cinquante-neuf bouches à feu; Napoléon en avait deux cent quarante.

Supposez la terre sèche, l’artillerie pouvant rouler, l’action commençait à six heures du matin. La bataille était gagnée et finie à deux heures, trois heures avant la péripétie prussienne.

Quelle quantité de faute y a-t-il de la part de Napoléon dans la perte de cette bataille? le naufrage est-il imputable au pilote?

Le déclin physique évident de Napoléon se compliquait-il à cette époque d’une certaine diminution intérieure? les vingt ans de guerre avaient-ils usé la lame comme le fourreau, l’âme comme le corps? le vétéran se faisait-il fâcheusement sentir dans le capitaine? en un mot, ce génie, comme beaucoup d’historiens considérables l’ont cru, s’éclipsait-il? entrait-il en frénésie pour se déguiser à lui-même son affaiblissement? commençait-il à osciller sous l’égarement d’un souffle d’aventure? devenait-il, chose grave dans un général, inconscient du péril? dans cette classe de grands hommes matériels qu’on peut appeler les géants de l’action, y a-t-il un âge pour la myopie du génie? La vieillesse n’a pas de prise sur les génies de l’idéal; pour les Dantes et les Michel-Anges, vieillir, c’est croître; pour les Annibals et les Bonapartes, est-ce décroître? Napoléon avait-il perdu le sens direct de la victoire? en était-il à ne plus reconnaître l’écueil, à ne plus deviner le piège, à ne plus discerner le bord croulant des abîmes? manquait-il du flair des catastrophes? lui qui jadis savait toutes les routes du triomphe et qui, du haut de son char d’éclairs, les indiquait d’un doigt souverain, avait-il maintenant cet ahurissement sinistre de mener aux précipices son tumultueux attelage de légions? était-il pris, à quarante-six ans, d’une folie suprême? ce cocher titanique du destin n’était-il plus qu’un immense casse-cou?

Nous ne le pensons point. Son plan de bataille était, de l’aveu de tous, un chef-d’œuvre. Aller droit au centre de la ligne alliée, faire un trou dans l’ennemi, le couper en deux, pousser la moitié britannique sur Hal et la moitié prussienne sur Tongres, faire de Wellington et de Blücher deux tronçons; enlever Mont-Saint-Jean, saisir Bruxelles, jeter l’Allemand dans le Rhin et l’Anglais dans la mer. Tout cela, pour Napoléon, était dans cette bataille. Ensuite on verrait.

Il va sans dire que nous ne prétendons pas faire ici l’histoire de Waterloo; une des scènes génératrices du drame que nous racontons se rattache à cette bataille; mais cette histoire n’est pas notre sujet; cette histoire d’ailleurs est faite, et faite magistralement, à un point de vue par Napoléon, à l’autre point de vue par toute une pléiade d’historiens. Quant à nous, nous laissons les historiens aux prises, nous ne sommes qu’un témoin à distance, un passant dans la plaine, un chercheur penché sur cette terre pétrie de chair humaine, prenant peut-être des apparences pour des réalités; nous n’avons pas le droit de tenir tête, au nom de la science, à un ensemble de faits où il y a sans doute du mirage, nous n’avons ni la pratique militaire ni la compétence stratégique qui autorisent un système; selon nous, un enchaînement de hasards domine à Waterloo les deux capitaines; et quand il s’agit du destin, ce mystérieux accusé, nous jugeons comme le peuple, ce juge naïf.

Chapitre IV

A

Ceux qui veulent se figurer nettement la bataille de Waterloo n’ont qu’à coucher sur le sol par la pensée un A majuscule. Le jambage gauche de l’A est la route de Nivelles, le jambage droit est la route de Genappe, la corde de l’A est le chemin creux d’Ohain à Braine-l’Alleud. Le sommet de l’A est Mont-Saint-Jean, là est Wellington; la pointe gauche inférieure est Hougomont, là est Reille avec Jérôme Bonaparte; la pointe droite inférieure est la Belle-Alliance, là est Napoléon. Un peu au-dessous du point où la corde de l’A rencontre et coupe le jambage droit est la Haie-Sainte. Au milieu de cette corde est le point précis où s’est dit le mot final de la bataille. C’est là qu’on a placé le lion, symbole involontaire du suprême héroïsme de la garde impériale.

Le triangle compris au sommet de l’A, entre les deux jambages et la corde, est le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean. La dispute de ce plateau fut toute la bataille.

Les ailes des deux armées s’étendent à droite et à gauche des deux routes de Genappe et de Nivelles; d’Erlon faisant face à Picton, Reille faisant face à Hill.

Derrière la pointe de l’A, derrière le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean, est la forêt de Soignes.

Quant à la plaine en elle-même, qu’on se représente un vaste terrain ondulant; chaque pli domine le pli suivant, et toutes les ondulations montent vers Mont-Saint-Jean, et y aboutissent à la forêt.

Deux troupes ennemies sur un champ de bataille sont deux lutteurs. C’est un bras-le-corps. L’une cherche à faire glisser l’autre. On se cramponne à tout; un buisson est un point d’appui; un angle de mur est un épaulement; faute d’une bicoque où s’adosser, un régiment lâche pied; un ravalement de la plaine, un mouvement de terrain, un sentier transversal à propos, un bois, un ravin, peuvent arrêter le talon de ce colosse qu’on appelle une armée et l’empêcher de reculer. Qui sort du champ est battu. De là, pour le chef responsable, la nécessité d’examiner la moindre touffe d’arbres, et d’approfondir le moindre relief.

Les deux généraux avaient attentivement étudié la plaine de Mont-Saint-Jean, dite aujourd’hui plaine de Waterloo. Dès l’année précédente, Wellington, avec une sagacité prévoyante, l’avait examinée comme un en-cas de grande bataille. Sur ce terrain et pour ce duel, le 18 juin, Wellington avait le bon côté, Napoléon le mauvais. L’armée anglaise était en haut, l’armée française en bas.

Esquisser ici l’aspect de Napoléon, à cheval, sa lunette à la main, sur la hauteur de Rossomme, à l’aube du 18 juin 1815, cela est presque de trop. Avant qu’on le montre, tout le monde l’a vu. Ce profil calme sous le petit chapeau de l’école de Brienne, cet uniforme vert, le revers blanc cachant la plaque, la redingote grise cachant les épaulettes, l’angle du cordon rouge sous le gilet, la culotte de peau, le cheval blanc avec sa housse de velours pourpre ayant aux coins des N couronnées et des aigles, les bottes à l’écuyère sur des bas de soie, les éperons d’argent, l’épée de Marengo, toute cette figure du dernier césar est debout dans les imaginations, acclamée des uns, sévèrement regardée par les autres.

Cette figure a été longtemps toute dans la lumière; cela tenait à un certain obscurcissement légendaire que la plupart des héros dégagent et qui voile toujours plus ou moins longtemps la vérité; mais aujourd’hui l’histoire et le jour se font.

Cette clarté, l’histoire, est impitoyable; elle a cela d’étrange et de divin que, toute lumière qu’elle est, et précisément parce qu’elle est lumière, elle met souvent de l’ombre là où l’on voyait des rayons; du même homme elle fait deux fantômes différents, et l’un attaque l’autre, et en fait justice, et les ténèbres du despote luttent avec l’éblouissement du capitaine. De là une mesure plus vraie dans l’appréciation définitive des peuples. Babylone violée diminue Alexandre; Rome enchaînée diminue César; Jérusalem tuée diminue Titus. La tyrannie suit le tyran. C’est un malheur pour un homme de laisser derrière lui de la nuit qui a sa forme.

Chapitre V

Le quid obscurum des batailles

Tout le monde connaît la première phase de cette bataille; début trouble, incertain, hésitant, menaçant pour les deux armées, mais pour les Anglais plus encore que pour les Français.

Il avait plu toute la nuit; la terre était défoncée par l’averse; l’eau s’était çà et là amassée dans les creux de la plaine comme dans des cuvettes; sur de certains points les équipages du train en avaient jusqu’à l’essieu; les sous-ventrières des attelages dégouttaient de boue liquide; si les blés et les seigles couchés par cette cohue de charrois en masse n’eussent comblé les ornières et fait litière sous les roues, tout mouvement, particulièrement dans les vallons du côté de Papelotte, eût été impossible.

L’affaire commença tard; Napoléon, nous l’avons expliqué, avait l’habitude de tenir toute l’artillerie dans sa main comme un pistolet, visant tantôt tel point, tantôt tel autre de la bataille, et il avait voulu attendre que les batteries attelées pussent rouler et galoper librement; il fallait pour cela que le soleil parût et séchât le sol. Mais le soleil ne parut pas. Ce n’était plus le rendez-vous d’Austerlitz. Quand le premier coup de canon fut tiré, le général anglais Colville regarda à sa montre et constata qu’il était onze heures trente-cinq minutes.

L’action s’engagea avec furie, plus de furie peut-être que l’empereur n’eût voulu, par l’aile gauche française sur Hougomont. En même temps Napoléon attaqua le centre en précipitant la brigade Quiot sur la Haie-Sainte, et Ney poussa l’aile droite française contre l’aile gauche anglaise qui s’appuyait sur Papelotte.

L’attaque sur Hougomont avait quelque simulation: attirer là Wellington, le faire pencher à gauche, tel était le plan. Ce plan eût réussi, si les quatre compagnies des gardes anglaises et les braves Belges de la division Perponcher n’eussent solidement gardé la position, et Wellington, au lieu de s’y masser, put se borner à y envoyer pour tout renfort quatre autres compagnies de gardes et un bataillon de Brunswick.

L’attaque de l’aile droite française sur Papelotte était à fond; culbuter la gauche anglaise, couper la route de Bruxelles, barrer le passage aux Prussiens possibles, forcer Mont-Saint-Jean, refouler Wellington sur

Hougomont, de là sur Braine-l'Alleud, de là sur Hal, rien de plus net. À part quelques incidents, cette attaque réussit. Papelotte fut pris; la Haie-Sainte fut enlevée.

Détail à noter. Il y avait dans l'infanterie anglaise, particulièrement dans la brigade de Kempt, force recrues. Ces jeunes soldats, devant nos redoutables fantassins, furent vaillants; leur inexpérience se tira intrépidement d'affaire; ils firent surtout un excellent service de tirailleurs; le soldat en tirailleur, un peu livré à lui-même, devient pour ainsi dire son propre général; ces recrues montrèrent quelque chose de l'invention et de la furie françaises. Cette infanterie novice eut de la verve. Ceci déplut à Wellington.

Après la prise de la Haie-Sainte, la bataille vacilla.

Il y a dans cette journée, de midi à quatre heures, un intervalle obscur; le milieu de cette bataille est presque indistinct et participe du sombre de la mêlée. Le crépuscule s'y fait. On aperçoit de vastes fluctuations dans cette brume, un mirage vertigineux, l'attirail de guerre d'alors presque inconnu aujourd'hui, les colbacks à flamme, les sabretaches flottantes, les buffleteries croisées, les gibernes à grenade, les dolmans des hussards, les bottes rouges à mille plis, les lourds shakos enguirlandés de torsades, l'infanterie presque noire de Brunswick mêlée à l'infanterie écarlate d'Angleterre, les soldats anglais ayant aux entournures pour épaulettes de gros bourrelets blancs circulaires, les chevau-légers hanovriens avec leur casque de cuir oblong à bandes de cuivre et à crinières de crins rouges, les Écossais aux genoux nus et aux plaids quadrillés, les grandes guêtres blanches de nos grenadiers, des tableaux, non des lignes stratégiques, ce qu'il faut à Salvator Rosa, non ce qu'il faut à Gribeauval.

Une certaine quantité de tempête se mêle toujours à une bataille. Quid obscurum, quid divinum. Chaque historien trace un peu le linéament qui lui plaît dans ces pêle-mêle. Quelle que soit la combinaison des généraux, le choc des masses armées a d'incalculables reflux; dans l'action, les deux plans des deux chefs entrent l'un dans l'autre et se déforment l'un par l'autre. Tel point du champ de bataille dévore plus de combattants que tel autre, comme ces sols plus ou moins spongieux qui boivent plus ou moins vite l'eau qu'on y jette. On est obligé de reverser là plus de soldats qu'on ne voudrait. Dépenses qui sont l'imprévu. La ligne de bataille flotte et serpente comme un fil, les traînées de sang ruissellent illogiquement, les fronts des armées ondoient, les régiments entrant ou sortant font des caps ou des golfes, tous ces écueils remuent continuellement les uns devant les autres; où était l’infanterie, l’artillerie arrive; où était l’artillerie, accourt la cavalerie; les bataillons sont des fumées. Il y avait là quelque chose, cherchez, c’est disparu; les éclaircies se déplacent; les plis sombres avancent et reculent; une sorte de vent du sépulcre pousse, refoule, enfle et disperse ces multitudes tragiques. Qu’est-ce qu’une mêlée? une oscillation. L’immobilité d’un plan mathématique exprime une minute et non une journée. Pour peindre une bataille, il faut de ces puissants peintres qui aient du chaos dans le pinceau; Rembrandt vaut mieux que Van Der Meulen. Van der Meulen, exact à midi, ment à trois heures. La géométrie trompe; l’ouragan seul est vrai. C’est ce qui donne à Folard le droit de contredire Polybe. Ajoutons qu’il y a toujours un certain instant où la bataille dégénère en combat, se particularise, et s’éparpille en d’innombrables faits de détails qui, pour emprunter l’expression de Napoléon lui-même, «appartiennent plutôt à la biographie des régiments qu’à l’histoire de l’armée». L’historien, en ce cas, a le droit évident de résumé. Il ne peut que saisir les contours principaux de la lutte, et il n’est donné à aucun narra-teur, si consciencieux qu’il soit, de fixer absolument la forme de ce nuage horrible, qu’on appelle une bataille.

Ceci, qui est vrai de tous les grands chocs armés, est particulièrement applicable à Waterloo.

Toutefois, dans l’après-midi, à un certain moment, la bataille se précisa.

Chapitre VI

Quatre heures de l’après-midi

Vers quatre heures, la situation de l’armée anglaise était grave. Le prince d’Orange commandait le centre, Hill l’aile droite, Picton l’aile gauche. Le prince d’Orange, éperdu et intrépide, criait aux Hollando-Belges: Nassau! Brunswick! jamais en arrière! Hill, affaibli, venait s’adosser à Wellington, Picton était mort. Dans la même minute où les Anglais avaient enlevé aux Français le drapeau du 105ème de ligne, les Français avaient tué aux Anglais le général Picton, d’une balle à travers la tête. La bataille, pour Wellington, avait deux points d’appui, Hougomont et la Hale-Sainte; Hougomont tenait encore, mais brûlait; la Haie-Sainte était prise. Du bataillon allemand qui la défendait, quarante-deux hommes seulement survivaient; tous les officiers, moins cinq, étaient morts ou pris. Trois mille combattants s’étaient massacrés dans cette grange. Un sergent des gardes anglaises, le premier boxeur de l’Angleterre, réputé par ses compagnons invulnérable, y avait été tué par un petit tambour français. Baring était délogé. Alten était sabré. Plusieurs drapeaux étaient perdus, dont un de la division Alten, et un du bataillon de Lunebourg porté par un prince de la famille de Deux-Ponts. Les Écossais gris n’existaient plus; les gros dragons de Ponsonby étaient hachés. Cette vaillante cavalerie avait plié sous les lanciers de Bro et sous les cuirassiers de Travers; de douze cents chevaux il en restait six cents; des trois lieutenants-colonels, deux étaient à terre, Hamilton blessé, Mater tué. Ponsonby était tombé, troué de sept coups de lance. Gordon était mort, Marsh était mort. Deux divisions, la cinquième et la sixième, étaient détruites.

Hougomont entamé, la Haie-Sainte prise, il n’y avait plus qu’un nœud, le centre. Ce nœud-là tenait toujours. Wellington le renforça. Il y appela Hill qui était à Merbe-Braine, il y appela Chassé qui était à Braine-l’Alleud.

Le centre de l’armée anglaise, un peu concave, très dense et très compact, était fortement situé. Il occupait le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean, ayant derrière lui le village et devant lui la pente, assez âpre alors. Il s’adossait à cette forte maison de pierre, qui était à cette époque un bien domanial de Nivelles et qui marque l’intersection des routes, masse du seizième siècle si robuste que les boulets y ricochaient sans l’entamer. Tout autour du plateau, les Anglais avaient taillé çà et là les haies, fait des embrasures dans les aubépines, mis une gueule de canon entre deux branches, crénelé les buissons. Leur artillerie était en embuscade sous les broussailles. Ce travail punique, incontestablement autorisé par la guerre qui admet le piège, était si bien fait que Haxo, envoyé par l'empereur à neuf heures du matin pour reconnaître les batteries ennemies, n'en avait rien vu, et était revenu dire à Napoléon qu'il n'y avait pas d'obstacle, hors les deux barricades barrant les routes de Nivelles et de Genappe. C'était le moment où la moisson est haute; sur la lisière du plateau, un bataillon de la brigade de Kempt, le 951, armé de carabines, était couché dans les grands blés.

Ainsi assuré et contre-buté, le centre de l'armée anglo-hollandaise était en bonne posture.

Le péril de cette position était la forêt de Soignes, alors contiguë au champ de bataille et coupée par les étangs de Groe-nendael et de Boitsfort. Une armée n'eût pu y reculer sans se dissoudre; les régiments s'y fussent tout de suite désagrégés. L'artillerie s'y fût perdue dans les marais. La retraite, selon l'opinion de plusieurs hommes du métier, contestée par d'autres, il est vrai, eût été là un sauve-qui-peut.

Wellington ajouta à ce centre une brigade de Chassé, ôtée à l'aile droite, et une brigade de Wincke, ôtée à l'aile gauche, plus la division Clinton. À ses Anglais, aux régiments de Halkett, à la brigade de Mitchell, aux gardes de Maitland, il donna comme épaulements et contreforts l'infanterie de Brunswick, le contingent de Nassau, les Hanovriens de Kielmansegge et les Allemands d'Ompteda. Cela lui mit sous la main vingt-six bataillons. L'aile droite, comme dit Charras, fut rabattue derrière le centre. Une batterie énorme était masquée par des sacs à terre à l'endroit où est aujourd'hui ce qu'on appelle «le musée de Waterloo». Wellington avait en outre dans un pli de terrain les dragons-gardes de Somerset, quatorze cents chevaux. C'était l'autre moitié de cette cavalerie anglaise, si justement célèbre. Ponsonby détruit, restait Somerset.

La batterie, qui, achevée, eût été presque une redoute, était disposée derrière un mur de jardin très bas, revêtu à la hâte d'une chemise de sacs de sable et d'un large talus de terre. Cet ouvrage n'était pas fini; on n'avait pas eu le temps de le palissader.

Wellington, inquiet, mais impassible, était à cheval, et y demeura toute la journée dans la même attitude, un peu en avant du vieux moulin de Mont-Saint-Jean, qui existe encore, sous un orme qu'un Anglais, depuis, vandale enthousiaste, a acheté deux cents francs, scié et emporté. Wellington fut là froidement héroïque. Les boulets pleuvaient. L'aide de camp Gordon venait de tomber à côté de lui. Lord Hill, lui montrant un obus qui éclatait, lui dit: — Mylord, quelles sont vos instructions, et quels ordres nous laissez-vous si vous vous faites tuer? — De faire comme moi, répondit Wellington. À Clinton, il dit laconiquement: — Tenir ici jusqu'au dernier homme. — La journée visiblement tournait mal. Wellington criait à ses anciens compagnons de Talavera, de Vitoria et de Salamanque: — Boys (garçons)! est-ce qu'on peut songer à lâcher pied? pensez à la vieille Angleterre!

Vers quatre heures, la ligne anglaise s'ébranla en arrière. Tout à coup on ne vit plus sur la crête du plateau que l'artillerie et les tirailleurs, le reste disparut; les régiments, chassés par les obus et les boulets français, se replièrent dans le fond que coupe encore aujourd'hui le sentier de service de la ferme de Mont-Saint-Jean, un mouvement rétrograde se fit, le front de bataille anglais se déroba, Wellington recula. — Commencement de retraite! cria Napoléon.

Chapitre VII

Napoléon de belle humeur

L’empereur, quoique malade et gêné à cheval par une souffrance locale, n’avait jamais été de si bonne humeur que ce jour-là. Depuis le matin, son impénétrabilité souriait. Le 18 juin 1815, cette âme profonde, masquée de marbre, rayonnait aveuglément. L’homme qui avait été sombre à Austerlitz fut gai à Waterloo. Les plus grands prédestinés font de ces contre-sens. Nos joies sont de l’ombre. Le suprême sourire est à Dieu.

Ridet Caesar, Pompeius flebit, disaient les légionnaires de la légion Fulminatrix. Pompée cette fois ne devait pas pleurer, mais il est certain que César riait.

Dès la veille, la nuit, à une heure, explorant à cheval, sous l’orage et sous la pluie, avec Bertrand, les collines qui avoisinent Rossomme, satisfait de voir la longue ligne des feux anglais illuminant tout l’horizon de Frischemont à Braine-l’Alleud, il lui avait semblé que le destin, assigné par lui à jour fixe sur ce champ de Waterloo, était exact; il avait arrêté son cheval, et était demeuré quelque temps immobile, regardant les éclairs, écoutant le tonnerre, et on avait entendu ce fataliste jeter dans l’ombre cette parole mystérieuse: «Nous sommes d’accord.» Napoléon se trompait. Ils n’étaient plus d’accord.

Il n’avait pas pris une minute de sommeil, tous les instants de cette nuit-là avaient été marqués pour lui par une joie. Il avait parcouru toute la ligne des grand’gardes, en s’arrêtent çà et là pour parler aux vedettes. À deux heures et demie, près du bois d’Hougomont, il avait entendu le pas d’une colonne en marche; il avait cru un moment à la reculade de Wellington. Il avait dit à Bertrand: C’est l’arrière-garde anglaise qui s’ébranle pour décamper. Je ferai prisonniers les six mille Anglais qui viennent d’arriver à Ostende. Il causait avec expansion; il avait retrouvé cette verve du débarquement du 1er mars, quand il montrait au grand-maréchal le paysan enthousiaste du golfe Juan, en s’écriant: — Eh bien, Bertrand, voilà déjà du renfort! La nuit du 17 au 18 juin, il raillait Wellington. — Ce petit Anglais a besoin d’une leçon, disait Napoléon. La pluie redoublait, il tonnait pendant que l’empereur parlait.

À trois heures et demie du matin, il avait perdu une illusion; des officiers envoyés en reconnaissance lui avaient annoncé que l’ennemi ne faisait aucun mouvement. Rien ne bougeait; pas un feu de bivouac n’était éteint. L’armée anglaise dormait. Le silence était profond sur la terre; il n’y avait de bruit que dans le ciel. À quatre heures, un paysan lui avait été amené par les coureurs; ce paysan avait servi de guide à une brigade de cavalerie anglaise, probablement la brigade Vivian, qui allait prendre position au village d’Ohain, à l’extrême gauche. À cinq heures, deux déserteurs belges lui avaient rapporté qu’ils venaient de quitter leur régiment, et que l’armée anglaise attendait la bataille. Tant mieux! s’était écrié Napoléon. J’aime encore mieux les culbuter que les refouler.

Le matin, sur la berge qui fait l’angle du chemin de Plancenoit, il avait mis pied à terre dans la boue, s’était fait apporter de la ferme de Rossomme une table de cuisine et une chaise de paysan, s’était assis, avec une botte de paille pour tapis, et avait déployé sur la table la carte du champ de bataille, en disant à Soult: Joli échiquier!

Par suite des pluies de la nuit, les convois de vivres, empêtrés dans des routes défoncées, n’avaient pu arriver le matin, le soldat n’avait pas dormi, était mouillé, et était à jeun; cela n’avait pas empêché Napoléon de crier allégrement à Ney: Nous avons quatre-vingt-dix chances sur cent. À huit heures, on avait apporté le déjeuner de l’empereur. Il y avait invité plusieurs généraux. Tout en déjeunant, on avait raconté que Wellington était l’avant-veille au bal à Bruxelles, chez la duchesse de Richmond, et Soult, rude homme de guerre avec une figure d’archevêque, avait dit: Le bal, c’est aujourd’hui. L’empereur avait plaisanté Ney qui disait: Wellington ne sera pas assez simple pour attendre Votre Majesté. C’était là d’ailleurs sa manière. Il badinait volontiers, dit Fleury de Chaboulon. Le fond de son caractère était une humeur enjouée, dit Gourgaud. Il abondait en plaisanteries, plutôt bizarres que spirituelles, dit Benjamin Constant. Ces gaîtés de géant valent la peine qu’on y insiste. C’est lui qui avait appelé ses grenadiers «les grognards»; il leur pinçait l’oreille, il leur tirait la moustache. L’empereur ne faisait que nous faire des niches; ceci est un mot de l’un d’eux. Pendant le mystérieux trajet de l’île d’Elbe en France, le 27 février, en pleine mer, le brick de guerre français le Zéphir ayant rencontré le brick l’Inconstant où Napoléon était caché et ayant demandé à l’Inconstant des nouvelles de Napoléon, l’empereur, qui avait encore en ce moment-là à son chapeau la cocarde blanche et amarante semée d’abeilles, adoptée par lui à l’île d’Elbe, avait pris en riant le porte-voix et avait répondu lui-même: L’empereur se porte bien. Qui rit de la sorte est en familiarité avec les événements. Napoléon avait eu plusieurs accès de ce rire pendant le déjeuner de Waterloo. Après le déjeuner il s’était recueilli un quart d’heure, puis deux généraux s’étaient assis sur la botte de paille, une plume à la main, une feuille de papier sur le genou, et l’empereur leur avait dicté l’ordre de bataille.

À neuf heures, à l’instant où l’armée française, échelonnée et mise en mouvement sur cinq colonnes, s’était déployée, les divisions sur deux lignes, l’artillerie entre les brigades, musique en tête, battant aux champs, avec les roulements des tambours et les sonneries des trompettes, puissante, vaste, joyeuse, mer de casques, de sabres et de bayonnettes sur l’ho-rizon, l’empereur, ému, s’était écrié à deux reprises: Magnifique! magnifique!

De neuf heures à dix heures et demie, toute l’armée, ce qui semble incroyable, avait pris position et s’était rangée sur six lignes, formant, pour répéter l’expression de l’empereur, «la figure de six V». Quelques instants après la formation du front de bataille, au milieu de ce profond silence de commencement d’orage qui précède les mêlées, voyant défiler les trois batteries de douze, détachées sur son ordre des trois corps de d’Erlon, de Reille et de Lobau, et destinées à commencer l’action en battant Mont-Saint-Jean où est l’intersection des routes de Nivelles et de Genappe, l’empereur avait frappé sur l’épaule de Haxo en lui disant: Voilà vingt-quatre belles filles, général.

Sûr de l’issue, il avait encouragé d’un sourire, à son passage devant lui, la compagnie de sapeurs du premier corps, désignée par lui pour se barricader dans Mont-Saint-Jean, sitôt le village enlevé. Toute cette sérénité n’avait été traversée que par un mot de pitié hautaine; en voyant à sa gauche, à un endroit où il y a aujourd’hui une grande tombe, se masser avec leurs chevaux superbes ces admirables Écossais gris, il avait dit: C’est dommage.

Puis il était monté à cheval, s’était porté en avant de Rossomme, et avait choisi pour observatoire une étroite croupe de gazon à droite de la route de Genappe à Bruxelles, qui fut sa seconde station pendant la bataille. La troisième station, celle de sept heures du soir, entre la Belle-Alliance et la Haie-Sainte, est redoutable; c’est un tertre assez élevé qui existe encore et derrière lequel la garde était massée dans une déclivité de la plaine. Autour de ce tertre, les boulets ricochaient sur le pavé de la chaussée jusqu’à

Napoléon. Comme à Brienne, il avait sur sa tête le sifflement des balles et des biscayens. On a ramassé, presque à l'endroit où étaient les pieds de son cheval, des boulets vermoulus, de vieilles lames de sabre et des projectiles informes, mangés de rouille. Scabra rubigine. Il y a quelques années, on y a déterré un obus de soixante, encore chargé, dont la fusée s'était brisée au ras de la bombe. C'est à cette dernière station que l'empereur disait à son guide Lacoste, paysan hostile, effaré, attaché à la selle d'un hussard, se retournant à chaque paquet de mitraille, et tâchant de se cacher derrière lui: — Imbécile! c'est honteux, tu vas te faire tuer dans le dos. Celui qui écrit ces lignes, a trouvé lui-même dans le talus friable de ce tertre, en creusant le sable, les restes du col d'une bombe désagrégés par l'oxyde de quarante-six années, et de vieux tronçons de fer qui cassaient comme des bâtons de sureau entre ses doigts.

Les ondulations des plaines diversement inclinées où eut lieu la rencontre de Napoléon et de Wellington ne sont plus, personne ne l'ignore, ce qu'elles étaient le 18 juin 1815. En prenant à ce champ funèbre de quoi lui faire un monument, on lui a ôté son relief réel, et l'histoire, déconcertée, ne s'y reconnaît plus. Pour le glorifier, on l'a défiguré. Wellington, deux ans après, revoyant Waterloo, s'est écrié: On m'a changé mon champ de bataille. Là où est aujourd'hui la grosse pyramide de terre surmontée du lion, il y avait une crête qui, vers la route de Nivelles, s'abaissait en rampe praticable, mais qui, du côté de la chaussée de Genappe, était presque un escarpement. L'élévation de cet escarpement peut encore être mesurée aujourd'hui par la hauteur des deux tertres des deux grandes sépultures qui encaissent la route de Genappe à Bruxelles; l'une, le tombeau anglais, à gauche; l'autre, le tombeau allemand, à droite. Il n'y a point de tombeau français. Pour la France, toute cette plaine est sépulcre. Grâce aux mille et mille charretées de terre employées à la butte de cent cinquante pieds de haut et d'un demi-mille de circuit, le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean est aujourd'hui accessible en pente douce; le jour de la bataille, surtout du côté de la Haie-Sainte, il était d'un abord âpre et abrupt. Le versant là était si incliné que les canons anglais ne voyaient pas au-dessous d'eux la ferme située au fond du vallon, centre du combat. Le 18 juin 1815, les pluies avaient encore raviné cette roideur, la fange compliquait la montée, et non seulement on gravissait, mais on s'embourbait. Le long de la crête du plateau courait une sorte de fossé impossible à deviner pour un observateur lointain.

Qu’était-ce que ce fossé? Disons-le. Braine-l’Alleud est un village de Belgique, Ohain en est un autre. Ces villages, cachés tous les deux dans des courbes de terrain, sont joints par un chemin d’une lieue et demie environ qui traverse une plaine à niveau ondulant, et souvent entre et s’enfonce dans des collines comme un sillon, ce qui fait que sur divers points cette route est un ravin. En 1815, comme aujourd’hui, cette route coupait la crête du plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean entre les deux chaussées de Genappe et de Nivelles; seulement, elle est aujourd’hui de plain-pied avec la plaine; elle était alors chemin creux. On lui a pris ses deux talus pour la butte-monument. Cette route était et est encore une tranchée dans la plus grande partie de son parcours; tranchée creuse quelquefois d’une douzaine de pieds et dont les talus trop escarpés s’écroulaient çà et là, surtout en hiver, sous les averses. Des accidents y arrivaient. La route était si étroite à l’entrée de Braine-l’Alleud qu’un passant y avait été broyé par un chariot, comme le constate une croix de pierre debout près du cimetière qui donne le nom du mort, Monsieur Bernard Debrye, marchand à Bruxelles, et la date de l’accident, février 1637 . Elle était si profonde sur le plateau du Mont-Saint-Jean qu’un paysan, Mathieu Nicaise, y avait été écrasé en 1783 par un éboulement du talus, comme le constatait une autre croix de pierre dont le faîte a disparu dans les défrichements, mais dont le piédestal renversé est encore visible aujourd’hui sur la pente du gazon à gauche de la chaussée entre la Haie-Sainte et la ferme de Mont-Saint-Jean.

Un jour de bataille, ce chemin creux dont rien n’avertissait, bordant la crête de Mont-Saint-Jean, fossé au sommet de l’es-carpement, ornière cachée dans les terres, était invisible, c’est-à-dire terrible.

Chapitre VIII

L’empereur fait une question au guide Lacoste

Donc, le matin de Waterloo, Napoléon était content.

Il avait raison; le plan de bataille conçu par lui, nous l’avons constaté, était en effet admirable.

Une fois la bataille engagée, ses péripéties très diverses, la résistance d’Hougomont, la ténacité de la Haie-Sainte, Bauduin tué, Foy mis hors de combat, la muraille inattendue où s’était brisée la brigade Soye, l’étourderie fatale de Guilleminot n’ayant ni pétards ni sacs à poudre, l’embourbement des batteries, les quinze pièces sans escorte culbutées par Uxbridge dans un chemin creux, le peu d’effet des bombes tombant dans les lignes anglaises, s’y enfouissant dans le sol détrempé par les pluies et ne réussissant qu’à y faire des volcans de boue, de sorte que la mitraille se changeait en éclaboussure, l’inutilité de la démonstration de Piré sur Braine-l’Alleud, toute cette cavalerie, quinze escadrons, à peu près annulée, l’aile droite anglaise mal inquiétée, l’aile gauche mal entamée, l’étrange malentendu de Ney massant, au lieu de les échelonner, les quatre divisions du premier corps, des épaisseurs de vingt-sept rangs et des fronts de deux cents hommes livrés de la sorte à la mitraille, l’effrayante trouée des boulets dans ces masses, les colonnes d’attaque désunies, la batterie d’écharpe brusquement démasquée sur leur flanc Bourgeois, Donzelot et Durutte compromis, Quiot repoussé, le lieutenant Vieux, cet hercule sorti de l’école polytechnique, blessé au moment où il enfonçait à coups de hache la porte de la Haie-Sainte sous le feu plongeant de la barricade anglaise barrant le coude de la route de Genappe à Bruxelles, la division Marcognet, prise entre l’infanterie et la cavalerie, fusillée à bout portant dans les blés par Best et Pack, sabrée par Ponsonby, sa batterie de sept pièces enclouée, le prince de Saxe-Weimar tenant et gardant, malgré le comte d’Erlon, Frischemont et Smohain, le drapeau du 105ème pris, le drapeau du 45ème pris, ce hussard noir prussien arrêté par les coureurs de la colonne volante de trois cents chasseurs battant l’estrade entre Wavre et Plancenoit, les choses inquiétantes que ce prisonnier avait dites, le retard de Grouchy, les quinze cents hommes tués en moins d’une heure dans le verger d’Hougomont, les dix-huit cents hommes couchés en moins de temps encore autour de la Haie-Sainte, tous ces incidents orageux, passant comme les nuées de la bataille devant Napoléon, avaient à peine troublé son regard et n'avaient point assombri cette face impériale de la certitude. Napoléon était habitué à regarder la guerre fixement; il ne faisait jamais chiffre à chiffre l'addition poignante du détail; les chiffres lui importaient peu, pourvu qu'ils donnassent ce total: victoire; que les commencements s'égarassent, il ne s'en alarmait point, lui qui se croyait maître et possesseur de la fin; il savait attendre, se supposant hors de question, et il traitait le destin d'égal à égal. Il paraissait dire au sort: tu n'oserais pas.

Mi-parti lumière et ombre, Napoléon se sentait protégé dans le bien et toléré dans le mal. Il avait, ou croyait avoir pour lui, une connivence, on pourrait presque dire une complicité des événements, équivalente à l'antique invulnérabilité.

Pourtant, quand on a derrière soi la Bérésina, Leipsick et Fontainebleau, il semble qu'on pourrait se défier de Waterloo. Un mystérieux froncement de sourcil devient visible au fond du ciel.

Au moment où Wellington rétrograda, Napoléon tressaillit. Il vit subitement le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean se dégarnir et le front de l'armée anglaise disparaître. Elle se ralliait, mais se dérobait. L'empereur se souleva à demi sur ses étriers. L'éclair de la victoire passa dans ses yeux.

Wellington acculé à la forêt de Soignes et détruit, c'était le terrassement définitif de l'Angleterre par la France; c'était Crécy, Poitiers, Malplaquet et Ramillies vengés. L'homme de Marengo raturait Azincourt.

L'empereur alors, méditant la péripétie terrible, promena une dernière fois sa lunette sur tous les points du champ de bataille. Sa garde, l'arme au pied derrière lui, l'observait d'en bas avec une sorte de religion. Il songeait; il examinait les versants, notait les pentes, scrutait le bouquet d'arbres, le carré de seigles, le sentier; il semblait compter chaque buisson. Il regarda avec quelque fixité les barricades anglaises des deux chaussées, deux larges abatis d'arbres, celle de la chaussée de Genappe au-dessus de la Haie-Sainte, armée de deux canons, les seuls de toute l'artillerie anglaise qui vissent le fond du champ de bataille, et celle de la chaussée de Nivelles où étincelaient les bayonnettes hollandaises de la brigade Chassé. Il remarqua près de cette barricade la vieille chapelle de Saint-Nicolas peinte en blanc qui est à l'angle de la traverse vers Braine-l'Alleud. Il se pencha et parla à demi-voix au guide Lacoste. Le guide fit un signe de tête négatif, probablement perfide.

L’empereur se redressa et se recueillit.

Wellington avait reculé. Il ne restait plus qu’à achever ce recul par un écrasement. Napoléon, se retournant brusquement, expédia une estafette à franc étrier à Paris pour y annoncer que la bataille était gagnée.

Napoléon était un de ces génies d’où sort le tonnerre.

Il venait de trouver son coup de foudre.

Il donna l’ordre aux cuirassiers de Milhaud d’enlever le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean.

Chapitre IX

L'inattendu

Ils étaient trois mille cinq cents. Ils faisaient un front d'un quart de lieue. C'étaient des hommes géants sur des chevaux colosses. Ils étaient vingt-six escadrons; et ils avaient derrière eux, pour les appuyer, la division de Lefebvre-Desnouettes, les cent six gendarmes d'élite, les chasseurs de la garde, onze cent quatre-vingt-dix-sept hommes, et les lanciers de la garde, huit cent quatre-vingts lances. Ils portaient le casque sans crins et la cuirasse de fer battu, avec les pistolets d'arçon dans les fontes et le long sabre-épée. Le matin toute l'armée les avait admirés quand, à neuf heures, les clairons sonnant, toutes les musiques chantant Veillons au salut de l'empire, ils étaient venus, colonne épaisse, une de leurs batteries à leur flanc, l'autre à leur centre, se déployer sur deux rangs entre la chaussée de Genappe et Frischemont, et prendre leur place de bataille dans cette puissante deuxième ligne, si savamment composée par Napoléon, laquelle, ayant à son extrémité de gauche les cuirassiers de Kellermann et à son extrémité de droite les cuirassiers de Milhaud, avait, pour ainsi dire, deux ailes de fer.

L'aide de camp Bernard leur porta l'ordre de l'empereur. Ney tira son épée et prit la tête. Les escadrons énormes s'ébranlèrent.

Alors on vit un spectacle formidable.

Toute cette cavalerie, sabres levés, étendards et trompettes au vent, formée en colonne par division, descendit, d'un même mouvement et comme un seul homme, avec la précision d'un bélier de bronze qui ouvre une brèche, la colline de la Belle-Alliance, s'enfonça dans le fond redoutable où tant d'hommes déjà étaient tombés, y disparut dans la fumée, puis, sortant de cette ombre, reparut de l'autre côté du vallon, toujours compacte et serrée, montant au grand trot, à travers un nuage de mitraille crevant sur elle, l'épouvantable pente de boue du plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean. Ils montaient, graves, menaçants, imperturbables; dans les intervalles de la mousqueterie et de l'artillerie, on entendait ce piétinement colossal. Étant deux divisions, ils étaient deux colonnes; la division Wathier avait la droite, la division Delord avait la gauche. On croyait voir de loin s'allonger vers la crête du plateau deux immenses couleuvres d’acier. Cela traversa la bataille comme un prodige.

Rien de semblable ne s’était vu depuis la prise de la grande redoute de la Moskowa par la grosse cavalerie; Murat y manquait, mais Ney s’y retrouvait. Il semblait que cette masse était devenue monstre et n’eût qu’une âme. Chaque escadron ondulait et se gonflait comme un anneau du polype. On les apercevait à travers une vaste fumée déchirée çà et là. Pêle-mêle de casques, de cris, de sabres, bondissement orageux des croupes des chevaux dans le canon et la fanfare, tumulte discipliné et terrible; là-dessus les cuirasses, comme les écailles sur l’hydre.

Ces récits semblent d’un autre âge. Quelque chose de pareil à cette vision apparaissait sans doute dans les vieilles épopées orphiques racontant les hommes-chevaux, les antiques hippanthropes, ces titans à face humaine et à poitrail équestre dont le galop escalada l’Olympe, horribles, invulnérables, sublimes; dieux et bêtes.

Bizarre coïncidence numérique, vingt-six bataillons allaient recevoir ces vingt-six escadrons. Derrière la crête du plateau, à l’ombre de la batterie masquée, l’infanterie anglaise, formée en treize carrés, deux bataillons par carré, et sur deux lignes, sept sur la première, six sur la seconde, la crosse à l’épaule, couchant en joue ce qui allait venir, calme, muette, immobile, attendait. Elle ne voyait pas les cuirassiers et les cuirassiers ne la voyaient pas. Elle écoutait monter cette marée d’hommes. Elle entendait le grossissement du bruit des trois mille chevaux, le frappement alternatif et symétrique des sabots au grand trot, le froissement des cuirasses, le cliquetis des sabres, et une sorte de grand souffle farouche. Il y eut un silence redoutable, puis, subitement, une longue file de bras levés brandissant des sabres apparut au-dessus de la crête, et les casques, et les trompettes, et les étendards, et trois mille têtes à moustaches grises criant: vive l’empereur! toute cette cavalerie déboucha sur le plateau, et ce fut comme l’entrée d’un tremblement de terre.

Tout à coup, chose tragique, à la gauche des Anglais, à notre droite, la tête de colonne des cuirassiers se cabra avec une clameur effroyable. Parvenus au point culminant de la crête, effrénés, tout à leur furie et à leur course d’extermination sur les carrés et les canons, les cuirassiers venaient d’apercevoir entre eux et les Anglais un fossé, une fosse. C’était le chemin creux d’Ohain.

L’instant fut épouvantable. Le ravin était là, inattendu, béant, à pic sous les pieds des chevaux, profond de deux toises entre son double talus; le second rang y poussa le premier, et le troisième y poussa le second; les chevaux se dressaient, se rejetaient en arrière, tombaient sur la croupe, glissaient les quatre pieds en l’air, pilant et bouleversant les cavaliers, aucun moyen de reculer, toute la colonne n’était plus qu’un projectile, la force acquise pour écraser les Anglais écrasa les Français, le ravin inexorable ne pouvait se rendre que comblé, cavaliers et chevaux y roulèrent pêle-mêle se broyant les uns sur les autres, ne faisant qu’une chair dans ce gouffre, et, quand cette fosse fut pleine d’hommes vivants, on marcha dessus et le reste passa. Presque un tiers de la brigade Dubois croula dans cet abîme.

Ceci commença la perte de la bataille.

Une tradition locale, qui exagère évidemment, dit que deux mille chevaux et quinze cents hommes furent ensevelis dans le chemin creux d’Ohain. Ce chiffre vraisemblablement comprend tous les autres cadavres qu’on jeta dans ce ravin le lendemain du combat.

Notons en passant que c’était cette brigade Dubois, si funestement éprouvée, qui, une heure auparavant, chargeant à part, avait enlevé le drapeau du bataillon de Lunebourg.

Napoléon, avant d’ordonner cette charge des cuirassiers de Milhaud, avait scruté le terrain, mais n’avait pu voir ce chemin creux qui ne faisait pas même une ride à la surface du plateau. Averti pourtant et mis en éveil par la petite chapelle blanche qui en marque l’angle sur la chaussée de Nivelles, il avait fait, probablement sur l’éventualité d’un obstacle, une question au guide Lacoste. Le guide avait répondu non. On pourrait presque dire que de ce signe de tête d’un paysan est sortie la catastrophe de Napoléon.

D’autres fatalités encore devaient surgir.

Était-il possible que Napoléon gagnât cette bataille? Nous répondons non. Pourquoi? À cause de Wellington? à cause de Blü-cher? Non. À cause de Dieu.

Bonaparte vainqueur à Waterloo, ceci n’était plus dans la loi du dix-neuvième siècle. Une autre série de faits se préparait, où Napoléon n’avait plus de place. La mauvaise volonté des événements s’était annoncée de longue date.

Il était temps que cet homme vaste tombât.

L’excessive pesanteur de cet homme dans la destinée humaine troublait l’équilibre. Cet individu comptait à lui seul plus que le groupe universel. Ces pléthores de toute la vitalité humaine concentrée dans une seule tête, le monde montant au cerveau d’un homme, cela serait mortel à la civilisation si cela durait. Le moment était venu pour l’incorruptible équité suprême d’aviser. Probablement les principes et les éléments, d’où dépendent les gravitations régulières dans l’ordre moral comme dans l’ordre matériel, se plaignaient. Le sang qui fume, le trop-plein des cimetières, les mères en larmes, ce sont des plaidoyers redoutables. Il y a, quand la terre souffre d’une surcharge, de mystérieux gémissements de l’ombre, que l’abîme entend.

Napoléon avait été dénoncé dans l’infini, et sa chute était décidée.

Il gênait Dieu.

Waterloo n’est point une bataille; c’est le changement de front de l’univers.

Chapitre X

Le plateau de Mont Saint-Jean

En même temps que le ravin, la batterie s'était démasquée.

Soixante canons et les treize carrés foudroyèrent les cuirassiers à bout portant. L'intrépide général Delord fit le salut militaire à la batterie anglaise.

Toute l'artillerie volante anglaise était rentrée au galop dans les carrés. Les cuirassiers n'eurent pas même un temps d'arrêt. Le désastre du chemin creux les avait décimés, mais non découragés. C'étaient de ces hommes qui, diminués de nombre, grandissent de cœur.

La colonne Wathier seule avait souffert du désastre; la colonne Delord, que Ney avait fait obliquer à gauche, comme s'il pressentait l'embûche, était arrivée entière.

Les cuirassiers se ruèrent sur les carrés anglais.

Ventre à terre, brides lâchées, sabre aux dents, pistolets au poing, telle fut l'attaque.

Il y a des moments dans les batailles où l'âme durcit l'homme jusqu'à changer le soldat en statue, et où toute cette chair se fait granit. Les bataillons anglais, éperdument assaillis, ne bougèrent pas.

Alors ce fut effrayant.

Toutes les faces des carrés anglais furent attaquées à la fois. Un tournoiement frénétique les enveloppa. Cette froide infanterie demeura impassible. Le premier rang, genou en terre, recevait les cuirassiers sur les bayonnettes, le second rang les fusillait; derrière le second rang les canonniers chargeaient les pièces, le front du carré s'ouvrait, laissait passer une éruption de mitraille et se refermait. Les cuirassiers répondaient par l'écrasement. Leurs grands chevaux se cabraient, enjambaient les rangs, sautaient par-dessus les bayonnettes et tombaient, gigantesques, au milieu de ces quatre murs vivants. Les boulets faisaient des trouées dans les cuirassiers, les cuirassiers faisaient des brèches dans les carrés. Des files d'hommes disparaissaient broyées sous les chevaux. Les bayonnettes s'enfonçaient dans les ventres de ces centaures. De là une difformité de blessures qu'on n'a pas vue peut-être ailleurs. Les carrés, rongés par cette cavalerie forcenée, se rétrécissaient sans broncher. Inépuisables en mitraille, ils faisaient explosion au milieu des assaillants. La figure de ce combat était monstrueuse. Ces carrés n’étaient plus des bataillons, c’étaient des cratères; ces cuirassiers n’étaient plus une cavalerie, c’était une tempête. Chaque carré était un volcan attaqué par un nuage; la lave combattait la foudre.

Le carré extrême de droite, le plus exposé de tous, étant en l’air, fut presque anéanti dès les premiers chocs. Il était formé du 75ème régiment de highlanders. Le joueur de cornemuse au centre, pendant qu’on s’exterminait autour de lui, baissant dans une inattention profonde son œil mélancolique plein du reflet des forêts et des lacs, assis sur un tambour, son pibroch sous le bras, jouait les airs de la montagne. Ces Écossais mouraient en pensant au Ben Lothian, comme les Grecs en se souvenant d’Argos. Le sabre d’un cuirassier, abattant le pibroch et le bras qui le portait, fit cesser le chant en tuant le chanteur.

Les cuirassiers, relativement peu nombreux, amoindris par la catastrophe du ravin, avaient là contre eux presque toute l’armée anglaise, mais ils se multipliaient, chaque homme valant dix. Cependant quelques bataillons hanovriens plièrent. Wellington le vit, et songea à sa cavalerie. Si Napoléon, en ce moment-là même, eût songé à son infanterie, il eût gagné la bataille. Cet oubli fut sa grande faute fatale. Tout à coup les cuirassiers, assaillants, se sentirent assaillis. La cavalerie anglaise était sur leur dos. Devant eux les carrés, derrière eux Somerset; Somerset, c’étaient les quatorze cents dragons-gardes. Somerset avait à sa droite Dornberg avec les chevau-légers allemands, et à sa gauche Trip avec les carabiniers belges; les cuirassiers, attaqués en flanc et en tête, en avant et en arrière, par l’infanterie et par la cavalerie, durent faire face de tous les côtés. Que leur importait? ils étaient tourbillon. La bravoure devint inexprimable.

En outre, ils avaient derrière eux la batterie toujours tonnante. Il fallait cela pour que ces hommes fussent blessés dans le dos. Une de leurs cuirasses, trouée à l’omoplate gauche d’un biscayen, est dans la collection dite musée de Waterloo.

Pour de tels Français, il ne fallait pas moins que de tels Anglais.

Ce ne fut plus une mêlée, ce fut une ombre, une furie, un vertigineux emportement d’âmes et de courages, un ouragan d’épées éclairs. En un instant les quatorze cents dragons-gardes ne furent plus que huit cents; Fuller, leur lieutenant-colonel, tomba mort. Ney accourut avec les lanciers et les chasseurs de Lefebvre-Desnouettes. Le plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean fut pris, repris, pris encore. Les cuirassiers quittaient la cavalerie pour retourner à l’infanterie, ou, pour mieux dire, toute cette cohue formidable se colletait sans que l’un lâchât l’autre. Les carrés tenaient toujours. Il y eut douze assauts. Ney eut quatre chevaux tués sous lui. La moitié des cuirassiers resta sur le plateau. Cette lutte dura deux heures.

L’armée anglaise en fut profondément ébranlée. Nul doute que, s’ils n’eussent été affaiblis dans leur premier choc par le désastre du chemin creux, les cuirassiers n’eussent culbuté le centre et décidé la victoire. Cette cavalerie extraordinaire pétrifia Clinton qui avait vu Talavera et Badajoz. Wellington, aux trois quarts vaincu, admirait héroïquement. Il disait à demi-voix: sublime!

Les cuirassiers anéantirent sept carrés sur treize, prirent ou enclouèrent soixante pièces de canon, et enlevèrent aux régiments anglais six drapeaux, que trois cuirassiers et trois chasseurs de la garde allèrent porter à l’empereur devant la ferme de la Belle-Alliance.

La situation de Wellington avait empiré. Cette étrange bataille était comme un duel entre deux blessés acharnés qui, chacun de leur côté, tout en combattant et en se résistant toujours, perdent tout leur sang. Lequel des deux tombera le premier?

La lutte du plateau continuait.

Jusqu’où sont allés les cuirassiers? personne ne saurait le dire. Ce qui est certain, c’est que, le lendemain de la bataille, un cuirassier et son cheval furent trouvés morts dans la charpente de la bascule du pesage des voitures à Mont-Saint-Jean, au point même où s’entrecoupent et se rencontrent les quatre routes de Nivelles, de Genappe, de La Hulpe et de Bruxelles. Ce cavalier avait percé les lignes anglaises. Un des hommes qui ont relevé ce cadavre vit encore à Mont-Saint-Jean. Il se nomme Dehaze. Il avait alors dix-huit ans.

Wellington se sentait pencher. La crise était proche.

Les cuirassiers n’avaient point réussi, en ce sens que le centre n’était pas enfoncé. Tout le monde ayant le plateau, personne ne l’avait, et en somme il restait pour la plus grande part aux Anglais. Wellington avait le village et la plaine culminante; Ney n’avait que la crête et la pente. Des deux côtés on semblait enraciné dans ce sol funèbre.

Mais l’affaiblissement des Anglais paraissait irrémédiable. L’hémorragie de cette armée était horrible. Kempt, à l’aile gauche, réclamait du renfort. — Il n’y en a pas, répondait Wellington, qu’il se fasse tuer! — Presque à la même minute, rapprochement singulier qui peint l’épuisement des deux armées, Ney demandait de l’infanterie à Napoléon, et Napoléon s’écriait: De l’infanterie! où veut-il que j’en prenne? Veut-il que j’en fasse?

Pourtant l’armée anglaise était la plus malade. Les poussées furieuses de ces grands escadrons à cuirasses de fer et à poitrines d’acier avaient broyé l’infanterie. Quelques hommes autour d’un drapeau marquaient la place d’un régiment, tel bataillon n’était plus commandé que par un capitaine ou par un lieutenant; la division Alten, déjà si maltraitée à la Haie-Sainte, était presque détruite; les intrépides Belges de la brigade Van Kluze jonchaient les seigles le long de la route de Nivelles; il ne restait presque rien de ces grenadiers hollandais qui, en 1811, mêlés en Espagne à nos rangs, combattaient Wellington, et qui, en 1815, ralliés aux Anglais, combattaient Napoléon. La perte en officiers était considérable. Lord Uxbridge, qui le lendemain fit enterrer sa jambe, avait le genou fracassé. Si, du côté des Français, dans cette lutte des cuirassiers, Delord, Lhéritier, Colbert, Dnop, Travers et Blancard étaient hors de combat, du côté des Anglais, Alten était blessé, Barne était blessé, Delancey était tué, Van Merlen était tué, Ompteda était tué, tout l’état-major de Wellington était décimé, et l’Angleterre avait le pire partage dans ce sanglant équilibre. Le 2ème régiment des gardes à pied avait perdu cinq lieutenants-colonels, quatre capitaines et trois enseignes; le premier bataillon du 30ème d’infanterie avait perdu vingt-quatre officiers et cent douze soldats; le 79ème montagnards avait vingt-quatre officiers blessés, dix-huit officiers morts, quatre cent cinquante soldats tués. Les hussards hanovriens de Cumberland, un régiment tout entier, ayant à sa tête son colonel Hacke, qui devait plus tard être jugé et cassé, avaient tourné bride devant la mêlée et étaient en fuite dans la forêt de Soignes, semant la déroute jusqu’à Bruxelles. Les charrois, les prolonges, les bagages, les fourgons pleins de blessés, voyant les Français gagner du terrain et s’approcher de la forêt, s’y précipitaient; les Hollandais, sabrés par la cavalerie française, criaient: alarme! De Vert-Coucou jusqu’à Groenendael, sur une longueur de près de deux lieues dans la direction de Bruxelles, il y avait, au dire des témoins qui existent encore, un encombrement de fuyards. Cette panique fut telle qu’elle gagna le prince de Condé à Malines et Louis XVIII à Gand. À l’exception de la faible réserve échelonnée derrière l’ambulance établie dans la ferme de Mont-Saint-Jean et des brigades Vivian et Vandeleur qui flanquaient l’aile gauche, Wellington n’avait plus de cavalerie. Nombre de batteries gisaient démontées. Ces faits sont avoués par Siborne; et Pringle, exagérant le désastre, va jusqu’à dire que l’armée anglo-hollandaise était réduite à trente-quatre mille hommes. Le duc-de-fer demeurait calme, mais ses lèvres avaient blêmi. Le commissaire autrichien Vincent, le commissaire espagnol Alava, présents à la bataille dans l’état-major anglais, croyaient le duc perdu. À cinq heures, Wellington tira sa montre, et on l’entendit murmurer ce mot sombre: Blücher, ou la nuit!

Ce fut vers ce moment-là qu’une ligne lointaine de bayonnettes étincela sur les hauteurs du côté de Frischemont.

Ici est la péripétie de ce drame géant.

Chapitre XI

Mauvais guide à Napoléon, bon guide à Bülow

On connaît la poignante méprise de Napoléon: Grouchy espéré, Blücher survenant, la mort au lieu de la vie.

La destinée a de ces tournants; on s'attendait au trône du monde; on aperçoit Sainte-Hélène. Si le petit pâtre, qui servait de guide à Bülow, lieutenant de Blücher, lui eût conseillé de déboucher de la forêt au-dessus de Frischemont plutôt qu'au dessous de Plancenoit, la forme du dix-neuvième siècle eût peut-être été différente. Napoléon eût gagné la bataille de Waterloo. Par tout autre chemin qu'au-dessous de Plancenoit, l'armée prussienne aboutissait à un ravin infranchissable à l'artillerie, et Bülow n'arrivait pas.

Or, une heure de retard, c'est le général prussien Muffling qui le déclare, et Blücher n'aurait plus trouvé Wellington debout; «la bataille était perdue».

Il était temps, on le voit, que Bülow arrivât. Il avait du reste été fort retardé. Il avait bivouaqué à Dion-le-Mont et était parti dès l'aube. Mais les chemins étaient impraticables et ses divisions s'étaient embourbées. Les ornières venaient au moyeu des canons. En outre, il avait fallu passer la Dyle sur l'étroit pont de Wavre; la rue menant au pont avait été incendiée par les Français; les caissons et les fourgons de l'artillerie, ne pouvant passer entre deux rangs de maisons en feu, avaient dû attendre que l'incendie fût éteint. Il était midi que l'avant-garde de Bülow n'avait pu encore atteindre Chapelle-Saint-Lambert.

L'action, commencée deux heures plus tôt, eût été finie à quatre heures, et Blücher serait tombé sur la bataille gagnée par Napoléon. Tels sont ces immenses hasards, proportionnés à un infini qui nous échappe. Dès midi, l'empereur, le premier, avec sa longue-vue, avait aperçu à l'extrême horizon quelque chose qui avait fixé son attention. Il avait dit: — Je vois là-bas un nuage qui me paraît être des troupes. Puis il avait demandé au duc de Dalmatie: — Soult, que voyez-vous vers Chapelle-Saint-Lambert? — Le maréchal braquant sa lunette avait répondu: — Quatre ou cinq mille hommes, sire. Évidemment Grouchy. — Cependant cela restait immobile dans la brume. Toutes les lunettes de l'état-major avaient étudié «le nuage» signalé par l'empereur. Quelques-uns avaient dit: Ce sont des colonnes qui font halte. La plupart avaient dit: Ce sont des arbres. La vérité est que le nuage ne remuait pas. L'empereur avait détaché en reconnaissance vers ce point obscur la division de cavalerie légère de Domon.

Bülow en effet n'avait pas bougé. Son avant-garde était très faible, et ne pouvait rien. Il devait attendre le gros du corps d'armée, et il avait l'ordre de se concentrer avant d'entrer en ligne; mais à cinq heures, voyant le péril de Wellington, Blücher ordonna à Bülow d'attaquer et dit ce mot remarquable: «Il faut donner de l'air à l'armée anglaise.»

Peu après, les divisions Losthin, Hiller, Hacke et Ryssel se déployaient devant le corps de Lobau, la cavalerie du prince Guillaume de Prusse débouchait du bois de Paris, Plancenoit était en flammes, et les boulets prussiens commençaient à pleuvoir jusque dans les rangs de la garde en réserve derrière Napoléon.

Chapitre XII

La garde

On sait le reste: l’irruption d’une troisième armée, la bataille disloquée, quatre-vingt-six bouches à feu tonnant tout à coup, Pirch Ier survenant avec Bülow, la cavalerie de Zieten menée par Blücher en personne, les Français refoulés, Marcognet balayé du plateau d’Ohain, Durutte délogé de Papelotte, Donzelot et Quiot reculant, Lobau pris en écharpe, une nouvelle bataille se précipitant à la nuit tombante sur nos régiments démantelés, toute la ligne anglaise reprenant l’offensive et poussée en avant, la gigantesque trouée faite dans l’armée française, la mitraille anglaise et la mitraille prussienne s’entr’aidant, l’extermination, le désastre de front, le désastre en flanc, la garde entrant en ligne sous cet épouvantable écroulement.

Comme elle sentait qu’elle allait mourir, elle cria: vive l’empereur! L’histoire n’a rien de plus émouvant que cette agonie éclatant en acclamations.

Le ciel avait été couvert toute la journée. Tout à coup, en ce moment-là même, il était huit heures du soir, les nuages de l’horizon s’écartèrent et laissèrent passer, à travers les ormes de la route de Nivelles, la grande rougeur sinistre du soleil qui se couchait. On l’avait vu se lever à Austerlitz.

Chaque bataillon de la garde, pour ce dénouement, était commandé par un général. Friant, Michel, Roguet, Harlet, Mallet, Poret de Morvan, étaient là. Quand les hauts bonnets des grenadiers de la garde avec la large plaque à l’aigle apparurent, symétriques, alignés, tranquilles, superbes, dans la brume de cette mêlée, l’ennemi sentit le respect de la France; on crut voir vingt victoires entrer sur le champ de bataille, ailes déployées, et ceux qui étaient vainqueurs, s’estimant vaincus, reculèrent; mais Wellington cria: Debout, gardes, et visez juste! le régiment rouge des gardes anglaises, couché derrière les haies, se leva, une nuée de mitraille cribla le drapeau tricolore frissonnant autour de nos aigles, tous se ruèrent, et le suprême carnage commença. La garde impériale sentit dans l’ombre l’armée lâchant pied autour d’elle, et le vaste ébranlement de la déroute, elle entendit le sauve-qui-peut! qui avait remplacé le vive l’empereur! et, avec la fuite derrière elle, elle continua d’avancer, de plus en plus foudroyée et mourant davantage à chaque pas qu’elle faisait. Il n’y eut point d’hésitants ni de timides. Le soldat dans cette troupe était aussi héros que le général. Pas un homme ne manqua au suicide.

Ney, éperdu, grand de toute la hauteur de la mort acceptée, s’offrait à tous les coups dans cette tourmente. Il eut là son cinquième cheval tué sous lui. En sueur, la flamme aux yeux, l’écume aux lèvres, l’uniforme déboutonné, une de ses épaulettes à demi coupée par le coup de sabre d’un horse-guard, sa plaque de grand-aigle bosselée par une balle, sanglant, fangeux, magnifique, une épée cassée à la main, il disait: Venez voir comment meurt un maréchal de France sur le champ de bataille! Mais en vain; il ne mourut pas. Il était hagard et indigné. Il jetait à Drouet d’Erlon cette question: Est-ce que tu ne te fais pas tuer, toi? Il criait au milieu de toute cette artillerie écrasant une poignée d’hommes: — Il n’y a donc rien pour moi! Oh! je voudrais que tous ces boulets anglais m’entrassent dans le ventre! Tu étais réservé à des balles françaises, infortuné!

Chapitre XIII

La catastrophe

La déroute derrière la garde fut lugubre.

L’armée plia brusquement de tous les côtés à la fois, de Hougomont, de la Haie-Sainte, de Papelotte, de Plancenoit. Le cri Trahison! fut suivi du cri Sauve-qui-peut! Une armée qui se débande, c’est un dégel. Tout fléchit, se fêle, craque, flotte, roule, tombe, se heurte, se hâte, se précipite. Désagrégation inouïe. Ney emprunte un cheval, saute dessus, et, sans chapeau, sans cravate, sans épée, se met en travers de la chaussée de Bruxelles, arrêtant à la fois les Anglais et les Français. Il tâche de retenir l’armée, il la rappelle, il l’insulte, il se cramponne à la déroute. Il est débordé. Les soldats le fuient, en criant: Vive le maréchal Ney! Deux régiments de Durutte vont et viennent effarés et comme ballottés entre le sabre des uhlans et la fusillade des brigades de Kempt, de Best, de Pack et de Rylandt; la pire des mêlées, c’est la déroute, les amis s’entre-tuent pour fuir; les escadrons et les bataillons se brisent et se dispersent les uns contre les autres, énorme écume de la bataille. Lobau à une extrémité comme Reille à l’autre sont roulés dans le flot. En vain Napoléon fait des murailles avec ce qui lui reste de la garde; en vain il dépense à un dernier effort ses escadrons de service. Quiot recule devant Vivian, Kellermann devant Vandeleur, Lobau devant Bülow, Morand devant Pirch, Domon et Subervic devant le prince Guillaume de Prusse. Guyot, qui a mené à la charge les escadrons de l’empereur, tombe sous les pieds des dragons anglais. Napoléon court au galop le long des fuyards, les harangue, presse, menace, supplie. Toutes ces bouches qui criaient le matin vive l’empereur, restent béantes; c’est à peine si on le connaît. La cavalerie prussienne, fraîche venue, s’élance, vole, sabre, taille, hache, tue, extermine. Les attelages se ruent, les canons se sauvent; les soldats du train détellent les caissons et en prennent les chevaux pour s’échapper; des fourgons culbutés les quatre roues en l’air entravent la route et sont des occasions de massacre. On s’écrase, on se foule, on marche sur les morts et sur les vivants. Les bras sont éperdus. Une multitude vertigineuse emplit les routes, les sentiers, les ponts, les plaines, les collines, les vallées, les bois, encombrés par cette évasion de quarante mille hommes. Cris, désespoir, sacs et fusils jetés dans les seigles, passages frayés à coups d'épée, plus de camarades, plus d'officiers, plus de généraux, une inexprimable épouvante. Zieten sabrant la France à son aise. Les lions devenus chevreuils. Telle fut cette fuite.

À Genappe, on essaya de se retourner, de faire front, d'enrayer. Lobau rallia trois cents hommes. On barricada l'entrée du village; mais à la première volée de la mitraille prussienne, tout se remit à fuir, et Lobau fut pris. On voit encore aujourd'hui cette volée de mitraille empreinte sur le vieux pignon d'une masure en brique à droite de la route, quelques minutes avant d'entrer à Genappe. Les Prussiens s'élancèrent dans Genappe, furieux sans doute d'être si peu vainqueurs. La poursuite fut monstrueuse. Blücher ordonna l'extermination. Roguet avait donné ce lugubre exemple de menacer de mort tout grenadier français qui lui amènerait un prisonnier prussien. Blücher dépassa Roguet. Le général de la jeune garde, Ducesme, acculé sur la porte d'une auberge de Genappe, rendit son épée à un hussard de la mort qui prit l'épée et tua le prisonnier. La victoire s'acheva par l'assassinat des vaincus. Punissons, puisque nous sommes l'histoire: le vieux Blücher se déshonora. Cette férocité mit le comble au désastre. La déroute désespérée traversa Genappe, traversa les Quatre-Bras, traversa Gosselies, traversa Frasnes, traversa Charleroi, traversa Thuin, et ne s'arrêta qu'à la frontière. Hélas! et qui donc fuyait de la sorte? la grande armée.

Ce vertige, cette terreur, cette chute en ruine de la plus haute bravoure qui ait jamais étonné l'histoire, est-ce que cela est sans cause? Non. L'ombre d'une droite énorme se projette sur Waterloo. C'est la journée du destin. La force au-dessus de l'homme a donné ce jour-là. De là le pli épouvanté des têtes; de là toutes ces grandes âmes rendant leur épée. Ceux qui avaient vaincu l'Europe sont tombés terrassés, n'ayant plus rien à dire ni à faire, sentant dans l'ombre une présence terrible. Hoc erat in fatis. Ce jour-là, la perspective du genre humain a changé. Waterloo, c'est le gond du dix-neuvième siècle. La disparition du grand homme était nécessaire à l'avènement du grand siècle. Quelqu'un à qui on ne réplique pas s'en est chargé. La panique des héros s'explique. Dans la bataille de Waterloo, il y a plus du nuage, il y a du météore. Dieu a passé.

À la nuit tombante, dans un champ près de Genappe, Bernard et Bertrand saisirent par un pan de sa redingote et arrêtèrent un homme hagard, pensif, sinistre, qui, entraîné jusque-là par le courant de la déroute, venait de mettre pied à terre, avait passé sous son bras la bride de son cheval, et, l'œil égaré, s’en retournait seul vers Waterloo. C’était Napoléon essayant encore d’aller en avant, immense somnambule de ce rêve écroulé.

Chapitre XIV

Le dernier carré

Quelques carrés de la garde, immobiles dans le ruissellement de la déroute comme des rochers dans de l’eau qui coule, tinrent jusqu’à la nuit. La nuit venant, la mort aussi, ils attendirent cette ombre double, et, inébranlables, s’en laissèrent envelopper. Chaque régiment, isolé des autres et n’ayant plus de lien avec l’armée rompue de toutes parts, mourait pour son compte. Ils avaient pris position, pour faire cette dernière action, les uns sur les hauteurs de Rossomme, les autres dans la plaine de Mont-Saint-Jean. Là, abandonnés, vaincus, terribles, ces carrés sombres agonisaient formidablement. Ulm, Wagram, Iéna, Friedland, mouraient en eux.

Au crépuscule, vers neuf heures du soir, au bas du plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean, il en restait un. Dans ce vallon funeste, au pied de cette pente gravie par les cuirassiers, inondée maintenant par les masses anglaises, sous les feux convergents de l’artillerie ennemie victorieuse, sous une effroyable densité de projectiles, ce carré luttait. Il était commandé par un officier obscur nommé Cambronne. À chaque décharge, le carré diminuait, et ripostait. Il répliquait à la mitraille par la fusillade, rétrécissant continuellement ses quatre murs. De loin les fuyards s’arrêtaient par moment, essoufflés, écoutant dans les ténèbres ce sombre tonnerre décroissant.

Quand cette légion ne fut plus qu’une poignée, quand leur drapeau ne fut plus qu’une loque, quand leurs fusils épuisés de balles ne furent plus que des bâtons, quand le tas de cadavres fut plus grand que le groupe vivant, il y eut parmi les vainqueurs une sorte de terreur sacrée autour de ces mourants sublimes, et l’artillerie anglaise, reprenant haleine, fit silence. Ce fut une espèce de répit. Ces combattants avaient autour d’eux comme un fourmillement de spectres, des silhouettes d’hommes à cheval, le profil noir des canons, le ciel blanc aperçu à travers les roues et les affûts; la colossale tête de mort que les héros entrevoient toujours dans la fumée au fond de la bataille, s’avançait sur eux et les regardait. Ils purent entendre dans l’ombre crépusculaire qu’on chargeait les pièces, les mèches allumées pareilles à des yeux de tigre dans la nuit firent un cercle autour de leurs têtes, tous les boute-feu des batteries anglaises s’approchèrent des canons, et alors, ému, tenant la minute suprême suspendue au-dessus de ces hommes, un général anglais, Colville selon les uns, Maitland selon les autres, leur cria: Braves Français, rendez-vous! Cambronne répondit: Merde!

Chapitre XV

Cambronne

Le lecteur français voulant être respecté, le plus beau mot peut-être qu'un Français ait jamais dit ne peut lui être répété. Défense de déposer du sublime dans l'histoire.

À nos risques et périls, nous enfreignons cette défense.

Donc, parmi tous ces géants, il y eut un titan, Cambronne.

Dire ce mot, et mourir ensuite. Quoi de plus grand! car c'est mourir que de le vouloir, et ce n'est pas la faute de cet homme, si, mitraillé, il a survécu.

L'homme qui a gagné la bataille de Waterloo, ce n'est pas Napoléon en déroute, ce n'est pas Wellington pliant à quatre heures, désespéré à cinq, ce n'est pas Blücher qui ne s'est point battu; l'homme qui a gagné la bataille de Waterloo, c'est Cambronne.

Foudroyer d'un tel mot le tonnerre qui vous tue, c'est vaincre.

Faire cette réponse à la catastrophe, dire cela au destin, donner cette base au lion futur, jeter cette réplique à la pluie de la nuit, au mur traître de Hougomont, au chemin creux d'Ohain, au retard de Grouchy, à l'arrivée de Blücher, être l'ironie dans le sépulcre, faire en sorte de rester debout après qu'on sera tombé, noyer dans deux syllabes la coalition européenne, offrir aux rois ces latrines déjà connues des césars, faire du dernier des mots le premier en y mêlant l'éclair de la France, clore insolemment Waterloo par le mardi gras, compléter Léonidas par Rabelais, résumer cette victoire dans une parole suprême impossible à prononcer, perdre le terrain et garder l'histoire, après ce carnage avoir pour soi les rieurs, c'est immense. C'est l'insulte à la foudre. Cela atteint la grandeur eschylienne.

Le mot de Cambronne fait l'effet d'une fracture. C'est la fracture d'une poitrine par le dédain; c'est le trop plein de l'agonie qui fait explosion. Qui a vaincu? Est-ce Wellington? Non. Sans Blücher il était perdu. Est-ce Blücher? Non. Si Wellington n'eût pas commencé, Blücher n'aurait pu finir. Ce Cambronne, ce passant de la dernière heure, ce soldat ignoré, cet infiniment petit de la guerre, sent qu'il y a là un mensonge, un mensonge dans une catastrophe, redoublement poignant, et, au moment où il en éclate de rage, on lui offre cette dérision, la vie! Comment ne pas bondir? Ils sont là, tous les rois de l’Europe, les généraux heureux, les Jupiters tonnants, ils ont cent mille soldats victorieux, et derrière les cent mille, un million, leurs canons, mèche allumée, sont béants, ils ont sous leurs talons la garde impériale et la grande armée, ils viennent d’écraser Napoléon, et il ne reste plus que Cambronne; il n’y a plus pour protester que ce ver de terre. Il protestera. Alors il cherche un mot comme on cherche une épée. Il lui vient de l’écume, et cette écume, c’est le mot. Devant cette victoire prodigieuse et médiocre, devant cette victoire sans victorieux, ce désespéré se redresse; il en subit l’énormité, mais il en constate le néant; et il fait plus que cracher sur elle; et sous l’accablement du nombre, de la force et de la matière, il trouve à l’âme une expression, l’excrément. Nous le répétons. Dire cela, faire cela, trouver cela, c’est être le vainqueur.

L’esprit des grands jours entra dans cet homme inconnu à cette minute fatale. Cambronne trouve le mot de Waterloo comme Rouget de l’Isle trouve la Marseillaise, par visitation du souffle d’en haut. Un effluve de l’ouragan divin se détache et vient passer à travers ces hommes, et ils tressaillent, et l’un chante le chant suprême et l’autre pousse le cri terrible. Cette parole du dédain titanique, Cambronne ne la jette pas seulement à l’Europe au nom de l’empire, ce serait peu; il la jette au passé au nom de la révolution. On l’entend, et l’on reconnaît dans Cambronne la vieille âme des géants. Il semble que c’est Danton qui parle ou Kléber qui rugit.

Au mot de Cambronne, la voix anglaise répondit: feu! les batteries flamboyèrent, la colline trembla, de toutes ces bouches d’airain sortit un dernier vomissement de mitraille, épouvantable, une vaste fumée, vaguement blanchie du lever de la lune, roula, et quand la fumée se dissipa, il n’y avait plus rien. Ce reste formidable était anéanti; la garde était morte. Les quatre murs de la redoute vivante gisaient, à peine distinguait-on çà et là un tressaillement parmi les cadavres; et c’est ainsi que les légions françaises, plus grandes que les légions romaines, expirèrent à Mont-Saint-Jean sur la terre mouillée de pluie et de sang, dans les blés sombres, à l’endroit où passe maintenant, à quatre heures du matin, en sifflant et en fouettant gaîment son cheval, Joseph, qui fait le service de la malle-poste de Nivelles.

Chapitre XVI

Quot libras in duce?

La bataille de Waterloo est une énigme. Elle est aussi obscure pour ceux qui l’ont gagnée que pour celui qui l’a perdue. Pour Napoléon, c’est une panique. Blücher n’y voit que du feu; Wellington n’y comprend rien. Voyez les rapports. Les bulletins sont confus, les commentaires sont embrouillés. Ceux-ci balbutient, ceux-là bégayent. Jomini partage la bataille de Waterloo en quatre moments; Muffling la coupe en trois péripéties; Charras, quoique sur quelques points nous ayons une autre appréciation que lui, a seul saisi de son fier coup d’œil les linéaments caractéristiques de cette catastrophe du génie humain aux prises avec le hasard divin. Tous les autres historiens ont un certain éblouissement, et dans cet éblouissement ils tâtonnent. Journée fulgurante, en effet, écroulement de la monarchie militaire qui, à la grande stupeur des rois, a entraîné tous les royaumes, chute de la force, déroute de la guerre.

Dans cet événement, empreint de nécessité surhumaine, la part des hommes n’est rien.

Retirer Waterloo à Wellington et à Blücher, est-ce ôter quelque chose à l’Angleterre et à l’Allemagne? Non. Ni cette illustre Angleterre ni cette auguste Allemagne ne sont en question dans le problème de Waterloo. Grâce au ciel, les peuples sont grands en dehors des lugubres aventures de l’épée. Ni l’Allemagne, ni l’Angleterre, ni la France, ne tiennent dans un fourreau. Dans cette époque où Waterloo n’est qu’un cliquetis de sabres, au-dessus de Blücher l’Allemagne à Goethe et au-dessus de Wellington l’Angleterre à Byron. Un vaste lever d’idées est propre à notre siècle, et dans cette aurore l’Angleterre et l’Allemagne ont leur lueur magnifique. Elles sont majestueuses par ce qu’elles pensent. L’élévation de niveau qu’elles apportent à la civilisation leur est intrinsèque; il vient d’elles-mêmes, et non d’un accident. Ce qu’elles ont d’agrandissement au dix-neuvième siècle n’a point Waterloo pour source. Il n’y a que les peuples barbares qui aient des crues subites après une victoire. C’est la vanité passagère des torrents enflés d’un orage. Les peuples civilisés, surtout au temps où nous sommes, ne se haussent ni ne s’abaissent par la bonne ou mauvaise fortune d’un capitaine. Leur poids spécifique dans le genre humain résulte de quelque chose de plus qu'un combat. Leur honneur, Dieu merci, leur dignité, leur lumière, leur génie, ne sont pas des numéros que les héros et les conquérants, ces joueurs, peuvent mettre à la loterie des batailles. Souvent bataille perdue, progrès conquis. Moins de gloire, plus de liberté. Le tambour se tait, la raison prend la parole. C'est le jeu à qui perd gagne. Parlons donc de Waterloo froidement des deux côtés. Rendons au hasard ce qui est au hasard et à Dieu ce qui est à Dieu. Qu'est-ce que Waterloo? Une victoire? Non. Un quine.

Quine gagné par l'Europe, payé par la France.

Ce n'était pas beaucoup la peine de mettre là un lion.

Waterloo du reste est la plus étrange rencontre qui soit dans l'histoire. Napoléon et Wellington. Ce ne sont pas des ennemis, ce sont des contraires. Jamais Dieu, qui se plaît aux antithèses, n'a fait un plus saisissant contraste et une confrontation plus extraordinaire. D'un côté, la précision, la prévision, la géométrie, la prudence, la retraite assurée, les réserves ménagées, un sang-froid opiniâtre, une méthode imperturbable, la stratégie qui profite du terrain, la tactique qui équilibre les bataillons, le carnage tiré au cordeau, la guerre réglée montre en main, rien laissé volontairement au hasard, le vieux courage classique, la correction absolue; de l'autre l'intuition, la divination, l'étrangeté militaire, l'instinct surhumain, le coup d'œil flamboyant, on ne sait quoi qui regarde comme l'aigle et qui frappe comme la foudre, un art prodigieux dans une impétuosité dédaigneuse, tous les mystères d'une âme profonde, l'association avec le destin, le fleuve, la plaine, la forêt, la colline, sommés et en quelque sorte forcés d'obéir, le despote allant jusqu'à tyranniser le champ de bataille, la foi à l'étoile mêlée à la science stratégique, la grandissant, mais la troublant. Wellington était le Barème de la guerre, Napoléon en était le Michel-Ange; et cette fois le génie fut vaincu par le calcul.

Des deux côtés on attendait quelqu'un. Ce fut le calculateur exact qui réussit. Napoléon attendait Grouchy; il ne vint pas. Wellington attendait Blücher; il vint.

Wellington, c'est la guerre classique qui prend sa revanche. Bonaparte, à son aurore, l'avait rencontrée en Italie, et superbement battue. La vieille chouette avait fui devant le jeune vautour. L'ancienne tactique avait été non seulement foudroyée, mais scandalisée. Qu'était-ce que ce Corse de vingt-six ans, que signifiait cet ignorant splendide qui, ayant tout contre lui, rien pour lui, sans vivres, sans munitions, sans canons, sans souliers, presque sans armée, avec une poignée d’hommes contre des masses, se ruait sur l’Europe coalisée, et gagnait absurdement des victoires dans l’impossible? D’où sortait ce forcené foudroyant qui, presque sans reprendre haleine, et avec le même jeu de combattants dans la main, pulvérisait l’une après l’autre les cinq armées de l’empereur d’Allemagne, culbutant Beaulieu sur Alvinzi, Wurmser sur Beaulieu, Mélas sur Wurmser, Mack sur Mélas? Qu’était-ce que ce nouveau venu de la guerre ayant l’effronterie d’un astre? L’école académique militaire l’excommuniait en lâchant pied. De là une implacable rancune du vieux césarisme contre le nouveau, du sabre correct contre l’épée flamboyante, et de l’échiquier contre le génie. Le 18 juin 1815, cette rancune eut le dernier mot, et au-dessous de Lodi, de Montebello, de Montenotte, de Mantoue, de Marengo, d’Arcole, elle écrivit: Waterloo. Triomphe des médiocres, doux aux majorités. Le destin consentit à cette ironie. À son déclin, Napoléon retrouva devant lui Wurmser jeune.

Pour avoir Wurmser en effet, il suffît de blanchir les cheveux de Wellington.

Waterloo est une bataille du premier ordre gagnée par un capitaine du second.

Ce qu’il faut admirer dans la bataille de Waterloo, c’est l’Angleterre, c’est la fermeté anglaise, c’est la résolution anglaise, c’est le sang anglais; ce que l’Angleterre a eu là de superbe, ne lui en déplaise, c’est elle-même. Ce n’est pas son capitaine, c’est son armée.

Wellington, bizarrement ingrat, déclare dans une lettre à lord Bathurst que son armée, l’armée qui a combattu le 18 juin 1815, était une «détestable armée». Qu’en pense cette sombre mêlée d’ossements enfouis sous les sillons de Waterloo?

L’Angleterre a été trop modeste vis-à-vis de Wellington. Faire Wellington si grand, c’est faire l’Angleterre petite. Wellington n’est qu’un héros comme un autre. Ces Écossais gris, ces horse-guards, ces régiments de Maitland et de Mitchell, cette infanterie de Pack et de Kempt, cette cavalerie de Ponsonby et de Somerset, ces highlanders jouant du pibroch sous la mitraille, ces bataillons de Rylandt, ces recrues toutes fraîches qui savaient à peine manier le mousquet tenant tête aux vieilles bandes d’Essling et de Rivoli, voilà ce qui est grand. Wellington a été tenace, ce fut là son mérite, et nous ne le lui marchandons pas, mais le moindre de ses fantassins et de ses cavaliers a été tout aussi solide que lui. L’iron-soldier vaut l’iron-duke. Quant à nous, toute notre glorification va au soldat anglais, à l’armée anglaise, au peuple anglais. Si trophée il y a, c’est à l’Angleterre que le trophée est dû. La colonne de Waterloo serait plus juste si au lieu de la figure d’un homme, elle élevait dans la nue la statue d’un peuple. Mais cette grande Angleterre s’irritera de ce que nous disons ici. Elle a encore, après son 1688 et notre 1789, l’illusion féodale. Elle croit à l’hérédité et à la hiérarchie. Ce peuple, qu’aucun ne dépasse en puissance et en gloire, s’estime comme nation, non comme peuple. En tant que peuple, il se subordonne volontiers et prend un lord pour une tête. Workman, il se laisse dédaigner; soldat, il se laisse bâtonner. On se souvient qu’à la bataille d’Inkermann un sergent qui, à ce qu’il paraît, avait sauvé l’armée, ne put être mentionné par lord Raglan, la hiérarchie militaire anglaise ne permettant de citer dans un rapport aucun héros au-dessous du grade d’officier.

Ce que nous admirons par-dessus tout, dans une rencontre du genre de celle de Waterloo, c’est la prodigieuse habileté du hasard. Pluie nocturne, mur de Hougomont, chemin creux d’Ohain, Grouchy sourd au canon, guide de Napoléon qui le trompe, guide de Bülow qui l’éclaire; tout ce cataclysme est merveilleusement conduit.

Au total, disons-le, il y eut à Waterloo plus de massacre que de bataille.

Waterloo est de toutes les batailles rangées celle qui a le plus petit front sur un tel nombre de combattants. Napoléon, trois quarts de lieue, Wellington, une demi-lieue; soixante-douze mille combattants de chaque côté. De cette épaisseur vint le carnage.

On a fait ce calcul et établi cette proportion: Perte d’hommes: à Austerlitz, Français, quatorze pour cent; Russes, trente pour cent, Autrichiens, quarante-quatre pour cent. À Wagram, Français, treize pour cent; Autrichiens, quatorze. À la Moskowa, Français, trente-sept pour cent; Russes, quarante-quatre. À Bautzen, Français, treize pour cent; Russes et Prussiens, quatorze. À Waterloo, Français, cinquante-six pour cent; Alliés, trente et un. Total pour Waterloo, quarante et un pour cent. Cent quarante-quatre mille combattants; soixante mille morts. Le champ de Waterloo aujourd’hui a le calme qui appartient à la terre, support impassible de l’homme, et il ressemble à toutes les plaines.

La nuit pourtant une espèce de brume visionnaire s’en dégage, et si quelque voyageur s’y promène, s’il regarde, s’il écoute, s’il rêve comme Virgile devant les funestes plaines de Philippes, l’hallucination de la catastrophe le saisit. L’effrayant 18 juin revit; la fausse colline monument s’efface, ce lion quelconque se dissipe, le champ de bataille reprend sa réalité; des lignes d’infanterie ondulent dans la plaine, des galops furieux traversent l’horizon! le songeur effaré voit l’éclair des sabres, l’étincelle des bayonnettes, le flamboiement des bombes, l’entre-croisement monstrueux des tonnerres; il entend, comme un râle au fond d’une tombe, la clameur vague de la bataille fantôme; ces ombres, ce sont les grenadiers; ces lueurs, ce sont les cuirassiers; ce squelette, c’est Napoléon; ce squelette, c’est Wellington; tout cela n’est plus et se heurte et combat encore; et les ravins s’empourprent, et les arbres frissonnent, et il y a de la furie jusque dans les nuées, et, dans les ténèbres, toutes ces hauteurs farouches, Mont-Saint-Jean, Hougomont, Frischemont, Pape-lotte, Plancenoit, apparaissent confusément couronnées de tourbillons de spectres s’exterminant.

Chapitre XVII

Faut-il trouver bon Waterloo?

Il existe une école libérale très respectable qui ne hait point Waterloo. Nous n’en sommes pas. Pour nous, Waterloo n’est que la date stupéfaite de la liberté. Qu’un tel aigle sorte d’un tel œuf, c’est à coup sûr l’inattendu.

Waterloo, si l’on se place au point de vue culminant de la question, est intentionnellement une victoire contre-révolutionnaire. C’est l’Europe contre la France, c’est Pétersbourg, Berlin et Vienne contre Paris, c’est le statu quo contre l’initiative, c’est le 14 juillet 1789 attaqué à travers le 20 mars 1815, c’est le branle-bas des monarchies contre l’indomptable émeute française. Éteindre enfin ce vaste peuple en éruption depuis vingt-six ans, tel était le rêve. Solidarité des Brunswick, des Nassau, des Romanoff, des Hohenzollern, des Habsbourg, avec les Bourbons. Waterloo porte en croupe le droit divin. Il est vrai que, l’empire ayant été despotique, la royauté, par la réaction naturelle des choses, devait forcément être libérale, et qu’un ordre constitutionnel à contre-cœur est sorti de Waterloo, au grand regret des vainqueurs. C’est que la révolution ne peut être vraiment vaincue, et qu’étant providentielle et absolument fatale, elle reparaît toujours, avant Waterloo, dans Bonaparte jetant bas les vieux trônes, après Waterloo, dans Louis XVIII octroyant et subissant la Charte. Bonaparte met un postillon sur le trône de Naples et un sergent sur le trône de Suède, employant l’inégalité à démontrer l’égalité; Louis XVIII à Saint-Ouen contresigne la déclaration des droits de l’homme. Voulez-vous vous rendre compte de ce que c’est que la révolution, appelez-la Progrès; et voulez-vous vous rendre compte de ce que c’est que le progrès, appelez-le Demain. Demain fait irrésistiblement son œuvre, et il la fait dès aujourd’hui. Il arrive toujours à son but, étrangement. Il emploie Wellington à faire de Foy, qui n’était qu’un soldat, un orateur. Foy tombe à Hougomont et se relève à la tribune. Ainsi procède le progrès. Pas de mauvais outil pour cet ouvrier-là. Il ajuste à son travail divin, sans se déconcerter, l’homme qui a enjambé les Alpes, et le bon vieux malade chancelant du père Élysée. Il se sert du podagre comme du conquérant; du conquérant au dehors, du podagre au dedans. Waterloo, en coupant court à la démolition des trônes européens par l’épée, n’a eu d’autre effet que de faire continuer le travail révolutionnaire d’un autre côté.

Les sabreurs ont fini, c’est le tour des penseurs. Le siècle que Waterloo voulait arrêter a marché dessus et a poursuivi sa route. Cette victoire sinistre a été vaincue par la liberté.

En somme, et incontestablement, ce qui triomphait à Waterloo, ce qui souriait derrière Wellington, ce qui lui apportait tous les bâtons de maréchal de l’Europe, y compris, dit-on, le bâton de maréchal de France, ce qui roulait joyeusement les brouettées de terre pleine d’ossements pour élever la butte du lion, ce qui a triomphalement écrit sur ce piédestal cette date: 18 juin 1815, ce qui encourageait Blücher sabrant la déroute, ce qui du haut du plateau de Mont-Saint-Jean se penchait sur la France comme sur une proie, c’était la contre-révolution. C’est la contre-révolution qui murmurait ce mot infâme: démembrement. Arrivée à Paris, elle a vu le cratère de près, elle a senti que cette cendre lui brûlait les pieds, et elle s’est ravisée. Elle est revenue au bégayement d’une charte.

Ne voyons dans Waterloo que ce qui est dans Waterloo. De liberté intentionnelle, point. La contre-révolution était involontairement libérale, de même que, par un phénomène correspondant, Napoléon était involontairement révolutionnaire. Le 18 juin 1815, Robespierre à cheval fut désarçonné.

Chapitre XVIII

Recrudescence du droit divin

Fin de la dictature. Tout un système d'Europe croula.
L'empire s'affaissa dans une ombre qui ressembla à celle du monde romain expirant. On revit de l'abîme comme au temps des barbares. Seulement la barbarie de 1815, qu'il faut nommer de son petit nom, la contre-révolution, avait peu d'haleine, s'essouffla vite, et resta court. L'empire, avouons-le, fut pleuré, et pleuré par des yeux héroïques. Si la gloire est dans le glaive fait sceptre, l'empire avait été la gloire même. Il avait répandu sur la terre toute la lumière que la tyrannie peut donner; lumière sombre. Disons plus: lumière obscure. Comparée au vrai jour, c'est de la nuit. Cette disparition de la nuit fit l'effet d'une éclipse.

Louis XVIII rentra dans Paris. Les danses en rond du 8 juillet effacèrent les enthousiasmes du 20 mars. Le Corse devint l'antithèse du Béarnais. Le drapeau du dôme des Tuileries fut blanc. L'exil trôna. La table de sapin de Hartwell prit place devant le fauteuil fleurdelysé de Louis XIV. On parla de Bouvines et de Fontenoy comme d'hier, Austerlitz ayant vieilli. L'autel et le trône fraternisèrent majestueusement. Une des formes les plus incontestées du salut de la société au dix-neuvième siècle s'établit sur la France et sur le continent. L'Europe prit la cocarde blanche. Trestaillon fut célèbre. La devise non pluribus impar reparut dans des rayons de pierre figurant un soleil sur la façade de la caserne du quai d'Orsay. Où il y avait eu une garde impériale, il y eut une maison rouge. L'arc du carrousel, tout chargé de victoires mal portées, dépaysé dans ces nouveautés, un peu honteux peut-être de Marengo et d'Arcole, se tira d'affaire avec la statue du duc d'Angoulême. Le cimetière de la Madeleine, redoutable fosse commune de 93, se couvrit de marbre et de jaspe, les os de Louis XVI et de Marie-Antoinette étant dans cette poussière. Dans le fossé de Vincennes, un cippe sépulcral sortit de terre, rappelant que le duc d'Enghien était mort dans le mois même où Napoléon avait été couronné. Le pape Pie VII, qui avait fait ce sacre très près de cette mort, bénit tranquillement la chute comme il avait béni l'élévation. Il y eut à Schoenbrunn une petite ombre âgée de quatre ans qu'il fut séditieux d'appeler le roi de Rome. Et ces choses se sont faites, et ces rois ont repris leurs trônes, et le maître de l'Europe a été mis dans une cage, et l'ancien régime est devenu le nouveau, et toute l'ombre et toute la lumière de la terre ont changé de place, parce que, dans l'après-midi d'un jour d'été, un pâtre a dit à un Prussien dans un bois: passez par ici et non par là!

Ce 1815 fut une sorte d'avril lugubre. Les vieilles réalités malsaines et vénéneuses se couvrirent d'apparences neuves. Le mensonge épousa 1789, le droit divin se masqua d'une charte, les fictions se firent constitutionnelles, les préjugés, les superstitions et les arrière-pensées, avec l'article 14 au cœur, se vernirent de libéralisme. Changement de peau des serpents.

L'homme avait été à la fois agrandi et amoindri par Napoléon. L'idéal, sous ce règne de la matière splendide, avait reçu le nom étrange d'idéologie. Grave imprudence d'un grand homme, tourner en dérision l'avenir. Les peuples cependant, cette chair à canon si amoureuse du canonnier, le cherchaient des yeux. Où est-il? Que fait-il? Napoléon est mort, disait un passant à un invalide de Marengo et de Waterloo. — Lui mort! s'écria ce soldat, vous le connaissez bien! Les imaginations déifiaient cet homme terrassé. Le fond de l'Europe, après Waterloo, fut ténébreux. Quelque chose d'énorme resta longtemps vide par l'évanouissement de Napoléon.

Les rois se mirent dans ce vide. La vieille Europe en profita pour se reformer. Il y eut une Sainte-Alliance. Belle-Alliance, avait dit d'avance le champ fatal de Waterloo.

En présence et en face de cette antique Europe refaite, les linéaments d'une France nouvelle s'ébauchèrent. L'avenir, raillé par l'empereur, fit son entrée. Il avait sur le front cette étoile, Liberté. Les yeux ardents des jeunes générations se tournèrent vers lui. Chose singulière, on s'éprit en même temps de cet avenir, Liberté, et de ce passé, Napoléon. La défaite avait grandi le vaincu. Bonaparte tombé semblait plus haut que Napoléon debout. Ceux qui avaient triomphé eurent peur. L'Angleterre le fit garder par Hudson Lowe et la France le fit guetter par Montchenu. Ses bras croisés devinrent l'inquiétude des trônes. Alexandre le nommait: mon insomnie. Cet effroi venait de la quantité de révolution qu'il avait en lui. C'est ce qui explique et excuse le libéralisme bonapartiste. Ce fantôme donnait le tremblement au vieux monde. Les rois régnèrent mal à leur aise, avec le rocher de Sainte-Hélène à l'horizon.

Pendant que Napoléon agonisait à Longwood, les soixante mille hommes tombés dans le champ de Waterloo pourrirent tranquillement, et quelque chose de leur paix se répandit dans le monde. Le congrès de Vienne en fit les traités de 1815, et l'Europe nomma cela la restauration.

Voilà ce que c'est que Waterloo.

Mais qu'importe à l'infini? Toute cette tempête, tout ce nuage, cette guerre, puis cette paix, toute cette ombre, ne troubla pas un moment la lueur de l'œil immense devant lequel un puceron sautant d'un brin d'herbe à l'autre égale l'aigle volant de clocher en clocher aux tours de Notre-Dame.

Chapitre XIX

Le champ de bataille la nuit

Revenons, c’est une nécessité de ce livre, sur ce fatal champ de bataille.

Le 18 juin 1815, c’était pleine lune. Cette clarté favorisa la poursuite féroce de Blücher, dénonça les traces des fuyards, livra cette masse désastreuse à la cavalerie prussienne acharnée, et aida au massacre. Il y a parfois dans les catastrophes de ces tragiques complaisances de la nuit.

Après le dernier coup de canon tiré, la plaine de Mont-Saint-Jean resta déserte.

Les Anglais occupèrent le campement des Français, c’est la constatation habituelle de la victoire; coucher dans le lit du vaincu. Ils établirent leur bivouac au delà de Rossomme. Les Prussiens, lâchés sur la déroute, poussèrent en avant. Wellington alla au village de Waterloo rédiger son rapport à lord Bathurst.

Si jamais le sic vos non vobis a été applicable, c’est à coup sûr à ce village de Waterloo. Waterloo n’a rien fait, et est resté à une demi-lieue de l’action. Mont-Saint-Jean a été canonné, Hougomont a été brûlé, Papelotte a été brûlé, Plancenoit a été brûlé, la Haie-Sainte a été prise d’assaut, la Belle-Alliance a vu l’embrasement des deux vainqueurs; on sait à peine ces noms, et Waterloo qui n’a point travaillé dans la bataille en a tout l’honneur.

Nous ne sommes pas de ceux qui flattent la guerre; quand l’occasion s’en présente, nous lui disons ses vérités. La guerre a d’affreuses beautés que nous n’avons point cachées; elle a aussi, convenons-en, quelques laideurs. Une des plus surprenantes, c’est le prompt dépouillement des morts après la victoire. L’aube qui suit une bataille se lève toujours sur des cadavres nus.

Qui fait cela? Qui souille ainsi le triomphe? Quelle est cette hideuse main furtive qui se glisse dans la poche de la victoire? Quels sont ces filous faisant leur coup derrière la gloire? Quelques philosophes, Voltaire entre autres, affirment que ce sont précisément ceux-là qui ont fait la gloire. Ce sont les mêmes, disent-ils, il n’y a pas de rechange, ceux qui sont debout pillent ceux qui sont à terre. Le héros du jour est le vampire de la nuit. On a bien le droit, après tout, de détrousser un peu un cadavre dont on est l’auteur. Quant à nous, nous ne le croyons pas. Cueillir des lauriers et voler les souliers d’un mort, cela nous semble impossible à la même main.

Ce qui est certain, c’est que, d’ordinaire, après les vainqueurs viennent les voleurs. Mais mettons le soldat, surtout le soldat contemporain, hors de cause.

Toute armée a une queue, et c’est là ce qu’il faut accuser. Des êtres chauves-souris, mi-partis brigands et valets, toutes les espèces de vespertilio qu’engendre ce crépuscule qu’on appelle la guerre, des porteurs d’uniformes qui ne combattent pas, de faux malades, des éclopés redoutables, des cantiniers interlopes trottant, quelquefois avec leurs femmes, sur de petites charrettes et volant ce qu’ils revendent, des mendiants s’offrant pour guides aux officiers, des goujats, des maraudeurs, les armées en marche autrefois, — nous ne parlons pas du temps présent, — traînaient tout cela, si bien que, dans la langue spéciale, cela s’appelait «les traînards». Aucune armée ni aucune nation n’étaient responsables de ces êtres; ils parlaient italien et suivaient les Allemands; ils parlaient français et suivaient les Anglais. C’est par un de ces misérables, traînard espagnol qui parlait français, que le marquis de Fervacques, trompé par son baragouin picard, et le prenant pour un des nôtres, fut tué en traître et volé sur le champ de bataille même, dans la nuit qui suivit la victoire de Cerisoles. De la maraude naissait le maraud. La détestable maxime: vivre sur l’ennemi, produisait cette lèpre, qu’une forte discipline pouvait seule guérir. Il y a des renommées qui trompent; on ne sait pas toujours pourquoi de certains généraux, grands d’ailleurs, ont été si populaires. Turenne était adoré de ses soldats parce qu’il tolérait le pillage; le mal permis fait partie de la bonté; Turenne était si bon qu’il a laissé mettre à feu et à sang le Palatinat. On voyait à la suite des armées moins ou plus de maraudeurs selon que le chef était plus ou moins sévère. Hoche et Marceau n’avaient point de traînards; Wellington, nous lui rendons volontiers cette justice, en avait peu.

Pourtant, dans la nuit du 18 au 19 juin, on dépouilla les morts. Wellington fut rigide; ordre de passer par les armes quiconque serait pris en flagrant délit; mais la rapine est tenace. Les maraudeurs volaient dans un coin du champ de bataille pendant qu’on les fusillait dans l’autre.

La lune était sinistre sur cette plaine.

Vers minuit, un homme rôdait, ou plutôt rampait, du côté du chemin creux d’Ohain. C’était, selon toute apparence, un de ceux que nous venons de caractériser, ni Anglais, ni Français, ni paysan, ni soldat, moins homme que goule, attiré par le flair des morts, ayant pour victoire le vol, venant dévaliser Waterloo. Il était vêtu d'une blouse qui était un peu une capote, il était inquiet et audacieux, il allait devant lui et regardait derrière lui. Qu'était-ce que cet homme? La nuit probablement en savait plus sur son compte que le jour. Il n'avait point de sac, mais évidemment de larges poches sous sa capote. De temps en temps, il s'arrêtait, examinait la plaine autour de lui comme pour voir s'il n'était pas observé, se penchait brusquement, dérangeait à terre quelque chose de silencieux et d'immobile, puis se redressait et s'esquivait. Son glissement, ses attitudes, son geste rapide et mystérieux le faisaient ressembler à ces larves crépusculaires qui hantent les ruines et que les anciennes légendes normandes appellent les Alleurs.

De certains échassiers nocturnes font de ces silhouettes dans les marécages.

Un regard qui eût sondé attentivement toute cette brume eût pu remarquer, à quelque distance, arrêté et comme caché derrière la masure qui borde sur la chaussée de Nivelles l'angle de la route de Mont-Saint-Jean à Braine-l'Alleud, une façon de petit fourgon de vivandier à coiffe d'osier goudronnée, attelé d'une haridelle affamée broutant l'ortie à travers son mors, et dans ce fourgon une espèce de femme assise sur des coffres et des paquets. Peut-être y avait-il un lien entre ce fourgon et ce rôdeur.

L'obscurité était sereine. Pas un nuage au zénith. Qu'importe que la terre soit rouge, la lune reste blanche. Ce sont là les indifférences du ciel. Dans les prairies, des branches d'arbre cassées par la mitraille mais non tombées et retenues par l'écorce se balançaient doucement au vent de la nuit. Une haleine, presque une respiration, remuait les broussailles. Il y avait dans l'herbe des frissons qui ressemblaient à des départs d'âmes.

On entendait vaguement au loin aller et venir les patrouilles et les rondes-major du campement anglais.

Hougomont et la Haie-Sainte continuaient de brûler, faisant, l'un à l'ouest, l'autre à l'est, deux grosses flammes auxquelles venait se rattacher, comme un collier de rubis dénoué ayant à ses extrémités deux escarboucles, le cordon de feux du bivouac anglais étalé en demi-cercle immense sur les collines de l'horizon.

Nous avons dit la catastrophe du chemin d'Ohain. Ce qu'avait été cette mort pour tant de braves, le cœur s'épouvante d'y songer.

Si quelque chose est effroyable, s’il existe une réalité qui dépasse le rêve, c’est ceci: vivre, voir le soleil, être en pleine possession de la force virile, avoir la santé et la joie, rire vaillamment, courir vers une gloire qu’on a devant soi, éblouissante, se sentir dans la poitrine un poumon qui respire, un cœur qui bat, une volonté qui raisonne, parler, penser, espérer, aimer, avoir une mère, avoir une femme, avoir des enfants, avoir la lumière, et tout à coup, le temps d’un cri, en moins d’une minute, s’effondrer dans un abîme, tomber, rouler, écraser, être écrasé, voir des épis de blé, des fleurs, des feuilles, des branches, ne pouvoir se retenir à rien, sentir son sabre inutile, des hommes sous soi, des chevaux sur soi, se débattre en vain, les os brisés par quelque ruade dans les ténèbres, sentir un talon qui vous fait jaillir les yeux, mordre avec rage des fers de chevaux, étouffer, hurler, se tordre, être là-dessous, et se dire: tout à l’heure j’étais un vivant!

Là où avait râlé ce lamentable désastre, tout faisait silence maintenant. L’encaissement du chemin creux était comble de chevaux et de cavaliers inextricablement amoncelés. Enchevêtrement terrible. Il n’y avait plus de talus. Les cadavres nivelaient la route avec la plaine et venaient au ras du bord comme un boisseau d’orge bien mesuré. Un tas de morts dans la partie haute, une rivière de sang dans la partie basse; telle était cette route le soir du 18 juin 1815. Le sang coulait jusque sur la chaussée de Nivelles et s’y extravasait en une large mare devant l’abatis d’arbres qui barrait la chaussée, à un endroit qu’on montre encore. C’est, on s’en souvient, au point opposé, vers la chaussée de Genappe, qu’avait eu lieu l’effondrement des cuirassiers. L’épaisseur des cadavres se proportionnait à la profondeur du chemin creux. Vers le milieu, à l’endroit où il devenait plein, là où avait passé la division Delord, la couche des morts s’amincissait.

Le rôdeur nocturne, que nous venons de faire entrevoir au lecteur, allait de ce côté. Il furetait cette immense tombe. Il regardait. Il passait on ne sait quelle hideuse revue des morts. Il marchait les pieds dans le sang.

Tout à coup il s’arrêta. À quelques pas devant lui, dans le chemin creux, au point où finissait le monceau des morts, de dessous cet amas d’hommes et de chevaux, sortait une main ouverte, éclairée par la lune.

Cette main avait au doigt quelque chose qui brillait, et qui était un anneau d’or.

L’homme se courba, demeura un moment accroupi, et quand il se releva, il n’y avait plus d’anneau à cette main.

Il ne se releva pas précisément; il resta dans une attitude fauve et effarouchée, tournant le dos au tas de morts, scrutant l'horizon, à genoux, tout l'avant du corps portant sur ses deux index appuyés à terre, la tête guettant par-dessus le bord du chemin creux. Les quatre pattes du chacal conviennent à de certaines actions.

Puis, prenant son parti, il se dressa.

En ce moment il eut un soubresaut. Il sentit que par derrière on le tenait.

Il se retourna; c'était la main ouverte qui s'était refermée et qui avait saisi le pan de sa capote.

Un honnête homme eût eu peur. Celui-ci se mit à rire.

— Tiens, dit-il, ce n'est que le mort. J'aime mieux un revenant qu'un gendarme.

Cependant la main défaillit et le lâcha. L'effort s'épuise vite dans la tombe.

— Ah çà! reprit le rôdeur, est-il vivant ce mort? Voyons donc. Il se pencha de nouveau, fouilla le tas, écarta ce qui faisait obstacle, saisit la main, empoigna le bras, dégagea la tête, tira le corps, et quelques instants après il traînait dans l'ombre du chemin creux un homme inanimé, au moins évanoui. C'était un cuirassier, un officier, un officier même d'un certain rang; une grosse épaulette d'or sortait de dessous la cuirasse; cet officier n'avait plus de casque. Un furieux coup de sabre balafrait son visage où l'on ne voyait que du sang. Du reste, il ne semblait pas qu'il eût de membre cassé, et par quelque hasard heureux, si ce mot est possible ici, les morts s'étaient arc-boutés au-dessus de lui de façon à le garantir de l'écrasement. Ses yeux étaient fermés.

Il avait sur sa cuirasse la croix d'argent de la Légion d'honneur.

Le rôdeur arracha cette croix qui disparut dans un des gouffres qu'il avait sous sa capote.

Après quoi, il tâta le gousset de l'officier, y sentit une montre et la prit. Puis il fouilla le gilet, y trouva une bourse et l'empocha.

Comme il en était à cette phase des secours qu'il portait à ce mourant, l'officier ouvrit les yeux.

— Merci, dit-il faiblement.

La brusquerie des mouvements de l'homme qui le maniait, la fraîcheur de la nuit, l'air respiré librement, l'avaient tiré de sa léthargie.

Le rôdeur ne répondit point. Il leva la tête. On entendait un bruit de pas dans la plaine; probablement quelque patrouille qui approchait.

L’officier murmura, car il y avait encore de l’agonie dans sa voix:

— Qui a gagné la bataille?

— Les Anglais, répondit le rôdeur.

L’officier reprit:

— Cherchez dans mes poches. Vous y trouverez une bourse et une montre. Prenez-les.

C’était déjà fait.

Le rôdeur exécuta le semblant demandé, et dit:

— Il n’y a rien.

— On m’a volé, reprit l’officier; j’en suis fâché. C’eût été pour vous.

Les pas de la patrouille devenaient de plus en plus distincts.

— Voici qu’on vient, dit le rôdeur, faisant le mouvement d’un homme qui s’en va.

L’officier, soulevant péniblement le bras, le retint:

— Vous m’avez sauvé la vie. Qui êtes-vous?

Le rôdeur répondit vite et bas:

— J’étais comme vous de l’armée française. Il faut que je vous quitte. Si l’on me prenait, on me fusillerait. Je vous ai sauvé la vie. Tirez-vous d’affaire maintenant.

— Quel est votre grade?

— Sergent.

— Comment vous appelez-vous?

— Thénardier.

— Je n’oublierai pas ce nom, dit l’officier. Et vous, retenez le mien. Je me nomme Pontmercy.

Livre deuxième — Le vaisseau L'Orion

Chapitre I

Le numéro 24601 devient le numéro 9430

Jean Valjean avait été repris.

On nous saura gré de passer rapidement sur des détails douloureux. Nous nous bornons à transcrire deux entrefilets publiés par les journaux du temps, quelques mois après les événements surprenants accomplis à Montreuil-sur-Mer.

Ces articles sont un peu sommaires. On se souvient qu'il n'existait pas encore à cette époque de Gazette des Tribunaux.

Nous empruntons le premier au Drapeau blanc. Il est daté du 25 juillet 1823:

«Un arrondissement du Pas-de-Calais vient d'être le théâtre d'un événement peu ordinaire. Un homme étranger au département et nommé Mr Madeleine avait relevé depuis quelques années, grâce à des procédés nouveaux, une ancienne industrie locale, la fabrication des jais et des verroteries noires. Il y avait fait sa fortune, et, disons-le, celle de l'arrondissement. En reconnaissance de ses services, on l'avait nommé maire. La police a découvert que ce Mr Madeleine n'était autre qu'un ancien forçat en rupture de ban, condamné en 1796 pour vol, et nommé Jean Valjean. Jean Valjean a été réintégré au bagne. Il paraît qu'avant son arrestation il avait réussi à retirer de chez Mr Laffitte une somme de plus d'un demi-million qu'il y avait placée, et qu'il avait, du reste, très légitimement, dit-on, gagnée dans son commerce. On n'a pu savoir où Jean Valjean avait caché cette somme depuis sa rentrée au bagne de Toulon.»

Le deuxième article, un peu plus détaillé, est extrait du Journal de Paris, même date.

«Un ancien forçat libéré, nommé Jean Valjean, vient de comparaître devant la cour d'assises du Var dans des circonstances faites pour appeler l'attention. Ce scélérat était parvenu à tromper la vigilance de la police; il avait changé de nom et avait réussi à se faire nommer maire d'une de nos petites villes du Nord. Il avait établi dans cette ville un commerce assez considérable. Il a été enfin démasqué et arrêté, grâce au zèle infatigable du ministère public. Il avait pour concubine une fille publique qui est morte de saisissement au moment de son arrestation. Ce misérable, qui est doué d’une force herculéenne, avait trouvé moyen de s’évader; mais, trois ou quatre jours après son évasion, la police mit de nouveau la main sur lui, à Paris même, au moment où il montait dans une de ces petites voitures qui font le trajet de la capitale au village de Montfermeil (Seine-et-Oise). On dit qu’il avait profité de l’intervalle de ces trois ou quatre jours de liberté pour rentrer en possession d’une somme considérable placée par lui chez un de nos principaux banquiers. On évalue cette somme à six ou sept cent mille francs. À en croire l’acte d’accusation, il l’aurait enfouie en un lieu connu de lui seul et l’on n’a pas pu la saisir. Quoi qu’il en soit, le nommé Jean Valjean vient d’être traduit aux assises du département du Var comme accusé d’un vol de grand chemin commis à main armée, il y a huit ans environ, sur la personne d’un de ces honnêtes enfants qui, comme l’a dit le patriarche de Ferney en vers immortels:

...De Savoie arrivent tous les ans
Et dont la main légèrement essuie
Ces longs canaux engorgés par la suie.

«Ce bandit a renoncé à se défendre. Il a été établi, par l’habile et éloquent organe du ministère public, que le vol avait été commis de complicité, et que Jean Valjean faisait partie d’une bande de voleurs dans le Midi. En conséquence Jean Valjean, déclaré coupable, a été condamné à la peine de mort. Ce criminel avait refusé de se pourvoir en cassation. Le roi, dans son inépuisable clémence, a daigné commuer sa peine en celle des travaux forcés à perpétuité. Jean Valjean a été immédiatement dirigé sur le bagne de Toulon.»

On n’a pas oublié que Jean Valjean avait à Montreuil-sur-Mer des habitudes religieuses. Quelques journaux, entre autres le Constitutionnel, présentèrent cette commutation comme un triomphe du parti prêtre.

Jean Valjean changea de chiffre au bagne. Il s’appela 9430.

Du reste, disons-le pour n’y plus revenir, avec Mr Madeleine la prospérité de Montreuil-sur-Mer disparut; tout ce qu’il avait prévu dans sa nuit de fièvre et d’hésitation se réalisa; lui de moins, ce fut en effet l’âme de moins. Après sa chute, il se fit à Montreuil-sur-Mer ce partage égoïste des grandes existences tombées, ce fatal dépècement des choses florissantes qui s’accomplit tous les jours obscurément dans la communauté humaine et que l’histoire n’a remarqué qu’une fois, parce qu’il s’est fait après la mort d’Alexandre. Les lieutenants se couronnent rois; les contre-maîtres s’improvisèrent fabricants. Les rivalités envieuses surgirent. Les vastes ateliers de Mr Madeleine furent fermés; les bâtiments tombèrent en ruine, les ouvriers se dispersèrent. Les uns quittèrent le pays, les autres quittèrent le métier. Tout se fit désormais en petit, au lieu de se faire en grand; pour le lucre, au lieu de se faire pour le bien. Plus de centre; la concurrence partout, et l'acharnement. Mr Madeleine dominait tout, et dirigeait. Lui tombé, chacun tira à soi; l'esprit de lutte succéda à l'esprit d'organisation, l'âpreté à la cordialité, la haine de l'un contre l'autre à la bienveillance du fondateur pour tous; les fils noués par Mr Madeleine se brouillèrent et se rompirent; on falsifia les procédés, on avilit les produits, on tua la confiance; les débouchés diminuèrent, moins de commandes; le salaire baissa, les ateliers chômèrent, la faillite vint. Et puis plus rien pour les pauvres. Tout s'évanouit.

L'état lui-même s'aperçut que quelqu'un avait été écrasé quelque part. Moins de quatre ans après l'arrêt de la cour d'assises constatant au profit du bagne l'identité de Mr Madeleine et de Jean Valjean, les frais de perception de l'impôt étaient doublés dans l'arrondissement de Montreuil-sur-Mer, et Mr de Villèle en faisait l'observation à la tribune au mois de février 1827.

Chapitre II

Où on lira deux vers qui sont peut-être du diable

Avant d’aller plus loin, il est à propos de raconter avec quelque détail un fait singulier qui se passa vers la même époque à Montfermeil et qui n’est peut-être pas sans coïncidence avec certaines conjectures du ministère public.

Il y a dans le pays de Montfermeil une superstition très ancienne, d’autant plus curieuse et d’autant plus précieuse qu’une superstition populaire dans le voisinage de Paris est comme un aloès en Sibérie. Nous sommes de ceux qui respectent tout ce qui est à l’état de plante rare. Voici donc la superstition de Montfermeil. On croit que le diable a, de temps immémorial, choisi la forêt pour y cacher ses trésors. Les bonnes femmes affirment qu’il n’est pas rare de rencontrer, à la chute du jour, dans les endroits écartés du bois, un homme noir, ayant la mine d’un charretier ou d’un bûcheron, chaussé de sabots, vêtu d’un pantalon et d’un sarrau de toile, et reconnaissable en ce qu’au lieu de bonnet ou de chapeau il a deux immenses cornes sur la tête. Ceci doit le rendre reconnaissable en effet. Cet homme est habituellement occupé à creuser un trou. Il y a trois manières de tirer parti de cette rencontre. La première, c’est d’aborder l’homme et de lui parler. Alors on s’aperçoit que cet homme est tout bonnement un paysan, qu’il paraît noir parce qu’on est au crépuscule, qu’il ne creuse pas le moindre trou, mais qu’il coupe de l’herbe pour ses vaches, et que ce qu’on avait pris pour des cornes n’est autre chose qu’une fourche à fumier qu’il porte sur son dos et dont les dents, grâce à la perspective du soir, semblaient lui sortir de la tête. On rentre chez soi, et l’on meurt dans la semaine. La seconde manière, c’est de l’observer, d’attendre qu’il ait creusé son trou, qu’il l’ait refermé et qu’il s’en soit allé; puis de courir bien vite à la fosse, de la rouvrir et d’y prendre le «trésor» que l’homme noir y a nécessairement déposé. En ce cas, on meurt dans le mois. Enfin la troisième manière, c’est de ne point parler à l’homme noir, de ne point le regarder, et de s’enfuir à toutes jambes. On meurt dans l’année. Comme les trois manières ont leurs inconvénients, la seconde, qui offre du moins quelques avantages, entre autres celui de posséder un trésor, ne fût-ce qu’un mois, est la plus généralement adoptée. Les hommes hardis, que toutes les chances tentent, ont donc, assez souvent, à ce qu'on assure, rouvert les trous creusés par l'homme noir et essayé de voler le diable. Il paraît que l'opération est médiocre. Du moins, s'il faut en croire la tradition et en particulier les deux vers énigmatiques en latin barbare qu'a laissés sur ce sujet un mauvais moine normand, un peu sorcier, appelé Tryphon. Ce Tryphon est enterré à l'abbaye de Saint-Georges de Bocherville près Rouen, et il naît des crapauds sur sa tombe.

On fait donc des efforts énormes, ces fosses-là sont ordinairement très creuses, on sue, on fouille, on travaille toute une nuit, car c'est la nuit que cela se fait, on mouille sa chemise, on brûle sa chandelle, on ébrèche sa pioche, et lorsqu'on est arrivé enfin au fond du trou, lorsqu'on met la main sur «le trésor», que trouve-t-on? qu'est-ce que c'est que le trésor du diable? Un sou, parfois un écu, une pierre, un squelette, un cadavre saignant, quelquefois un spectre plié en quatre comme une feuille de papier dans un portefeuille, quelquefois rien. C'est ce que semblent annoncer aux curieux indiscrets les vers de Tryphon:

Fodit, et in fossa thesauros condit opaca,
As, nummos, lapides, cadaver, simulacre, nihilque.

Il paraît que de nos jours on y trouve aussi, tantôt une poire à poudre avec des balles, tantôt un vieux jeu de cartes gras et roussi qui a évidemment servi aux diables. Tryphon n'enregistre point ces deux dernières trouvailles, attendu que Tryphon vivait au douzième siècle et qu'il ne semble point que le diable ait eu l'esprit d'inventer la poudre avant Roger Bacon et les cartes avant Charles VI.

Du reste, si l'on joue avec ces cartes, on est sûr de perdre tout ce qu'on possède; et quant à la poudre qui est dans la poire, elle a la propriété de vous faire éclater votre fusil à la figure.

Or, fort peu de temps après l'époque où il sembla au ministère public que le forçat libéré Jean Valjean, pendant son évasion de quelques jours, avait rôdé autour de Montfermeil, on remarqua dans ce même village qu'un certain vieux cantonnier appelé Boulatruelle avait «des allures» dans le bois. On croyait savoir dans le pays que ce Boulatruelle avait été au bagne; il était soumis à de certaines surveillances de police, et, comme il ne trouvait d'ouvrage nulle part, l'administration l'employait au rabais comme cantonnier sur le chemin de traverse de Gagny à Lagny.

Ce Boulatruelle était un homme vu de travers par les gens de l'endroit, trop respectueux, trop humble, prompt à ôter son bonnet à tout le monde, tremblant et souriant devant les gendarmes, probablement affilié à des bandes, disait-on, suspect d'embuscade au coin des taillis à la nuit tombante. Il n'avait que cela pour lui qu'il était ivrogne.

Voici ce qu'on croyait avoir remarqué:

Depuis quelque temps, Boulatruelle quittait de fort bonne heure sa besogne d'empierrement et d'entretien de la route et s'en allait dans la forêt avec sa pioche. On le rencontrait vers le soir dans les clairières les plus désertes, dans les fourrés les plus sauvages, ayant l'air de chercher quelque chose, quelquefois creusant des trous. Les bonnes femmes qui passaient le prenaient d'abord pour Belzébuth, puis elles reconnaissaient Boulatruelle, et n'étaient guère plus rassurées. Ces rencontres paraissaient contrarier vivement Boulatruelle. Il était visible qu'il cherchait à se cacher, et qu'il y avait un mystère dans ce qu'il faisait.

On disait dans le village: — C'est clair que le diable a fait quelque apparition. Boulatruelle l'a vu, et cherche. Au fait, il est fichu pour empoigner le magot de Lucifer. Les voltairiens ajoutaient: — Sera-ce Boulatruelle qui attrapera le diable, ou le diable qui attrapera Boulatruelle? Les vieilles femmes faisaient beaucoup de signes de croix.

Cependant les manèges de Boulatruelle dans le bois cessèrent, et il reprit régulièrement son travail de cantonnier. On parla d'autre chose.

Quelques personnes toutefois étaient restées curieuses, pensant qu'il y avait probablement dans ceci, non point les fabuleux trésors de la légende, mais quelque bonne aubaine, plus sérieuse et plus palpable que les billets de banque du diable, et dont le cantonnier avait sans doute surpris à moitié le secret. Les plus «intrigués» étaient le maître d'école et le gargotier Thénardier, lequel était l'ami de tout le monde et n'avait point dédaigné de se lier avec Boulatruelle.

— Il a été aux galères? disait Thénardier. Eh! mon Dieu! on ne sait ni qui y est, ni qui y sera.

Un soir le maître d'école affirmait qu'autrefois la justice se serait enquise de ce que Boulatruelle allait faire dans le bois, et qu'il aurait bien fallu qu'il parlât, et qu'on l'aurait mis à la torture au besoin, et que Boulatruelle n'aurait point résisté, par exemple, à la question de l'eau.

— Donnons-lui la question du vin, dit Thénardier.

On se mit à quatre et l'on fît boire le vieux cantonnier. Boulatruelle but énormément, et parla peu. Il combina, avec un art admirable et dans une proportion magistrale, la soif d'un goinfre avec la discrétion d'un juge.

Cependant, à force de revenir à la charge, et de rapprocher et de presser les quelques paroles obscures qui lui échappaient, voici ce que le Thénardier et le maître d'école crurent comprendre:

Boulatruelle, un matin, en se rendant au point du jour à son ouvrage, aurait été surpris de voir dans un coin du bois, sous une broussaille, une pelle et une pioche, comme qui dirait cachées. Cependant, il aurait pensé que c'étaient probablement la pelle et la pioche du père Six-Fours, le porteur d'eau, et il n'y aurait plus songé. Mais le soir du même jour, il aurait vu, sans pouvoir être vu lui-même, étant masqué par un gros arbre, se diriger de la route vers le plus épais du bois «un particulier qui n'était pas du tout du pays, et que lui, Boulatruelle, connaissait très bien». Traduction par Thénardier: un camarade du bagne. Boulatruelle s'était obstinément refusé à dire le nom. Ce particulier portait un paquet, quelque chose de carré, comme une grande boîte ou un petit coffre. Surprise de Boulatruelle. Ce ne serait pourtant qu'au bout de sept ou huit minutes que l'idée de suivre «le particulier» lui serait venue. Mais il était trop tard, le particulier était déjà dans le fourré, la nuit s'était faite, et Boulatruelle n'avait pu le rejoindre. Alors il avait pris le parti d'observer la lisière du bois. «Il faisait lune.» Deux ou trois heures après, Boulatruelle avait vu ressortir du taillis son particulier portant maintenant, non plus le petit coffre-malle, mais une pioche et une pelle. Boulatruelle avait laissé passer le particulier et n'avait pas eu l'idée de l'aborder, parce qu'il s'était dit que l'autre était trois fois plus fort que lui, et armé d'une pioche, et l'assommerait probablement en le reconnaissant et en se voyant reconnu. Touchante effusion de deux vieux camarades qui se retrouvent. Mais la pelle et la pioche avaient été un trait de lumière pour Boulatruelle; il avait couru à la broussaille du matin, et n'y avait plus trouvé ni pelle ni pioche. Il en avait conclu que son particulier, entré dans le bois, y avait creusé un trou avec la pioche, avait enfoui le coffre, et avait refermé le trou avec la pelle. Or, le coffre était trop petit pour contenir un cadavre, donc il contenait de l'argent. De là ses recherches. Boulatruelle avait exploré, sondé et fureté toute la forêt, et fouillé partout où la terre lui avait paru fraîchement remuée. En vain.

Il n'avait rien «déniché». Personne n'y pensa plus dans Montfermeil. Il y eut seulement quelques braves commères qui dirent: Tenez pour certain que le cantonnier de Gagny n'a pas fait tout ce triquemaque pour rien; il est sûr que le diable est venu.

Chapitre III

Qu’il fallait que la chaîne de la manille eut subit un certain travail préparatoire pour être ainsi brisée d’un coup de marteau

Vers la fin d’octobre de cette même année 1823, les habitants de Toulon virent rentrer dans leur port, à la suite d’un gros temps et pour réparer quelques avaries, le vaisseau l’ Orion qui a été plus tard employé à Brest comme vaisseau-école et qui faisait alors partie de l’escadre de la Méditerranée.

Ce bâtiment, tout éclopé qu’il était, car la mer l’avait malmené, fit de l’effet en entrant dans la rade. Il portait je ne sais plus quel pavillon qui lui valut un salut réglementaire de onze coups de canon, rendus par lui coup pour coup; total: vingt-deux. On a calculé qu’en salves, politesses royales et militaires, échanges de tapages courtois, signaux d’étiquette, formalités de rades et de citadelles, levers et couchers de soleil salués tous les jours par toutes les forteresses et tous les navires de guerre, ouvertures et fermetures de portes, etc., etc., le monde civilisé tirait à poudre par toute la terre, toutes les vingt-quatre heures, cent cinquante mille coups de canon inutiles. À six francs le coup de canon, cela fait neuf cent mille francs par jour, trois cents millions par an, qui s’en vont en fumée. Ceci n’est qu’un détail. Pendant ce temps-là les pauvres meurent de faim.

L’année 1823 était ce que la restauration a appelé «l’époque de la guerre d’Espagne.»

Cette guerre contenait beaucoup d’événements dans un seul, et force singularités. Une grosse affaire de famille pour la maison de Bourbon; la branche de France secourant et protégeant la branche de Madrid, c’est-à-dire faisant acte d’aînesse; un retour apparent à nos traditions nationales compliqué de servitude et de sujétion aux cabinets du nord; Mr le duc d’Angoulême, surnommé par les feuilles libérales le héros d’Andujar, comprimant, dans une attitude triomphale un peu contrariée par son air paisible, le vieux terrorisme fort réel du saint-office aux prises avec le terrorisme chimérique des libéraux; les sans-culottes ressuscités au grand effroi des douairières sous le nom de descamisados; le monarchisme faisant obstacle au progrès qualifié anarchie; les théories de 89 brusquement interrompues dans la sape; un holà européen intimé à l’idée française faisant son tour du monde; à côté du fils de France généralissime, le prince de Carignan, depuis Charles-Albert, s'enrôlant dans cette croisade des rois contre les peuples comme volontaire avec des épaulettes de grenadier en laine rouge; les soldats de l'empire se remettant en campagne, mais après huit années de repos, vieillis, tristes, et sous la cocarde blanche; le drapeau tricolore agité à l'étranger par une héroïque poignée de Français comme le drapeau blanc l'avait été à Coblentz trente ans auparavant; les moines mêlés à nos troupiers; l'esprit de liberté et de nouveauté mis à la raison par les bayonnettes; les principes matés à coups de canon; la France défaisant par ses armes ce qu'elle avait fait par son esprit; du reste, les chefs ennemis vendus, les soldats hésitants, les villes assiégées par des millions; point de périls militaires et pourtant des explosions possibles, comme dans toute mine surprise et envahie; peu de sang versé, peu d'honneur conquis, de la honte pour quelques-uns, de la gloire pour personne; telle fut cette guerre, faite par des princes qui descendaient de Louis XIV et conduite par des généraux qui sortaient de Napoléon. Elle eut ce triste sort de ne rappeler ni la grande guerre ni la grande politique.

Quelques faits d'armes furent sérieux; la prise du Trocadéro, entre autres, fut une belle action militaire; mais en somme, nous le répétons, les trompettes de cette guerre rendent un son fêlé, l'ensemble fut suspect, l'histoire approuve la France dans sa difficulté d'acceptation de ce faux triomphe. Il parut évident que certains officiers espagnols chargés de la résistance cédèrent trop aisément, l'idée de corruption se dégagea de la victoire; il sembla qu'on avait plutôt gagné les généraux que les batailles, et le soldat vainqueur rentra humilié. Guerre diminuante en effet où l'on put lire Banque de France dans les plis du drapeau. Des soldats de la guerre de 1808, sur lesquels s'était formidablement écroulée Saragosse, fronçaient le sourcil en 1823 devant l'ouverture facile des citadelles, et se prenaient à regretter Palafox. C'est l'humeur de la France d'aimer encore mieux avoir devant elle Rostopchine que Ballesteros.

À un point de vue plus grave encore, et sur lequel il convient d'insister aussi, cette guerre, qui froissait en France l'esprit militaire, indignait l'esprit démocratique. C'était une entreprise d'asservissement. Dans cette campagne, le but du soldat français, fils de la démocratie, était la conquête d'un joug pour autrui. Contresens hideux. La France est faite pour réveiller l'âme des peuples, non pour l'étouffer. Depuis 1792, toutes les révolutions de l'Europe sont la révolution française; la liberté rayonne de France. C'est là un fait solaire. Aveugle qui ne le voit pas! c'est Bonaparte qui l'a dit.

La guerre de 1823, attentat à la généreuse nation espagnole, était donc en même temps un attentat à la révolution française. Cette voie de fait monstrueuse, c'était la France qui la commettait; de force; car, en dehors des guerres libératrices, tout ce que font les armées, elles le font de force. Le mot obéissance passive l'indique. Une armée est un étrange chef-d'œuvre de combinaison où la force résulte d'une somme énorme d'impuissance. Ainsi s'explique la guerre, faite par l'humanité contre l'humanité malgré l'humanité.

Quant aux Bourbons, la guerre de 1823 leur fut fatale. Ils la prirent pour un succès. Ils ne virent point quel danger il y a à faire tuer une idée par une consigne. Ils se méprirent dans leur naïveté au point d'introduire dans leur établissement comme élément de force l'immense affaiblissement d'un crime. L'esprit de guet-apens entra dans leur politique. 1830 germa dans 1823. La campagne d'Espagne devint dans leurs conseils un argument pour les coups de force et pour les aventures de droit divin. La France, ayant rétabli el rey neto en Espagne, pouvait bien rétablir le roi absolu chez elle. Ils tombèrent dans cette redoutable erreur de prendre l'obéissance du soldat pour le consentement de la nation. Cette confiance-là perd les trônes. Il ne faut s'endormir, ni à l'ombre d'un mancenillier ni à l'ombre d'une armée.

Revenons au navire l' Orion.

Pendant les opérations de l'armée commandée par le prince-généralissime, une escadre croisait dans la Méditerranée. Nous venons de dire que l'Orion était de cette escadre et qu'il fut ramené par des événements de mer dans le port de Toulon.

La présence d'un vaisseau de guerre dans un port a je ne sais quoi qui appelle et qui occupe la foule. C'est que cela est grand, et que la foule aime ce qui est grand.

Un vaisseau de ligne est une des plus magnifiques rencontres qu'ait le génie de l'homme avec la puissance de la nature.

Un vaisseau de ligne est composé à la fois de ce qu'il y a de plus lourd et de ce qu'il y a de plus léger, parce qu'il a affaire en même temps aux trois formes de la substance, au solide, au liquide, au fluide, et qu'il doit lutter contre toutes les trois. Il a onze griffes de fer pour saisir le granit au fond de la mer, et plus d'ailes et plus d'antennes que la bigaille pour prendre le vent dans les nuées. Son haleine sort par ses cent vingt canons comme par des clairons énormes, et répond fièrement à la foudre. L’océan cherche à l’égarer dans l’effrayante similitude de ses vagues, mais le vaisseau a son âme, sa boussole, qui le conseille et lui montre toujours le nord. Dans les nuits noires ses fanaux suppléent aux étoiles. Ainsi, contre le vent il a la corde et la toile, contre l’eau le bois, contre le rocher le fer, le cuivre et le plomb, contre l’ombre la lumière, contre l’immensité une aiguille.

Si l’on veut se faire une idée de toutes ces proportions gigantesques dont l’ensemble constitue le vaisseau de ligne, on n’a qu’à entrer sous une des cales couvertes, à six étages, des ports de Brest ou de Toulon. Les vaisseaux en construction sont là sous cloche, pour ainsi dire. Cette poutre colossale, c’est une vergue; cette grosse colonne de bois couchée à terre à perte de vue, c’est le grand mât. À le prendre de sa racine dans la cale à sa cime dans la nuée, il est long de soixante toises, et il a trois pieds de diamètre à sa base. Le grand mât anglais s’élève à deux cent dix-sept pieds au-dessus de la ligne de flottaison. La marine de nos pères employait des câbles, la nôtre emploie des chaînes. Le simple tas de chaînes d’un vaisseau de cent canons a quatre pieds de haut, vingt pieds de large, huit pieds de profondeur. Et pour faire ce vaisseau, combien faut-il de bois? Trois mille stères. C’est une forêt qui flotte.

Et encore, qu’on le remarque bien, il ne s’agit ici que du bâtiment militaire d’il y a quarante ans, du simple navire à voiles; la vapeur, alors dans l’enfance, a depuis ajouté de nouveaux miracles à ce prodige qu’on appelle le vaisseau de guerre. À l’heure qu’il est, par exemple, le navire mixte à hélice est une machine surprenante traînée par une voilure de trois mille mètres carrés de surface et par une chaudière de la force de deux mille cinq cents chevaux.

Sans parler de ces merveilles nouvelles, l’ancien navire de Christophe Colomb et de Ruyter est un des grands chefs-d’œuvre de l’homme. Il est inépuisable en force comme l’infini en souffles, il emmagasine le vent dans sa voile, il est précis dans l’immense diffusion des vagues, il flotte et il règne.

Il vient une heure pourtant où la rafale brise comme une paille cette vergue de soixante pieds de long, où le vent ploie comme un jonc ce mât de quatre cents pieds de haut, où cette ancre qui pèse dix milliers se tord dans la gueule de la vague comme l’hameçon d’un pêcheur dans la mâchoire d’un brochet, où ces canons monstrueux poussent des rugissements plaintifs et inutiles que l’ouragan emporte dans le vide et dans la nuit, où toute cette puissance et toute cette majesté s’abîment dans une puissance et dans une majesté supérieures. Toutes les fois qu’une force immense se déploie pour aboutir à une immense faiblesse, cela fait rêver les hommes. De là, dans les ports, les curieux qui abondent, sans qu’ils s’expliquent eux-mêmes parfaitement pourquoi, autour de ces merveilleuses machines de guerre et de navigation.

Tous les jours donc, du matin au soir, les quais, les musoirs et les jetées du port de Toulon étaient couverts d’une quantité d’oisifs et de badauds, comme on dit à Paris, ayant pour affaire de regarder l’Orion.

L’Orion était un navire malade depuis longtemps. Dans ses navigations antérieures, des couches épaisses de coquillages s’étaient amoncelées sur sa carène au point de lui faire perdre la moitié de sa marche; on l’avait mis à sec l’année précédente pour gratter ces coquillages, puis il avait repris la mer. Mais ce grattage avait altéré les boulonnages de la carène. À la hauteur des Baléares, le bordé s’était fatigué et ouvert, et, comme le vaigrage ne se faisait pas alors en tôle, le navire avait fait de l’eau. Un violent coup d’équinoxe était survenu, qui avait défoncé à bâbord la poulaine et un sabord et endommagé le porte-haubans de misaine. À la suite de ces avaries, l’ Orion avait regagné Toulon.

Il était mouillé près de l’Arsenal. Il était en armement et on le réparait. La coque n’avait pas été endommagée à tribord, mais quelques bordages y étaient décloués çà et là, selon l’usage, pour laisser pénétrer de l’air dans la carcasse.

Un matin la foule qui le contemplait fut témoin d’un accident.

L’équipage était occupé à enverguer les voiles. Le gabier chargé de prendre l’empointure du grand hunier tribord perdit l’équilibre. On le vit chanceler, la multitude amassée sur le quai de l’Arsenal jeta un cri, la tête emporta le corps, l’homme tourna autour de la vergue, les mains étendues vers l’abîme; il saisit, au passage, le faux marchepied d’une main d’abord, puis de l’autre, et il y resta suspendu. La mer était au-dessous de lui à une profondeur vertigineuse. La secousse de sa chute avait imprimé au faux marchepied un violent mouvement d’escarpolette. L’homme allait et venait au bout de cette corde comme la pierre d’une fronde.

Aller à son secours, c’était courir un risque effrayant. Aucun des matelots, tous pêcheurs de la côte nouvellement levés pour le service, n’osait s’y aventurer. Cependant le malheureux gabier se fatiguait; on ne pouvait voir son angoisse sur son visage, mais on distinguait dans tous ses membres son épuisement. Ses bras se tendaient dans un tiraillement horrible. Chaque effort qu’il faisait pour remonter ne servait qu’à augmenter les oscillations du faux marchepied. Il ne criait pas de peur de perdre de la force. On n’attendait plus que la minute où il lâcherait la corde et par instants toutes les têtes se détournaient afin de ne pas le voir passer. Il y a des moments où un bout de corde, une perche, une branche d’arbre, c’est la vie même, et c’est une chose affreuse de voir un être vivant s’en détacher et tomber comme un fruit mûr.

Tout à coup, on aperçut un homme qui grimpait dans le gréement avec l’agilité d’un chat-tigre. Cet homme était vêtu de rouge, c’était un forçat; il avait un bonnet vert, c’était un forçat à vie. Arrivé à la hauteur de la hune, un coup de vent emporta son bonnet et laissa voir une tête toute blanche, ce n’était pas un jeune homme.

Un forçat en effet, employé à bord avec une corvée du bagne, avait dès le premier moment couru à l’officier de quart et au milieu du trouble et de l’hésitation de l’équipage, pendant que tous les matelots tremblaient et reculaient, il avait demandé à l’officier la permission de risquer sa vie pour sauver le gabier. Sur un signe affirmatif de l’officier, il avait rompu d’un coup de marteau la chaîne rivée à la manille de son pied, puis il avait pris une corde, et il s’était élancé dans les haubans. Personne ne remarqua en cet instant-là avec quelle facilité cette chaîne fut brisée. Ce ne fut que plus tard qu’on s’en souvint. En un clin d’œil il fut sur la vergue. Il s’arrêta quelques secondes et parut la mesurer du regard. Ces secondes, pendant lesquelles le vent balançait le gabier à l’extrémité d’un fil, semblèrent des siècles à ceux qui regardaient. Enfin le forçat leva les yeux au ciel, et fit un pas en avant. La foule respira. On le vit parcourir la vergue en courant. Parvenu à la pointe, il y attacha un bout de la corde qu’il avait apportée, et laissa pendre l’autre bout, puis il se mit à descendre avec les mains le long de cette corde, et alors ce fut une inexplicable angoisse, au lieu d’un homme suspendu sur le gouffre, on en vit deux.

On eût dit une araignée venant saisir une mouche; seulement ici l’araignée apportait la vie et non la mort. Dix mille regards étaient fixés sur ce groupe. Pas un cri, pas une parole, le même frémissement fronçait tous les sourcils. Toutes les bouches retenaient leur haleine, comme si elles eussent craint d’ajouter le moindre souffle au vent qui secouait les deux misérables.

Cependant le forçat était parvenu à s’affaler près du matelot. Il était temps; une minute de plus, l’homme, épuisé et désespéré, se laissait tomber dans l’abîme; le forçat l’avait amarré solidement avec la corde à laquelle il se tenait d’une main pendant qu’il travaillait de l’autre. Enfin on le vit remonter sur la vergue et y haler le matelot; il le soutint là un instant pour lui laisser reprendre des forces, puis il le saisit dans ses bras et le porta, en marchant sur la vergue jusqu’au chouquet, et de là dans la hune où il le laissa dans les mains de ses camarades.

À cet instant la foule applaudit; il y eut de vieux argousins de chiourme qui pleurèrent, les femmes s’embrassaient sur le quai, et l’on entendit toutes les voix crier avec une sorte de fureur attendrie: «La grâce de cet homme!»

Lui, cependant, s’était mis en devoir de redescendre immédiatement pour rejoindre sa corvée. Pour être plus promptement arrivé, il se laissa glisser dans le gréement et se mit à courir sur une basse vergue. Tous les yeux le suivaient. À un certain moment, on eut peur; soit qu’il fût fatigué, soit que la tête lui tournât, on crut le voir hésiter et chanceler. Tout à coup la foule poussa un grand cri, le forçat venait de tomber à la mer.

La chute était périlleuse. La frégate l’ Algésiras était mouillée auprès de l’ Orion, et le pauvre galérien était tombé entre les deux navires. Il était à craindre qu’il ne glissât sous l’un ou sous l’autre. Quatre hommes se jetèrent en hâte dans une embarcation. La foule les encourageait, l’anxiété était de nouveau dans toutes les âmes. L’homme n’était pas remonté à la surface. Il avait disparu dans la mer sans y faire un pli, comme s’il fût tombé dans une tonne d’huile. On sonda, on plongea. Ce fut en vain. On chercha jusqu’au soir; on ne retrouva pas même le corps.

Le lendemain, le journal de Toulon imprimait ces quelques livres: — «17 novembre 1823. — Hier, un forçat, de corvée à bord de l’Orion, en revenant de porter secours à un matelot, est tombé à la mer et s’est noyé. On n’a pu retrouver son cadavre. On présume qu’il se sera engagé sous le pilotis de la pointe de l’Arsenal. Cet homme était écroué sous le nº 9430 et se nommait Jean Valjean.»

Livre troisième — Accomplissement de la promesse faite à la morte

Chapitre I

La question de l’eau à Montfermeil

Montfermeil est situé entre Livry et Chelles, sur la lisière méridionale de ce haut plateau qui sépare l’Ourcq de la Marne. Aujourd’hui c’est un assez gros bourg orné, toute l’année, de villas en plâtre, et, le dimanche, de bourgeois épanouis. En 1823, il n’y avait à Montfermeil ni tant de maisons blanches ni tant de bourgeois satisfaits. Ce n’était qu’un village dans les bois. On y rencontrait bien çà et là quelques maisons de plaisance du dernier siècle, reconnaissables à leur grand air, à leurs balcons en fer tordu et à ces longues fenêtres dont les petits carreaux font sur le blanc des volets fermés toutes sortes de verts différents. Mais Montfermeil n’en était pas moins un village. Les marchands de drap retirés et les agréés en villégiature ne l’avaient pas encore découvert. C’était un endroit paisible et charmant, qui n’était sur la route de rien; on y vivait à bon marché de cette vie paysanne si abondante et si facile. Seulement l’eau y était rare à cause de l’élévation du plateau.

Il fallait aller la chercher assez loin. Le bout du village qui est du côté de Gagny puisait son eau aux magnifiques étangs qu’il y a là dans les bois; l’autre bout, qui entoure l’église et qui est du côté de Chelles, ne trouvait d’eau potable qu’à une petite source à mi-côte, près de la route de Chelles, à environ un quart d’heure de Montfermeil.

C’était donc une assez rude besogne pour chaque ménage que cet approvisionnement de l’eau. Les grosses maisons, l’aristocratie, la gargote Thénardier en faisait partie, payaient un liard par seau d’eau à un bonhomme dont c’était l’état et qui gagnait à cette entreprise des eaux de Montfermeil environ huit sous par jour; mais ce bonhomme ne travaillait que jusqu’à sept heures du soir l’été et jusqu’à cinq heures l’hiver, et une fois la nuit venue, une fois les volets des rez-de-chaussée clos, qui n’avait pas d’eau à boire en allait chercher ou s’en passait.

C’était là la terreur de ce pauvre être que le lecteur n’a peut-être pas oublié, de la petite Cosette. On se souvient que Cosette était utile aux Thénardier de deux manières, ils se faisaient payer par la mère et ils se faisaient servir par l’enfant. Aussi quand la mère cessa tout à fait de payer, on vient de lire pourquoi dans les chapitres précédents, les Thénardier gardèrent Cosette. Elle leur remplaçait une servante. En cette qualité, c'était elle qui courait chercher de l'eau quand il en fallait. Aussi l'enfant, fort épouvantée de l'idée d'aller à la source la nuit, avait-elle grand soin que l'eau ne manquât jamais à la maison.

La Noël de l'année 1823 fut particulièrement brillante à Montfermeil. Le commencement de l'hiver avait été doux; il n'avait encore ni gelé ni neigé. Des bateleurs venus de Paris avaient obtenu de Mr le maire la permission de dresser leurs baraques dans la grande rue du village, et une bande de marchands ambulants avait, sous la même tolérance, construit ses échoppes sur la place de l'église et jusque dans la ruelle du Boulanger, où était située, on s'en souvient peut-être, la gargote des Thénardier. Cela emplissait les auberges et les cabarets, et donnait à ce petit pays tranquille une vie bruyante et joyeuse. Nous devons même dire, pour être fidèle historien, que parmi les curiosités étalées sur la place, il y avait une ménagerie dans laquelle d'affreux paillasses, vêtus de loques et venus on ne sait d'où, montraient en 1823 aux paysans de Montfermeil un de ces effrayants vautours du Brésil que notre Muséum royal ne possède que depuis 1845, et qui ont pour œil une cocarde tricolore. Les naturalistes appellent, je crois, cet oiseau Caracara Polyborus: il est de l'ordre des apicides et de la famille des vautouriens. Quelques bons vieux soldats bonapartistes retirés dans le village allaient voir cette bête avec dévotion. Les bateleurs donnaient la cocarde tricolore comme un phénomène unique et fait exprès par le bon Dieu pour leur ménagerie.

Dans la soirée même de Noël, plusieurs hommes, rouliers et colporteurs, étaient attablés et buvaient autour de quatre ou cinq chandelles dans la salle basse de l'auberge Thénardier. Cette salle ressemblait à toutes les salles de cabaret; des tables, des brocs d'étain, des bouteilles, des buveurs, des fumeurs; peu de lumière, beaucoup de bruit. La date de l'année 1823 était pourtant indiquée par les deux objets à la mode alors dans la classe bourgeoise qui étaient sur une table, savoir un kaléidoscope et une lampe de fer-blanc moiré. La Thénardier surveillait le souper qui rôtissait devant un bon feu clair; le mari Thénardier buvait avec ses hôtes et parlait politique.

Outre les causeries politiques, qui avaient pour objets principaux la guerre d'Espagne et Mr le duc d'Angoulême, on entendait dans le brouhaha des parenthèses toutes locales comme celles-ci:

— Du côté de Nanterre et de Suresnes le vin a beaucoup donné. Où l'on comptait sur dix pièces on en a eu douze. Cela a beaucoup juté sous le pressoir. — Mais le raisin ne devait pas être mûr? — Dans ces pays-là il ne faut pas qu'on vendange mûr. Si l'on vendange mûr, le vin tourne au gras sitôt le printemps. — C'est donc tout petit vin? — C'est des vins encore plus petits que par ici. Il faut qu'on vendange vert.

Etc....

Ou bien, c'était un meunier qui s'écriait:

— Est-ce que nous sommes responsables de ce qu'il y a dans les sacs? Nous y trouvons un tas de petites graines que nous ne pouvons pas nous amuser à éplucher, et qu'il faut bien laisser passer sous les meules; c'est l'ivraie, c'est la luzette, la nielle, la vesce, le chènevis, la gaverolle, la queue-de-renard, et une foule d'autres drogues, sans compter les cailloux qui abondent dans de certains blés, surtout dans les blés bretons. Je n'ai pas l'amour de moudre du blé breton, pas plus que les scieurs de long de scier des poutres où il y a des clous. Jugez de la mauvaise poussière que tout cela fait dans le rendement. Après quoi on se plaint de la farine. On a tort. La farine n'est pas notre faute.

Dans un entre-deux de fenêtres, un faucheur, attablé avec un propriétaire qui faisait prix pour un travail de prairie à faire au printemps, disait:

— Il n'y a point de mal que l'herbe soit mouillée. Elle se coupe mieux. La rousée est bonne, monsieur. C'est égal, cette herbe-là, votre herbe, est jeune et bien difficile encore. Que voilà qui est si tendre, que voilà qui plie devant la planche de fer.

Etc....

Cosette était à sa place ordinaire, assise sur la traverse de la table de cuisine près de la cheminée. Elle était en haillons, elle avait ses pieds nus dans des sabots, et elle tricotait à la lueur du feu des bas de laine destinés aux petites Thénardier. Un tout jeune chat jouait sous les chaises. On entendait rire et jaser dans pièce voisine deux fraîches voix d'enfants; c'était Éponine et Azelma.

Au coin de la cheminée, un martinet était suspendu à un clou.

Par intervalles, le cri d'un très jeune enfant, qui était quelque part dans la maison, perçait au milieu du bruit du cabaret. C'était un petit garçon que la Thénardier avait eu un des hivers précédents, — «sans savoir pourquoi, disait-elle, effet du froid,» — et qui était âgé d'un peu plus de trois ans. La mère l'avait nourri, mais ne l'aimait pas. Quand la clameur acharnée du mioche devenait trop importune: — Ton fils piaille, disait Thénardier, va donc voir ce qu’il veut. — Bah! répondait la mère, il m’ennuie. — Et le petit abandonné continuait de crier dans les ténèbres.

Chapitre II

Deux portraits complétés

On n’a encore aperçu dans ce livre les Thénardier que de profil; le moment est venu de tourner autour de ce couple et de le regarder sous toutes ses faces.

Thénardier venait de dépasser ses cinquante ans; madame Thénardier touchait à la quarantaine, qui est la cinquantaine de la femme; de façon qu’il y avait équilibre d’âge entre la femme et le mari.

Les lecteurs ont peut-être, dès sa première apparition, conservé quelque souvenir de cette Thénardier grande, blonde, rouge, grasse, charnue, carrée, énorme et agile; elle tenait, nous l’avons dit, de la race de ces sauvagesses colosses qui se cambrent dans les foires avec des pavés pendus à leur chevelure. Elle faisait tout dans le logis, les lits, les chambres, la lessive, la cuisine, la pluie, le beau temps, le diable. Elle avait pour tout domestique Cosette; une souris au service d’un éléphant. Tout tremblait au son de sa voix, les vitres, les meubles et les gens. Son large visage, criblé de taches de rousseur, avait l’aspect d’une écumoire. Elle avait de la barbe. C’était l’idéal d’un fort de la halle habillé en fille. Elle jurait splendidement; elle se vantait de casser une noix d’un coup de poing. Sans les romans qu’elle avait lus, et qui, par moments, faisaient bizarrement reparaître la mijaurée sous l’ogresse, jamais l’idée ne fût venue à personne de dire d’elle: c’est une femme. Cette Thénardier était comme le produit de la greffe d’une donzelle sur une poissarde. Quand on l’entendait parler, on disait: C’est un gendarme; quand on la regardait boire, on disait: C’est un charretier; quand on la voyait manier Cosette, on disait: C’est le bourreau. Au repos, il lui sortait de la bouche une dent.

Le Thénardier était un homme petit, maigre, blême, anguleux, osseux, chétif, qui avait l’air malade et qui se portait à merveille; sa fourberie commençait là. Il souriait habituellement par précaution, et était poli à peu près avec tout le monde, même avec le mendiant auquel il refusait un liard. Il avait le regard d’une fouine et la mine d’un homme de lettres. Il ressemblait beaucoup aux portraits de l’abbé Delille. Sa coquetterie consistait à boire avec les rouliers. Personne n’avait jamais pu le griser. Il fumait dans une grosse pipe. Il portait une blouse et sous sa blouse un vieil habit noir. Il avait des prétentions à la littérature et au matérialisme. Il y avait des noms qu'il prononçait souvent, pour appuyer les choses quelconques qu'il disait, Voltaire, Raynal, Pamy, et, chose bizarre, saint Augustin. Il affirmait avoir «un système». Du reste fort escroc. Un filousophe. Cette nuance existe. On se souvient qu'il prétendait avoir servi; il contait avec quelque luxe qu'à Waterloo, étant sergent dans un 6ème ou un 9ème léger quelconque, il avait, seul contre un escadron de hussards de la Mort, couvert de son corps et sauvé à travers la mitraille «un général dangereusement blessé». De là, venait, pour son mur, sa flamboyante enseigne, et, pour son auberge, dans le pays, le nom de «cabaret du sergent de Waterloo». Il était libéral, classique et bonapartiste. Il avait souscrit pour le champ d'Asile. On disait dans le village qu'il avait étudié pour être prêtre.

Nous croyons qu'il avait simplement étudié en Hollande pour être aubergiste. Ce gredin de l'ordre composite était, selon les probabilités, quelque Flamand de Lille en Flandre, Français à Paris, Belge à Bruxelles, commodément à cheval sur deux frontières. Sa prouesse à Waterloo, on la connaît. Comme on voit, il l'exagérait un peu. Le flux et le reflux, le méandre, l'aventure, était l'élément de son existence; conscience déchirée entraîne vie décousue; et vraisemblablement, à l'orageuse époque du 18 juin 1815, Thénardier appartenait à cette variété de cantiniers maraudeurs dont nous avons parlé, battant l'estrade, vendant à ceux-ci, volant ceux-là, et roulant en famille, homme, femme et enfants, dans quelque carriole boiteuse, à la suite des troupes en marche, avec l'instinct de se rattacher toujours à l'armée victorieuse. Cette campagne faite, ayant, comme il disait, «du quibus», il était venu ouvrir gargote à Montfermeil. Ce quibus, composé des bourses et des montres, des bagues d'or et des croix d'argent récoltées au temps de la moisson dans les sillons ensemencés de cadavres, ne faisait pas un gros total et n'avait pas mené bien loin ce vivandier passé gargotier.

Thénardier avait ce je ne sais quoi de rectiligne dans le geste qui, avec un juron, rappelle la caserne et, avec un signe de croix, le séminaire. Il était beau parleur. Il se laissait croire savant. Néanmoins, le maître d'école avait remarqué qu'il faisait — «des cuirs». Il composait la carte à payer des voyageurs avec supériorité, mais des yeux exercés y trouvaient parfois des fautes d'orthographe. Thénardier était sournois, gourmand, flâneur et habile. Il ne dédaignait pas ses servantes, ce qui faisait que sa femme n'en avait plus. Cette géante était jalouse. Il lui semblait que ce petit homme maigre et jaune devait être l'objet de la convoitise universelle.

Thénardier, par-dessus tout, homme d'astuce et d'équilibre, était un coquin du genre tempéré. Cette espèce est la pire; l'hypocrisie s'y mêle.

Ce n'est pas que Thénardier ne fût dans l'occasion capable de colère au moins autant que sa femme; mais cela était très rare, et dans ces moments-là, comme il en voulait au genre humain tout entier, comme il avait en lui une profonde fournaise de haine, comme il était de ces gens qui se vengent perpétuellement, qui accusent tout ce qui passe devant eux de tout ce qui est tombé sur eux, et qui sont toujours prêts à jeter sur le premier venu, comme légitime grief, le total des déceptions, des banqueroutes et des calamités de leur vie, comme tout ce levain se soulevait en lui et lui bouillonnait dans la bouche et dans les yeux, il était épouvantable. Malheur à qui passait sous sa fureur alors!

Outre toutes ses autres qualités, Thénardier était attentif et pénétrant, silencieux ou bavard à l'occasion, et toujours avec une haute intelligence. Il avait quelque chose du regard des marins accoutumés à cligner des yeux dans les lunettes d'approche. Thénardier était un homme d'État.

Tout nouveau venu qui entrait dans la gargote disait en voyant la Thénardier: Voilà le maître de la maison. Erreur. Elle n'était même pas la maîtresse. Le maître et la maîtresse, c'était le mari. Elle faisait, il créait. Il dirigeait tout par une sorte d'action magnétique invisible et continuelle. Un mot lui suffisait, quelquefois un signe; le mastodonte obéissait. Le Thénardier était pour la Thénardier, sans qu'elle s'en rendit trop compte, une espèce d'être particulier et souverain. Elle avait les vertus de sa façon d'être; jamais, eût-elle été en dissentiment sur un détail avec «monsieur Thénardier», hypothèse du reste inadmissible, elle n'eût donné publiquement tort à son mari, sur quoi que ce soit. Jamais elle n'eût commis «devant des étrangers» cette faute que font si souvent les femmes, et qu'on appelle, en langage parlementaire, découvrir la couronne. Quoique leur accord n'eût pour résultat que le mal, il y avait de la contemplation dans la soumission de la Thénardier à son mari. Cette montagne de bruit et de chair se mouvait sous le petit doigt de ce despote frêle. C'était, vu par son côté nain et grotesque, cette grande chose universelle: l'adoration de la matière pour l'esprit; car de certaines laideurs ont leur raison d'être dans les profondeurs mêmes de la beauté éternelle. Il y avait de l'inconnu dans Thénardier; de là l'empire absolu de cet homme sur cette femme. À de certains moments, elle le voyait comme une chandelle allumée; dans d’autres, elle le sentait comme une griffe.

Cette femme était une créature formidable qui n’aimait que ses enfants et ne craignait que son mari. Elle était mère parce qu’elle était mammifère. Du reste, sa maternité s’arrêtait à ses filles, et, comme on le verra, ne s’étendait pas jusqu’aux garçons. Lui, l’homme, n’avait qu’une pensée: s’enrichir.

Il n’y réussissait point. Un digne théâtre manquait à ce grand talent. Thénardier à Montfermeil se ruinait, si la ruine est possible à zéro; en Suisse ou dans les Pyrénées, ce sans-le-sou serait devenu millionnaire. Mais où le sort attache l’aubergiste, il faut qu’il broute.

On comprend que le mot aubergiste est employé ici dans un sens restreint, et qui ne s’étend pas à une classe entière. En cette même année 1823, Thénardier était endetté d’environ quinze cents francs de dettes criardes, ce qui le rendait soucieux.

Quelle que fût envers lui l’injustice opiniâtre de la destinée, le Thénardier était un des hommes qui comprenaient le mieux, avec le plus de profondeur et de la façon la plus moderne, cette chose qui est une vertu chez les peuples barbares et une marchandise chez les peuples civilisés, l’hospitalité. Du reste braconnier admirable et cité pour son coup de fusil. Il avait un certain rire froid et paisible qui était particulièrement dangereux.

Ses théories d’aubergiste jaillissaient quelquefois de lui par éclairs. Il avait des aphorismes professionnels qu’il insérait dans l’esprit de sa femme. — «Le devoir de l’aubergiste, lui disait-il un jour violemment et à voix basse, c’est de vendre au premier venu du fricot, du repos, de la lumière, du feu, des draps sales, de la bonne, des puces, du sourire; d’arrêter les passants, de vider les petites bourses et d’alléger honnêtement les grosses, d’abriter avec respect les familles en route, de râper l’homme, de plumer la femme, d’éplucher l’enfant; de coter la fenêtre ouverte, la fenêtre fermée, le coin de la cheminée, le fauteuil, la chaise, le tabouret, l’escabeau, le lit de plume, le matelas et la botte de paille; de savoir de combien l’ombre use le miroir et de tarifer cela, et, par les cinq cent mille diables, de faire tout payer au voyageur, jusqu’aux mouches que son chien mange!»

Cet homme et cette femme, c’était ruse et rage mariés ensemble, attelage hideux et terrible.

Pendant que le mari ruminait et combinait, la Thénardier, elle, ne pensait pas aux créanciers absents, n’avait souci d’hier ni de demain, et vivait avec emportement, toute dans la minute.

Tels étaient ces deux êtres. Cosette était entre eux, subissant leur double pression, comme une créature qui serait à la fois broyée par une meule et déchiquetée par une tenaille. L’homme et la femme avaient chacun une manière différente; Cosette était rouée de coups, cela venait de la femme; elle allait pieds nus l’hiver, cela venait du mari.

Cosette montait, descendait, lavait, brossait, frottait, balayait, courait, trimait, haletait, remuait des choses lourdes, et, toute chétive, faisait les grosses besognes. Nulle pitié; une maîtresse farouche, un maître venimeux. La gargote Thénardier était comme une toile où Cosette était prise et tremblait. L’idéal de l’oppression était réalisé par cette domesticité sinistre. C’était quelque chose comme la mouche servante des araignées.

La pauvre enfant, passive, se taisait.

Quand elles se trouvent ainsi, dès l’aube, toutes petites, toutes nues, parmi les hommes, que se passe-t-il dans ces âmes qui viennent de quitter Dieu?

Chapitre III

Il faut du vin aux hommes et de l’eau aux chevaux

Il était arrivé quatre nouveaux voyageurs.

Cosette songeait tristement; car, quoiqu’elle n’eût que huit ans, elle avait déjà tant souffert qu’elle rêvait avec l’air lugubre d’une vieille femme.

Elle avait la paupière noire d’un coup de poing que la Thénardier lui avait donné, ce qui faisait dire de temps en temps à la Thénardier: — Est-elle laide avec son pochon sur l’œil!

Cosette pensait donc qu’il était nuit, très nuit, qu’il avait fallu remplir à l’improviste les pots et les carafes dans les chambres des voyageurs survenus, et qu’il n’y avait plus d’eau dans la fontaine.

Ce qui la rassurait un peu, c’est qu’on ne buvait pas beaucoup d’eau dans la maison Thénardier. Il ne manquait pas là de gens qui avaient soif; mais c’était de cette soif qui s’adresse plus volontiers au broc qu’à la cruche. Qui eût demandé un verre d’eau parmi ces verres de vin eût semblé un sauvage à tous ces hommes. Il y eut pourtant un moment où l’enfant trembla: la Thénardier souleva le couvercle d’une casserole qui bouillait sur le fourneau, puis saisit un verre et s’approcha vivement de la fontaine. Elle tourna le robinet, l’enfant avait levé la tête et suivait tous ses mouvements. Un maigre filet d’eau coula du robinet et remplit le verre à moitié.

— Tiens, dit-elle, il n’y a plus d’eau! puis elle eut un moment de silence.

L’enfant ne respirait pas.

— Bah, reprit la Thénardier en examinant le verre à demi plein, il y en aura assez comme cela.

Cosette se remit à son travail, mais pendant plus d’un quart d’heure elle sentit son cœur sauter comme un gros flocon dans sa poitrine.

Elle comptait les minutes qui s’écoulaient ainsi, et eût bien voulu être au lendemain matin.

De temps en temps, un des buveurs regardait dans la rue et s’exclamait: — Il fait noir comme dans un four! — Ou: — Il faut être chat pour aller dans la rue sans lanterne à cette heure-ci! — Et Cosette tressaillait.

Tout à coup, un des marchands colporteurs logés dans l’auberge entra, et dit d’une voix dure:

— On n’a pas donné à boire à mon cheval.

— Si fait vraiment, dit la Thénardier.

— Je vous dis que non, la mère, reprit le marchand.

Cosette était sortie de dessous la table.

— Oh! si! monsieur! dit-elle, le cheval a bu, il a bu dans le seau, plein le seau, et même que c’est moi qui lui ai porté à boire, et je lui ai parlé.

Cela n’était pas vrai. Cosette mentait.

— En voilà une qui est grosse comme le poing et qui ment gros comme la maison, s’écria le marchand. Je te dis qu’il n’a pas bu, petite drôlesse! Il a une manière de souffler quand il n’a pas bu que je connais bien.

Cosette persista, et ajouta d’une voix enrouée par l’angoisse et qu’on entendait à peine:

— Et même qu’il a bien bu!

— Allons, reprit le marchand avec colère, ce n’est pas tout ça, qu’on donne à boire à mon cheval et que cela finisse!

Cosette rentra sous la table.

— Au fait, c’est juste, dit la Thénardier, si cette bête n’a pas bu, il faut qu’elle boive.

Puis, regardant autour d’elle:

— Eh bien, où est donc cette autre?

Elle se pencha et découvrit Cosette blottie à l’autre bout de la table, presque sous les pieds des buveurs.

— Vas-tu venir? cria la Thénardier.

Cosette sortit de l’espèce de trou où elle s’était cachée. La Thénardier reprit:

— Mademoiselle Chien-faute-de-nom, va porter à boire à ce cheval.

— Mais, madame, dit Cosette faiblement, c’est qu’il n’y a pas d’eau.

La Thénardier ouvrit toute grande la porte de la rue.

— Eh bien, va en chercher!

Cosette baissa la tête, et alla prendre un seau vide qui était au coin de la cheminée.

Ce seau était plus grand qu’elle, et l’enfant aurait pu s’asseoir dedans et y tenir à l’aise.

La Thénardier se remit à son fourneau, et goûta avec une cuillère de bois ce qui était dans la casserole, tout en grommelant:

— Il y en a à la source. Ce n’est pas plus malin que ça. Je crois que j’aurais mieux fait de passer mes oignons.

Puis elle fouilla dans un tiroir où il y avait des sous, du poivre et des échalotes.

— Tiens, mamzelle Crapaud, ajouta-t-elle, en revenant tu prendras un gros pain chez le boulanger. Voilà une pièce de quinze sous.

Cosette avait une petite poche de côté à son tablier; elle prit la pièce sans dire un mot, et la mit dans cette poche.

Puis elle resta immobile, le seau à la main, la porte ouverte devant elle. Elle semblait attendre qu'on vînt à son secours.

— Va donc! cria la Thénardier.

Cosette sortit. La porte se referma.

Chapitre IV

Entrée en scène d’une poupée

La file de boutiques en plein vent qui partait de l’église se développait, on s’en souvient, jusqu’à l’auberge Thénardier. Ces boutiques, à cause du passage prochain des bourgeois allant à la messe de minuit, étaient toutes illuminées de chandelles brûlant dans des entonnoirs de papier, ce qui, comme le disait le maître d’école de Montfermeil attablé en ce moment chez Thénardier, faisait «un effet magique». En revanche, on ne voyait pas une étoile au ciel.

La dernière de ces baraques, établie précisément en face de la porte des Thénardier, était une boutique de bimbeloterie, toute reluisante de clinquants, de verroteries et de choses magnifiques en fer-blanc. Au premier rang, et en avant, le marchand avait placé, sur un fond de serviettes blanches, une immense poupée haute de près de deux pieds qui était vêtue d’une robe de crêpe rose avec des épis d’or sur la tête et qui avait de vrais cheveux et des yeux en émail. Tout le jour, cette merveille avait été étalée à l’ébahissement des passants de moins de dix ans, sans qu’il se fût trouvé à Montfermeil une mère assez riche, ou assez prodigue, pour la donner à son enfant. Éponine et Azelma avaient passé des heures à la contempler, et Cosette elle-même, furtivement, il est vrai, avait osé la regarder.

Au moment où Cosette sortit, son seau à la main, si morne et si accablée qu’elle fût, elle ne put s’empêcher de lever les yeux sur cette prodigieuse poupée, vers la dame, comme elle l’appelait. La pauvre enfant s’arrêta pétrifiée. Elle n’avait pas encore vu cette poupée de près. Toute cette boutique lui semblait un palais; cette poupée n’était pas une poupée, c’était une vision. C’étaient la joie, la splendeur, la richesse, le bonheur, qui apparaissaient dans une sorte de rayonnement chimérique à ce malheureux petit être englouti si profondément dans une misère funèbre et froide. Cosette mesurait avec cette sagacité naïve et triste de l’enfance l’abîme qui la séparait de cette poupée. Elle se disait qu’il fallait être reine ou au moins princesse pour avoir une «chose» comme cela. Elle considérait cette belle robe rose, ces beaux cheveux lisses, et elle pensait: Comme elle doit être heureuse, cette poupée-là! Ses yeux ne pouvaient se détacher de cette boutique fantastique. Plus elle regardait, plus elle s’éblouissait. Elle croyait voir le paradis. Il y avait d’autres poupées derrière la grande qui lui paraissaient des fées et des génies. Le marchand qui allait et venait au fond de sa baraque lui faisait un peu l’effet d’être le Père éternel.

Dans cette adoration, elle oubliait tout, même la commission dont elle était chargée. Tout à coup, la voix rude de la Thénardier la rappela à la réalité: — Comment, péronnelle, tu n’es pas partie! Attends! je vais à toi! Je vous demande un peu ce qu’elle fait là! Petit monstre, va!

La Thénardier avait jeté un coup d’œil dans la rue et aperçu Cosette en extase.

Cosette s’enfuit emportant son seau et faisant les plus grands pas qu’elle pouvait.

Chapitre V

La petite toute seule

Comme l'auberge Thénardier était dans cette partie du village qui est près de l'église, c'était à la source du bois du côté de Chelles que Cosette devait aller puiser de l'eau.

Elle ne regarda plus un seul étalage de marchand. Tant qu'elle fut dans la ruelle du Boulanger et dans les environs de l'église, les boutiques illuminées éclairaient le chemin, mais bientôt la dernière lueur de la dernière baraque disparut. La pauvre enfant se trouva dans l'obscurité. Elle s'y enfonça. Seulement, comme une certaine émotion la gagnait, tout en marchant elle agitait le plus qu'elle pouvait l'anse du seau. Cela faisait un bruit qui lui tenait compagnie.

Plus elle cheminait, plus les ténèbres devenaient épaisses. Il n'y avait plus personne dans les rues. Pourtant, elle rencontra une femme qui se retourna en la voyant passer, et qui resta immobile, marmottant entre ses lèvres: «Mais où peut donc aller cet enfant? Est-ce que c'est un enfant-garou?» Puis la femme reconnut Cosette. «Tiens, dit-elle, c'est l'Alouette!»

Cosette traversa ainsi le labyrinthe de rues tortueuses et désertes qui termine du côté de Chelles le village de Montfermeil. Tant qu'elle eut des maisons et même seulement des murs des deux côtés de son chemin, elle alla assez hardiment. De temps en temps, elle voyait le rayonnement d'une chandelle à travers la fente d'un volet, c'était de la lumière et de la vie, il y avait là des gens, cela la rassurait. Cependant, à mesure qu'elle avançait, sa marche se ralentissait comme machinalement. Quand elle eut passé l'angle de la dernière maison, Cosette s'arrêta. Aller au delà de la dernière boutique, cela avait été difficile; aller plus loin que la dernière maison, cela devenait impossible. Elle posa le seau à terre, plongea sa main dans ses cheveux et se mit à se gratter lentement la tête, geste propre aux enfants terrifiés et indécis. Ce n'était plus Montfermeil, c'étaient les champs. L'espace noir et désert était devant elle. Elle regarda avec désespoir cette obscurité où il n'y avait plus personne, où il y avait des bêtes, où il y avait peut-être des revenants. Elle regarda bien, et elle entendit les bêtes qui marchaient dans l'herbe, et elle vit distinctement les revenants qui remuaient dans les arbres. Alors elle ressaisit le seau, la peur lui donna de l’audace.

— Bah! dit-elle, je lui dirai qu’il n’y avait plus d’eau!

Et elle rentra résolument dans Montfermeil.

À peine eut-elle fait cent pas qu’elle s’arrêta encore, et se remit à se gratter la tête. Maintenant, c’était la Thénardier qui lui apparaissait; la Thénardier hideuse avec sa bouche d’hyène et la colère flamboyante dans les yeux. L’enfant jeta un regard lamentable en avant et en arrière. Que faire? que devenir? où aller? Devant elle le spectre de la Thénardier; derrière elle tous les fantômes de la nuit et des bois. Ce fut devant la Thénardier qu’elle recula. Elle reprit le chemin de la source et se mit à courir. Elle sortit du village en courant, elle entra dans le bois en courant, ne regardant plus rien, n’écoutant plus rien. Elle n’arrêta sa course que lorsque la respiration lui manqua, mais elle n’interrompit point sa marche. Elle allait devant elle, éperdue.

Tout en courant, elle avait envie de pleurer.

Le frémissement nocturne de la forêt l’enveloppait tout entière. Elle ne pensait plus, elle ne voyait plus. L’immense nuit faisait face à ce petit être. D’un côté, toute l’ombre; de l’autre, un atome.

Il n’y avait que sept ou huit minutes de la lisière du bois à la source. Cosette connaissait le chemin pour l’avoir fait bien souvent le jour. Chose étrange, elle ne se perdit pas. Un reste d’instinct la conduisait vaguement. Elle ne jetait cependant les yeux ni à droite ni à gauche, de crainte de voir des choses dans les branches et dans les broussailles. Elle arriva ainsi à la source.

C’était une étroite cuve naturelle creusée par l’eau dans un sol glaiseux, profonde d’environ deux pieds, entourée de mousses et de ces grandes herbes gaufrées qu’on appelle collerettes de Henri IV, et pavée de quelques grosses pierres. Un ruisseau s’en échappait avec un petit bruit tranquille.

Cosette ne prit pas le temps de respirer. Il faisait très noir, mais elle avait l’habitude de venir à cette fontaine. Elle chercha de la main gauche dans l’obscurité un jeune chêne incliné sur la source qui lui servait ordinairement de point d’appui, rencontra une branche, s’y suspendit, se pencha et plongea le seau dans l’eau. Elle était dans un moment si violent que ses forces étaient triplées. Pendant qu’elle était ainsi penchée, elle ne fît pas attention que la poche de son tablier se vidait dans la source. La pièce de quinze sous tomba dans l’eau. Cosette ne la vit ni ne l’entendit tomber. Elle retira le seau presque plein et le posa sur l’herbe.

Cela fait, elle s’aperçut qu’elle était épuisée de lassitude. Elle eût bien voulu repartir tout de suite; mais l’effort de remplir le seau avait été tel qu’il lui fut impossible de faire un pas. Elle fut bien forcée de s’asseoir. Elle se laissa tomber sur l’herbe et y demeura accroupie.

Elle ferma les yeux, puis elle les rouvrit, sans savoir pourquoi, mais ne pouvant faire autrement.

À côté d’elle l’eau agitée dans le seau faisait des cercles qui ressemblaient à des serpents de feu blanc.

Au-dessus de sa tête, le ciel était couvert de vastes nuages noirs qui étaient comme des pans de fumée. Le tragique masque de l’ombre semblait se pencher vaguement sur cet enfant. Jupiter se couchait dans les profondeurs. L’enfant regardait d’un œil égaré cette grosse étoile qu’elle ne connaissait pas et qui lui faisait peur. La planète, en effet, était en ce moment très près de l’horizon et traversait une épaisse couche de brume qui lui donnait une rougeur horrible. La brume, lugubrement empourprée, élargissait l’astre. On eût dit une plaie lumineuse.

Un vent froid soufflait de la plaine. Le bois était ténébreux, sans aucun froissement de feuilles, sans aucune de ces vagues et fraîches lueurs de l’été. De grands branchages s’y dressaient affreusement. Des buissons chétifs et difformes sifflaient dans les clairières. Les hautes herbes fourmillaient sous la bise comme des anguilles. Les ronces se tordaient comme de longs bras armés de griffes cherchant à prendre des proies; quelques bruyères sèches, chassées par le vent, passaient rapidement et avaient l’air de s’enfuir avec épouvante devant quelque chose qui arrivait. De tous les côtés il y avait des étendues lugubres.

L’obscurité est vertigineuse. Il faut à l’homme de la clarté. Quiconque s’enfonce dans le contraire du jour se sent le cœur serré. Quand l’œil voit noir, l’esprit voit trouble. Dans l’éclipse, dans la nuit, dans l’opacité fuligineuse, il y a de l’anxiété, même pour les plus forts. Nul ne marche seul la nuit dans la forêt sans tremblement. Ombres et arbres, deux épaisseurs redoutables. Une réalité chimérique apparaît dans la profondeur indistincte. L’inconcevable s’ébauche à quelques pas de vous avec une netteté spectrale. On voit flotter, dans l’espace ou dans son propre cerveau, on ne sait quoi de vague et d’insaisissable comme les rêves des fleurs endormies. Il y a des attitudes farouches sur l’horizon. On aspire les effluves du grand vide noir.

On a peur et envie de regarder derrière soi. Les cavités de la nuit, les choses devenues hagardes, des profils taciturnes qui se dissipent quand on avance, des échevellements obscurs, des touffes irritées, des flaques livides, le lugubre reflété dans le funèbre, l’immensité sépulcrale du silence, les êtres inconnus possibles, des penchements de branches mystérieux, d’effrayants torses d’arbres, de longues poignées d’herbes frémissantes, on est sans défense contre tout cela. Pas de hardiesse qui ne tressaille et qui ne sente le voisinage de l’angoisse. On éprouve quelque chose de hideux comme si l’âme s’amalgamait à l’ombre. Cette pénétration des ténèbres est inexprimablement sinistre dans un enfant.

Les forêts sont des apocalypses; et le battement d’ailes d’une petite âme fait un bruit d’agonie sous leur voûte monstrueuse.

Sans se rendre compte de ce qu’elle éprouvait, Cosette se sentait saisir par cette énormité noire de la nature. Ce n’était plus seulement de la terreur qui la gagnait, c’était quelque chose de plus terrible même que la terreur. Elle frissonnait. Les expressions manquent pour dire ce qu’avait d’étrange ce frisson qui la glaçait jusqu’au fond du cœur. Son œil était devenu farouche. Elle croyait sentir qu’elle ne pourrait peut-être pas s’empêcher de revenir là à la même heure le lendemain.

Alors, par une sorte d’instinct, pour sortir de cet état singulier qu’elle ne comprenait pas, mais qui l’effrayait, elle se mit à compter à haute voix un, deux, trois, quatre, jusqu’à dix, et, quand elle eut fini, elle recommença. Cela lui rendit la perception vraie des choses qui l’entouraient. Elle sentit le froid à ses mains qu’elle avait mouillées en puisant de l’eau. Elle se leva. La peur lui était revenue, une peur naturelle et insurmontable. Elle n’eut plus qu’une pensée, s’enfuir; s’enfuir à toutes jambes, à travers bois, à travers champs, jusqu’aux maisons, jusqu’aux fenêtres, jusqu’aux chandelles allumées. Son regard tomba sur le seau qui était devant elle. Tel était l’effroi que lui inspirait la Thénardier qu’elle n’osa pas s’enfuir sans le seau d’eau. Elle saisit l’anse à deux mains. Elle eut de la peine à soulever le seau.

Elle fit ainsi une douzaine de pas, mais le seau était plein, il était lourd, elle fut forcée de le reposer à terre. Elle respira un instant, puis elle enleva l’anse de nouveau, et se remit à marcher, cette fois un peu plus longtemps. Mais il fallut s’arrêter encore. Après quelques secondes de repos, elle repartit. Elle marchait penchée en avant, la tête baissée, comme une vieille; le poids du seau tendait et raidissait ses bras maigres; l’anse de fer achevait d’engourdir et de geler ses petites mains mouillées; de temps en temps elle était forcée de s’arrêter, et chaque fois qu’elle s’arrêtait l’eau froide qui débordait du seau tombait sur ses jambes nues. Cela se passait au fond d’un bois, la nuit, en hiver, loin de tout regard humain; c’était un enfant de huit ans. Il n’y avait que Dieu en ce moment qui voyait cette chose triste.

Et sans doute sa mère, hélas!

Car il est des choses qui font ouvrir les yeux aux mortes dans leur tombeau.

Elle soufflait avec une sorte de râlement douloureux; des sanglots lui serraient la gorge, mais elle n’osait pas pleurer, tant elle avait peur de la Thénardier, même loin. C’était son habitude de se figurer toujours que la Thénardier était là.

Cependant elle ne pouvait pas faire beaucoup de chemin de la sorte, et elle allait bien lentement. Elle avait beau diminuer la durée des stations et marcher entre chaque le plus longtemps possible, elle pensait avec angoisse qu’il lui faudrait plus d’une heure pour retourner ainsi à Montfermeil et que la Thénardier la battrait. Cette angoisse se mêlait à son épouvante d’être seule dans le bois la nuit. Elle était harassée de fatigue et n’était pas encore sortie de la forêt. Parvenue près d’un vieux châtaignier qu’elle connaissait, elle fit une dernière halte plus longue que les autres pour se bien reposer, puis elle rassembla toutes ses forces, reprit le seau et se remit à marcher courageusement. Cependant le pauvre petit être désespéré ne put s’empêcher de s’écrier: Ô mon Dieu! mon Dieu!

En ce moment, elle sentit tout à coup que le seau ne pesait plus rien. Une main, qui lui parut énorme, venait de saisir l’anse et la soulevait vigoureusement. Elle leva la tête. Une grande forme noire, droite et debout, marchait auprès d’elle dans l’obscurité. C’était un homme qui était arrivé derrière elle et qu’elle n’avait pas entendu venir. Cet homme, sans dire un mot, avait empoigné l’anse du seau qu’elle portait.

Il y a des instincts pour toutes les rencontres de la vie. L’enfant n’eut pas peur.

Chapitre VI

Qui peut-être prouve l’intelligence de Boulatruelle

Dans l’après-midi de cette même journée de Noël 1823, un homme se promena assez longtemps dans la partie la plus déserte du boulevard de l’Hôpital à Paris. Cet homme avait l’air de quelqu’un qui cherche un logement, et semblait s’arrêter de préférence aux plus modestes maisons de cette lisière délabrée du faubourg Saint-Marceau.

On verra plus loin que cet homme avait en effet loué une chambre dans ce quartier isolé.

Cet homme, dans son vêtement comme dans toute sa personne, réalisait le type de ce qu’on pourrait nommer le mendiant de bonne compagnie, l’extrême misère combinée avec l’extrême propreté. C’est là un mélange assez rare qui inspire aux cœurs intelligents ce double respect qu’on éprouve pour celui qui est très pauvre et pour celui qui est très digne. Il avait un chapeau rond fort vieux et fort brossé, une redingote râpée jusqu’à la corde en gros drap jaune d’ocre, couleur qui n’avait rien de trop bizarre à cette époque, un grand gilet à poches de forme séculaire, des culottes noires devenues grises aux genoux, des bas de laine noire et d’épais souliers à boucles de cuivre. On eût dit un ancien précepteur de bonne maison revenu de l’émigration. À ses cheveux tout blancs, à son front ridé, à ses lèvres livides, à son visage où tout respirait l’accablement et la lassitude de la vie, on lui eût supposé beaucoup plus de soixante ans. À sa démarche ferme, quoique lente, à la vigueur singulière empreinte dans tous ses mouvements, on lui en eût donné à peine cinquante. Les rides de son front étaient bien placées, et eussent prévenu en sa faveur quelqu’un qui l’eût observé avec attention. Sa lèvre se contractait avec un pli étrange, qui semblait sévère et qui était humble. Il y avait au fond de son regard on ne sait quelle sérénité lugubre. Il portait de la main gauche un petit paquet noué dans un mouchoir; de la droite il s’appuyait sur une espèce de bâton coupé dans une haie. Ce bâton avait été travaillé avec quelque soin, et n’avait pas trop méchant air; on avait tiré parti des nœuds, et on lui avait figuré un pommeau de corail avec de la cire rouge; c’était un gourdin, et cela semblait une canne.

Il y a peu de passants sur ce boulevard, surtout l’hiver. Cet homme, sans affectation pourtant, paraissait les éviter plutôt que les chercher.

À cette époque le roi Louis XVIII allait presque tous les jours à Choisy-le-Roi. C’était une de ses promenades favorites. Vers deux heures, presque invariablement, on voyait la voiture et la cavalcade royale passer ventre à terre sur le boulevard de l’Hôpital.

Cela tenait lieu de montre et d’horloge aux pauvresses du quartier qui disaient: — Il est deux heures, le voilà qui s’en retourne aux Tuileries.

Et les uns accouraient, et les autres se rangeaient; car un roi qui passe, c’est toujours un tumulte. Du reste l’apparition et la disparition de Louis XVIII faisaient un certain effet dans les rues de Paris. Cela était rapide, mais majestueux. Ce roi impotent avait le goût du grand galop; ne pouvant marcher, il voulait courir; ce cul-de-jatte se fût fait volontiers traîner par l’éclair. Il passait, pacifique et sévère, au milieu des sabres nus. Sa berline massive, toute dorée, avec de grosses branches de lys peintes sur les panneaux, roulait bruyamment. À peine avait-on le temps d’y jeter un coup d’œil. On voyait dans l’angle du fond à droite, sur des coussins capitonnés de satin blanc, une face large, ferme et vermeille, un front frais poudré à l’oiseau royal, un œil fier, dur et fin, un sourire de lettré, deux grosses épaulettes à torsades flottantes sur un habit bourgeois, la Toison d’or, la croix de Saint-Louis, la croix de la Légion d’honneur, la plaque d’argent du Saint-Esprit, un gros ventre et un large cordon bleu; c’était le roi. Hors de Paris, il tenait son chapeau à plumes blanches sur ses genoux emmaillotés de hautes guêtres anglaises; quand il rentrait dans la ville, il mettait son chapeau sur sa tête, saluant peu. Il regardait froidement le peuple, qui le lui rendait. Quand il parut pour la première fois dans le quartier Saint-Marceau, tout son succès fut ce mot d’un faubourien à son camarade: «C’est ce gros-là qui est le gouvernement.»

Cet infaillible passage du roi à la même heure était donc l’événement quotidien du boulevard de l’Hôpital.

Le promeneur à la redingote jaune n’était évidemment pas du quartier, et probablement pas de Paris, car il ignorait ce détail. Lorsqu’à deux heures la voiture royale, entourée d’un escadron de gardes du corps galonnés d’argent, déboucha sur le boulevard, après avoir tourné la Salpêtrière, il parut surpris et presque effrayé. Il n’y avait que lui dans la contre-allée, il se rangea vivement derrière un angle de mur d’enceinte, ce qui n’empêcha pas Mr le duc d’Havré de l’apercevoir. Mr le duc d’Havré, comme capitaine des gardes de service ce jour-là, était assis dans la voiture vis-à-vis du roi. Il dit à Sa Majesté: «Voilà un homme d’assez mauvaise mine.» Des gens de police, qui éclairaient le passage du roi, le remarquèrent également, et l’un d’eux reçut l’ordre de le suivre. Mais l’homme s’enfonça dans les petites rues solitaires du faubourg, et comme le jour commençait à baisser, l’agent perdit sa trace, ainsi que cela est constaté par un rapport adressé le soir même à Mr le comte Anglès, ministre d’État, préfet de police.

Quand l’homme à la redingote jaune eut dépisté l’agent, il doubla le pas, non sans s’être retourné bien des fois pour s’assurer qu’il n’était pas suivi. À quatre heures un quart, c’est-à-dire à la nuit close, il passait devant le théâtre de la Porte-Saint-Martin où l’on donnait ce jour-là les Deux Forçats. Cette affiche, éclairée par les réverbères du théâtre, le frappa, car, quoiqu’il marchât vite, il s’arrêta pour la lire. Un instant après, il était dans le cul-de-sac de la Planchette, et il entrait au Plat d’étain, où était alors le bureau de la voiture de Lagny. Cette voiture partait à quatre heures et demie. Les chevaux étaient attelés, et les voyageurs, appelés par le cocher, escaladaient en hâte le haut escalier de fer du coucou.

L’homme demanda:

— Avez-vous une place?

— Une seule, à côté de moi, sur le siège, dit le cocher.

— Je la prends.

— Montez.

Cependant, avant de partir, le cocher jeta un coup d’œil sur le costume médiocre du voyageur, sur la petitesse de son paquet, et se fit payer.

— Allez-vous jusqu’à Lagny? demanda le cocher.

— Oui, dit l’homme.

Le voyageur paya jusqu’à Lagny.

On partit. Quand on eut passé la barrière, le cocher essaya de nouer la conversation, mais le voyageur ne répondait que par monosyllabes. Le cocher prit le parti de siffler et de jurer après ses chevaux.

Le cocher s’enveloppa dans son manteau. Il faisait froid. L’homme ne paraissait pas y songer. On traversa ainsi Gournay et Neuilly-sur-Marne.

Vers six heures du soir on était à Chelles. Le cocher s’arrêta pour laisser souffler ses chevaux, devant l’auberge à rouliers installée dans les vieux bâtiments de l’abbaye royale.

— Je descends ici, dit l’homme.

Il prit son paquet et son bâton, et sauta à bas de la voiture.

Un instant après, il avait disparu.

Il n’était pas entré dans l’auberge.

Quand, au bout de quelques minutes, la voiture repartit pour Lagny, elle ne le rencontra pas dans la grande rue de Chelles.

Le cocher se tourna vers les voyageurs de l’intérieur.

— Voilà, dit-il, un homme qui n’est pas d’ici, car je ne le connais pas. Il a l’air de n’avoir pas le sou; cependant il ne tient pas à l’argent; il paye pour Lagny, et il ne va que jusqu’à Chelles. Il est nuit, toutes les maisons sont fermées, il n’entre pas à l’auberge, et on ne le retrouve plus. Il s’est donc enfoncé dans la terre.

L’homme ne s’était pas enfoncé dans la terre, mais il avait arpenté en hâte dans l’obscurité la grande rue de Chelles; puis il avait pris à gauche avant d’arriver à l’église le chemin vicinal qui mène à Montfermeil, comme quelqu’un qui eût connu le pays et qui y fût déjà venu.

Il suivit ce chemin rapidement. À l’endroit où il est coupé par l’ancienne route bordée d’arbres qui va de Gagny à Lagny, il entendit venir des passants. Il se cacha précipitamment dans un fossé, et y attendit que les gens qui passaient se fussent éloignés. La précaution était d’ailleurs presque superflue, car, comme nous l’avons déjà dit, c’était une nuit de décembre très noire. On voyait à peine deux ou trois étoiles au ciel.

C’est à ce point-là que commence la montée de la colline. L’homme ne rentra pas dans le chemin de Montfermeil; il prit à droite, à travers champs, et gagna à grands pas le bois.

Quand il fut dans le bois, il ralentit sa marche, et se mit à regarder soigneusement tous les arbres, avançant pas à pas, comme s’il cherchait et suivait une route mystérieuse connue de lui seul. Il y eut un moment où il parut se perdre et où il s’arrêta indécis. Enfin il arriva, de tâtonnements en tâtonnements, à une clairière où il y avait un monceau de grosses pierres blanchâtres. Il se dirigea vivement vers ces pierres et les examina avec attention à travers la brume de la nuit, comme s’il les passait en revue. Un gros arbre, couvert de ces excroissances qui sont les verrues de la végétation, était à quelques pas du tas de pierres. Il alla à cet arbre, et promena sa main sur l’écorce du tronc, comme s’il cherchait à reconnaître et à compter toutes les verrues.

Vis-à-vis de cet arbre, qui était un frêne, il y avait un châtaignier malade d’une décortication, auquel on avait mis pour pansement une bande de zinc clouée. Il se haussa sur la pointe des pieds et toucha cette bande de zinc.

Puis il piétina pendant quelque temps sur le sol dans l’espace compris entre l’arbre et les pierres, comme quelqu’un qui s’assure que la terre n’a pas été fraîchement remuée.

Cela fait, il s’orienta et reprit sa marche à travers le bois.

C’était cet homme qui venait de rencontrer Cosette.

En cheminant par le taillis dans la direction de Montfermeil, il avait aperçu cette petite ombre qui se mouvait avec un gémissement, qui déposait un fardeau à terre, puis le reprenait, et se remettait à marcher. Il s’était approché et avait reconnu que c’était un tout jeune enfant chargé d’un énorme seau d’eau. Alors il était allé à l’enfant, et avait pris silencieusement l’anse du seau.

Chapitre VII

Cosette côte à côte dans l'ombre avec l'inconnu

Cosette, nous l'avons dit, n'avait pas eu peur.

L'homme lui adressa la parole. Il parlait d'une voix grave et presque basse.

— Mon enfant, c'est bien lourd pour vous ce que vous portez là.

Cosette leva la tête et répondit:

— Oui, monsieur.

— Donnez, reprit l'homme. Je vais vous le porter.

Cosette lâcha le seau. L'homme se mit à cheminer près d'elle.

— C'est très lourd en effet, dit-il entre ses dents.

Puis il ajouta:

— Petite, quel âge as-tu?

— Huit ans, monsieur.

— Et viens-tu de loin comme cela?

— De la source qui est dans le bois.

— Et est-ce loin où tu vas? — À un bon quart d'heure d'ici.

L'homme resta un moment sans parler, puis il dit brusquement:

— Tu n'as donc pas de mère?

— Je ne sais pas, répondit l'enfant.

Avant que l'homme eût eu le temps de reprendre la parole, elle ajouta:

— Je ne crois pas. Les autres en ont. Moi, je n'en ai pas.

Et après un silence, elle reprit:

— Je crois que je n'en ai jamais eu.

L'homme s'arrêta, il posa le seau à terre, se pencha et mit ses deux mains sur les deux épaules de l'enfant, faisant effort pour la regarder et voir son visage dans l'obscurité.

La figure maigre et chétive de Cosette se dessinait vaguement à la lueur livide du ciel.

— Comment t'appelles-tu? dit l'homme.

— Cosette.

L'homme eut comme une secousse électrique. Il la regarda encore, puis il ôta ses mains de dessus les épaules de Cosette, saisit le seau, et se remit à marcher.

Au bout d’un instant il demanda:

— Petite, où demeures-tu?

— À Montfermeil, si vous connaissez.

— C’est là que nous allons?

— Oui, monsieur.

Il fit encore une pause, puis recommença:

— Qui est-ce donc qui t’a envoyée à cette heure chercher de l’eau dans le bois?

— C’est madame Thénardier.

L’homme repartit d’un son de voix qu’il voulait s’efforcer de rendre indifférent, mais où il y avait pourtant un tremblement singulier:

— Qu’est-ce qu’elle fait, ta madame Thénardier?

— C’est ma bourgeoise, dit l’enfant. Elle tient l’auberge.

— L’auberge? dit l’homme. Eh bien, je vais aller y loger cette nuit. Conduis-moi.

— Nous y allons, dit l’enfant.

L’homme marchait assez vite. Cosette le suivait sans peine. Elle ne sentait plus la fatigue. De temps en temps, elle levait les yeux vers cet homme avec une sorte de tranquillité et d’abandon inexprimables. Jamais on ne lui avait appris à se tourner vers la providence et à prier. Cependant elle sentait en elle quelque chose qui ressemblait à de l’espérance et à de la joie et qui s’en allait vers le ciel.

Quelques minutes s’écoulèrent. L’homme reprit:

— Est-ce qu’il n’y a pas de servante chez madame Thénardier?

— Non, monsieur.

— Est-ce que tu es seule?

— Oui, monsieur.

Il y eut encore une interruption. Cosette éleva la voix:

— C’est-à-dire il y a deux petites filles.

— Quelles petites filles?

— Ponine et Zelma.

L’enfant simplifiait de la sorte les noms romanesques chers à la Thénardier.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que Ponine et Zelma?

— Ce sont les demoiselles de madame Thénardier. Comme qui dirait ses filles.

— Et que font-elles, celles-là? — Oh! dit l’enfant, elles ont de belles poupées, des choses où il y a de l’or, tout plein d’affaires. Elles jouent, elles s’amusent.

— Toute la journée?

— Oui, monsieur.

— Et toi?

— Moi, je travaille.

— Toute la journée?

L’enfant leva ses grands yeux où il y avait une larme qu’on ne voyait pas à cause de la nuit, et répondit doucement:

— Oui, monsieur.

Elle poursuivit après un intervalle de silence:

— Des fois, quand j’ai fini l’ouvrage et qu’on veut bien, je m’amuse aussi.

— Comment t’amuses-tu?

— Comme je peux. On me laisse. Mais je n’ai pas beaucoup de joujoux. Ponine et Zelma ne veulent pas que je joue avec leurs poupées. Je n’ai qu’un petit sabre en plomb, pas plus long que ça.

L’enfant montrait son petit doigt.

— Et qui ne coupe pas? — Si, monsieur, dit l’enfant, ça coupe la salade et les têtes de mouches.

Ils atteignirent le village; Cosette guida l’étranger dans les rues. Ils passèrent devant la boulangerie; mais Cosette ne songea pas au pain qu’elle devait rapporter. L’homme avait cessé de lui faire des questions et gardait maintenant un silence morne. Quand ils eurent laissé l’église derrière eux, l’homme, voyant toutes ces boutiques en plein vent, demanda à Cosette:

— C’est donc la foire ici?

— Non, monsieur, c’est Noël.

Comme ils approchaient de l’auberge, Cosette lui toucha le bras timidement.

— Monsieur?

— Quoi, mon enfant?

— Nous voilà tout près de la maison.

— Eh bien?

— Voulez-vous me laisser reprendre le seau à présent?

— Pourquoi?

— C’est que, si madame voit qu’on me l’a porté, elle me battra.

L’homme lui remit le seau. Un instant après, ils étaient à la porte de la gargote.

Chapitre VIII

Désagrément de recevoir chez soi un pauvre qui est peut-être un riche

Cosette ne put s’empêcher de jeter un regard de côté à la grande poupée toujours étalée chez le bimbelotier, puis elle frappa. La porte s’ouvrit. La Thénardier parut une chandelle à la main.

— Ah! c’est toi, petite gueuse! Dieu merci, tu y as mis le temps! elle se sera amusée, la drôlesse!

— Madame, dit Cosette toute tremblante, voilà un monsieur qui vient loger.

La Thénardier remplaça bien vite sa mine bourrue par sa grimace aimable, changement à vue propre aux aubergistes, et chercha avidement des yeux le nouveau venu.

— C’est monsieur? dit-elle.

— Oui, madame, répondit l’homme en portant la main à son chapeau.

Les voyageurs riches ne sont pas si polis. Ce geste et l’inspection du costume et du bagage de l’étranger que la Thénardier passa en revue d’un coup d’œil firent évanouir la grimace aimable et reparaître la mine bourrue. Elle reprit sèchement:

— Entrez, bonhomme.

Le «bonhomme» entra. La Thénardier lui jeta un second coup d’œil, examina particulièrement sa redingote qui était absolument râpée et son chapeau qui était un peu défoncé, et consulta d’un hochement de tête, d’un froncement de nez et d’un clignement d’yeux, son mari, lequel buvait toujours avec les rouliers. Le mari répondit par cette imperceptible agitation de l’index qui, appuyée du gonflement des lèvres, signifie en pareil cas: débine complète. Sur ce, la Thénardier s’écria:

— Ah! çà, brave homme, je suis bien fâchée, mais c’est que je n’ai plus de place.

— Mettez-moi où vous voudrez, dit l’homme, au grenier, à l’écurie. Je payerai comme si j’avais une chambre.

— Quarante sous.

— Quarante sous. Soit.

— À la bonne heure.

— Quarante sous! dit un routier bas à la Thénardier, mais ce n’est que vingt sous.

— C’est quarante sous pour lui, répliqua la Thénardier du même ton. Je ne loge pas des pauvres à moins.

— C’est vrai, ajouta le mari avec douceur, ça gâte une maison d’y avoir de ce monde-là.

Cependant l’homme, après avoir laissé sur un banc son paquet et son bâton, s’était assis à une table où Cosette s’était empressée de poser une bouteille de vin et un verre. Le marchand qui avait demandé le seau d’eau était allé lui-même le porter à son cheval. Cosette avait repris sa place sous la table de cuisine et son tricot. L’homme, qui avait à peine trempé ses lèvres dans le verre de vin qu’il s’était versé, considérait l’enfant avec une attention étrange.

Cosette était laide. Heureuse, elle eût peut-être été jolie. Nous avons déjà esquissé cette petite figure sombre. Cosette était maigre et blême. Elle avait près de huit ans, on lui en eût donné à peine six. Ses grands yeux enfoncés dans une sorte d’ombre profonde étaient presque éteints à force d’avoir pleuré. Les coins de sa bouche avaient cette courbe de l’angoisse habituelle, qu’on observe chez les condamnés et chez les malades désespérés. Ses mains étaient, comme sa mère l’avait deviné, «perdues d’engelures.» Le feu qui l’éclairait en ce moment faisait saillir les angles de ses os et rendait sa maigreur affreusement visible. Comme elle grelottait toujours, elle avait pris l’habitude de serrer ses deux genoux l’un contre l’autre. Tout son vêtement n’était qu’un haillon qui eût fait pitié l’été et qui faisait horreur l’hiver. Elle n’avait sur elle que de la toile trouée; pas un chiffon de laine. On voyait sa peau çà et là, et l’on y distinguait partout des taches bleues ou noires qui indiquaient les endroits où la Thénardier l’avait touchée. Ses jambes nues étaient rouges et grêles. Le creux de ses clavicules était à faire pleurer. Toute la personne de cette enfant, son allure, son attitude, le son de sa voix, ses intervalles entre un mot et l’autre, son regard, son silence, son moindre geste, exprimaient et traduisaient une seule idée: la crainte.

La crainte était répandue sur elle; elle en était pour ainsi dire couverte; la crainte ramenait ses coudes contre ses hanches, retirait ses talons sous ses jupes, lui faisait tenir le moins de place possible, ne lui laissait de souffle que le nécessaire, et était devenue ce qu’on pourrait appeler son habitude de corps, sans variation possible que d’augmenter. Il y avait au fond de sa prunelle un coin étonné où était la terreur.

Cette crainte était telle qu'en arrivant, toute mouillée comme elle était, Cosette n'avait pas osé s'aller sécher au feu et s'était remise silencieusement à son travail. L'expression du regard de cette enfant de huit ans était habituellement si morne et parfois si tragique qu'il semblait, à de certains moments, qu'elle fût en train de devenir une idiote ou un démon.

Jamais, nous l'avons dit, elle n'avait su ce que c'est que prier, jamais elle n'avait mis le pied dans une église.

«Est-ce que j'ai le temps?» disait la Thénardier.

L'homme à la redingote jaune ne quittait pas Cosette des yeux.

Tout à coup la Thénardier s'écria:

— À propos! et ce pain?

Cosette, selon sa coutume toutes les fois que la Thénardier élevait la voix, sortit bien vite de dessous la table.

Elle avait complètement oublié ce pain. Elle eut recours à l'expédient des enfants toujours effrayés. Elle mentit.

— Madame, le boulanger était fermé.

— Il fallait cogner.

— J'ai cogné, madame.

— Eh bien?

— Il n'a pas ouvert.

— Je saurai demain si c'est vrai, dit la Thénardier, et si tu mens, tu auras une fière danse. En attendant, rends-moi la pièce-quinze-sous.

Cosette plongea sa main dans la poche de son tablier, et devint verte. La pièce de quinze sous n'y était plus.

— Ah çà! dit la Thénardier, m'as-tu entendue?

Cosette retourna la poche, il n'y avait rien. Qu'est-ce que cet argent pouvait être devenu? La malheureuse petite ne trouva pas une parole. Elle était pétrifiée.

— Est-ce que tu l'as perdue, la pièce-quinze-sous? râla la Thénardier, ou bien est-ce que tu veux me la voler?

En même temps elle allongea le bras vers le martinet suspendu à la cheminée.

Ce geste redoutable rendit à Cosette la force de crier:

— Grâce! madame! madame! je ne le ferai plus.

La Thénardier détacha le martinet.

Cependant l'homme à la redingote jaune avait fouillé dans le gousset de son gilet, sans qu'on eût remarqué ce mouvement. D'ailleurs les autres voyageurs buvaient ou jouaient aux cartes et ne faisaient attention à rien.

Cosette se pelotonnait avec angoisse dans l'angle de la cheminée, tâchant de ramasser et de dérober ses pauvres membres demi-nus. La Thénardier leva le bras.

— Pardon, madame, dit l'homme, mais tout à l'heure j'ai vu quelque chose qui est tombé de la poche du tablier de cette petite et qui a roulé. C'est peut-être cela.

En même temps il se baissa et parut chercher à terre un instant.

— Justement. Voici, reprit-il en se relevant.

Et il tendit une pièce d'argent à la Thénardier.

— Oui, c'est cela, dit-elle.

Ce n'était pas cela, car c'était une pièce de vingt sous, mais la Thénardier y trouvait du bénéfice. Elle mit la pièce dans sa poche, et se borna à jeter un regard farouche à l'enfant en disant:

— Que cela ne t'arrive plus, toujours!

Cosette rentra dans ce que la Thénardier appelait «sa niche», et son grand œil, fixé sur le voyageur inconnu, commença à prendre une expression qu'il n'avait jamais eue. Ce n'était encore qu'un naïf étonnement, mais une sorte de confiance stupéfaite s'y mêlait.

— À propos, voulez-vous souper? demanda la Thénardier au voyageur.

Il ne répondit pas. Il semblait songer profondément.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que cet homme-là? dit-elle entre ses dents. C'est quelque affreux pauvre. Cela n'a pas le sou pour souper. Me payera-t-il mon logement seulement? Il est bien heureux tout de même qu'il n'ait pas eu l'idée de voler l'argent qui était à terre.

Cependant une porte s'était ouverte et Éponine et Azelma étaient entrées.

C'étaient vraiment deux jolies petites filles, plutôt bourgeoises que paysannes, très charmantes, l'une avec ses tresses châtaines bien lustrées, l'autre avec ses longues nattes noires tombant derrière le dos, toutes deux vives, propres, grasses, fraîches et saines à réjouir le regard. Elles étaient chaudement vêtues, mais avec un tel art maternel, que l'épaisseur des étoffes n'ôtait rien à la coquetterie de l'ajustement. L'hiver était prévu sans que le printemps fût effacé. Ces deux petites dégageaient de la lumière. En outre, elles étaient régnantes. Dans leur toilette, dans leur gaîté, dans le bruit qu'elles faisaient, il y avait de la souveraineté. Quand elles entrèrent, la Thénardier leur dit d'un ton grondeur, qui était plein d'adoration:

— Ah! vous voilà donc, vous autres!

Puis, les attirant dans ses genoux l’une après l’autre, lissant leurs cheveux, renouant leurs rubans, et les lâchant ensuite avec cette douce façon de secouer qui est propre aux mères, elle s’écria:

— Sont-elles fagotées!

Elles vinrent s’asseoir au coin du feu. Elles avaient une poupée qu’elles tournaient et retournaient sur leurs genoux avec toutes sortes de gazouillements joyeux. De temps en temps, Cosette levait les yeux de son tricot, et les regardait jouer d’un air lugubre.

Éponine et Azelma ne regardaient pas Cosette. C’était pour elles comme le chien. Ces trois petites filles n’avaient pas vingt-quatre ans à elles trois, et elles représentaient déjà toute la société des hommes; d’un côté l’envie, de l’autre le dédain.

La poupée des sœurs Thénardier était très fanée et très vieille et toute cassée, mais elle n’en paraissait pas moins admirable à Cosette, qui de sa vie n’avait eu une poupée, une vraie poupée, pour nous servir d’une expression que tous les enfants comprendront.

Tout à coup la Thénardier, qui continuait d’aller et de venir dans la salle, s’aperçut que Cosette avait des distractions et qu’au lieu de travailler elle s’occupait des petites qui jouaient.

— Ah! je t’y prends! cria-t-elle. C’est comme cela que tu travailles! Je vais te faire travailler à coups de martinet, moi.

L’étranger, sans quitter sa chaise, se tourna vers la Thénardier.

— Madame, dit-il en souriant d’un air presque craintif, bah! laissez-la jouer!

De la part de tout voyageur qui eût mangé une tranche de gigot et bu deux bouteilles de vin à son souper et qui n’eût pas eu l’air d’un affreux pauvre, un pareil souhait eût été un ordre. Mais qu’un homme qui avait ce chapeau se permît d’avoir un désir et qu’un homme qui avait cette redingote se permît d’avoir une volonté, c’est ce que la Thénardier ne crut pas devoir tolérer. Elle repartit aigrement:

— Il faut qu’elle travaille, puisqu’elle mange. Je ne la nourris pas à rien faire.

— Qu’est-ce qu’elle fait donc? reprit l’étranger de cette voix douce qui contrastait si étrangement avec ses habits de mendiant et ses épaules de portefaix.

La Thénardier daigna répondre:

— Des bas, s’il vous plaît. Des bas pour mes petites filles qui n’en ont pas, autant dire, et qui vont tout à l’heure pieds nus.

L’homme regarda les pauvres pieds rouges de Cosette, et continua:

— Quand aura-t-elle fini cette paire de bas?

— Elle en a encore au moins pour trois ou quatre grands jours, la paresseuse.

— Et combien peut valoir cette paire de bas, quand elle sera faite?

La Thénardier lui jeta un coup d’œil méprisant.

— Au moins trente sous.

— La donneriez-vous pour cinq francs? reprit l’homme.

— Pardieu! s’écria avec un gros rire un routier qui écoutait, cinq francs? je crois fichtre bien! cinq balles!

Le Thénardier crut devoir prendre la parole.

— Oui, monsieur, si c’est votre fantaisie, on vous donnera cette paire de bas pour cinq francs. Nous ne savons rien refuser aux voyageurs.

— Il faudrait payer tout de suite, dit la Thénardier avec sa façon brève et péremptoire.

— J’achète cette paire de bas, répondit l’homme, et, ajouta-t-il en tirant de sa poche une pièce de cinq francs qu’il posa sur la table, — je la paye.

Puis il se tourna vers Cosette.

— Maintenant ton travail est à moi. Joue, mon enfant.

Le routier fut si ému de la pièce de cinq francs, qu’il laissa là son verre et accourut.

— C’est pourtant vrai! cria-t-il en l’examinant. Une vraie roue de derrière! et pas fausse!

Le Thénardier approcha et mit silencieusement la pièce dans son gousset.

La Thénardier n’avait rien à répliquer. Elle se mordit les lèvres, et son visage prit une expression de haine.

Cependant Cosette tremblait. Elle se risqua à demander:

— Madame, est-ce que c’est vrai? est-ce que je peux jouer?

— Joue! dit la Thénardier d’une voix terrible.

— Merci, madame, dit Cosette.

Et pendant que sa bouche remerciait la Thénardier, toute sa petite âme remerciait le voyageur.

Le Thénardier s’était remis à boire. Sa femme lui dit à l’oreille:

— Qu’est-ce que ça peut être que cet homme jaune?

— J’ai vu, répondit souverainement Thénardier, des millionnaires qui avaient des redingotes comme cela.

Cosette avait laissé là son tricot, mais elle n’était pas sortie de sa place. Cosette bougeait toujours le moins possible. Elle avait pris dans une boîte derrière elle quelques vieux chiffons et son petit sabre de plomb.

Éponine et Azelma ne faisaient aucune attention à ce qui se passait. Elles venaient d’exécuter une opération fort importante; elles s’étaient emparées du chat. Elles avaient jeté la poupée à terre, et Éponine, qui était l’aînée, emmaillotait le petit chat, malgré ses miaulements et ses contorsions, avec une foule de nippes et de guenilles rouges et bleues. Tout en faisant ce grave et difficile travail, elle disait à sa sœur dans ce doux et adorable langage des enfants dont la grâce, pareille à la splendeur de l’aile des papillons, s’en va quand on veut la fixer:

— Vois-tu, ma sœur, cette poupée-là est plus amusante que l’autre. Elle remue, elle crie, elle est chaude. Vois-tu, ma sœur, jouons avec. Ce serait ma petite fille. Je serais une dame. Je viendrais te voir et tu la regarderais. Peu à peu tu verrais ses moustaches, et cela t’étonnerait. Et puis tu verrais ses oreilles, et puis tu verrais sa queue, et cela t’étonnerait. Et tu me dirais: Ah! mon Dieu! et je te dirais: Oui, madame, c’est une petite fille que j’ai comme ça. Les petites filles sont comme ça à présent.

Azelma écoutait Éponine avec admiration.

Cependant, les buveurs s’étaient mis à chanter une chanson obscène dont ils riaient à faire trembler le plafond. Le Thénardier les encourageait et les accompagnait.

Comme les oiseaux font un nid avec tout, les enfants font une poupée avec n’importe quoi. Pendant qu’Éponine et Azelma emmaillotaient le chat, Cosette de son côté avait emmailloté le sabre. Cela fait, elle l’avait couché sur ses bras, et elle chantait doucement pour l’endormir.

La poupée est un des plus impérieux besoins et en même temps un des plus charmants instincts de l’enfance féminine. Soigner, vêtir, parer, habiller, déshabiller, rhabiller, enseigner, un peu gronder, bercer, dorloter, endormir, se figurer que quelque chose est quelqu’un, tout l’avenir de la femme est là. Tout en rêvant et tout en jasant, tout en faisant de petits trousseaux et de petites layettes, tout en cousant de petites robes, de petits corsages et de petites brassières, l’enfant devient jeune fille, la jeune fille devient grande fille, la grande fille devient femme. Le premier enfant continue la dernière poupée.

Une petite fille sans poupée est à peu près aussi malheureuse et tout à fait aussi impossible qu'une femme sans enfant.

Cosette s'était donc fait une poupée avec le sabre.

La Thénardier, elle, s'était rapprochée de l' homme jaune.

— Mon mari a raison, pensait-elle, c'est peut-être monsieur Laffitte. Il y a des riches si farces! Elle vint s'accouder à sa table.

— Monsieur... dit-elle.

À ce mot monsieur, l'homme se retourna. La Thénardier ne l'avait encore appelé que brave homme ou bonhomme.

— Voyez-vous, monsieur, poursuivit-elle en prenant son air douceâtre qui était encore plus fâcheux à voir que son air féroce, je veux bien que l'enfant joue, je ne m'y oppose pas, mais c'est bon pour une fois, parce que vous êtes généreux. Voyez-vous, cela n'a rien. Il faut que cela travaille.

— Elle n'est donc pas à vous, cette enfant? demanda l'homme.

— Oh mon Dieu non, monsieur! c'est une petite pauvre que nous avons recueillie comme cela, par charité. Une espèce d'enfant imbécile. Elle doit avoir de l'eau dans la tête. Elle a la tête grosse, comme vous voyez. Nous faisons pour elle ce que nous pouvons, car nous ne sommes pas riches. Nous avons beau écrire à son pays, voilà six mois qu'on ne nous répond plus. Il faut croire que sa mère est morte.

— Ah! dit l'homme, et il retomba dans sa rêverie.

— C'était une pas grand'chose que cette mère, ajouta la Thénardier. Elle abandonnait son enfant.

Pendant toute cette conversation, Cosette, comme si un instinct l'eût avertie qu'on parlait d'elle, n'avait pas quitté des yeux la Thénardier. Elle écoutait vaguement. Elle entendait çà et là quelques mots.

Cependant les buveurs, tous ivres aux trois quarts, répétaient leur refrain immonde avec un redoublement de gaîté. C'était une gaillardise de haut goût où étaient mêlés la Vierge et l'enfant Jésus. La Thénardier était allée prendre sa part des éclats de rire. Cosette, sous la table, regardait le feu qui se réverbérait dans son œil fixe; elle s'était remise à bercer l'espèce de maillot qu'elle avait fait, et, tout en le berçant, elle chantait à voix basse: «Ma mère est morte! ma mère est morte! ma mère est morte!»

Sur de nouvelles insistances de l'hôtesse, l'homme jaune, «le millionnaire», consentit enfin à souper.

— Que veut monsieur?

— Du pain et du fromage, dit l'homme.

— Décidément c’est un gueux, pensa la Thénardier.

Les ivrognes chantaient toujours leur chanson, et l’enfant, sous la table, chantait aussi la sienne.

Tout à coup Cosette s’interrompit. Elle venait de se retourner et d’apercevoir la poupée des petites Thénardier qu’elles avaient quittée pour le chat et laissée à terre à quelques pas de la table de cuisine.

Alors elle laissa tomber le sabre emmailloté qui ne lui suffisait qu’à demi, puis elle promena lentement ses yeux autour de la salle. La Thénardier parlait bas à son mari, et comptait de la monnaie, Ponine et Zelma jouaient avec le chat, les voyageurs mangeaient, ou buvaient, ou chantaient, aucun regard n’était fixé sur elle. Elle n’avait pas un moment à perdre. Elle sortit de dessous la table en rampant sur ses genoux et sur ses mains, s’assura encore une fois qu’on ne la guettait pas, puis se glissa vivement jusqu’à la poupée, et la saisit. Un instant après elle était à sa place, assise, immobile, tournée seulement de manière à faire de l’ombre sur la poupée qu’elle tenait dans ses bras. Ce bonheur de jouer avec une poupée était tellement rare pour elle qu’il avait toute la violence d’une volupté.

Personne ne l’avait vue, excepté le voyageur, qui mangeait lentement son maigre souper.

Cette joie dura près d’un quart d’heure.

Mais, quelque précaution que prit Cosette, elle ne s’apercevait pas qu’un des pieds de la poupée — passait, — et que le feu de la cheminée l’éclairait très vivement. Ce pied rose et lumineux qui sortait de l’ombre frappa subitement le regard d’Azelma qui dit à Éponine: — Tiens! ma sœur!

Les deux petites filles s’arrêtèrent, stupéfaites. Cosette avait osé prendre la poupée!

Éponine se leva, et, sans lâcher le chat, alla vers sa mère et se mit à la tirer par sa jupe.

— Mais laisse-moi donc! dit la mère. Qu’est-ce que tu me veux?

— Mère, dit l’enfant, regarde donc!

Et elle désignait du doigt Cosette.

Cosette, elle, tout entière aux extases de la possession, ne voyait et n’entendait plus rien.

Le visage de la Thénardier prit cette expression particulière qui se compose du terrible mêlé aux riens de la vie et qui a fait nommer ces sortes de femmes: mégères.

Cette fois, l'orgueil blessé exaspérait encore sa colère. Cosette avait franchi tous les intervalles, Cosette avait attenté à la poupée de «ces demoiselles».

Une czarine qui verrait un moujik essayer le grand cordon bleu de son impérial fils n'aurait pas une autre figure.

Elle cria d'une voix que l'indignation enrouait.

— Cosette!

Cosette tressaillit comme si la terre eût tremblé sous elle. Elle se retourna.

— Cosette, répéta la Thénardier.

Cosette prit la poupée et la posa doucement à terre avec une sorte de vénération mêlée de désespoir. Alors, sans la quitter des yeux, elle joignit les mains, et, ce qui est effrayant à dire dans un enfant de cet âge, elle se les tordit; puis, ce que n'avait pu lui arracher aucune des émotions de la journée, ni la course dans le bois, ni la pesanteur du seau d'eau, ni la perte de l'argent, ni la vue du martinet, ni même la sombre parole qu'elle avait entendu dire à la Thénardier, — elle pleura. Elle éclata en sanglots.

Cependant le voyageur s'était levé.

— Qu'est-ce donc? dit-il à la Thénardier.

— Vous ne voyez pas? dit la Thénardier en montrant du doigt le corps du délit qui gisait aux pieds de Cosette.

— Hé bien, quoi? reprit l'homme.

— Cette gueuse, répondit la Thénardier, s'est permis de toucher à la poupée des enfants!

— Tout ce bruit pour cela! dit l'homme. Eh bien, quand elle jouerait avec cette poupée?

— Elle y a touché avec ses mains sales! poursuivit la Thénardier, avec ses affreuses mains!

Ici Cosette redoubla ses sanglots.

— Te tairas-tu? cria la Thénardier.

L'homme alla droit à la porte de la rue, l'ouvrit et sortit.

Dès qu'il fut sorti, la Thénardier profita de son absence pour allonger sous la table à Cosette un grand coup de pied qui fit jeter à l'enfant les hauts cris.

La porte se rouvrit, l'homme reparut, il portait dans ses deux mains la poupée fabuleuse dont nous avons parlé, et que tous les marmots du village contemplaient depuis le matin, et il la posa debout devant Cosette en disant:

— Tiens, c’est pour toi.

Il faut croire que, depuis plus d’une heure qu’il était là, au milieu de sa rêverie, il avait confusément remarqué cette boutique de bimbeloterie éclairée de lampions et de chandelles si splendidement qu’on l’apercevait à travers la vitre du cabaret comme une illumination.

Cosette leva les yeux, elle avait vu venir l’homme à elle avec cette poupée comme elle eût vu venir le soleil, elle entendit ces paroles inouïes: c’est pour toi, elle le regarda, elle regarda la poupée, puis elle recula lentement, et s’alla cacher tout au fond sous la table dans le coin du mur.

Elle ne pleurait plus, elle ne criait plus, elle avait l’air de ne plus oser respirer.

La Thénardier, Éponine, Azelma étaient autant de statues. Les buveurs eux-mêmes s’étaient arrêtés. Il s’était fait un silence solennel dans tout le cabaret.

La Thénardier, pétrifiée et muette, recommençait ses conjectures: — Qu’est-ce que c’est que ce vieux? est-ce un pauvre? est-ce un millionnaire? C’est peut-être les deux, c’est-à-dire un voleur.

La face du mari Thénardier offrit cette ride expressive qui accentue la figure humaine chaque fois que l’instinct dominant y apparent avec toute sa puissance bestiale. Le gargotier considérait tour à tour la poupée et le voyageur; il semblait flairer cet homme comme il eût flairé un sac d’argent. Cela ne dura que le temps d’un éclair. Il s’approcha de sa femme et lui dit bas:

— Cette machine coûte au moins trente francs. Pas de bêtises. À plat ventre devant l’homme.

Les natures grossières ont cela de commun avec les natures naïves qu’elles n’ont pas de transitions. — Eh bien, Cosette, dit la Thénardier d’une voix qui voulait être douce et qui était toute composée de ce miel aigre des méchantes femmes, est-ce que tu ne prends pas ta poupée?

Cosette se hasarda à sortir de son trou.

— Ma petite Cosette, reprit la Thénardier d’un air caressant, monsieur te donne une poupée. Prends-la. Elle est à toi.

Cosette considérait la poupée merveilleuse avec une sorte de terreur. Son visage était encore inondé de larmes, mais ses yeux commençaient à s’emplir, comme le ciel au crépuscule du matin, des rayonnements étranges de la joie. Ce qu’elle éprouvait en ce moment-là était un peu pareil à ce qu’elle eût ressenti si on lui eût dit brusquement: Petite, vous êtes la reine de France.

Il lui semblait que si elle touchait à cette poupée, le tonnerre en sortirait.

Ce qui était vrai jusqu’à un certain point, car elle se disait que la Thénardier gronderait, et la battrait.

Pourtant l’attraction l’emporta. Elle finit par s’approcher, et murmura timidement en se tournant vers la Thénardier:

— Est-ce que je peux, madame?

Aucune expression ne saurait rendre cet air à la fois désespéré, épouvanté et ravi.

— Pardi! fit la Thénardier, c’est à toi. Puisque monsieur te la donne.

— Vrai, monsieur? reprit Cosette, est-ce que c’est vrai? c’est à moi, la dame?

L’étranger paraissait avoir les yeux pleins de larmes. Il semblait être à ce point d’émotion où l’on ne parle pas pour ne pas pleurer. Il fit un signe de tête à Cosette, et mit la main de «la dame» dans sa petite main.

Cosette retira vivement sa main, comme si celle de la dame la brûlait, et se mit à regarder le pavé. Nous sommes forcé d’ajouter qu’en cet instant-là elle tirait la langue d’une façon démesurée. Tout à coup elle se retourna et saisit la poupée avec emportement.

— Je l’appellerai Catherine, dit-elle.

Ce fut un moment bizarre que celui où les haillons de Cosette rencontrèrent et étreignirent les rubans et les fraîches mousselines roses de la poupée.

— Madame, reprit-elle, est-ce que je peux la mettre sur une chaise?

— Oui, mon enfant, répondit la Thénardier.

Maintenant c’étaient Éponine et Azelma qui regardaient Cosette avec envie.

Cosette posa Catherine sur une chaise, puis s’assit à terre devant elle, et demeura immobile, sans dire un mot dans l’attitude de la contemplation.

— Joue donc, Cosette, dit l’étranger.

— Oh! je joue, répondit l’enfant. Cet étranger, cet inconnu qui avait l’air d’une visite que la providence faisait à Cosette, était en ce moment-là ce que la Thénardier haïssait le plus au monde. Pourtant il fallait se contraindre. C’était plus d’émotions qu’elle n’en pouvait supporter, si habituée qu’elle fût à la dissimulation par la copie qu’elle tâchait de faire de son mari dans toutes ses actions. Elle se hâta d’envoyer ses filles coucher, puis elle demanda à l’homme jaune la permission d’y envoyer aussi Cosette, qui a bien fatigué aujourd’hui, ajouta-t-elle d’un air maternel. Cosette s’alla coucher emportant Catherine entre ses bras.

La Thénardier allait de temps en temps à l’autre bout de la salle où était son homme, pour se soulager l’âme, disait-elle. Elle échangeait avec son mari quelques paroles d’autant plus furieuses qu’elle n’osait les dire haut:

— Vieille bête! qu’est-ce qu’il a donc dans le ventre? Venir nous déranger ici! vouloir que ce petit monstre joue! lui donner des poupées! donner des poupées de quarante francs à une chienne que je donnerais moi pour quarante sous! Encore un peu il lui dirait votre majesté comme à la duchesse de Berry! Y a-t-il du bon sens? il est donc enragé, ce vieux mystérieux-là?

— Pourquoi? C’est tout simple, répliquait le Thénardier. Si ça l’amuse! Toi, ça t’amuse que la petite travaille, lui, ça l’amuse qu’elle joue. Il est dans son droit. Un voyageur, ça fait ce que ça veut quand ça paye. Si ce vieux est un philanthrope, qu’est-ce que ça te fait? Si c’est un imbécile, ça ne te regarde pas. De quoi te mêles-tu, puisqu’il a de l’argent?

Langage de maître et raisonnement d’aubergiste qui n’admettaient ni l’un ni l’autre la réplique.

L’homme s’était accoudé sur la table et avait repris son attitude de rêverie. Tous les autres voyageurs, marchands et rouliers, s’étaient un peu éloignés et ne chantaient plus. Ils le considéraient à distance avec une sorte de crainte respectueuse. Ce particulier si pauvrement vêtu, qui tirait de sa poche les roues de derrière avec tant d’aisance et qui prodiguait des poupées gigantesques à de petites souillons en sabots, était certainement un bonhomme magnifique et redoutable.

Plusieurs heures s’écoulèrent. La messe de minuit était dite, le réveillon était fini, les buveurs s’en étaient allés, le cabaret était fermé, la salle basse était déserte, le feu s’était éteint, l’étranger était toujours à la même place et dans la même posture. De temps en temps il changeait le coude sur lequel il s’appuyait. Voilà tout. Mais il n’avait pas dit un mot depuis que Cosette n’était plus là.

Les Thénardier seuls, par convenance et par curiosité, étaient restés dans la salle. — Est-ce qu’il va passer la nuit comme ça? grommelait la Thénardier. Comme deux heures du matin sonnaient, elle se déclara vaincue et dit à son mari: — Je vais me coucher. Fais-en ce que tu voudras. — Le mari s’assit à une table dans un coin, alluma une chandelle et se mit à lire le Courrier français.

Une bonne heure se passa ainsi. Le digne aubergiste avait lu au moins trois fois le Courrier français, depuis la date du numéro jusqu’au nom de l’imprimeur. L’étranger ne bougeait pas.

Le Thénardier remua, toussa, cracha, se moucha, fit craquer sa chaise. Aucun mouvement de l’homme. — Est-ce qu’il dort? pensa Thénardier. — L’homme ne dormait pas, mais rien ne pouvait l’éveiller.

Enfin Thénardier ôta son bonnet, s’approcha doucement, et s’aventura à dire:

— Est-ce que monsieur ne va pas reposer?

Ne va pas se coucher lui eût semblé excessif et familier. Reposer sentait le luxe et était du respect. Ces mots-là ont la propriété mystérieuse et admirable de gonfler le lendemain matin le chiffre de la carte à payer. Une chambre où l’on couche coûte vingt sous; une chambre où l’on repose coûte vingt francs.

— Tiens! dit l’étranger, vous avez raison. Où est votre écurie?

— Monsieur, fit le Thénardier avec un sourire, je vais conduire monsieur.

Il prit la chandelle, l’homme prit son paquet et son bâton, et Thénardier le mena dans une chambre au premier qui était d’une rare splendeur, toute meublée en acajou avec un lit-bateau et des rideaux de calicot rouge.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que cela? dit le voyageur.

— C’est notre propre chambre de noce, dit l’aubergiste. Nous en habitons une autre, mon épouse et moi. On n’entre ici que trois ou quatre fois dans l’année.

— J’aurais autant aimé l’écurie, dit l’homme brusquement.

Le Thénardier n’eut pas l’air d’entendre cette réflexion peu obligeante.

Il alluma deux bougies de cire toutes neuves qui figuraient sur la cheminée. Un assez bon feu flambait dans l’âtre.

Il y avait sur cette cheminée, sous un bocal, une coiffure de femme en fils d’argent et en fleurs d’oranger.

— Et ceci, qu’est-ce que c’est? reprit l’étranger. — Monsieur, dit le Thénardier, c’est le chapeau de mariée de ma femme.

Le voyageur regarda l’objet d’un regard qui semblait dire: il y a donc eu un moment où ce monstre a été une vierge!

Du reste le Thénardier mentait. Quand il avait pris à bail cette bicoque pour en faire une gargote, il avait trouvé cette chambre ainsi garnie, et avait acheté ces meubles et brocanté ces fleurs d’oranger, jugeant que cela ferait une ombre gracieuse sur «son épouse», et qu’il en résulterait pour sa maison ce que les Anglais appellent de la respectabilité.

Quand le voyageur se retourna, l’hôte avait disparu. Le Thénardier s’était éclipsé discrètement, sans oser dire bonsoir, ne voulant pas traiter avec une cordialité irrespectueuse un homme qu’il se proposait d’écorcher royalement le lendemain matin.

L’aubergiste se retira dans sa chambre. Sa femme était couchée, mais elle ne dormait pas. Quand elle entendit le pas de son mari, elle se tourna et lui dit:

— Tu sais que je flanque demain Cosette à la porte.

Le Thénardier répondit froidement:

— Comme tu y vas!

Ils n’échangèrent pas d’autres paroles, et quelques minutes après leur chandelle était éteinte.

De son côté le voyageur avait déposé dans un coin son bâton et son paquet. L’hôte parti, il s’assit sur un fauteuil et resta quelque temps pensif. Puis il ôta ses souliers, prit une des deux bougies, souffla l’autre, poussa la porte et sortit de la chambre, regardant autour de lui comme quelqu’un qui cherche. Il traversa un corridor et parvint à l’escalier. Là il entendit un petit bruit très doux qui ressemblait à une respiration d’enfant. Il se laissa conduire par ce bruit et arriva à une espèce d’enfoncement triangulaire pratiqué sous l’escalier ou pour mieux dire formé par l’escalier même. Cet enfoncement n’était autre chose que le dessous des marches. Là, parmi toutes sortes de vieux paniers et de vieux tessons, dans la poussière et dans les toiles d’araignées, il y avait un lit; si l’on peut appeler lit une paillasse trouée jusqu’à montrer la paille et une couverture trouée jusqu’à laisser voir la paillasse. Point de draps. Cela était posé à terre sur le carreau. Dans ce lit Cosette dormait.

L’homme s’approcha, et la considéra.

Cosette dormait profondément. Elle était toute habillée. L’hiver elle ne se déshabillait pas pour avoir moins froid.

Elle tenait serrée contre elle la poupée dont les grands yeux ouverts brillaient dans l’obscurité. De temps en temps elle poussait un grand soupir comme si elle allait se réveiller, et elle étreignait la poupée dans ses bras presque convulsivement. Il n’y avait à côté de son lit qu’un de ses sabots.

Une porte ouverte près du galetas de Cosette laissait voir une assez grande chambre sombre. L’étranger y pénétra. Au fond, à travers une porte vitrée, on apercevait deux petits lits jumeaux très blancs. C’étaient ceux d’Azelma et d’Éponine. Derrière ces lits disparaissait à demi un berceau d’osier sans rideaux où dormait le petit garçon qui avait crié toute la soirée.

L’étranger conjectura que cette chambre communiquait avec celle des époux Thénardier. Il allait se retirer quand son regard rencontra la cheminée; une de ces vastes cheminées d’auberge où il y a toujours un si petit feu, quand il y a du feu, et qui sont si froides à voir. Dans celle-là il n’y avait pas de feu, il n’y avait pas même de cendre; ce qui y était attira pourtant l’attention du voyageur. C’étaient deux petits souliers d’enfant de forme coquette et de grandeur inégale; le voyageur se rappela la gracieuse et immémoriale coutume des enfants qui déposent leur chaussure dans la cheminée le jour de Noël pour y attendre dans les ténèbres quelque étincelant cadeau de leur bonne fée. Éponine et Azelma n’avaient eu garde d’y manquer, et elles avaient mis chacune un de leurs souliers dans la cheminée.

Le voyageur se pencha.

La fée, c’est-à-dire la mère, avait déjà fait sa visite, et l’on voyait reluire dans chaque soulier une belle pièce de dix sous toute neuve.

L’homme se relevait et allait s’en aller lorsqu’il aperçut au fond, à l’écart, dans le coin le plus obscur de l’âtre, un autre objet. Il regarda, et reconnut un sabot, un affreux sabot du bois le plus grossier, à demi brisé, et tout couvert de cendre et de boue desséchée. C’était le sabot de Cosette. Cosette, avec cette touchante confiance des enfants qui peut être trompée toujours sans se décourager jamais, avait mis, elle aussi, son sabot dans la cheminée.

C’est une chose sublime et douce que l’espérance dans un enfant qui n’a jamais connu que le désespoir.

Il n’y avait rien dans ce sabot.

L’étranger fouilla dans son gilet, se courba, et mit dans le sabot de Cosette un louis d’or.

Puis il regagna sa chambre à pas de loup.

Chapitre IX

Thénardier à la manœuvre

Le lendemain matin, deux heures au moins avant le jour, le mari Thénardier, attablé près d'une chandelle dans la salle basse du cabaret, une plume à la main, composait la carte du voyageur à la redingote jaune.

La femme debout, à demi courbée sur lui, le suivait des yeux. Ils n'échangeaient pas une parole. C'était, d'un côté, une méditation profonde, de l'autre, cette admiration religieuse avec laquelle on regarde naître et s'épanouir une merveille de l'esprit humain. On entendait un bruit dans la maison; c'était l'Alouette qui balayait l'escalier.

Après un bon quart d'heure et quelques ratures, le Thénardier produisit ce chef-d'œuvre.

Note du Monsieur du No 1.

Souper Fr. 3

Chambre Fr. 10

Bougie Fr. 5

Feu Fr. 4

Service Fr. 1

———— ———— ———— ————

Total Fr. 23

Service était écrit servisse.

— Vingt-trois francs! s'écria la femme avec un enthousiasme mêlé de quelque hésitation.

Comme tous les grands artistes, le Thénardier n'était pas content. — Peuh! fit-il.

C'était l'accent de Castlereagh rédigeant au congrès de Vienne la carte à payer de la France.

— Monsieur Thénardier, tu as raison, il doit bien cela, murmura la femme qui songeait à la poupée donnée à Cosette en présence de ses filles, c'est juste, mais c'est trop. Il ne voudra pas payer.

Le Thénardier fit son rire froid, et dit:

— Il payera.

Ce rire était la signification suprême de la certitude et de l'autorité. Ce qui était dit ainsi devait être. La femme n'insista point. Elle se mit à ranger les tables; le mari marchait de long en large dans la salle. Un moment après il ajouta:

— Je dois bien quinze cents francs, moi!

Il alla s’asseoir au coin de la cheminée, méditant, les pieds sur les cendres chaudes.

— Ah çà! reprit la femme, tu n’oublies pas que je flanque Cosette à la porte aujourd’hui? Ce monstre! elle me mange le cœur avec sa poupée! J’aimerais mieux épouser Louis XVIII que de la garder un jour de plus à la maison.

Le Thénardier alluma sa pipe et répondit entre deux bouffées.

— Tu remettras la carte à l’homme.

Puis il sortit.

Il était à peine hors de la salle que le voyageur y entra.

Le Thénardier reparut sur-le-champ derrière lui et demeura immobile dans la porte entre-bâillée, visible seulement pour sa femme.

L’homme jaune portait à la main son bâton et son paquet.

— Levé si tôt! dit la Thénardier, est-ce que monsieur nous quitte déjà?

Tout en parlant ainsi, elle tournait d’un air embarrassé la carte dans ses mains et y faisait des plis avec ses ongles. Son visage dur offrait une nuance qui ne lui était pas habituelle, la timidité et le scrupule.

Présenter une pareille note à un homme qui avait si parfaitement l’air d’«un pauvre», cela lui paraissait malaisé.

Le voyageur semblait préoccupé et distrait. Il répondit:

— Oui, madame. Je m’en vais.

— Monsieur, reprit-elle, n’avait donc pas d’affaires à Montfermeil?

— Non. Je passe par ici. Voilà tout. Madame, ajouta-t-il, qu’est-ce que je dois?

La Thénardier, sans répondre, lui tendit la carte pliée.

L’homme déplia le papier, le regarda, mais son attention était visiblement ailleurs.

— Madame, reprit-il, faites-vous de bonnes affaires dans ce Montfermeil?

— Comme cela, monsieur, répondit la Thénardier stupéfaite de ne point voir d’autre explosion.

Elle poursuivit d’un accent élégiaque et lamentable:

— Oh! monsieur, les temps sont bien durs! et puis nous avons si peu de bourgeois dans nos endroits! C’est tout petit monde, voyez-vous. Si nous n’avions pas par-ci par-là des voyageurs généreux et riches comme monsieur! Nous avons tant de charges. Tenez, cette petite nous coûte les yeux de la tête.

— Quelle petite?

— Eh bien, la petite, vous savez! Cosette! l’Alouette, comme on dit dans le pays!

— Ah! dit l’homme.

Elle continua:

— Sont-ils bêtes, ces paysans, avec leurs sobriquets! elle a plutôt l’air d’une chauve-souris que d’une alouette. Voyez-vous, monsieur, nous ne demandons pas la charité, mais nous ne pouvons pas la faire. Nous ne gagnons rien, et nous avons gros à payer. La patente, les impositions, les portes et fenêtres, les centimes! Monsieur sait que le gouvernement demande un argent terrible! Et puis j’ai mes filles, moi. Je n’ai pas besoin de nourrir l’enfant des autres. L’homme reprit, de cette voix qu’il s’efforçait de rendre indifférente et dans laquelle il y avait un tremblement:

— Et si l’on vous en débarrassait?

— De qui? de la Cosette?

— Oui.

La face rouge et violente de la gargotière s’illumina d’un épanouissement hideux.

— Ah, monsieur! mon bon monsieur! prenez-la, gardez-la, emmenez-la, emportez-la, sucrez-la, truffez-la, buvez-la, mangez-la, et soyez béni de la bonne sainte Vierge et de tous les saints du paradis!

— C’est dit.

— Vrai? vous l’emmenez?

— Je l’emmène.

— Tout de suite?

— Tout de suite. Appelez l’enfant.

— Cosette! cria la Thénardier.

— En attendant, poursuivit l’homme, je vais toujours vous payer ma dépense. Combien est-ce?

Il jeta un coup d’œil sur la carte et ne put réprimer un mouvement de surprise:

— Vingt-trois francs!

Il regarda la gargotière et répéta:

— Vingt-trois francs?

Il y avait dans la prononciation de ces deux mots ainsi répétés l’accent qui sépare le point d’exclamation du point d’interrogation.

La Thénardier avait eu le temps de se préparer au choc. Elle répondit avec assurance:

— Dame oui, monsieur! c’est vingt-trois francs.

L’étranger posa cinq pièces de cinq francs sur la table.

— Allez chercher la petite, dit-il.

En ce moment, le Thénardier s’avança au milieu de la salle et dit:

— Monsieur doit vingt-six sous.

— Vingt-six sous! s’écria la femme.

— Vingt sous pour la chambre, reprit le Thénardier froidement, et six sous pour le souper. Quant à la petite, j’ai besoin d’en causer un peu avec monsieur. Laisse-nous, ma femme. La Thénardier eut un de ces éblouissements que donnent les éclairs imprévus du talent. Elle sentit que le grand acteur entrait en scène, ne répliqua pas un mot, et sortit.

Dès qu’ils furent seuls, le Thénardier offrit une chaise au voyageur. Le voyageur s’assit; le Thénardier resta debout, et son visage prit une singulière expression de bonhomie et de simplicité.

— Monsieur, dit-il, tenez, je vais vous dire. C’est que je l’adore, moi, cette enfant.

L’étranger le regarda fixement.

— Quelle enfant?

Thénardier continua:

— Comme c’est drôle! on s’attache. Qu’est-ce que c’est que tout cet argent-là? reprenez donc vos pièces de cent sous. C’est une enfant que j’adore.

— Qui ça? demanda l’étranger.

— Hé, notre petite Cosette! ne voulez-vous pas nous l’emmener? Eh bien, je parle franchement, vrai comme vous êtes un honnête homme, je ne peux pas y consentir. Elle me ferait faute, cette enfant. J’ai vu ça tout petit. C’est vrai qu’elle nous coûte de l’argent, c’est vrai qu’elle a des défauts, c’est vrai que nous ne sommes pas riches, c’est vrai que j’ai payé plus de quatre cents francs en drogues rien que pour une de ses maladies! Mais il faut bien faire quelque chose pour le bon Dieu. Ça n’a ni père ni mère, je l’ai élevée. J’ai du pain pour elle et pour moi. Au fait j’y tiens, à cette enfant. Vous comprenez, on se prend d’affection; je suis une bonne bête, moi; je ne raisonne pas; je l’aime, cette petite; ma femme est vive, mais elle l’aime aussi. Voyez-vous, c’est comme notre enfant. J’ai besoin que ça babille dans la maison.

L’étranger le regardait toujours fixement. Il continua:

— Pardon, excuse, monsieur, mais on ne donne point son enfant comme ça à un passant. Pas vrai que j’ai raison? Après cela, je ne dis pas, vous êtes riche, vous avez l’air d’un bien brave homme, si c’était pour son bonheur? Mais il faudrait savoir. Vous comprenez? Une supposition que je la laisserais aller et que je me sacrifierais, je voudrais savoir où elle va, je ne voudrais pas la perdre de vue, je voudrais savoir chez qui elle est, pour l’aller voir de temps en temps, qu’elle sache que son bon père nourricier est là, qu’il veille sur elle. Enfin il y a des choses qui ne sont pas possibles. Je ne sais seulement pas votre nom? Vous l’emmèneriez, je dirais: eh bien, l’Alouette? Où donc a-t-elle passé? Il faudrait au moins voir quelque méchant chiffon de papier, un petit bout de passeport, quoi!

L’étranger, sans cesser de le regarder de ce regard qui va, pour ainsi dire, jusqu’au fond de la conscience, lui répondit d’un accent grave et ferme:

— Monsieur Thénardier, on n’a pas de passeport pour venir à cinq lieues de Paris. Si j’emmène Cosette, je l’emmènerai, voilà tout. Vous ne saurez pas mon nom, vous ne saurez pas ma demeure, vous ne saurez pas où elle sera, et mon intention est qu’elle ne vous revoie de sa vie. Je casse le fil qu’elle a au pied, et elle s’en va. Cela vous convient-il? Oui ou non.

De même que les démons et les génies reconnaissaient à de certains signes la présence d’un dieu supérieur, le Thénardier comprit qu’il avait affaire à quelqu’un de très fort. Ce fut comme une intuition; il comprit cela avec sa promptitude nette et sagace. La veille, tout en buvant avec les rouliers, tout en fumant, tout en chantant des gaudrioles, il avait passé la soirée à observer l’étranger, le guettant comme un chat et l’étudiant comme un mathématicien. Il l’avait à la fois épié pour son propre compte, pour le plaisir et par instinct, et espionné comme s’il eût été payé pour cela. Pas un geste, pas un mouvement de l’homme à la capote jaune ne lui était échappé. Avant même que l’inconnu manifestât si clairement son intérêt pour Cosette, le Thénardier l’avait deviné. Il avait surpris les regards profonds de ce vieux qui revenaient toujours à l’enfant. Pourquoi cet intérêt? Qu’était-ce que cet homme? Pourquoi, avec tant d’argent dans sa bourse, ce costume si misérable? Questions qu’il se posait sans pouvoir les résoudre et qui l’irritaient. Il y avait songé toute la nuit. Ce ne pouvait être le père de Cosette. Était-ce quelque grand-père? Alors pourquoi ne pas se faire connaître tout de suite? Quand on a un droit, on le montre. Cet homme évidemment n'avait pas de droit sur Cosette. Alors qu'était-ce? Le Thénardier se perdait en suppositions. Il entrevoyait tout, et ne voyait rien. Quoi qu'il en fût, en entamant la conversation avec l'homme, sûr qu'il y avait un secret dans tout cela, sûr que l'homme était intéressé à rester dans l'ombre, il se sentait fort; à la réponse nette et ferme de l'étranger, quand il vit que ce personnage mystérieux était mystérieux si simplement, il se sentit faible. Il ne s'attendait à rien de pareil. Ce fut la déroute de ses conjectures. Il rallia ses idées. Il pesa tout cela en une seconde. Le Thénardier était un de ces hommes qui jugent d'un coup d'œil une situation. Il estima que c'était le moment de marcher droit et vite. Il fit comme les grands capitaines à cet instant décisif qu'ils savent seuls reconnaître, il démasqua brusquement sa batterie.

— Monsieur, dit-il, il me faut quinze cents francs.

L'étranger prit dans sa poche de côté un vieux portefeuille en cuir noir, l'ouvrit et en tira trois billets de banque qu'il posa sur la table. Puis il appuya son large pouce sur ces billets, et dit au gargotier:

— Faites venir Cosette. Pendant que ceci se passait, que faisait Cosette?

Cosette, en s'éveillant, avait couru à son sabot. Elle y avait trouvé la pièce d'or. Ce n'était pas un napoléon, c'était une de ces pièces de vingt francs toutes neuves de la restauration sur l'effigie desquelles la petite queue prussienne avait remplacé la couronne de laurier. Cosette fut éblouie. Sa destinée commençait à l'enivrer. Elle ne savait pas ce que c'était qu'une pièce d'or, elle n'en avait jamais vu, elle la cacha bien vite dans sa poche comme si elle l'avait volée. Cependant elle sentait que cela était bien à elle, elle devinait d'où ce don lui venait, mais elle éprouvait une sorte de joie pleine de peur. Elle était contente; elle était surtout stupéfaite. Ces choses si magnifiques et si jolies ne lui paraissaient pas réelles. La poupée lui faisait peur, la pièce d'or lui faisait peur. Elle tremblait vaguement devant ces magnificences. L'étranger seul ne lui faisait pas peur. Au contraire, il la rassurait. Depuis la veille, à travers ses étonnements, à travers son sommeil, elle songeait dans son petit esprit d'enfant à cet homme qui avait l'air vieux et pauvre et si triste, et qui était si riche et si bon. Depuis qu'elle avait rencontré ce bonhomme dans le bois, tout était comme changé pour elle. Cosette, moins heureuse que la moindre hirondelle du ciel, n'avait jamais su ce que c'est que de se réfugier à l'ombre de sa mère et sous une aile. Depuis cinq ans, c'est-à-dire aussi loin que pouvaient remonter ses souvenirs, la pauvre enfant frissonnait et grelottait. Elle avait toujours été toute nue sous la bise aigre du malheur, maintenant il lui semblait qu’elle était vêtue. Autrefois son âme avait froid, maintenant elle avait chaud. Elle n’avait plus autant de crainte de la Thénardier. Elle n’était plus seule; il y avait quelqu’un là.

Elle s’était mise bien vite à sa besogne de tous les matins. Ce louis, qu’elle avait sur elle, dans ce même gousset de son tablier d’où la pièce de quinze sous était tombée la veille, lui donnait des distractions. Elle n’osait pas y toucher, mais elle passait des cinq minutes à le contempler, il faut le dire, en tirant la langue. Tout en balayant l’escalier, elle s’arrêtait, et restait là, immobile, oubliant le balai et l’univers entier, occupée à regarder cette étoile briller au fond de sa poche.

Ce fut dans une de ces contemplations que la Thénardier la rejoignit.

Sur l’ordre de son mari, elle l’était allée chercher. Chose inouïe, elle ne lui donna pas une tape et ne lui dit pas une injure.

— Cosette, dit-elle presque doucement, viens tout de suite.

Un instant après, Cosette entrait dans la salle basse.

L’étranger prit le paquet qu’il avait apporté et le dénoua. Ce paquet contenait une petite robe de laine, un tablier, une brassière de futaine, un jupon, un fichu, des bas de laine, des souliers, un vêtement complet pour une fille de huit ans. Tout cela était noir.

— Mon enfant, dit l’homme, prends ceci et va t’habiller bien vite.

Le jour paraissait lorsque ceux des habitants de Montfermeil qui commençaient à ouvrir leurs portes virent passer dans la rue de Paris un bonhomme pauvrement vêtu donnant la main à une petite fille tout en deuil qui portait une grande poupée rose dans ses bras. Ils se dirigeaient du côté de Livry.

C’étaient notre homme et Cosette.

Personne ne connaissait l’homme; comme Cosette n’était plus en guenilles, beaucoup ne la reconnurent pas.

Cosette s’en allait. Avec qui? elle l’ignorait. Où? elle ne savait. Tout ce qu’elle comprenait, c’est qu’elle laissait derrière elle la gargote Thénardier. Personne n’avait songé à lui dire adieu, ni elle à dire adieu à personne. Elle sortait de cette maison haïe et haïssant.

Pauvre doux être dont le cœur n’avait jusqu’à cette heure été que comprimé!

Cosette marchait gravement, ouvrant ses grands yeux et considérant le ciel. Elle avait mis son louis dans la poche de son tablier neuf. De temps en temps elle se penchait et lui jetait un coup d'œil, puis elle regardait le bonhomme. Elle sentait quelque chose comme si elle était près du bon Dieu.

Chapitre X

Qui cherche le mieux peut trouver le pire

La Thénardier, selon son habitude, avait laissé faire son mari. Elle s’attendait à de grands événements. Quand l’homme et Cosette furent partis, le Thénardier laissa s’écouler un grand quart d’heure, puis il la prit à part et lui montra les quinze cents francs.

— Que ça! dit-elle.

C’était la première fois, depuis le commencement de leur ménage, qu’elle osait critiquer un acte du maître.

Le coup porta.

— Au fait, tu as raison, dit-il, je suis un imbécile. Donne-moi mon chapeau.

Il plia les trois billets de banque, les enfonça dans sa poche et sortit en toute hâte, mais il se trompa et prit d’abord à droite. Quelques voisines auxquelles il s’informa le remirent sur la trace, l’Alouette et l’homme avaient été vus allant dans la direction de Livry. Il suivit cette indication, marchant à grands pas et monologuant.

— Cet homme est évidemment un million habillé en jaune, et moi je suis un animal. Il a d’abord donné vingt sous, puis cinq francs, puis cinquante francs, puis quinze cents francs, toujours aussi facilement. Il aurait donné quinze mille francs. Mais je vais le rattraper.

Et puis ce paquet d’habits préparés d’avance pour la petite, tout cela était singulier; il y avait bien des mystères là-dessous. On ne lâche pas des mystères quand on les tient. Les secrets des riches sont des éponges pleines d’or; il faut savoir les presser. Toutes ces pensées lui tourbillonnaient dans le cerveau.

— Je suis un animal, disait-il.

Quand on est sorti de Montfermeil et qu’on a atteint le coude que fait la route qui va à Livry, on la voit se développer devant soi très loin sur le plateau. Parvenu là, il calcula qu’il devait apercevoir l’homme et la petite. Il regarda aussi loin que sa vue put s’étendre, et ne vit rien. Il s’informa encore. Cependant il perdait du temps. Des passants lui dirent que l’homme et l’enfant qu’il cherchait s’étaient acheminés vers les bois du côté de Gagny. Il se hâta dans cette direction.

Ils avaient de l’avance sur lui, mais un enfant marche lentement, et lui il allait vite. Et puis le pays lui était bien connu.

Tout à coup il s’arrêta et se frappa le front comme un homme qui a oublié l’essentiel, et qui est prêt à revenir sur ses pas.

— J’aurais dû prendre mon fusil! se dit-il.

Thénardier était une de ces natures doubles qui passent quelquefois au milieu de nous à notre insu et qui disparaissent sans qu’on les ait connues parce que la destinée n’en a montré qu’un côté. Le sort de beaucoup d’hommes est de vivre ainsi à demi submergés. Dans une situation calme et plate, Thénardier avait tout ce qu’il fallait pour faire — nous ne disons pas pour être — ce qu’on est convenu d’appeler un honnête commerçant, un bon bourgeois. En même temps, certaines circonstances étant données, certaines secousses venant à soulever sa nature de dessous, il avait tout ce qu’il fallait pour être un scélérat. C’était un boutiquier dans lequel il y avait du monstre. Satan devait par moments s’accroupir dans quelque coin du bouge où vivait Thénardier et rêver devant ce chef-d’œuvre hideux. Après une hésitation d’un instant:

— Bah! pensa-t-il, ils auraient le temps d’échapper!

Et il continua son chemin, allant devant lui rapidement, et presque d’un air de certitude, avec la sagacité du renard flairant une compagnie de perdrix.

En effet, quand il eut dépassé les étangs et traversé obliquement la grande clairière qui est à droite de l’avenue de Bellevue, comme il arrivait à cette allée de gazon qui fait presque le tour de la colline et qui recouvre la voûte de l’ancien canal des eaux de l’abbaye de Chelles, il aperçut au-dessus d’une broussaille un chapeau sur lequel il avait déjà échafaudé bien des conjectures. C’était le chapeau de l’homme. La broussaille était basse. Le Thénardier reconnut que l’homme et Cosette étaient assis là. On ne voyait pas l’enfant à cause de sa petitesse, mais on apercevait la tête de la poupée.

Le Thénardier ne se trompait pas. L’homme s’était assis là pour laisser un peu reposer Cosette. Le gargotier tourna la broussaille et apparut brusquement aux regards de ceux qu’il cherchait.

— Pardon excuse, monsieur, dit-il tout essoufflé, mais voici vos quinze cents francs.

En parlant ainsi, il tendait à l’étranger les trois billets de banque.

L’homme leva les yeux.

— Qu’est-ce que cela signifie?

Le Thénardier répondit respectueusement:

— Monsieur, cela signifie que je reprends Cosette.

Cosette frissonna et se serra contre le bonhomme.

Lui, il répondit en regardant le Thénardier dans le fond des yeux et en espaçant toutes les syllabes.

— Vous re-pre-nez Cosette?

— Oui, monsieur, je la reprends. Je vais vous dire. J’ai réfléchi. Au fait, je n’ai pas le droit de vous la donner. Je suis un honnête homme, voyez-vous. Cette petite n’est pas à moi, elle est à sa mère. C’est sa mère qui me l’a confiée, je ne puis la remettre qu’à sa mère. Vous me direz: Mais la mère est morte. Bon. En ce cas je ne puis rendre l’enfant qu’à une personne qui m’apporterait un écrit signé de la mère comme quoi je dois remettre l’enfant à cette personne-là. Cela est clair.

L’homme, sans répondre, fouilla dans sa poche et le Thénardier vit reparaître le portefeuille aux billets de banque.

Le gargotier eut un frémissement de joie.

— Bon! pensa-t-il, tenons-nous. Il va me corrompre!

Avant d’ouvrir le portefeuille, le voyageur jeta un coup d’œil autour de lui. Le lieu était absolument désert. Il n’y avait pas une âme dans le bois ni dans la vallée. L’homme ouvrit le portefeuille et en tira, non la poignée de billets de banque qu’attendait Thénardier, mais un simple petit papier qu’il développa et présenta tout ouvert à l’aubergiste en disant:

— Vous avez raison. Lisez.

Le Thénardier prit le papier, et lut:

«Montreuil-sur-Mer, le 25 mars 1823

«Monsieur Thénardier,

Vous remettrez Cosette à la personne.

On vous payera toutes les petites choses.

J’ai l’honneur de vous saluer avec considération.

«Fantine.»

— Vous connaissez cette signature? reprit l’homme.

C’était bien la signature de Fantine. Le Thénardier la reconnut.

Il n’y avait rien à répliquer. Il sentit deux violents dépits, le dépit de renoncer à la corruption qu’il espérait, et le dépit d’être battu. L’homme ajouta:

— Vous pouvez garder ce papier pour votre décharge.

Le Thénardier se replia en bon ordre.

— Cette signature est assez bien imitée, grommela-t-il entre ses dents. Enfin, soit!

Puis il essaya un effort désespéré.

— Monsieur, dit-il, c’est bon. Puisque vous êtes la personne. Mais il faut me payer «toutes les petites choses». On me doit gros. L’homme se dressa debout, et dit en époussetant avec des chiquenaudes sa manche râpée où il y avait de la poussière.

— Monsieur Thénardier, en janvier la mère comptait qu’elle vous devait cent vingt francs; vous lui avez envoyé en février un mémoire de cinq cents francs; vous avez reçu trois cents francs fin février et trois cents francs au commencement de mars. Il s’est écoulé depuis lors neuf mois à quinze francs, prix convenu, cela fait cent trente-cinq francs. Vous aviez reçu cent francs de trop. Reste trente-cinq francs qu’on vous doit. Je viens de vous donner quinze cents francs.

Le Thénardier éprouva ce qu’éprouve le loup au moment où il se sent mordu et saisi par la mâchoire d’acier du piège.

— Quel est ce diable d’homme? pensa-t-il.

Il fit ce que fait le loup. Il donna une secousse. L’audace lui avait déjà réussi une fois.

— Monsieur-dont-je-ne-sais-pas-le-nom, dit-il résolument et mettant cette fois les façons respectueuses de côté, je reprendrai Cosette ou vous me donnerez mille écus.

L’étranger dit tranquillement.

— Viens, Cosette.

Il prit Cosette de la main gauche, et de la droite il ramassa son bâton qui était à terre.

Le Thénardier remarqua l’énormité de la trique et la solitude du lieu.

L’homme s’enfonça dans le bois avec l’enfant, laissant le gargotier immobile et interdit.

Pendant qu’ils s’éloignaient, le Thénardier considérait ses larges épaules un peu voûtées et ses gros poings.

Puis ses yeux, revenant à lui-même, retombaient sur ses bras chétifs et sur ses mains maigres.

— Il faut que je sois vraiment bien bête, pensait-il, de n’avoir pas pris mon fusil, puisque j’allais à la chasse!

Cependant l’aubergiste ne lâcha pas prise.

— Je veux savoir où il ira, dit-il.

Et il se mit à les suivre à distance. Il lui restait deux choses dans les mains, une ironie, le chiffon de papier signé Fantine, et une consolation, les quinze cents francs.

L'homme emmenait Cosette dans la direction de Livry et de Bondy. Il marchait lentement, la tête baissée, dans une attitude de réflexion et de tristesse. L'hiver avait fait le bois à claire-voie, si bien que le Thénardier ne les perdait pas de vue, tout en restant assez loin. De temps en temps l'homme se retournait et regardait si on ne le suivait pas. Tout à coup il aperçut Thénardier. Il entra brusquement avec Cosette dans un taillis où ils pouvaient tous deux disparaître.

— Diantre! dit le Thénardier.

Et il doubla le pas.

L'épaisseur du fourré l'avait forcé de se rapprocher d'eux. Quand l'homme fut au plus épais, il se retourna. Thénardier eut beau se cacher dans les branches; il ne put faire que l'homme ne le vît pas. L'homme lui jeta un coup d'œil inquiet, puis hocha la tête et reprit sa route. L'aubergiste se remit à le suivre. Ils firent ainsi deux ou trois cents pas. Tout à coup l'homme se retourna encore. Il aperçut l'aubergiste. Cette fois il le regarda d'un air si sombre que le Thénardier jugea «inutile» d'aller plus loin. Thénardier rebroussa chemin.

Chapitre XI

Le numéro 9430 reparaît et Cosette le gagne à la loterie

Jean Valjean n’était pas mort.

En tombant à la mer, ou plutôt en s’y jetant, il était, comme on l’a vu, sans fers. Il nagea entre deux eaux jusque sous un navire au mouillage, auquel était amarrée une embarcation. Il trouva moyen de se cacher dans cette embarcation jusqu’au soir. À la nuit, il se jeta de nouveau à la nage, et atteignit la côte à peu de distance du cap Brun. Là, comme ce n’était pas l’argent qui lui manquait, il put se procurer des vêtements. Une guinguette aux environs de Balaguier était alors le vestiaire des forçats évadés, spécialité lucrative. Puis, Jean Valjean, comme tous ces tristes fugitifs qui tâchent de dépister le guet de la loi et la fatalité sociale, suivit un itinéraire obscur et ondulant. Il trouva un premier asile aux Pradeaux, près Beausset. Ensuite il se dirigea vers le Grand-Villard, près Briançon, dans les Hautes-Alpes. Fuite tâtonnante et inquiète, chemin de taupe dont les embranchements sont inconnus. On a pu, plus tard, retrouver quelque trace de son passage dans l’Ain sur le territoire de Civrieux, dans les Pyrénées, à Accons au lieu dit la Grange-de-Doumecq, près du hameau de Chavailles, et dans les environs de Périgueux, à Brunies, canton de la Chapelle-Gonaguet. Il gagna Paris. On vient de le voir à Montfermeil.

Son premier soin, en arrivant à Paris, avait été d’acheter des habits de deuil pour une petite fille de sept à huit ans, puis de se procurer un logement. Cela fait, il s’était rendu à Montfermeil.

On se souvient que déjà, lors de sa précédente évasion, il y avait fait, ou dans les environs, un voyage mystérieux dont la justice avait eu quelque lueur.

Du reste on le croyait mort, et cela épaississait l’obscurité qui s’était faite sur lui. À Paris, il lui tomba sous la main un des journaux qui enregistraient le fait. Il se sentit rassuré et presque en paix comme s’il était réellement mort.

Le soir même du jour où Jean Valjean avait tiré Cosette des griffes des Thénardier, il rentrait dans Paris. Il y rentrait à la nuit tombante, avec l’enfant, par la barrière de Monceaux. Là il monta dans un cabriolet qui le conduisit à l’esplanade de l’Observatoire. Il y descendit, paya le cocher, prit

Cosette par la main, et tous deux, dans la nuit noire, par les rues désertes qui avoisinent l’Ourcine et la Glacière, se dirigèrent vers le boulevard de l’Hôpital.

La journée avait été étrange et remplie d’émotions pour Cosette; on avait mangé derrière des haies du pain et du fromage achetés dans des gargotes isolées, on avait souvent changé de voiture, on avait fait des bouts de chemin à pied, elle ne se plaignait pas, mais elle était fatiguée, et Jean Valjean s’en aperçut à sa main qu’elle tirait davantage en marchant. Il la prit sur son dos; Cosette, sans lâcher Catherine, posa sa tête sur l’épaule de Jean Valjean, et s’y endormit.

Livre quatrième — La masure Gorbeau

Chapitre I

Maître Gorbeau

Il y a quarante ans, le promeneur solitaire qui s’aventurait dans les pays perdus de la Salpêtrière, et qui montait par le boulevard jusque vers la barrière d’Italie, arrivait à des endroits où l’on eût pu dire que Paris disparaissait. Ce n’était pas la solitude, il y avait des passants; ce n’était pas la campagne, il y avait des maisons et des rues; ce n’était pas une ville, les rues avaient des ornières comme les grandes routes et l’herbe y poussait; ce n’était pas un village, les maisons étaient trop hautes. Qu’était-ce donc? C’était un lieu habité où il n’y avait personne, c’était un lieu désert où il y avait quelqu’un; c’était un boulevard de la grande ville, une rue de Paris, plus farouche la nuit qu’une forêt, plus morne le jour qu’un cimetière.

C’était le vieux quartier du Marché-aux-Chevaux.

Ce promeneur, s’il se risquait au delà des quatre murs caducs de ce Marché-aux-Chevaux, s’il consentait même à dépasser la rue du Petit-Banquier, après avoir laissé à sa droite un courtil gardé par de hautes murailles, puis un pré où se dressaient des meules de tan pareilles à des huttes de castors gigantesques, puis un enclos encombré de bois de charpente avec des tas de souches, de sciures et de copeaux en haut desquels aboyait un gros chien, puis un long mur bas tout en ruine, avec une petite porte noire et en deuil, chargé de mousses qui s’emplissaient de fleurs au printemps, puis, au plus désert, une affreuse bâtisse décrépite sur laquelle on lisait en grosses lettres: DEFENSE D’AFFICHER, ce promeneur hasardeux atteignait l’angle de la rue des Vignes-Saint-Marcel, latitudes peu connues. Là, près d’une usine et entre deux murs de jardins, on voyait en ce temps-là une masure qui, au premier coup d’œil, semblait petite comme une chaumière et qui en réalité était grande comme une cathédrale. Elle se présentait sur la voie publique de côté, par le pignon; de là son exiguïté apparente. Presque toute la maison était cachée. On n’en apercevait que la porte et une fenêtre.

Cette masure n’avait qu’un étage.

En l’examinant, le détail qui frappait d’abord, c’est que cette porte n’avait jamais pu être que la porte d’un bouge, tandis que cette croisée, si elle eût été coupée dans la pierre de taille au lieu de l’être dans le moellon, aurait pu être la croisée d’un hôtel.

La porte n’était autre chose qu’un assemblage de planches vermoulues grossièrement reliées par des traverses pareilles à des bûches mal équarries. Elle s’ouvrait immédiatement sur un roide escalier à hautes marches, boueux, plâtreux, poudreux, de la même largeur qu’elle, qu’on voyait de la rue monter droit comme une échelle et disparaître dans l’ombre entre deux murs. Le haut de la baie informe que battait cette porte était masqué d’une volige étroite au milieu de laquelle on avait scié un jour triangulaire, tout ensemble lucarne et vasistas quand la porte était fermée. Sur le dedans de la porte un pinceau trempé dans l’encre avait tracé en deux coups de poing le chiffre 52, et au-dessus de la volige le même pinceau avait barbouillé le numéro 50; de sorte qu’on hésitait. Où est-on? Le dessus de la porte dit: au numéro 50; le dedans réplique: non, au numéro 52. On ne sait quels chiffons couleur de poussière pendaient comme des draperies au vasistas triangulaire.

La fenêtre était large, suffisamment élevée, garnie de persiennes et de châssis à grands carreaux; seulement ces grands carreaux avaient des blessures variées, à la fois cachées et trahies par un ingénieux bandage en papier, et les persiennes, disloquées et descellées, menaçaient plutôt les passants qu’elles ne gardaient les habitants. Les abat-jour horizontaux y manquaient çà et là et étaient naïvement remplacés par des planches clouées perpendiculairement; si bien que la chose commençait en persienne et finissait en volet.

Cette porte qui avait l’air immonde et cette fenêtre qui avait l’air honnête, quoique délabrée, ainsi vues sur la même maison, faisaient l’effet de deux mendiants dépareillés qui iraient ensemble et marcheraient côte à côte avec deux mines différentes sous les mêmes haillons, l’un ayant toujours été un gueux, l’autre ayant été un gentilhomme.

L’escalier menait à un corps de bâtiment très vaste qui ressemblait à un hangar dont on aurait fait une maison. Ce bâtiment avait pour tube intestinal un long corridor sur lequel s’ouvraient, à droite et à gauche, des espèces de compartiments de dimensions variées, à la rigueur logeables et plutôt semblables à des échoppes qu’à des cellules. Ces chambres prenaient jour sur des terrains vagues des environs. Tout cela était obscur, fâcheux, blafard, mélancolique, sépulcral; traversé, selon que les fentes étaient dans le toit ou dans la porte, par des rayons froids ou par des bises glacées. Une particularité intéressante et pittoresque de ce genre d'habitation, c'est l'énormité des araignées.

À gauche de la porte d'entrée, sur le boulevard, à hauteur d'homme, une lucarne qu'on avait murée faisait une niche carrée pleine de pierres que les enfants y jetaient en passant.

Une partie de ce bâtiment a été dernièrement démolie. Ce qui en reste aujourd'hui peut encore faire juger de ce qu'il a été. Le tout, dans son ensemble, n'a guère plus d'une centaine d'années. Cent ans, c'est la jeunesse d'une église et la vieillesse d'une maison. Il semble que le logis de l'homme participe de sa brièveté et le logis de Dieu de son éternité.

Les facteurs de la poste appelaient cette masure le numéro 50-52; mais elle était connue dans le quartier sous le nom de maison Gorbeau. Disons d'où lui venait cette appellation.

Les collecteurs de petits faits, qui se font des herbiers d'anecdotes et qui piquent dans leur mémoire les dates fugaces avec une épingle, savent qu'il y avait à Paris, au siècle dernier, vers 1770, deux procureurs au Châtelet, appelés, l'un Corbeau, l'autre Renard. Deux noms prévus par La Fontaine. L'occasion était trop belle pour que la basoche n'en fît point gorge chaude. Tout de suite la parodie courut, en vers quelque peu boiteux, les galeries du Palais:

Maître Corbeau, sur un dossier perché,
Tenait dans son bec une saisie exécutoire;
Maître Renard, par l'odeur alléché,
Lui fit à peu près cette histoire:
Hé bonjour! etc.

Les deux honnêtes praticiens, gênés par les quolibets et contrariés dans leur port de tête par les éclats de rire qui les suivaient, résolurent de se débarrasser de leurs noms et prirent le parti de s'adresser au roi. La requête fut présentée à Louis XV le jour même où le nonce du pape, d'un côté, et le cardinal de La Roche-Aymon, de l'autre, dévotement agenouillés tous les deux, chaussèrent, en présence de sa majesté, chacun d'une pantoufle les deux pieds nus de madame Du Barry sortant du lit. Le roi, qui riait, continua de rire, passa gaîment des deux évêques aux deux procureurs, et fit à ces robins grâce de leurs noms, ou à peu près. Il fut permis, de par le roi, à maître Corbeau d'ajouter une queue à son initiale et de se nommer Gorbeau; maître Renard fut moins heureux, il ne put obtenir que de mettre un P devant son R et de s’appeler Prenard; si bien que le deuxième nom n’était guère moins ressemblant que le premier.

Or, selon la tradition locale, ce maître Gorbeau avait été propriétaire de la bâtisse numérotée 50-52 boulevard de l’Hôpital. Il était même l’auteur de la fenêtre monumentale. De là à cette masure le nom de maison Gorbeau.

Vis-à-vis le numéro 50-52 se dresse, parmi les plantations du boulevard, un grand orme aux trois quarts mort; presque en face s’ouvre la rue de la barrière des Gobelins, rue alors sans maisons, non pavée, plantée d’arbres mal venus, verte ou fangeuse selon la saison, qui allait aboutir carrément au mur d’enceinte de Paris. Une odeur de couperose sort par bouffées des toits d’une fabrique voisine.

La barrière était tout près. En 1823, le mur d’enceinte existait encore.

Cette barrière elle-même jetait dans l’esprit des figures funestes. C’était le chemin de Bicêtre. C’est par là que, sous l’Empire et la Restauration, rentraient à Paris les condamnés à mort le jour de leur exécution. C’est là que fut commis vers 1829 ce mystérieux assassinat dit «de la barrière de Fontainebleau» dont la justice n’a pu découvrir les auteurs, problème funèbre qui n’a pas été éclairci, énigme effroyable qui n’a pas été ouverte. Faites quelques pas, vous trouvez cette fatale rue Croulebarbe où Ulbach poignarda la chevrière d’Ivry au bruit du tonnerre, comme dans un mélodrame. Quelques pas encore, et vous arrivez aux abominables ormes étêtés de la barrière Saint-Jacques, cet expédient des philanthropes cachant l’échafaud, cette mesquine et honteuse place de Grève d’une société boutiquière et bourgeoise, qui a reculé devant la peine de mort, n’osant ni l’abolir avec grandeur, ni la maintenir avec autorité.

Il y a trente-sept ans, en laissant à part cette place Saint-Jacques qui était comme prédestinée et qui a toujours été horrible, le point le plus morne peut-être de tout ce morne boulevard était l’endroit, si peu attrayant encore aujourd’hui, où l’on rencontrait la masure 50-52.

Les maisons bourgeoises n’ont commencé à poindre là que vingt-cinq ans plus tard. Le lieu était morose. Aux idées funèbres qui vous y saisissaient, on se sentait entre la Salpêtrière dont on entrevoyait le dôme et Bicêtre dont on touchait la barrière; c’est-à-dire entre la folie de la femme et la folie de l’homme. Si loin que la vue pût s’étendre, on n’apercevait que les abattoirs, le mur d’enceinte et quelques rares façades d’usines, pareilles à des casernes ou à des monastères; partout des baraques et des plâtras, de vieux murs noirs comme des linceuls, des murs neufs blancs comme des suaires; partout des rangées d’arbres parallèles, des bâtisses tirées au cordeau, des constructions plates, de longues lignes froides, et la tristesse lugubre des angles droits. Pas un accident de terrain, pas un caprice d’architecture, pas un pli. C’était un ensemble glacial, régulier, hideux. Rien ne serre le cœur comme la symétrie. C’est que la symétrie, c’est l’ennui, et l’ennui est le fond même du deuil. Le désespoir bâille. On peut rêver quelque chose de plus terrible qu’un enfer où l’on souffre, c’est un enfer où l’on s’ennuierait. Si cet enfer existait, ce morceau du boulevard de l’Hôpital en eût pu être l’avenue.

Cependant, à la nuit tombante, au moment où la clarté s’en va, l’hiver surtout, à l’heure où la bise crépusculaire arrache aux ormes leurs dernières feuilles rousses, quand l’ombre est profonde et sans étoiles, ou quand la lune et le vent font des trous dans les nuages, ce boulevard devenait tout à coup effrayant. Les lignes droites s’enfonçaient et se perdaient dans les ténèbres comme des tronçons de l’infini. Le passant ne pouvait s’empêcher de songer aux innombrables traditions patibulaires du lieu. La solitude de cet endroit où il s’était commis tant de crimes avait quelque chose d’affreux. On croyait pressentir des pièges dans cette obscurité, toutes les formes confuses de l’ombre paraissaient suspectes, et les longs creux carrés qu’on apercevait entre chaque arbre semblaient des fosses. Le jour, c’était laid; le soir, c’était lugubre; la nuit, c’était sinistre.

L’été, au crépuscule, on voyait çà et là quelques vieilles femmes, assises au pied des ormes sur des bancs moisis par les pluies. Ces bonnes vieilles mendiaient volontiers.

Du reste ce quartier, qui avait plutôt l’air suranné qu’antique, tendait dès lors à se transformer. Dès cette époque, qui voulait le voir devait se hâter. Chaque jour quelque détail de cet ensemble s’en allait. Aujourd’hui, et depuis vingt ans, l’embarcadère du chemin de fer d’Orléans est là, à côté du vieux faubourg, et le travaille. Partout où l’on place, sur la lisière d’une capitale, l’embarcadère d’un chemin de fer, c’est la mort d’un faubourg et la naissance d’une ville. Il semble qu’autour de ces grands centres du mouvement des peuples, au roulement de ces puissantes machines, au souffle de ces monstrueux chevaux de la civilisation qui mangent du charbon et vomissent du feu, la terre pleine de germes tremble et s’ouvre pour engloutir les anciennes demeures des hommes et laisser sortir les nouvelles. Les vieilles maisons croulent, les maisons neuves montent.

Depuis que la gare du railway d’Orléans a envahi les terrains de la Salpêtrière, les antiques rues étroites qui avoisinent les fossés Saint-Victor et le Jardin des Plantes s’ébranlent, violemment traversées trois ou quatre fois chaque jour par ces courants de diligences, de fiacres et d’omnibus qui, dans un temps donné, refoulent les maisons à droite et à gauche; car il y a des choses bizarres à énoncer qui sont rigoureusement exactes, et de même qu’il est vrai de dire que dans les grandes villes le soleil fait végéter et croître les façades des maisons au midi, il est certain que le passage fréquent des voitures élargit les rues. Les symptômes d’une vie nouvelle sont évidents. Dans ce vieux quartier provincial, aux recoins les plus sauvages, le pavé se montre, les trottoirs commencent à ramper et à s’allonger, même là où il n’y a pas encore de passants. Un matin, matin mémorable, en juillet 1845, on y vit tout à coup fumer les marmites noires du bitume; ce jour-là on put dire que la civilisation était arrivée rue de Lourcine et que Paris était entré dans le faubourg Saint-Marceau.

Chapitre II

Nid pour hibou et fauvette

Ce fut devant cette masure Gorbeau que Jean Valjean s’arrêta. Comme les oiseaux fauves, il avait choisi le lieu le plus désert pour y faire son nid.

Il fouilla dans son gilet, y prit une sorte de passe-partout, ouvrit la porte, entra, puis la referma avec soin, et monta l’escalier, portant toujours Cosette.

Au haut de l’escalier, il tira de sa poche une autre clef avec laquelle il ouvrit une autre porte. La chambre où il entra et qu’il referma sur-le-champ était une espèce de galetas assez spacieux meublé d’un matelas posé à terre, d’une table et de quelques chaises. Un poêle allumé et dont on voyait la braise était dans un coin. Le réverbère du boulevard éclairait vaguement cet intérieur pauvre. Au fond il y avait un cabinet avec un lit de sangle. Jean Valjean porta l’enfant sur ce lit et l’y déposa sans qu’elle s’éveillât.

Il battit le briquet, et alluma une chandelle; tout cela était préparé d’avance sur la table; et, comme il l’avait fait la veille, il se mit à considérer Cosette d’un regard plein d’extase où l’expression de la bonté et de l’attendrissement allait presque jusqu’à l’égarement. La petite fille, avec cette confiance tranquille qui n’appartient qu’à l’extrême force et qu’à l’extrême faiblesse, s’était endormie sans savoir avec qui elle était, et continuait de dormir sans savoir où elle était.

Jean Valjean se courba et baisa la main de cette enfant.

Neuf mois auparavant il baisait la main de la mère qui, elle aussi, venait de s’endormir.

Le même sentiment douloureux, religieux, poignant, lui remplissait le cœur.

Il s’agenouilla près du lit de Cosette.

Il faisait grand jour que l’enfant dormait encore. Un rayon pâle du soleil de décembre traversait la croisée du galetas et traînait sur le plafond de longs filandres d’ombre et de lumière. Tout à coup une charrette de cartier, lourdement chargée, qui passait sur la chaussée du boulevard, ébranla la baraque comme un roulement d’orage et la fit trembler du haut en bas.

— Oui, madame! cria Cosette réveillée en sursaut, voilà! voilà!

Et elle se jeta à bas du lit, les paupières encore à demi fermées par la pesanteur du sommeil, étendant le bras vers l’angle du mur.

— Ah! mon Dieu! mon balai! dit-elle.

Elle ouvrit tout à fait les yeux, et vit le visage souriant de Jean Valjean.

— Ah! tiens, c’est vrai! dit l’enfant. Bonjour, monsieur.

Les enfants acceptent tout de suite et familièrement la joie et le bonheur, étant eux-mêmes naturellement bonheur et joie.

Cosette aperçut Catherine au pied de son lit, et s’en empara, et, tout en jouant, elle faisait cent questions à Jean Valjean. — Où elle était? Si c’était grand, Paris? Si madame Thénardier était bien loin? Si elle ne reviendrait pas? etc., etc. Tout à coup elle s’écria: — Comme c’est joli ici! C’était un affreux taudis; mais elle se sentait libre.

— Faut-il que je balaye? reprit-elle enfin.

— Joue, dit Jean Valjean.

La journée se passa ainsi. Cosette, sans s’inquiéter de rien comprendre, était inexprimablement heureuse entre cette poupée et ce bonhomme.

Chapitre III

Deux malheurs mêlés font du bonheur

Le lendemain au point du jour, Jean Valjean était encore près du lit de Cosette. Il attendit là, immobile, et il la regarda se réveiller.

Quelque chose de nouveau lui entrait dans l’âme.

Jean Valjean n’avait jamais rien aimé. Depuis vingt-cinq ans il était seul au monde. Il n’avait jamais été père, amant, mari, ami. Au bagne il était mauvais, sombre, chaste, ignorant et farouche. Le cœur de ce vieux forçat était plein de virginités. Sa sœur et les enfants de sa sœur ne lui avaient laissé qu’un souvenir vague et lointain qui avait fini par s’évanouir presque entièrement. Il avait fait tous ses efforts pour les retrouver, et, n’ayant pu les retrouver, il les avait oubliés. La nature humaine est ainsi faite. Les autres émotions tendres de sa jeunesse, s’il en avait, étaient tombées dans un abîme.

Quand il vit Cosette, quand il l’eut prise, emportée et délivrée, il sentit se remuer ses entrailles. Tout ce qu’il y avait de passionné et d’affectueux en lui s’éveilla et se précipita vers cet enfant. Il allait près du lit où elle dormait, et il y tremblait de joie; il éprouvait des épreintes comme une mère et il ne savait ce que c’était; car c’est une chose bien obscure et bien douce que ce grand et étrange mouvement d’un cœur qui se met à aimer.

Pauvre vieux cœur tout neuf!

Seulement, comme il avait cinquante-cinq ans et que Cosette en avait huit, tout ce qu’il aurait pu avoir d’amour dans toute sa vie se fondit en une sorte de lueur ineffable.

C’était la deuxième apparition blanche qu’il rencontrait. L’évêque avait fait lever à son horizon l’aube de la vertu; Cosette y faisait lever l’aube de l’amour.

Les premiers jours s’écoulèrent dans cet éblouissement.

De son côté, Cosette, elle aussi, devenait autre, à son insu, pauvre petit être! Elle était si petite quand sa mère l’avait quittée qu’elle ne s’en souvenait plus. Comme tous les enfants, pareils aux jeunes pousses de la vigne qui s’accrochent à tout, elle avait essayé d’aimer. Elle n’y avait pu réussir. Tous l’avaient repoussée, les Thénardier, leurs enfants, d’autres enfants. Elle avait aimé le chien, qui était mort. Après quoi, rien n’avait voulu d’elle, ni personne. Chose lugubre à dire, et que nous avons déjà indiquée, à huit ans elle avait le cœur froid. Ce n’était pas sa faute, ce n’était point la faculté d’aimer qui lui manquait; hélas! c’était la possibilité. Aussi, dès le premier jour, tout ce qui sentait et songeait en elle se mit à aimer ce bonhomme. Elle éprouvait ce qu’elle n’avait jamais ressenti, une sensation d’épanouissement.

Le bonhomme ne lui faisait même plus l’effet d’être vieux, ni d’être pauvre. Elle trouvait Jean Valjean beau, de même qu’elle trouvait le taudis joli.

Ce sont là des effets d’aurore, d’enfance, de jeunesse, de joie. La nouveauté de la terre et de la vie y est pour quelque chose. Rien n’est charmant comme le reflet colorant du bonheur sur le grenier. Nous avons tous ainsi dans notre passé un galetas bleu.

La nature, cinquante ans d’intervalle, avaient mis une séparation profonde entre Jean Valjean et Cosette; cette séparation, la destinée la combla. La destinée unit brusquement et fiança avec son irrésistible puissance ces deux existences déracinées, différentes par l’âge, semblables par le deuil. L’une en effet complétait l’autre. L’instinct de Cosette cherchait un père comme l’instinct de Jean Valjean cherchait un enfant. Se rencontrer, ce fut se trouver. Au moment mystérieux où leurs deux mains se touchèrent, elles se soudèrent. Quand ces deux âmes s’aperçurent, elles se reconnurent comme étant le besoin l’une de l’autre et s’embrassèrent étroitement.

En prenant les mots dans leur sens le plus compréhensif et le plus absolu, on pourrait dire que, séparés de tout par des murs de tombe, Jean Valjean était le Veuf comme Cosette était l’Orpheline. Cette situation fit que Jean Valjean devint d’une façon céleste le père de Cosette.

Et, en vérité, l’impression mystérieuse produite à Cosette, au fond du bois de Chelles, par la main de Jean Valjean saisissant la sienne dans l’obscurité, n’était pas une illusion, mais une réalité. L’entrée de cet homme dans la destinée de cet enfant avait été l’arrivée de Dieu.

Du reste, Jean Valjean avait bien choisi son asile. Il était là dans une sécurité qui pouvait sembler entière.

La chambre à cabinet qu’il occupait avec Cosette était celle dont la fenêtre donnait sur le boulevard. Cette fenêtre étant unique dans la maison, aucun regard de voisin n’était à craindre, pas plus de côté qu’en face.

Le rez-de-chaussée du numéro 50-52, espèce d’appentis délabré, servait de remise à des maraîchers, et n’avait aucune communication avec le premier. Il en était séparé par le plancher qui n’avait ni trappe ni escalier et qui était comme le diaphragme de la masure. Le premier étage contenait, comme nous l’avons dit, plusieurs chambres et quelques greniers, dont un seulement était occupé par une vieille femme qui faisait le ménage de Jean Valjean. Tout le reste était inhabité.

C’était cette vieille femme, ornée du nom de principale locataire et en réalité chargée des fonctions de portière, qui lui avait loué ce logis dans la journée de Noël. Il s’était donné à elle pour un rentier ruiné par les bons d’Espagne, qui allait venir demeurer là avec sa petite-fille. Il avait payé six mois d’avance et chargé la vieille de meubler la chambre et le cabinet comme on a vu. C’était cette bonne femme qui avait allumé le poêle et tout préparé le soir de leur arrivée.

Les semaines se succédèrent. Ces deux êtres menaient dans ce taudis misérable une existence heureuse.

Dès l’aube Cosette riait, jasait, chantait. Les enfants ont leur chant du matin comme les oiseaux.

Il arrivait quelquefois que Jean Valjean lui prenait sa petite main rouge et crevassée d’engelures et la baisait. La pauvre enfant, accoutumée à être battue, ne savait ce que cela voulait dire, et s’en allait toute honteuse.

Par moments elle devenait sérieuse et elle considérait sa petite robe noire. Cosette n’était plus en guenilles, elle était en deuil. Elle sortait de la misère et elle entrait dans la vie.

Jean Valjean s’était mis à lui enseigner à lire. Parfois, tout en faisant épeler l’enfant, il songeait que c’était avec l’idée de faire le mal qu’il avait appris à lire au bagne. Cette idée avait tourné à montrer à lire à un enfant. Alors le vieux galérien souriait du sourire pensif des anges.

Il sentait là une préméditation d’en haut, une volonté de quelqu’un qui n’est pas l’homme, et il se perdait dans la rêverie. Les bonnes pensées ont leurs abîmes comme les mauvaises.

Apprendre à lire à Cosette, et la laisser jouer, c’était à peu près là toute la vie de Jean Valjean. Et puis il lui parlait de sa mère et il la faisait prier. Elle l’appelait: père, et ne lui savait pas d’autre nom.

Il passait des heures à la contempler, habillant et déshabillant sa poupée, et à l’écouter gazouiller. La vie lui paraissait désormais pleine d’intérêt, les hommes lui semblaient bons et justes, il ne reprochait dans sa pensée plus rien à personne, il n’apercevait aucune raison de ne pas vieillir très vieux maintenant que cette enfant l’aimait. Il se voyait tout un avenir éclairé par

Cosette comme par une charmante lumière. Les meilleurs ne sont pas exempts d'une pensée égoïste. Par moments il songeait avec une sorte de joie qu'elle serait laide.

Ceci n'est qu'une opinion personnelle; mais pour dire notre pensée tout entière, au point où en était Jean Valjean quand il se mit à aimer Cosette, il ne nous est pas prouvé qu'il n'ait pas eu besoin de ce ravitaillement pour persévérer dans le bien. Il venait de voir sous de nouveaux aspects la méchanceté des hommes et la misère de la société, aspects incomplets et qui ne montraient fatalement qu'un côté du vrai, le sort de la femme résumé dans Fantine, l'autorité publique personnifiée dans Javert; il était retourné au bagne, cette fois pour avoir bien fait; de nouvelles amertumes l'avaient abreuvé; le dégoût et la lassitude le reprenaient; le souvenir même de l'évêque touchait peut-être à quelque moment d'éclipse, sauf à reparaître plus tard lumineux et triomphant; mais enfin ce souvenir sacré s'affaiblissait. Qui sait si Jean Valjean n'était pas à la veille de se décourager et de retomber? Il aima, et il redevint fort. Hélas! il n'était guère moins chancelant que Cosette. Il la protégea et elle l'affermit. Grâce à lui, elle put marcher dans la vie; grâce à elle, il put continuer dans la vertu. Il fut le soutien de cet enfant et cet enfant fut son point d'appui. O mystère insondable et divin des équilibres de la destinée!

Chapitre IV

Les remarques de la principale locataire

Jean Valjean avait la prudence de ne sortir jamais le jour. Tous les soirs, au crépuscule, il se promenait une heure ou deux, quelquefois seul, souvent avec Cosette, cherchant les contre-allées du boulevard les plus solitaires, ou entrant dans les églises à la tombée de la nuit. Il allait volontiers à Saint-Médard qui est l'église la plus proche. Quand il n'emmenait pas Cosette, elle restait avec la vieille femme; mais c'était la joie de l'enfant de sortir avec le bonhomme. Elle préférait une heure avec lui même aux tête-à-tête ravissants de Catherine. Il marchait en la tenant par la main et en lui disant des choses douces.

Il se trouva que Cosette était très gaie.

La vieille faisait le ménage et la cuisine et allait aux provisions.

Ils vivaient sobrement, ayant toujours un peu de feu, mais comme des gens très gênés. Jean Valjean n'avait rien changé au mobilier du premier jour; seulement il avait fait remplacer par une porte pleine la porte vitrée du cabinet de Cosette.

Il avait toujours sa redingote jaune, sa culotte noire et son vieux chapeau. Dans la rue on le prenait pour un pauvre. Il arrivait quelquefois que des bonnes femmes se retournaient et lui donnaient un sou. Jean Valjean recevait le sou et saluait profondément. Il arrivait aussi parfois qu'il rencontrait quelque misérable demandant la charité, alors il regardait derrière lui si personne ne le voyait, s'approchait furtivement du malheureux, lui mettait dans la main une pièce de monnaie, souvent une pièce d'argent, et s'éloignait rapidement. Cela avait ses inconvénients. On commençait à le connaître dans le quartier sous le nom du mendiant qui fait l'aumône. La vieille principale locataire, créature rechignée, toute pétrie vis-à-vis du prochain de l'attention des envieux, examinait beaucoup Jean Valjean, sans qu'il s'en doutât. Elle était un peu sourde, ce qui la rendait bavarde. Il lui restait de son passé deux dents, l'une en haut, l'autre en bas, qu'elle cognait toujours l'une contre l'autre. Elle avait fait des questions à Cosette qui, ne sachant rien, n'avait pu rien dire, sinon qu'elle venait de Montfermeil. Un matin, cette guetteuse aperçut Jean Valjean qui entrait, d'un air qui sembla à la commère particulier, dans un des compartiments inhabités de la masure. Elle le suivit du pas d’une vieille chatte, et put l’observer, sans en être vue, par la fente de la porte qui était tout contre. Jean Valjean, pour plus de précaution sans doute, tournait le dos à cette porte. La vieille le vit fouiller dans sa poche et y prendre un étui, des ciseaux et du fil, puis il se mit à découdre la doublure d’un pan de sa redingote et il tira de l’ouverture un morceau de papier jaunâtre qu’il déplia. La vieille reconnut avec épouvante que c’était un billet de mille francs. C’était le second ou le troisième qu’elle voyait depuis qu’elle était au monde. Elle s’enfuit très effrayée.

Un moment après, Jean Valjean l’aborda et la pria d’aller lui changer ce billet de mille francs, ajoutant que c’était le semestre de sa rente qu’il avait touché la veille. — Où? pensa la vieille. Il n’est sorti qu’à six heures du soir, et la caisse du gouvernement n’est certainement pas ouverte à cette heure-là. La vieille alla changer le billet et fit ses conjectures. Ce billet de mille francs, commenté et multiplié, produisit une foule de conversations effarées parmi les commères de la rue des Vignes-Saint-Marcel.

Les jours suivants, il arriva que Jean Valjean, en manches de veste, scia du bois dans le corridor. La vieille était dans la chambre et faisait le ménage. Elle était seule, Cosette étant occupée à admirer le bois qu’on sciait, la vieille vit la redingote accrochée à un clou, et la scruta: la doublure avait été recousue. La bonne femme la palpa attentivement, et crut sentir dans les pans et dans les entournures des épaisseurs de papier. D’autres billets de mille francs sans doute! Elle remarqua en outre qu’il y avait toutes sortes de choses dans les poches, non seulement les aiguilles, les ciseaux et le fil qu’elle avait vus, mais un gros portefeuille, un très grand couteau, et, détail suspect, plusieurs perruques de couleurs variées. Chaque poche de cette redingote avait l’air d’être une façon d’en-cas pour des événements imprévus.

Les habitants de la masure atteignirent ainsi les derniers jours de l’hiver.

Chapitre V

Une pièce de cinq francs qui tombe à terre fait du bruit

Il y avait près de Saint-Médard un pauvre qui s'accroupissait sur la margelle d'un puits banal condamné, et auquel Jean Valjean faisait volontiers la charité. Il ne passait guère devant cet homme sans lui donner quelques sous. Parfois il lui parlait. Les envieux de ce mendiant disaient qu'il était de la police. C'était un vieux bedeau de soixante-quinze ans qui marmottait continuellement des oraisons.

Un soir que Jean Valjean passait par là, il n'avait pas Cosette avec lui, il aperçut le mendiant à sa place ordinaire sous le réverbère qu'on venait d'allumer. Cet homme, selon son habitude, semblait prier et était tout courbé. Jean Valjean alla à lui et lui mit dans la main son aumône accoutumée. Le mendiant leva brusquement les yeux, regarda fixement Jean Valjean, puis baissa rapidement la tête. Ce mouvement fut comme un éclair, Jean Valjean eut un tressaillement. Il lui sembla qu'il venait d'entrevoir, à la lueur du réverbère, non le visage placide et béat du vieux bedeau, mais une figure effrayante et connue. Il eut l'impression qu'on aurait en se trouvant tout à coup dans l'ombre face à face avec un tigre. Il recula terrifié et pétrifié, n'osant ni respirer, ni parler, ni rester, ni fuir, considérant le mendiant qui avait baissé sa tête couverte d'une loque et paraissait ne plus savoir qu'il était là. Dans ce moment étrange, un instinct, peut-être l'instinct mystérieux de la conservation, fit que Jean Valjean ne prononça pas une parole. Le mendiant avait la même taille, les mêmes guenilles, la même apparence que tous les jours. — Bah!... dit Jean Valjean, je suis fou! je rêve! impossible! — Et il rentra profondément troublé.

C'est à peine s'il osait s'avouer à lui-même que cette figure qu'il avait cru voir était la figure de Javert.

La nuit, en y réfléchissant, il regretta de n'avoir pas questionné l'homme pour le forcer à lever la tête une seconde fois.

Le lendemain à la nuit tombante il y retourna. Le mendiant était à sa place. — Bonjour, bonhomme, dit résolument Jean Valjean en lui donnant un sou. Le mendiant leva la tête, et répondit d'une voix dolente: — Merci, mon bon monsieur. — C'était bien le vieux bedeau. Jean Valjean se sentit pleinement rassuré. Il se mit à rire. — Où diable ai-je été voir là Javert?

pensa-t-il. Ah çà, est-ce que je vais avoir la berlue à présent? — Il n’y songea plus.

Quelques jours après, il pouvait être huit heures du soir, il était dans sa chambre et il faisait épeler Cosette à haute voix, il entendit ouvrir, puis refermer la porte de la masure. Cela lui parut singulier. La vieille, qui seule habitait avec lui la maison, se couchait toujours à la nuit pour ne point user de chandelle. Jean Valjean fit signe à Cosette de se taire. Il entendit qu’on montait l’escalier. À la rigueur ce pouvait être la vieille qui avait pu se trouver malade et aller chez l’apothicaire. Jean Valjean écouta. Le pas était lourd et sonnait comme le pas d’un homme; mais la vieille portait de gros souliers et rien ne ressemble au pas d’un homme comme le pas d’une vieille femme. Cependant Jean Valjean souffla sa chandelle.

Il avait envoyé Cosette au lit en lui disant tout bas: — Couche-toi bien doucement; et, pendant qu’il la baisait au front, les pas s’étaient arrêtés. Jean Valjean demeura en silence, immobile, le dos tourné à la porte, assis sur sa chaise dont il n’avait pas bougé, retenant son souffle dans l’obscurité. Au bout d’un temps assez long, n’entendant plus rien, il se retourna sans faire de bruit, et, comme il levait les yeux vers la porte de sa chambre, il vit une lumière par le trou de la serrure. Cette lumière faisait une sorte d’étoile sinistre dans le noir de la porte et du mur. Il y avait évidemment là quelqu’un qui tenait une chandelle à la main, et qui écoutait. Quelques minutes s’écoulèrent, et la lumière s’en alla. Seulement il n’entendit plus aucun bruit de pas, ce qui semblait indiquer que celui qui était venu écouter à la porte avait ôté ses souliers.

Jean Valjean se jeta tout habillé sur son lit et ne put fermer l’œil de la nuit.

Au point du jour, comme il s’assoupissait de fatigue, il fut réveillé par le grincement d’une porte qui s’ouvrait à quelque mansarde du fond du corridor, puis il entendit le même pas d’homme qui avait monté l’escalier la veille. Le pas s’approchait. Il se jeta à bas du lit et appliqua son œil au trou de sa serrure, lequel était assez grand, espérant voir au passage l’être quelconque qui s’était introduit la nuit dans la masure et qui avait écouté à sa porte. C’était un homme en effet qui passa, cette fois sans s’arrêter, devant la chambre de Jean Valjean. Le corridor était encore trop obscur pour qu’on pût distinguer son visage; mais quand l’homme arriva à l’escalier, un rayon de la lumière du dehors le fit saillir comme une silhouette, et Jean Valjean le vit de dos complètement. L’homme était de haute taille, vêtu d'une redingote longue, avec un gourdin sous son bras. C'était l'encolure formidable de Javert.

Jean Valjean aurait pu essayer de le revoir par sa fenêtre sur le boulevard. Mais il eût fallu ouvrir cette fenêtre, il n'osa pas.

Il était évident que cet homme était entré avec une clef, et comme chez lui. Qui lui avait donné cette clef? qu'est-ce que cela voulait dire?

À sept heures du matin, quand la vieille vint faire le ménage, Jean Valjean lui jeta un coup d'œil pénétrant, mais il ne l'interrogea pas. La bonne femme était comme à l'ordinaire.

Tout en balayant, elle lui dit: — Monsieur a peut-être entendu quelqu'un qui entrait cette nuit?

À cet âge et sur ce boulevard, huit heures du soir, c'est la nuit la plus noire.

— À propos, c'est vrai, répondit-il de l'accent le plus naturel. Qui était-ce donc?

— C'est un nouveau locataire, dit la vieille, qu'il y a dans la maison.

— Et qui s'appelle?

— Je ne sais plus trop. Monsieur Dumont ou Daumont. Un nom comme cela.

— Et qu'est-ce qu'il est, ce monsieur Dumont.

La vieille le considéra avec ses petits yeux de fouine, et répondit:

— Un rentier, comme vous.

Elle n'avait peut-être aucune intention. Jean Valjean crut lui en démêler une.

Quant la vieille fut partie, il fit un rouleau d'une centaine de francs qu'il avait dans une armoire et le mit dans sa poche. Quelque précaution qu'il prit dans cette opération pour qu'on ne l'entendît pas remuer de l'argent, une pièce de cent sous lui échappa des mains et roula bruyamment sur le carreau.

À la brune, il descendit et regarda avec attention de tous les côtés sur le boulevard. Il n'y vit personne. Le boulevard semblait absolument désert. Il est vrai qu'on peut s'y cacher derrière les arbres.

Il remonta.

— Viens, dit-il à Cosette.

Il la prit par la main, et ils sortirent tous deux.

Livre cinquième — À chasse noire, meute muette

Chapitre I

Les zigzags de la stratégie

Ici, pour les pages qu'on va lire et pour d'autres encore qu'on rencontrera plus tard, une observation est nécessaire.

Voilà bien des années déjà que l'auteur de ce livre, forcé, à regret, de parler de lui, est absent de Paris. Depuis qu'il l'a quitté, Paris s'est transformé. Une ville nouvelle a surgi qui lui est en quelque sorte inconnue. Il n'a pas besoin de dire qu'il aime Paris; Paris est la ville natale de son esprit. Par suite des démolitions et des reconstructions, le Paris de sa jeunesse, ce Paris qu'il a religieusement emporté dans sa mémoire, est à cette heure un Paris d'autrefois. Qu'on lui permette de parler de ce Paris-là comme s'il existait encore. Il est possible que là où l'auteur va conduire les lecteurs en disant: «Dans telle rue il y a telle maison», il n'y ait plus aujourd'hui ni maison ni rue. Les lecteurs vérifieront, s'ils veulent en prendre la peine. Quant à lui, il ignore le Paris nouveau, et il écrit avec le Paris ancien devant les yeux dans une illusion qui lui est précieuse. C'est une douceur pour lui de rêver qu'il reste derrière lui quelque chose de ce qu'il voyait quand il était dans son pays, et que tout ne s'est pas évanoui. Tant qu'on va et vient dans le pays natal, on s'imagine que ces rues vous sont indifférentes, que ces fenêtres, ces toits et ces portes ne vous sont de rien, que ces murs vous sont étrangers, que ces arbres sont les premiers arbres venus, que ces maisons où l'on n'entre pas vous sont inutiles, que ces pavés où l'on marche sont des pierres. Plus tard, quand on n'y est plus, on s'aperçoit que ces rues vous sont chères, que ces toits, ces fenêtres et ces portes vous manquent, que ces murailles vous sont nécessaires, que ces arbres sont vos bien-aimés, que ces maisons où l'on n'entrait pas on y entrait tous les jours, et qu'on a laissé de ses entrailles, de son sang et de son cœur dans ces pavés. Tous ces lieux qu'on ne voit plus, qu'on ne reverra jamais peut-être, et dont on a gardé l'image, prennent un charme douloureux, vous reviennent avec la mélancolie d'une apparition, vous font la terre sainte visible, et sont, pour ainsi dire, la forme même de la France; et on les aime et on les invoque tels qu'ils sont, tels qu'ils étaient, et l'on s'y obstine, et l'on n'y veut rien changer, car on tient à la figure de la patrie comme au visage de sa mère.

Qu’il nous soit donc permis de parler du passé au présent. Cela dit, nous prions le lecteur d’en tenir note, et nous continuons.

Jean Valjean avait tout de suite quitté le boulevard et s’était engagé dans les rues, faisant le plus de lignes brisées qu’il pouvait, revenant quelquefois brusquement sur ses pas pour s’assurer qu’il n’était point suivi.

Cette manœuvre est propre au cerf traqué. Sur les terrains où la trace peut s’imprimer, cette manœuvre a, entre autres avantages, celui de tromper les chasseurs et les chiens par le contre-pied. C’est ce qu’en vénerie on appelle faux rembuchement.

C’était une nuit de pleine lune. Jean Valjean n’en fut pas fâché. La lune, encore très près de l’horizon, coupait dans les rues de grands pans d’ombre et de lumière. Jean Valjean pouvait se glisser le long des maisons et des murs dans le côté sombre et observer le côté clair. Il ne réfléchissait peut-être pas assez que le côté obscur lui échappait. Pourtant, dans toutes les ruelles désertes qui avoisinent la rue de Poliveau, il crut être certain que personne ne venait derrière lui.

Cosette marchait sans faire de questions. Les souffrances des six premières années de sa vie avaient introduit quelque chose de passif dans sa nature. D’ailleurs, et c’est là une remarque sur laquelle nous aurons plus d’une occasion de revenir, elle était habituée, sans trop s’en rendre compte, aux singularités du bonhomme et aux bizarreries de la destinée. Et puis elle se sentait en sûreté, étant avec lui.

Jean Valjean, pas plus que Cosette, ne savait où il allait. Il se confiait à Dieu comme elle se confiait à lui. Il lui semblait qu’il tenait, lui aussi, quelqu’un de plus grand que lui par la main; il croyait sentir un être qui le menait, invisible. Du reste il n’avait aucune idée arrêtée, aucun plan, aucun projet. Il n’était même pas absolument sûr que ce fût Javert, et puis ce pouvait être Javert sans que Javert sût que c’était lui Jean Valjean. N’était-il pas déguisé? ne le croyait-on pas mort? Cependant depuis quelques jours il se passait des choses qui devenaient singulières. Il ne lui en fallait pas davantage. Il était déterminé à ne plus rentrer dans la maison Gorbeau. Comme l’animal chassé du gîte, il cherchait un trou où se cacher, en attendant qu’il en trouvât un où se loger.

Jean Valjean décrivit plusieurs labyrinthes variés dans le quartier Mouffetard, déjà endormi comme s’il avait encore la discipline du moyen âge et le joug du couvre-feu; il combina de diverses façons, dans des stratégies savantes, la rue Censier et la rue Copeau, la rue du Battoir-Saint-

Victor et la rue du Puits-l'Ermite. Il y a par là des logeurs, mais il n'y entrait même pas, ne trouvant point ce qui lui convenait. Par exemple, il ne doutait pas que, si, par hasard, on avait cherché sa piste, on ne l'eût perdue.

Comme onze heures sonnaient à Saint-Etienne-du-Mont, il traversait la rue de Pontoise devant le bureau du commissaire de police qui est au no 14. Quelques instants après, l'instinct dont nous parlions plus haut fit qu'il se retourna. En ce moment, il vit distinctement, grâce à la lanterne du commissaire qui les trahissait, trois hommes qui le suivaient d'assez près passer successivement sous cette lanterne dans le côté ténébreux de la rue. L'un de ces trois hommes entra dans l'allée de la maison du commissaire. Celui qui marchait en tête lui parut décidément suspect. — Viens, enfant, dit-il à Cosette, et il se hâta de quitter la rue de Pontoise.

Il fit un circuit, tourna le passage des Patriarches qui était fermé à cause de l'heure, arpenta la rue de l'Épée-de-Bois et la rue de l'Arbalète et s'enfonça dans la rue des Postes.

Il y a là un carrefour, où est aujourd'hui le collège Rollin et où vient s'embrancher la rue Neuve-Sainte-Geneviève.

(Il va sans dire que la rue Neuve-Sainte-Geneviève est une vieille rue, et qu'il ne passe pas une chaise de poste tous les dix ans rue des Postes. Cette rue des Postes était au treizième siècle habitée par des potiers et son vrai nom est rue des Pots.)

La lune jetait une vive lumière dans ce carrefour. Jean Valjean s'embusqua sous une porte, calculant que si ces hommes le suivaient encore, il ne pourrait manquer de les très bien voir lorsqu'ils traverseraient cette clarté.

En effet, il ne s'était pas écoulé trois minutes que les hommes parurent. Ils étaient maintenant quatre; tous de haute taille, vêtus de longues redingotes brunes, avec des chapeaux ronds, et de gros bâtons à la main. Ils n'étaient pas moins inquiétants par leur grande stature et leurs vastes poings que par leur marche sinistre dans les ténèbres. On eût dit quatre spectres déguisés en bourgeois.

Ils s'arrêtèrent au milieu du carrefour et firent groupe, comme des gens qui se consultent. Ils avaient l'air indécis. Celui qui paraissait les conduire se tourna et désigna vivement de la main droite la direction où s'était engagé Jean Valjean; un autre semblait indiquer avec une certaine obstination la direction contraire. À l'instant où le premier se retourna, la lune éclaira en plein son visage. Jean Valjean reconnut parfaitement Javert.

Chapitre II

Il est heureux que le pont d’Austerlitz porte voitures

L’incertitude cessait pour Jean Valjean; heureusement elle durait encore pour ces hommes. Il profita de leur hésitation; c’était du temps perdu pour eux, gagné pour lui. Il sortit de dessous la porte où il s’était tapi, et poussa dans la rue des Postes vers la région du Jardin des Plantes. Cosette commençait à se fatiguer, il la prit dans ses bras, et la porta. Il n’y avait point un passant, et l’on n’avait pas allumé les réverbères à cause de la lune.

Il doubla le pas.

En quelques enjambées, il atteignit la poterie Goblet sur la façade de laquelle le clair de lune faisait très distinctement lisible la vieille inscription:

De Goblet fils c’est ici la fabrique;
Venez choisir des cruches et des brocs,
Des pots à fleurs, des tuyaux, de la brique.
À tout venant le Cœur vend des Carreaux.

Il laissa derrière lui la rue de la Clef, puis la fontaine Saint-Victor, longea le Jardin des Plantes par les rues basses, et arriva au quai. Là il se retourna. Le quai était désert. Les rues étaient désertes. Personne derrière lui. Il respira.

Il gagna le pont d’Austerlitz.

Le péage y existait encore à cette époque.

Il se présenta au bureau du péager, et donna un sou. — C’est deux sous, dit l’invalide du pont. Vous portez là un enfant qui peut marcher. Payez pour deux.

Il paya, contrarié que son passage eût donné lieu à une observation. Toute fuite doit être un glissement.

Une grosse charrette passait la Seine en même temps que lui et allait comme lui sur la rive droite. Cela lui fut utile. Il put traverser tout le pont dans l’ombre de cette charrette.

Vers le milieu du pont, Cosette, ayant les pieds engourdis, désira marcher. Il la posa à terre et la reprit par la main.

Le pont franchi, il aperçut un peu à droite des chantiers devant lui; il y marcha. Pour y arriver, il fallait s’aventurer dans un assez large espace découvert et éclairé. Il n’hésita pas. Ceux qui le traquaient étaient évidemment dépistés et Jean Valjean se croyait hors de danger. Cherché, oui; suivi, non.

Une petite rue, la rue du Chemin-Vert-Saint-Antoine, s’ouvrait entre deux chantiers enclos de murs. Cette rue était étroite, obscure, et comme faite exprès pour lui. Avant d’y entrer, il regarda en arrière.

Du point où il était, il voyait dans toute sa longueur le pont d’Austerlitz.

Quatre ombres venaient d’entrer sur le pont.

Ces ombres tournaient le dos au Jardin des Plantes et se dirigeaient vers la rive droite.

Ces quatre ombres, c’étaient les quatre hommes.

Jean Valjean eut le frémissement de la bête reprise.

Il lui restait une espérance; c’est que ces hommes peut-être n’étaient pas encore entrés sur le pont et ne l’avaient pas aperçu au moment où il avait traversé, tenant Cosette par la main, la grande place éclairée.

En ce cas-là, en s’enfonçant dans la petite rue qui était devant lui, s’il parvenait à atteindre les chantiers, les marais, les cultures, les terrains non bâtis, il pouvait échapper.

Il lui sembla qu’on pouvait se confier à cette petite rue silencieuse. Il y entra.

Chapitre III

Voir le plan de Paris de 1727

Au bout de trois cents pas, il arriva à un point où la rue se bifurquait. Elle se partageait en deux rues, obliquant l'une à gauche, l'autre à droite. Jean Valjean avait devant lui comme les deux branches d'un Y. Laquelle choisir?

Il ne balança point, il prit la droite.

Pourquoi?

C'est que la branche gauche allait vers le faubourg, c'est-à-dire vers les lieux habités, et la branche droite vers la campagne, c'est-à-dire vers les lieux déserts.

Cependant ils ne marchaient plus très rapidement. Le pas de Cosette ralentissait le pas de Jean Valjean.

Il se remit à la porter. Cosette appuyait sa tête sur l'épaule du bonhomme et ne disait pas un mot.

Il se retournait de temps en temps et regardait. Il avait soin de se tenir toujours du côté obscur de la rue. La rue était droite derrière lui. Les deux ou trois premières fois qu'il se retourna, il ne vit rien, le silence était profond, il continua sa marche un peu rassuré. Tout à coup, à un certain instant, s'étant retourné, il lui sembla voir dans la partie de la rue où il venait de passer, loin dans l'obscurité, quelque chose qui bougeait.

Il se précipita en avant, plutôt qu'il ne marcha, espérant trouver quelque ruelle latérale, s'évader par là, et rompre encore une fois sa piste.

Il arriva à un mur.

Ce mur pourtant n'était point une impossibilité d'aller plus loin; c'était une muraille bordant une ruelle transversale à laquelle aboutissait la rue où s'était engagé Jean Valjean.

Ici encore il fallait se décider; prendre à droite ou à gauche.

Il regarda à droite. La ruelle se prolongeait en tronçon entre des constructions qui étaient des hangars ou des granges, puis se terminait en impasse. On voyait distinctement le fond du cul-de-sac; un grand mur blanc.

Il regarda à gauche. La ruelle de ce côté était ouverte, et, au bout de deux cents pas environ, tombait dans une rue dont elle était l'affluent. C'était de ce côté-là qu'était le salut.

Au moment où Jean Valjean songeait à tourner à gauche, pour tâcher de gagner la rue qu'il entrevoyait au bout de la ruelle, il aperçut, à l'angle de la ruelle et de cette rue vers laquelle il allait se diriger, une espèce de statue noire, immobile.

C'était quelqu'un, un homme, qui venait d'être posté là évidemment, et qui, barrant le passage, attendait.

Jean Valjean recula.

Le point de Paris où se trouvait Jean Valjean, situé entre le faubourg Saint-Antoine et la Râpée, est un de ceux qu'ont transformés de fond en comble les travaux récents, enlaidissements selon les uns, transfiguration selon les autres. Les cultures, les chantiers et les vieilles bâtisses se sont effacés. Il y a là aujourd'hui de grandes rues toutes neuves, des arènes, des cirques, des hippodromes, des embarcadères de chemin de fer, une prison, Mazas; le progrès, comme on voit, avec son correctif. Il y a un demi-siècle, dans cette langue usuelle populaire, toute faite de traditions, qui s'obstine à appeler l'Institut les Quatre-Nations et l'Opéra-Comique Feydeau, l'endroit précis où était parvenu Jean Valjean se nommait le Petit-Picpus. La porte Saint-Jacques, la porte Paris, la barrière des Sergents, les Porcherons, la Galiote, les Célestins, les Capucins, le Mail, la Bourbe, l'Arbre-de-Cracovie, la Petite-Pologne, le Petit-Picpus, ce sont les noms du vieux Paris surnageant dans le nouveau. La mémoire du peuple flotte sur ces épaves du passé.

Le Petit-Picpus, qui du reste a existé à peine et n'a jamais été qu'une ébauche de quartier, avait presque l'aspect monacal d'une ville espagnole. Les chemins étaient peu pavés, les rues étaient peu bâties. Excepté les deux ou trois rues dont nous allons parler, tout y était muraille et solitude. Pas une boutique, pas une voiture; à peine çà et là une chandelle allumée aux fenêtres; toute lumière éteinte après dix heures. Des jardins, des couvents, des chantiers, des marais; de rares maisons basses, et de grands murs aussi hauts que les maisons.

Tel était ce quartier au dernier siècle. La révolution l'avait déjà fort rabroué. L'édilité républicaine l'avait démoli, percé, troué. Des dépôts de gravats y avaient été établis. Il y a trente ans, ce quartier disparaissait sous la rature des constructions nouvelles. Aujourd'hui il est biffé tout à fait. Le Petit-Picpus, dont aucun plan actuel n'a gardé trace, est assez clairement indiqué dans le plan de 1727, publié à Paris chez Denis Thierry, rue Saint-Jacques, vis-à-vis la rue du Plâtre, et à Lyon chez Jean Girin rue Mercière, à la Prudence. Le Petit-Picpus avait ce que nous venons d’appeler un Y de rues, formé par la rue du Chemin-Vert-Saint-Antoine s’écartant en deux branches et prenant à gauche le nom de petite rue Picpus et à droite le nom de rue Polonceau. Les deux branches de l’Y étaient réunies à leur sommet comme par une barre. Cette barre se nommait rue Droit-Mur. La rue Polonceau y aboutissait; la petite rue Picpus passait outre, et montait vers le marché Lenoir. Celui qui, venant de la Seine, arrivait à l’extrémité de la rue Polonceau, avait à sa gauche la rue Droit-Mur, tournant brusquement à angle droit, devant lui la muraille de cette rue, et à sa droite un prolongement tronqué de la rue Droit-Mur, sans issue, appelé le cul-de-sac Genrot.

C’est là qu’était Jean Valjean.

Comme nous venons de le dire, en apercevant la silhouette noire, en vedette à l’angle de la rue Droit-Mur et de la petite rue Picpus, il recula. Nul doute. Il était guetté par ce fantôme.

Que faire?

Il n’était plus temps de rétrograder. Ce qu’il avait vu remuer dans l’ombre à quelque distance derrière lui le moment d’auparavant, c’était sans doute Javert et son escouade. Javert était probablement déjà au commencement de la rue à la fin de laquelle était Jean Valjean. Javert, selon toute apparence, connaissait ce petit dédale, et avait pris ses précautions en envoyant un de ses hommes garder l’issue. Ces conjectures, si ressemblantes à des évidences, tourbillonnèrent tout de suite, comme une poignée de poussière qui s’envole à un vent subit, dans le cerveau douloureux de Jean Valjean. Il examina le cul-de-sac Genrot; là, barrage. Il examina la petite rue Picpus; là, une sentinelle. Il voyait cette figure sombre se détacher en noir sur le pavé blanc inondé de lune. Avancer, c’était tomber sur cet homme. Reculer, c’était se jeter dans Javert. Jean Valjean se sentait pris comme dans un filet qui se resserrait lentement. Il regarda le ciel avec désespoir.

Chapitre IV

Les tâtonnements de l’évasion

Pour comprendre ce qui va suivre, il faut se figurer d’une manière exacte la ruelle Droit-Mur, et en particulier l’angle qu’on laissait à gauche quand on sortait de la rue Polonceau pour entrer dans cette ruelle. La ruelle Droit-Mur était à peu près entièrement bordée à droite jusqu’à la petite rue Picpus par des maisons de pauvre apparence; à gauche par un seul bâtiment d’une ligne sévère composé de plusieurs corps de logis qui allaient se haussant graduellement d’un étage ou deux à mesure qu’ils approchaient de la petite rue Picpus; de sorte que ce bâtiment, très élevé du côté de la petite rue Picpus, était assez bas du côté de la rue Polonceau. Là, à l’angle dont nous avons parlé, il s’abaissait au point de n’avoir plus qu’une muraille. Cette muraille n’allait pas aboutir carrément à la rue; elle dessinait un pan coupé fort en retraite, dérobé par ses deux angles à deux observateurs qui eussent été l’un rue Polonceau, l’autre rue Droit-Mur.

À partir des deux angles du pan coupé, la muraille se prolongeait sur la rue Polonceau jusqu’à une maison qui portait le no 49 et sur la rue Droit-Mur, où son tronçon était beaucoup plus court, jusqu’au bâtiment sombre dont nous avons parlé et dont elle coupait le pignon, faisant ainsi dans la rue un nouvel angle rentrant. Ce pignon était d’un aspect morne; on n’y voyait qu’une seule fenêtre, ou, pour mieux dire, deux volets revêtus d’une feuille de zinc, et toujours fermés.

L’état de lieux que nous dressons ici est d’une rigoureuse exactitude et éveillera certainement un souvenir très précis dans l’esprit des anciens habitants du quartier.

Le pan coupé était entièrement rempli par une chose qui ressemblait à une porte colossale et misérable. C’était un vaste assemblage informe de planches perpendiculaires, celles d’en haut plus larges que celles d’en bas, reliées par de longues lanières de fer transversales. À côté il y avait une porte cochère de dimension ordinaire et dont le percement ne remontait évidemment pas à plus d’une cinquantaine d’années.

Un tilleul montrait son branchage au-dessus du pan coupé, et le mur était couvert de lierre du côté de la rue Polonceau.

Dans l’imminent péril où se trouvait Jean Valjean, ce bâtiment sombre avait quelque chose d’inhabité et de solitaire qui le tentait. Il le parcourut rapidement des yeux. Il se disait que s’il parvenait à y pénétrer, il était peut-être sauvé. Il eut d’abord une idée et une espérance.

Dans la partie moyenne de la devanture de ce bâtiment sur la rue Droit-Mur, il y avait à toutes les fenêtres des divers étages de vieilles cuvettes-entonnoirs en plomb. Les embranchements variés des conduits qui allaient d’un conduit central aboutir à toutes ces cuvettes dessinaient sur la façade une espèce d’arbre. Ces ramifications de tuyaux avec leurs cent coudes imitaient ces vieux ceps de vigne dépouillés qui se tordent sur les devantures des anciennes fermes.

Ce bizarre espalier aux branches de tôle et de fer fut le premier objet qui frappa le regard de Jean Valjean. Il assit Cosette le dos contre une borne en lui recommandant le silence et courut à l’endroit où le conduit venait toucher le pavé. Peut-être y avait-il moyen d’escalader par là et d’entrer dans la maison. Mais le conduit était délabré et hors de service et tenait à peine à son scellement. D’ailleurs toutes les fenêtres de ce logis silencieux étaient grillées d’épaisses barres de fer, même les mansardes du toit. Et puis la lune éclairait pleinement cette façade, et l’homme qui l’observait du bout de la rue aurait vu Jean Valjean faire l’escalade. Enfin que faire de Cosette? comment la hisser au haut d’une maison à trois étages?

Il renonça à grimper par le conduit et rampa le long du mur pour rentrer dans la rue Polonceau.

Quand il fut au pan coupé où il avait laissé Cosette, il remarqua que, là, personne ne pouvait le voir. Il échappait, comme nous venons de l’expliquer, à tous les regards, de quelque côté qu’ils vinssent. En outre il était dans l’ombre. Enfin il y avait deux portes. Peut-être pourrait-on les forcer. Le mur au-dessus duquel il voyait le tilleul et le lierre donnait évidemment dans un jardin où il pourrait tout au moins se cacher, quoiqu’il n’y eût pas encore de feuilles aux arbres, et passer le reste de la nuit.

Le temps s’écoulait. Il fallait faire vite.

Il tâta la porte cochère et reconnut tout de suite quelle était condamnée au dedans et au dehors. Il s’approcha de l’autre grande porte avec plus d’espoir. Elle était affreusement décrépite, son immensité même la rendait moins solide, les planches étaient pourries, les ligatures de fer, il n’y en avait que trois, étaient rouillées. Il semblait possible de percer cette clôture vermoulue.

En l’examinant, il vit que cette porte n’était pas une porte. Elle n’avait ni gonds, ni pentures, ni serrure, ni fente au milieu. Les bandes de fer la traversaient de part en part sans solution de continuité. Par les crevasses des planches il entrevit des moellons et des pierres grossièrement cimentés que les passants pouvaient y voir encore il y a dix ans. Il fut forcé de s’avouer avec consternation que cette apparence de porte était simplement le parement en bois d’une bâtisse à laquelle elle était adossée. Il était facile d’arracher une planche, mais on se trouvait face à face avec un mur.

Chapitre V

Qui serait impossible avec l’éclairage au gaz

En ce moment un bruit sourd et cadencé commença à se faire entendre à quelque distance. Jean Valjean risqua un peu son regard en dehors du coin de la rue. Sept ou huit soldats disposés en peloton venaient de déboucher dans la rue Polonceau. Il voyait briller les bayonnettes. Cela venait vers lui.

Ces soldats, en tête desquels il distinguait la haute stature de Javert, s’avançaient lentement et avec précaution. Ils s’arrêtaient fréquemment. Il était visible qu’ils exploraient tous les recoins des murs et toutes les embrasures de portes et d’allées.

C’était, et ici la conjecture ne pouvait se tromper, quelque patrouille que Javert avait rencontrée et qu’il avait requise.

Les deux acolytes de Javert marchaient dans leurs rangs.

Du pas dont ils marchaient, et avec les stations qu’ils faisaient, il leur fallait environ un quart d’heure pour arriver à l’endroit où se trouvait Jean Valjean. Ce fut un instant affreux. Quelques minutes séparaient Jean Valjean de cet épouvantable précipice qui s’ouvrait devant lui pour la troisième fois. Et le bagne maintenant n’était plus seulement le bagne, c’était Cosette perdue à jamais; c’est-à-dire une vie qui ressemblait au dedans d’une tombe.

Il n’y avait plus qu’une chose possible.

Jean Valjean avait cela de particulier qu’on pouvait dire qu’il portait deux besaces; dans l’une il avait les pensées d’un saint, dans l’autre les redoutables talents d’un forçat. Il fouillait dans l’une ou dans l’autre, selon l’occasion.

Entre autres ressources, grâce à ses nombreuses évasions du bagne de Toulon, il était, on s’en souvient, passé maître dans cet art incroyable de s’élever, sans échelles, sans crampons, par la seule force musculaire, en s’appuyant de la nuque, des épaules, des hanches et des genoux, en s’aidant à peine des rares reliefs de la pierre, dans l’angle droit d’un mur, au besoin jusqu’à la hauteur d’un sixième étage; art qui a rendu si effrayant et si célèbre le coin de la cour de la Conciergerie de Paris par où s’échappa, il y a une vingtaine d’années, le condamné Battemolle.

Jean Valjean mesura des yeux la muraille au-dessus de laquelle il voyait le tilleul. Elle avait environ dix-huit pieds de haut. L’angle qu’elle faisait avec le pignon du grand bâtiment était rempli, dans sa partie inférieure, d’un massif de maçonnerie de forme triangulaire, probablement destiné à préserver ce trop commode recoin des stations de ces stercoraires qu’on appelle les passants. Ce remplissage préventif des coins de mur est fort usité à Paris.

Ce massif avait environ cinq pieds de haut. Du sommet de ce massif l’espace à franchir pour arriver sur le mur n’était guère que de quatorze pieds.

Le mur était surmonté d’une pierre plate sans chevron.

La difficulté était Cosette. Cosette elle, ne savait pas escalader un mur. L’abandonner? Jean Valjean n’y songeait pas. L’emporter était impossible. Toutes les forces d’un homme lui sont nécessaires pour mener à bien ces étranges ascensions. Le moindre fardeau dérangerait son centre de gravité et le précipiterait.

Il aurait fallu une corde. Jean Valjean n’en avait pas. Où trouver une corde à minuit, rue Polonceau? Certes, en cet instant-là, si Jean Valjean avait eu un royaume, il l’eût donné pour une corde. Toutes les situations extrêmes ont leurs éclairs qui tantôt nous aveuglent, tantôt nous illuminent.

Le regard désespéré de Jean Valjean rencontra la potence du réverbère du cul-de-sac Genrot.

À cette époque il n’y avait point de becs de gaz dans les rues de Paris. À la nuit tombante on y allumait des réverbères placés de distance en distance, lesquels montaient et descendaient au moyen d’une corde qui traversait la rue de part en part et qui s’ajustait dans la rainure d’une potence. Le tourniquet où se dévidait cette corde était scellé au-dessous de la lanterne dans une petite armoire de fer dont l’allumeur avait la clef, et la corde elle-même était protégée jusqu’à une certaine hauteur par un étui de métal.

Jean Valjean, avec l’énergie d’une lutte suprême, franchit la rue d’un bond, entra dans le cul-de-sac, fit sauter le pêne de la petite armoire avec la pointe de son couteau, et un instant après il était revenu près de Cosette. Il avait une corde. Ils vont vite en besogne, ces sombres trouveurs d’expédients, aux prises avec la fatalité.

Nous avons expliqué que les réverbères n’avaient pas été allumés cette nuit-là. La lanterne du cul-de-sac Genrot se trouvait donc naturellement éteinte comme les autres, et l’on pouvait passer à côté sans même remarquer qu’elle n’était plus à sa place.

Cependant l’heure, le lieu, l’obscurité, la préoccupation de Jean Valjean, ses gestes singuliers, ses allées et venues, tout cela commençait à inquiéter Cosette. Tout autre enfant qu’elle aurait depuis longtemps jeté les hauts cris. Elle se borna à tirer Jean Valjean par le pan de sa redingote. On entendait toujours de plus en plus distinctement le bruit de la patrouille qui approchait.

— Père, dit-elle tout bas, j’ai peur. Qu’est-ce qui vient donc là?

— Chut! répondit le malheureux homme. C’est la Thénardier.

Cosette tressaillit. Il ajouta:

— Ne dis rien. Laisse-moi faire. Si tu cries, si tu pleures, la Thénardier te guette. Elle vient pour te ravoir.

Alors, sans se hâter, mais sans s’y reprendre à deux fois pour rien, avec une précision ferme et brève, d’autant plus remarquable en un pareil moment que la patrouille et Javert pouvaient survenir d’un instant à l’autre, il défit sa cravate, la passa autour du corps de Cosette sous les aisselles en ayant soin qu’elle ne pût blesser l’enfant, rattacha cette cravate à un bout de la corde au moyen de ce nœud que les gens de mer appellent nœud d’hirondelle, prit l’autre bout de cette corde dans ses dents, ôta ses souliers et ses bas qu’il jeta par-dessus la muraille, monta sur le massif de maçonnerie, et commença à s’élever dans l’angle du mur et du pignon avec autant de solidité et de certitude que s’il eût eu des échelons sous les talons et sous les coudes. Une demi-minute ne s’était pas écoulée qu’il était à genoux sur le mur.

Cosette le considérait avec stupeur, sans dire une parole. La recommandation de Jean Valjean et le nom de la Thénardier l’avaient glacée.

Tout à coup elle entendit la voix de Jean Valjean qui lui criait, tout en restant très basse:

— Adosse-toi au mur.

Elle obéit.

— Ne dis pas un mot et n’aie pas peur, reprit Jean Valjean.

Et elle se sentit enlever de terre.

Avant qu’elle eût eu le temps de se reconnaître, elle était au haut de la muraille.

Jean Valjean la saisit, la mit sur son dos, lui prit ses deux petites mains dans sa main gauche, se coucha à plat ventre et rampa sur le haut du mur jusqu'au pan coupé. Comme il l'avait deviné, il y avait là une bâtisse dont le toit partait du haut de la clôture en bois et descendait fort près de terre, selon un plan assez doucement incliné, en effleurant le tilleul.

Circonstance heureuse, car la muraille était beaucoup plus haute de ce côté que du côté de la rue. Jean Valjean n'apercevait le sol au-dessous de lui que très profondément.

Il venait d'arriver au plan incliné du toit et n'avait pas encore lâché la crête de la muraille lorsqu'un hourvari violent annonça l'arrivée de la patrouille. On entendit la voix tonnante de Javert:

— Fouillez le cul-de-sac! La rue Droit-Mur est gardée, la petite rue Picpus aussi. Je réponds qu'il est dans le cul-de-sac!

Les soldats se précipitèrent dans le cul-de-sac Genrot.

Jean Valjean se laissa glisser le long du toit, tout en soutenant Cosette, atteignit le tilleul et sauta à terre. Soit terreur, soit courage, Cosette n'avait pas soufflé. Elle avait les mains un peu écorchées.

Chapitre VI

Commencement d’une énigme

Jean Valjean se trouvait dans une espèce de jardin fort vaste et d’un aspect singulier; un de ces jardins tristes qui semblent faits pour être regardés l’hiver et la nuit. Ce jardin était d’une forme oblongue, avec une allée de grands peupliers au fond, des futaies assez hautes dans les coins, et un espace sans ombre au milieu, où l’on distinguait un très grand arbre isolé, puis quelques arbres fruitiers tordus et hérissés comme de grosses broussailles, des carrés de légumes, une melonnière dont les cloches brillaient à la lune, et un vieux puisard. Il y avait çà et là des bancs de pierre qui semblaient noirs de mousse. Les allées étaient bordées de petits arbustes sombres, et toutes droites. L’herbe en envahissait la moitié et une moisissure verte couvrait le reste.

Jean Valjean avait à côté de lui la bâtisse dont le toit lui avait servi pour descendre, un tas de fagots, et derrière les fagots, tout contre le mur, une statue de pierre dont la face mutilée n’était plus qu’un masque informe qui apparaissait vaguement dans l’obscurité.

La bâtisse était une sorte de ruine où l’on distinguait des chambres démantelées dont une, tout encombrée, semblait servir de hangar.

Le grand bâtiment de la rue Droit-Mur qui faisait retour sur la petite rue Picpus développait sur ce jardin deux façades en équerre. Ces façades du dedans étaient plus tragiques encore que celles du dehors. Toutes les fenêtres étaient grillées. On n’y entrevoyait aucune lumière. Aux étages supérieurs il y avait des hottes comme aux prisons. L’une de ces façades projetait sur l’autre son ombre qui retombait sur le jardin comme un immense drap noir.

On n’apercevait pas d’autre maison. Le fond du jardin se perdait dans la brume et dans la nuit. Cependant on y distinguait confusément des murailles qui s’entrecoupaient comme s’il y avait d’autres cultures au delà, et les toits bas de la rue Polonceau.

On ne pouvait rien se figurer de plus farouche et de plus solitaire que ce jardin. Il n’y avait personne, ce qui était tout simple à cause de l’heure; mais il ne semblait pas que cet endroit fût fait pour que quelqu’un y marchât, même en plein midi.

Le premier soin de Jean Valjean avait été de retrouver ses souliers et de se rechausser, puis d'entrer dans le hangar avec Cosette. Celui qui s'évade ne se croit jamais assez caché. L'enfant, songeant toujours à la Thénardier, partageait son instinct de se blottir le plus possible.

Cosette tremblait et se serrait contre lui. On entendait le bruit tumultueux de la patrouille qui fouillait le cul-de-sac et la rue, les coups de crosse contre les pierres, les appels de Javert aux mouchards qu'il avait postés, et ses imprécations mêlées de paroles qu'on ne distinguait point.

Au bout d'un quart d'heure, il sembla que cette espèce de grondement orageux commençait à s'éloigner. Jean Valjean ne respirait pas.

Il avait posé doucement sa main sur la bouche de Cosette.

Au reste la solitude où il se trouvait était si étrangement calme que cet effroyable tapage, si furieux et si proche, n'y jetait même pas l'ombre d'un trouble. Il semblait que ces murs fussent bâtis avec ces pierres sourdes dont parle l'Écriture.

Tout à coup, au milieu de ce calme profond, un nouveau bruit s'éleva; un bruit céleste, divin, ineffable, aussi ravissant que l'autre était horrible. C'était un hymne qui sortait des ténèbres, un éblouissement de prière et d'harmonie dans l'obscur et effrayant silence de la nuit; des voix de femmes, mais des voix composées à la fois de l'accent pur des vierges et de l'accent naïf des enfants, de ces voix qui ne sont pas de la terre et qui ressemblent à celles que les nouveau-nés entendent encore et que les moribonds entendent déjà. Ce chant venait du sombre édifice qui dominait le jardin. Au moment où le vacarme des démons s'éloignait, on eût dit un chœur d'anges qui s'approchait dans l'ombre.

Cosette et Jean Valjean tombèrent à genoux.

Ils ne savaient pas ce que c'était, ils ne savaient pas où ils étaient, mais ils sentaient tous deux, l'homme et l'enfant, le pénitent et l'innocent, qu'il fallait qu'ils fussent à genoux.

Ces voix avaient cela d'étrange qu'elles n'empêchaient pas que le bâtiment ne parût désert. C'était comme un chant surnaturel dans une demeure inhabitée.

Pendant que ces voix chantaient, Jean Valjean ne songeait plus à rien. Il ne voyait plus la nuit, il voyait un ciel bleu. Il lui semblait sentir s'ouvrir ces ailes que nous avons tous au dedans de nous.

Le chant s'éteignit. Il avait peut-être duré longtemps. Jean Valjean n'aurait pu le dire. Les heures de l'extase ne sont jamais qu'une minute.

Tout était retombé dans le silence. Plus rien dans la rue, plus rien dans le jardin. Ce qui menaçait, ce qui rassurait, tout s’était évanoui. Le vent froissait dans la crête du mur quelques herbes sèches qui faisaient un petit bruit doux et lugubre.

Chapitre VII

Suite de l’énigme

La bise de nuit s’était levée, ce qui indiquait qu’il devait être entre une et deux heures du matin. La pauvre Cosette ne disait rien. Comme elle s’était assise à terre à son côté et qu’elle avait penché sa tête sur lui, Jean Valjean pensa quelle s’était endormie. Il se baissa et la regarda. Cosette avait les yeux tout grands ouverts et un air pensif qui fit mal à Jean Valjean.

Elle tremblait toujours.

— As-tu envie de dormir? dit Jean Valjean.

— J’ai bien froid, répondit-elle.

Un moment après elle reprit:

— Est-ce qu’elle est toujours là?

— Qui? dit Jean Valjean.

— Madame Thénardier.

Jean Valjean avait déjà oublié le moyen dont il s’était servi pour faire garder le silence à Cosette.

— Ah! dit-il, elle est partie. Ne crains plus rien.

L’enfant soupira comme si un poids se soulevait de dessus sa poitrine.

La terre était humide, le hangar ouvert de toute part, la bise plus fraîche à chaque instant. Le bonhomme ôta sa redingote et en enveloppa Cosette.

— As-tu moins froid ainsi? dit-il.

— Oh oui, père!

— Eh bien, attends-moi un instant. Je vais revenir.

Il sortit de la ruine, et se mit à longer le grand bâtiment, cherchant quelque abri meilleur. Il rencontra des portes, mais elles étaient fermées. Il y avait des barreaux à toutes les croisées du rez-de-chaussée.

Comme il venait de dépasser l’angle intérieur de l’édifice, il remarqua qu’il arrivait à des fenêtres cintrées, et il y aperçut quelque clarté. Il se haussa sur la pointe du pied et regarda par l’une de ces fenêtres. Elles donnaient toutes dans une salle assez vaste, pavée de larges dalles, coupée d’arcades et de piliers, où l’on ne distinguait rien qu’une petite lueur et de grandes ombres. La lueur venait d’une veilleuse allumée dans un coin. Cette salle était déserte et rien n’y bougeait. Cependant, à force de regarder, il crut voir à terre, sur le pavé, quelque chose qui paraissait couvert d’un linceul et qui ressemblait à une forme humaine. Cela était étendu à plat ventre, la face contre la pierre, les bras en croix, dans l'immobilité de la mort. On eût dit, à une sorte de serpent qui traînait sur le pavé, que cette forme sinistre avait la corde au cou.

Toute la salle baignait dans cette brume des lieux à peine éclairés qui ajoute à l'horreur.

Jean Valjean a souvent dit depuis que, quoique bien des spectacles funèbres eussent traversé sa vie, jamais il n'avait rien vu de plus glaçant et de plus terrible que cette figure énigmatique accomplissant on ne sait quel mystère inconnu dans ce lieu sombre et ainsi entrevue dans la nuit. Il était effrayant de supposer que cela était peut-être mort, et plus effrayant encore de songer que cela était peut-être vivant.

Il eut le courage de coller son front à la vitre et d'épier si cette chose remuerait. Il eut beau rester un temps qui lui parut très long, la forme étendue ne faisait aucun mouvement. Tout à coup il se sentit pris d'une épouvante inexprimable, et il s'enfuit. Il se mit à courir vers le hangar sans oser regarder en arrière. Il lui semblait que s'il tournait la tête il verrait la figure marcher derrière lui à grands pas en agitant les bras.

Il arriva à la ruine haletant. Ses genoux pliaient; la sueur lui coulait dans les reins.

Où était-il? qui aurait jamais pu s'imaginer quelque chose de pareil à cette espèce de sépulcre au milieu de Paris? qu'était-ce que cette étrange maison? Édifice plein de mystères nocturnes, appelant les âmes dans l'ombre avec la voix des anges et, lorsqu'elles viennent, leur offrant brusquement cette vision épouvantable, promettant d'ouvrir la porte radieuse du ciel et ouvrant la porte horrible du tombeau! Et cela était bien en effet un édifice, une maison qui avait son numéro dans une rue! Ce n'était pas un rêve! Il avait besoin d'en toucher les pierres pour y croire.

Le froid, l'anxiété, l'inquiétude, les émotions de la soirée, lui donnaient une véritable fièvre, et toutes ces idées s'entre-heurtaient dans son cerveau.

Il s'approcha de Cosette. Elle dormait.

Chapitre VIII

L’énigme redouble

L’enfant avait posé sa tête sur une pierre et s’était endormie.

Il s’assit auprès d’elle et se mit à la considérer. Peu à peu, à mesure qu’il la regardait, il se calmait, et il reprenait possession de sa liberté d’esprit.

Il percevait clairement cette vérité, le fond de sa vie désormais, que tant qu’elle serait là, tant qu’il l’aurait près de lui, il n’aurait besoin de rien que pour elle, ni peur de rien qu’à cause d’elle. Il ne sentait même pas qu’il avait très froid, ayant quitté sa redingote pour l’en couvrir.

Cependant, à travers la rêverie où il était tombé, il entendait depuis quelque temps un bruit singulier. C’était comme un grelot qu’on agitait. Ce bruit était dans le jardin. On l’entendait distinctement, quoique faiblement. Cela ressemblait à la petite musique vague que font les clarines des bestiaux la nuit dans les pâturages.

Ce bruit fit retourner Jean Valjean.

Il regarda, et vit qu’il y avait quelqu’un dans le jardin.

Un être qui ressemblait à un homme marchait au milieu des cloches de la melonnière, se levant, se baissant, s’arrêtant, avec des mouvements réguliers, comme s’il traînait ou étendait quelque chose à terre. Cet être paraissait boiter.

Jean Valjean tressaillit avec ce tremblement continuel des malheureux. Tout leur est hostile et suspect. Ils se défient du jour parce qu’il aide à les voir et de la nuit parce qu’elle aide à les surprendre. Tout à l’heure il frissonnait de ce que le jardin était désert, maintenant il frissonnait de ce qu’il y avait quelqu’un.

Il retomba des terreurs chimériques aux terreurs réelles. Il se dit que Javert et les mouchards n’étaient peut-être pas partis, que sans doute ils avaient laissé dans la rue des gens en observation, que, si cet homme le découvrait dans ce jardin, il crierait au voleur, et le livrerait. Il prit doucement Cosette endormie dans ses bras et la porta derrière un tas de vieux meubles hors d’usage, dans le coin le plus reculé du hangar. Cosette ne remua pas.

De là il observa les allures de l’être qui était dans la melonnière. Ce qui était bizarre, c’est que le bruit du grelot suivait tous les mouvements de cet homme. Quand l’homme s’approchait, le bruit s’approchait; quand il s’éloignait, le bruit s’éloignait; s’il faisait quelque geste précipité, un trémolo accompagnait ce geste; quand il s’arrêtait, le bruit cessait. Il paraissait évident que le grelot était attaché à cet homme; mais alors qu’est-ce que cela pouvait signifier? qu’était-ce que cet homme auquel une clochette était suspendue comme à un bélier ou à un bœuf?

Tout en se faisant ces questions, il toucha les mains de Cosette. Elles étaient glacées.

— Ah mon Dieu! dit-il.

Il appela à voix basse:

— Cosette!

Elle n’ouvrit pas les yeux.

Il la secoua vivement.

Elle ne s’éveilla pas.

— Serait-elle morte! dit-il, et il se dressa debout, frémissant de la tête aux pieds.

Les idées les plus affreuses lui traversèrent l’esprit pêle-mêle. Il y a des moments où les suppositions hideuses nous assiègent comme une cohue de furies et forcent violemment les cloisons de notre cerveau. Quand il s’agit de ceux que nous aimons, notre prudence invente toutes les folies. Il se souvint que le sommeil peut être mortel en plein air dans une nuit froide.

Cosette, pâle, était retombée étendue à terre à ses pieds sans faire un mouvement.

Il écouta son souffle; elle respirait; mais d’une respiration qui lui paraissait faible et prête à s’éteindre.

Comment la réchauffer? comment la réveiller? Tout ce qui n’était pas ceci s’effaça de sa pensée. Il s’élança éperdu hors de la ruine.

Il fallait absolument qu’avant un quart d’heure Cosette fût devant un feu et dans un lit.

Chapitre IX

L’homme au grelot

Il marcha droit à l’homme qu’il apercevait dans le jardin. Il avait pris à sa main le rouleau d’argent qui était dans la poche de son gilet.

Cet homme baissait la tête et ne le voyait pas venir. En quelques enjambées, Jean Valjean fut à lui.

Jean Valjean l’aborda en criant:

— Cent francs!

L’homme fit un soubresaut et leva les yeux.

— Cent francs à gagner, reprit Jean Valjean, si vous me donnez asile pour cette nuit!

La lune éclairait en plein le visage effaré de Jean Valjean.

— Tiens, c’est vous, père Madeleine! dit l’homme.

Ce nom, ainsi prononcé, à cette heure obscure, dans ce lieu inconnu, par cet homme inconnu, fit reculer Jean Valjean.

Il s’attendait à tout, excepté à cela. Celui qui lui parlait était un vieillard courbé et boiteux, vêtu à peu près comme un paysan, qui avait au genou gauche une genouillère de cuir où pendait une assez grosse clochette. On ne distinguait pas son visage qui était dans l’ombre.

Cependant ce bonhomme avait ôté son bonnet, et s’écriait tout tremblant:

— Ah mon Dieu! comment êtes-vous ici, père Madeleine? Par où êtes-vous entré, Dieu Jésus? Vous tombez donc du ciel! Ce n’est pas l’embarras, si vous tombez jamais, c’est de là que vous tomberez. Et comme vous voilà fait! Vous n’avez pas de cravate, vous n’avez pas de chapeau, vous n’avez pas d’habit! Savez-vous que vous auriez fait peur à quelqu’un qui ne vous aurait pas connu? Mon Dieu Seigneur, est-ce que les saints deviennent fous à présent? Mais comment donc êtes-vous entré ici?

Un mot n’attendait pas l’autre. Le vieux homme parlait avec une volubilité campagnarde où il n’y avait rien d’inquiétant. Tout cela était dit avec un mélange de stupéfaction et de bonhomie naïve.

— Qui êtes-vous? et qu’est-ce que c’est que cette maison-ci? demanda Jean Valjean.

— Ah, pardieu, voilà qui est fort! s’écria le vieillard, je suis celui que vous avez fait placer ici, et cette maison est celle où vous m’avez fait placer.

Comment! vous ne me reconnaissez pas?

— Non, dit Jean Valjean. Et comment se fait-il que vous me connaissiez, vous?

— Vous m’avez sauvé la vie, dit l’homme.

Il se tourna, un rayon de lune lui dessina le profil, et Jean Valjean reconnut le vieux Fauchelevent.

— Ah.! dit Jean Valjean, c’est vous? oui, je vous reconnais.

— C’est bien heureux! fit le vieux d’un ton de reproche.

— Et que faites-vous ici? reprit Jean Valjean.

— Tiens! je couvre mes melons donc!

Le vieux Fauchelevent tenait en effet à la main, au moment où Jean Valjean l’avait accosté, le bout d’un paillasson qu’il était occupé à étendre sur la melonnière. Il en avait déjà ainsi posé un certain nombre depuis une heure environ qu’il était dans le jardin. C’était cette opération qui lui faisait faire les mouvements particuliers observés du hangar par Jean Valjean.

Il continua:

— Je me suis dit: la lune est claire, il va geler. Si je mettais à mes melons leurs carricks? Et, ajouta-t-il en regardant Jean Valjean avec un gros rire, vous auriez pardieu bien dû en faire autant! Mais comment donc êtes-vous ici?

Jean Valjean, se sentant connu par cet homme, du moins sous son nom de Madeleine, n’avançait plus qu’avec précaution. Il multipliait les questions. Chose bizarre, les rôles semblaient intervertis. C’était lui, intrus, qui interrogeait.

— Et qu’est-ce que c’est que cette sonnette que vous avez au genou?

— Ça? répondit Fauchelevent, c’est pour qu’on m’évite.

— Comment! pour qu’on vous évite?

Le vieux Fauchelevent cligna de l’œil d’un air inexprimable.

— Ah dame! il n’y a que des femmes dans cette maison-ci; beaucoup de jeunes filles. Il paraît que je serais dangereux à rencontrer. La sonnette les avertit. Quand je viens, elles s’en vont.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que cette maison-ci?

— Tiens! vous savez bien.

— Mais non, je ne sais pas.

— Puisque vous m’y avez fait placer jardinier!

— Répondez-moi comme si je ne savais rien.

— Eh bien, c’est le couvent du Petit-Picpus donc!

Les souvenirs revenaient à Jean Valjean. Le hasard, c’est-à-dire la providence, l’avait jeté précisément dans ce couvent du quartier Saint-Antoine où le vieux Fauchelevent, estropié par la chute de sa charrette, avait été admis sur sa recommandation, il y avait deux ans de cela. Il répéta comme se parlant à lui-même:

— Le couvent du Petit-Picpus!

— Ah çà mais, au fait, reprit Fauchelevent, comment diable avez-vous fait pour y entrer, vous, père Madeleine? Vous avez beau être un saint, vous êtes un homme, et il n’entre pas d’hommes ici.

— Vous y êtes bien.

— Il n’y a que moi.

— Cependant, reprit Jean Valjean, il faut que j’y reste.

— Ah mon Dieu! s’écria Fauchelevent.

Jean Valjean s’approcha du vieillard et lui dit d’une voix grave:

— Père Fauchelevent, je vous ai sauvé la vie.

— C’est moi qui m’en suis souvenu le premier, répondit Fauchelevent.

— Eh bien, vous pouvez faire aujourd’hui pour moi ce que j’ai fait autrefois pour vous.

Fauchelevent prit dans ses vieilles mains ridées et tremblantes les deux robustes mains de Jean Valjean, et fut quelques secondes comme s’il ne pouvait parler. Enfin il s’écria:

— Oh! ce serait une bénédiction du bon Dieu si je pouvais vous rendre un peu cela! Moi! vous sauver la vie! Monsieur le maire, disposez du vieux bonhomme!

Une joie admirable avait comme transfiguré ce vieillard. Un rayon semblait lui sortir du visage.

— Que voulez-vous que je fasse? reprit-il.

— Je vous expliquerai cela. Vous avez une chambre?

— J’ai une baraque isolée, là, derrière la ruine du vieux couvent, dans un recoin que personne ne voit. Il y a trois chambres. La baraque était en effet si bien cachée derrière la ruine et si bien disposée pour que personne ne la vît, que Jean Valjean ne l’avait pas vue.

— Bien, dit Jean Valjean. Maintenant je vous demande deux choses.

— Lesquelles, monsieur le maire?

— Premièrement, vous ne direz à personne ce que vous savez de moi. Deuxièmement, vous ne chercherez pas à en savoir davantage.

— Comme vous voudrez. Je sais que vous ne pouvez rien faire que d’honnête et que vous avez toujours été un homme du bon Dieu. Et puis d’ailleurs, c’est vous qui m’avez mis ici. Ça vous regarde. Je suis à vous.

— C’est dit. À présent, venez avec moi. Nous allons chercher l’enfant.

— Ah! dit Fauchelevent. Il y a un enfant!

Il n’ajouta pas une parole et suivit Jean Valjean comme un chien suit son maître.

Moins d’une demi-heure après, Cosette, redevenue rose à la flamme d’un bon feu, dormait dans le lit du vieux jardinier. Jean Valjean avait remis sa cravate et sa redingote; le chapeau lancé par-dessus le mur avait été retrouvé et ramassé; pendant que Jean Valjean endossait sa redingote, Fauchelevent avait ôté sa genouillère à clochette, qui maintenant, accrochée à un clou près d’une hotte, ornait le mur. Les deux hommes se chauffaient accoudés sur une table où Fauchelevent avait posé un morceau de fromage, du pain bis, une bouteille de vin et deux verres, et le vieux disait à Jean Valjean en lui posant la main sur le genou:

— Ah! père Madeleine! vous ne m’avez pas reconnu tout de suite! Vous sauvez la vie aux gens, et après vous les oubliez! Oh! c’est mal! eux ils se souviennent de vous! vous êtes un ingrat!

Chapitre X

Où il est expliqué comment Javert a fait buisson creux

Les événements dont nous venons de voir, pour ainsi dire, l'envers, s'étaient accomplis dans les conditions les plus simples.

Lorsque Jean Valjean, dans la nuit même du jour où Javert l'arrêta près du lit de mort de Fantine, s'échappa de la prison municipale de Montreuil-sur-Mer, la police supposa que le forçat évadé avait dû se diriger vers Paris. Paris est un maelström où tout se perd, et tout disparaît dans ce nombril du monde comme dans le nombril de la mer. Aucune forêt ne cache un homme comme cette foule. Les fugitifs de toute espèce le savent. Ils vont à Paris comme à un engloutissement; il y a des engloutissements qui sauvent. La police aussi le sait, et c'est à Paris qu'elle cherche ce qu'elle a perdu ailleurs. Elle y chercha l'ex-maire de Montreuil-sur-Mer. Javert fut appelé à Paris afin d'éclairer les perquisitions. Javert en effet aida puissamment à reprendre Jean Valjean. Le zèle et l'intelligence de Javert en cette occasion furent remarqués de Mr Chabouillet, secrétaire de la préfecture sous le comte Anglès. Mr Chabouillet, qui du reste avait déjà protégé Javert, fit attacher l'inspecteur de Montreuil-sur-Mer à la police de Paris. Là Javert se rendit diversement et, disons-le, quoique le mot semble inattendu pour de pareils services, honorablement utile.

Il ne songeait plus à Jean Valjean, — à ces chiens toujours en chasse, le loup d'aujourd'hui fait oublier le loup d'hier, — lorsqu'en décembre 1823 il lut un journal, lui qui ne lisait jamais de journaux; mais Javert, homme monarchique, avait tenu à savoir les détails de l'entrée triomphale du «prince généralissime» à Bayonne. Comme il achevait l'article qui l'intéressait, un nom, le nom de Jean Valjean, au bas d'une page, appela son attention. Le journal annonçait que le forçat Jean Valjean était mort, et publiait le fait en termes si formels que Javert n'en douta pas. Il se borna à dire: c'est là le bon écrou. Puis il jeta le journal, et n'y pensa plus.

Quelque temps après il arriva qu'une note de police fut transmise par la préfecture de Seine-et-Oise à la préfecture de police de Paris sur l'enlèvement d'un enfant, qui avait eu lieu, disait-on, avec des circonstances particulières, dans la commune de Montfermeil. Une petite fille de sept à huit ans, disait la note, qui avait été confiée par sa mère à un aubergiste du pays, avait été volée par un inconnu; cette petite répondait au nom de Cosette et était l'enfant d'une fille nommée Fantine, morte à l'hôpital, on ne savait quand ni où. Cette note passa sous les yeux de Javert, et le rendit rêveur.

Le nom de Fantine lui était bien connu. Il se souvenait que Jean Valjean l'avait fait éclater de rire, lui Javert, en lui demandant un répit de trois jours pour aller chercher l'enfant de cette créature. Il se rappela que Jean Valjean avait été arrêté à Paris au moment où il montait dans la voiture de Montfermeil. Quelques indications avaient même fait songer à cette époque que c'était la seconde fois qu'il montait dans cette voiture, et qu'il avait déjà, la veille, fait une première excursion aux environs de ce village, car on ne l'avait point vu dans le village même. Qu'allait-il faire dans ce pays de Montfermeil? on ne l'avait pu deviner. Javert le comprenait maintenant. La fille de Fantine s'y trouvait. Jean Valjean l'allait chercher. Or, cette enfant venait d'être volée par un inconnu. Quel pouvait être cet inconnu? Serait-ce Jean Valjean? mais Jean Valjean était mort. Javert, sans rien dire à personne, prit le coucou du Plat d'étain, cul-de-sac de la Planchette, et fit le voyage de Montfermeil.

Il s'attendait à trouver là un grand éclaircissement; il y trouva une grande obscurité.

Dans les premiers jours, les Thénardier, dépités, avaient jasé. La disparition de l'Alouette avait fait bruit dans le village. Il y avait eu tout de suite plusieurs versions de l'histoire qui avait fini par être un vol d'enfant. De là, la note de police. Cependant, la première humeur passée, le Thénardier, avec son admirable instinct, avait très vite compris qu'il n'est jamais utile d'émouvoir monsieur le procureur du roi, et que ses plaintes à propos de l'enlèvement de Cosette auraient pour premier résultat de fixer sur lui, Thénardier, et sur beaucoup d'affaires troubles qu'il avait, l'étincelante prunelle de la justice. La première chose que les hiboux ne veulent pas, c'est qu'on leur apporte une chandelle. Et d'abord, comment se tirerait-il des quinze cents francs qu'il avait reçus? Il tourna court, mit un bâillon à sa femme, et fit l'étonné quand on lui parlait de l'enfant volé. Il n'y comprenait rien; sans doute il s'était plaint dans le moment de ce qu'on lui «enlevait» si vite cette chère petite; il eût voulu par tendresse la garder encore deux ou trois jours; mais c'était son «grand-père» qui était venu la chercher le plus naturellement du monde. Il avait ajouté le grand-père, qui faisait bien. Ce fut sur cette histoire que Javert tomba en arrivant à Montfermeil. Le grand-père faisait évanouir Jean Valjean.

Javert pourtant enfonça quelques questions, comme des sondes, dans l’histoire de Thénardier. — Qu’était-ce que ce grand-père, et comment s’appelait-il? — Thénardier répondit avec simplicité: — C’est un riche cultivateur. J’ai vu son passeport. Je crois qu’il s’appelle Mr Guillaume Lambert.

Lambert est un nom bonhomme et très rassurant. Javert s’en revint à Paris.

— Le Jean Valjean est bien mort, se dit-il, et je suis un jobard.

Il recommençait à oublier toute cette histoire, lorsque, dans le courant de mars 1824, il entendit parler d’un personnage bizarre qui habitait sur la paroisse de Saint-Médard et qu’on surnommait «le mendiant qui fait l’aumône». Ce personnage était, disait-on, un rentier dont personne ne savait au juste le nom et qui vivait seul avec une petite fille de huit ans, laquelle ne savait rien elle-même sinon qu’elle venait de Montfermeil. Montfermeil! ce nom revenait toujours, et fit dresser l’oreille à Javert. Un vieux mendiant mouchard, ancien bedeau, auquel ce personnage faisait la charité, ajoutait quelques autres détails. — Ce rentier était un être très farouche, — ne sortant jamais que le soir, — ne parlant à personne, — qu’aux pauvres quelquefois, — et ne se laissant pas approcher. Il portait une horrible vieille redingote jaune qui valait plusieurs millions, étant toute cousue de billets de banque. — Ceci piqua décidément la curiosité de Javert. Afin de voir ce rentier fantastique de très près sans l’effaroucher, il emprunta un jour au bedeau sa défroque et la place où le vieux mouchard s’accroupissait tous les soirs en nasillant des oraisons et en espionnant à travers la prière.

«L’individu suspect» vint en effet à Javert ainsi travesti, et lui fit l’aumône. En ce moment Javert leva la tête, et la secousse que reçut Jean Valjean en croyant reconnaître Javert, Javert la reçut en croyant reconnaître Jean Valjean.

Cependant l’obscurité avait pu le tromper; la mort de Jean Valjean était officielle; il restait à Javert des doutes, et des doutes graves; et dans le doute Javert, l’homme du scrupule, ne mettait la main au collet de personne.

Il suivit son homme jusqu’à la masure Gorbeau, et fit parler «la vieille», ce qui n’était pas malaisé. La vieille lui confirma le fait de la redingote doublée de millions, et lui conta l’épisode du billet de mille francs. Elle avait vu! elle avait touché! Javert loua une chambre. Le soir même il s’y installa. Il vint écouter à la porte du locataire mystérieux, espérant entendre le son de sa voix, mais Jean Valjean aperçut sa chandelle à travers la serrure et déjoua l’espion en gardant le silence.

Le lendemain Jean Valjean décampait. Mais le bruit de la pièce de cinq francs qu’il laissa tomber fut remarqué de la vieille qui, entendant remuer de l’argent, songea qu’on allait déménager et se hâta de prévenir Javert. À la nuit, lorsque Jean Valjean sortit, Javert l’attendait derrière les arbres du boulevard avec deux hommes.

Javert avait réclamé main-forte à la préfecture, mais il n’avait pas dit le nom de l’individu qu’il espérait saisir. C’était son secret; et il l’avait gardé pour trois raisons: d’abord, parce que la moindre indiscrétion pouvait donner l’éveil à Jean Valjean; ensuite, parce que mettre la main sur un vieux forçat évadé et réputé mort, sur un condamné que les notes de justice avaient jadis classé à jamais parmi les malfaiteurs de l’espèce la plus dangereuse, c’était un magnifique succès que les anciens de la police parisienne ne laisseraient certainement pas à un nouveau venu comme Javert, et qu’il craignait qu’on ne lui prît son galérien; enfin, parce que Javert, étant un artiste, avait le goût de l’imprévu. Il haïssait ces succès annoncés qu’on déflore en en parlant longtemps d’avance. Il tenait à élaborer ses chefs-d’œuvre dans l’ombre et à les dévoiler ensuite brusquement.

Javert avait suivi Jean Valjean d’arbre en arbre, puis de coin de rue en coin de rue, et ne l’avait pas perdu de vue un seul instant. Même dans les moments où Jean Valjean se croyait le plus en sûreté, l’œil de Javert était sur lui.

Pourquoi Javert n’arrêtait-il pas Jean Valjean? c’est qu’il doutait encore.

Il faut se souvenir qu’à cette époque la police n’était pas précisément à son aise; la presse libre la gênait. Quelques arrestations arbitraires, dénoncées par les journaux, avaient retenti jusqu’aux chambres, et rendu la préfecture timide. Attenter à la liberté individuelle était un fait grave. Les agents craignaient de se tromper; le préfet s’en prenait à eux; une erreur, c’était la destitution. Se figure-t-on l’effet qu’eût fait dans Paris ce bref entrefilet reproduit par vingt journaux: — Hier, un vieux grand-père en cheveux blancs, rentier respectable, qui se promenait avec sa petite-fille âgée de huit ans, a été arrêté et conduit au Dépôt de la Préfecture comme forçat évadé! Répétons en outre que Javert avait ses scrupules à lui; les recommandations de sa conscience s’ajoutaient aux recommandations du préfet. Il doutait réellement.

Jean Valjean tournait le dos et marchait dans l’obscurité.

La tristesse, l’inquiétude, l’anxiété, l’accablement, ce nouveau malheur d’être obligé de s’enfuir la nuit et de chercher un asile au hasard dans Paris pour Cosette et pour lui, la nécessité de régler son pas sur le pas d’un enfant, tout cela, à son insu même, avait changé la démarche de Jean Valjean et imprimé à son habitude de corps une telle sénilité que la police elle-même, incarnée dans Javert, pouvait s’y tromper, et s’y trompa. L’impossibilité d’approcher de trop près, son costume de vieux précepteur émigré, la déclaration de Thénardier qui le faisait grand-père, enfin la croyance de sa mort au bagne, ajoutaient encore aux incertitudes qui s’épaississaient dans l’esprit de Javert.

Il eut un moment l’idée de lui demander brusquement ses papiers. Mais si cet homme n’était pas Jean Valjean, et si cet homme n’était pas un bon vieux rentier honnête, c’était probablement quelque gaillard profondément et savamment mêlé à la trame obscure des méfaits parisiens, quelque chef de bande dangereux, faisant l’aumône pour cacher ses autres talents, vieille rubrique. Il avait des affidés, des complices, des logis en-cas où il allait se réfugier sans doute. Tous ces détours qu’il faisait dans les rues semblaient indiquer que ce n’était pas un simple bonhomme. L’arrêter trop vite, c’était «tuer la poule aux œufs d’or». Où était l’inconvénient d’attendre? Javert était bien sûr qu’il n’échapperait pas.

Il cheminait donc assez perplexe, en se posant cent questions sur ce personnage énigmatique.

Ce ne fut qu’assez tard, rue de Pontoise, que, grâce à la vive clarté que jetait un cabaret, il reconnut décidément Jean Valjean. Il y a dans ce monde deux êtres qui tressaillent profondément: la mère qui retrouve son enfant, et le tigre qui retrouve sa proie. Javert eut ce tressaillement profond.

Dès qu’il eut positivement reconnu Jean Valjean, le forçat redoutable, il s’aperçut qu’ils n’étaient que trois, et il fit demander du renfort au commissaire de police de la rue de Pontoise. Avant d’empoigner un bâton d’épines, on met des gants.

Ce retard et la station au carrefour Rollin pour se concerter avec ses agents faillirent lui faire perdre la piste. Cependant, il eut bien vite deviné que Jean Valjean voudrait placer la rivière entre ses chasseurs et lui. Il pencha la tête et réfléchit comme un limier qui met le nez à terre pour être juste à la voie. Javert, avec sa puissante rectitude d'instinct, alla droit au pont d'Austerlitz. Un mot au péager le mit au fait: — Avez-vous vu un homme avec une petite fille? — Je lui ai fait payer deux sous, répondit le péager. Javert arriva sur le pont à temps pour voir de l'autre côté de l'eau Jean Valjean traverser avec Cosette à la main l'espace éclairé par la lune. Il le vit s'engager dans la rue du Chemin-Vert-Saint-Antoine; il songea au cul-de-sac Genrot disposé là comme une trappe et à l'issue unique de la rue Droit-Mur sur la petite rue Picpus. Il assura les grands devants, comme parlent les chasseurs; il envoya en hâte par un détour un de ses agents garder cette issue. Une patrouille, qui rentrait au poste de l'Arsenal, ayant passé, il la requit et s'en fit accompagner. Dans ces parties-là, les soldats sont des atouts. D'ailleurs, c'est le principe que, pour venir à bout d'un sanglier, il faut faire science de veneur et force de chiens. Ces dispositions combinées, sentant Jean Valjean saisi entre l'impasse Genrot à droite, son agent à gauche, et lui Javert derrière, il prit une prise de tabac.

Puis il se mit à jouer. Il eut un moment ravissant et infernal; il laissa aller son homme devant lui, sachant qu'il le tenait, mais désirant reculer le plus possible le moment de l'arrêter, heureux de le sentir pris et de le voir libre, le couvant du regard avec cette volupté de l'araignée qui laisse voleter la mouche et du chat qui laisse courir la souris. La griffe et la serre ont une sensualité monstrueuse; c'est le mouvement obscur de la bête emprisonnée dans leur tenaille. Quel délice que cet étouffement!

Javert jouissait. Les mailles de son filet étaient solidement attachées. Il était sûr du succès; il n'avait plus maintenant qu'à fermer la main.

Accompagné comme il l'était, l'idée même de la résistance était impossible, si énergique, si vigoureux, et si désespéré que fût Jean Valjean.

Javert avança lentement, sondant et fouillant sur son passage tous les recoins de la rue comme les poches d'un voleur.

Quand il arriva au centre de sa toile, il n'y trouva plus la mouche.

On imagine son exaspération.

Il interrogea sa vedette des rues Droit-Mur et Picpus; cet agent, resté imperturbable à son poste, n'avait point vu passer l'homme.

Il arrive quelquefois qu'un cerf est brisé la tête couverte, c'est-à-dire s'échappe, quoique ayant la meute sur le corps, et alors les plus vieux chasseurs ne savent que dire. Duvivier, Ligniville et Desprez restent court. Dans une déconvenue de ce genre, Artonge s'écria: Ce n'est pas un cerf, c'est un sorcier.

Javert eût volontiers jeté le même cri.

Son désappointement tint un moment du désespoir et de la fureur. Il est certain que Napoléon fit des fautes dans la guerre de Russie, qu'Alexandre fit des fautes dans la guerre de l'Inde, que César fit des fautes dans la guerre d'Afrique, que Cyrus fit des fautes dans la guerre de Scythie, et que Javert fit des fautes dans cette campagne contre Jean Valjean. Il eut tort peut-être d'hésiter à reconnaître l'ancien galérien. Le premier coup d'œil aurait dû lui suffire. Il eut tort de ne pas l'appréhender purement et simplement dans la masure. Il eut tort de ne pas l'arrêter quand il le reconnut positivement rue de Pontoise. Il eut tort de se concerter avec ses auxiliaires en plein clair de lune dans le carrefour Rollin; certes, les avis sont utiles, et il est bon de connaître et d'interroger ceux des chiens qui méritent créance. Mais le chasseur ne saurait prendre trop de précautions quand il chasse des animaux inquiets, comme le loup et le forçat. Javert, en se préoccupant trop de mettre les limiers de meute sur la voie, alarma la bête en lui donnant vent du trait et la fit partir. Il eut tort surtout, dès qu'il eut retrouvé la piste au pont d'Austerlitz, de jouer ce jeu formidable et puéril de tenir un pareil homme au bout d'un fil. Il s'estima plus fort qu'il n'était, et crut pouvoir jouer à la souris avec un lion. En même temps, il s'estima trop faible quand il jugea nécessaire de s'adjoindre du renfort. Précaution fatale, perte d'un temps précieux. Javert commit toutes ces fautes, et n'en était pas moins un des espions les plus savants et les plus corrects qui aient existé. Il était, dans toute la force du terme, ce qu'en vénerie on appelle un chien sage. Mais qui est-ce qui est parfait?

Les grands stratégistes ont leurs éclipses.

Les fortes sottises sont souvent faites, comme les grosses cordes, d'une multitude de brins. Prenez le câble fil à fil, prenez séparément tous les petits motifs déterminants, vous les cassez l'un après l'autre, et vous dites: Ce n'est que cela! Tressez-les et tordez-les ensemble, c'est une énormité; c'est Attila qui hésite entre Marcien à l'Orient et Valentinien à l'Occident; c'est Annibal qui s'attarde à Capoue; c'est Danton qui s'endort à Arcis-sur-Aube. Quoi qu'il en soit, au moment même où il s'aperçut que Jean Valjean lui échappait, Javert ne perdit pas la tête. Sûr que le forçat en rupture de ban ne pouvait être bien loin, il établit des guets, il organisa des souricières et des embuscades et battit le quartier toute la nuit. La première chose qu'il vit, ce fut le désordre du réverbère, dont la corde était coupée. Indice précieux, qui l'égara pourtant en ce qu'il fit dévier toutes ses recherches vers le cul-de-sac Genrot. Il y a dans ce cul-de-sac des murs assez bas qui donnent sur des jardins dont les enceintes touchent à d’immenses terrains en friche. Jean Valjean avait dû évidemment s’enfuir par là. Le fait est que, s’il eût pénétré un peu plus avant dans le cul-de-sac Genrot, il l’eût fait probablement, et il était perdu. Javert explora ces jardins et ces terrains comme s’il y eût cherché une aiguille.

Au point du jour, il laissa deux hommes intelligents en observation et il regagna la préfecture de police, honteux comme un mouchard qu’un voleur aurait pris.

Livre sixième — Le Petit-Picpus

Chapitre I

Petite rue Picpus, numéro 62

Rien ne ressemblait plus, il y a un demi-siècle, à la première porte cochère venue que la porte cochère du numéro 62 de la petite rue Picpus. Cette porte, habituellement entrouverte de la façon la plus engageante, laissait voir deux choses qui n’ont rien de très funèbre, une cour entourée de murs tapissés de vigne et la face d’un portier qui flâne. Au-dessus du mur du fond on apercevait de grands arbres. Quand un rayon de soleil égayait la cour, quand un verre de vin égayait le portier, il était difficile de passer devant le numéro 62 de la petite rue Picpus sans en emporter une idée riante. C’était pourtant un lieu sombre qu’on avait entrevu.

Le seuil souriait; la maison priait et pleurait.

Si l’on parvenait, ce qui n’était point facile, à franchir le portier, — ce qui même pour presque tous était impossible, car il y avait un sésame, ouvre-toi! qu’il fallait savoir; — si, le portier franchi, on entrait à droite dans un petit vestibule où donnait un escalier resserré entre deux murs et si étroit qu’il n’y pouvait passer qu’une personne à la fois, si l’on ne se laissait pas effrayer par le badigeonnage jaune serin avec soubassement chocolat qui enduisait cet escalier, si l’on s’aventurait à monter, on dépassait un premier palier, puis un deuxième, et l’on arrivait au premier étage dans un corridor où la détrempe jaune et la plinthe chocolat vous suivaient avec un acharnement paisible. Escalier et corridor étaient éclairés par deux belles fenêtres. Le corridor faisait un coude et devenait obscur. Si l’on doublait ce cap, on parvenait après quelques pas devant une porte d’autant plus mystérieuse qu’elle n’était pas fermée. On la poussait, et l’on se trouvait dans une petite chambre d’environ six pieds carrés, carrelée, lavée, propre, froide, tendue de papier nankin à fleurettes vertes, à quinze sous le rouleau. Un jour blanc et mat venait d’une grande fenêtre à petits carreaux qui était à gauche et qui tenait toute la largeur de la chambre. On regardait, on ne voyait personne; on écoutait, on n’entendait ni un pas ni un murmure humain. La muraille était nue; la chambre n’était point meublée; pas une chaise.

On regardait encore, et l’on voyait au mur en face de la porte un trou quadrangulaire d’environ un pied carré, grillé d’une grille en fer à barreaux entre-croisés, noirs, noueux, solides, lesquels formaient des carreaux, j'ai presque dit des mailles, de moins d'un pouce et demi de diagonale. Les petites fleurettes vertes du papier nankin arrivaient avec calme et en ordre jusqu'à ces barreaux de fer, sans que ce contact funèbre les effarouchât et les fît tourbillonner. En supposant qu'un être vivant eût été assez admirablement maigre pour essayer d'entrer ou de sortir par le trou carré, cette grille l'en eût empêché. Elle ne laissait point passer le corps, mais elle laissait passer les yeux, c'est-à-dire l'esprit. Il semblait qu'on eût songé à cela, car on l'avait doublée d'une lame de fer-blanc sertie dans la muraille un peu en arrière et piquée de mille trous plus microscopiques que les trous d'une écumoire. Au bas de cette plaque était percée une ouverture tout à fait pareille à la bouche d'une boîte aux lettres. Un ruban de fil attaché à un mouvement de sonnette pendait à droite du trou grillé.

Si l'on agitait ce ruban, une clochette tintait et l'on entendait une voix, tout près de soi, ce qui faisait tressaillir.

— Qui est là? demandait la voix.

C'était une voix de femme, une voix douce, si douce qu'elle en était lugubre.

Ici encore il y avait un mot magique qu'il fallait savoir. Si on ne le savait pas, la voix se taisait, et le mur redevenait silencieux comme si l'obscurité effarée du sépulcre eût été de l'autre côté.

Si l'on savait le mot, la voix reprenait:

— Entrez à droite.

On remarquait alors à sa droite, en face de la fenêtre, une porte vitrée surmontée d'un châssis vitré et peinte en gris. On soulevait le loquet, on franchissait la porte, et l'on éprouvait absolument la même impression que lorsqu'on entre au spectacle dans une baignoire grillée avant que la grille soit baissée et que le lustre soit allumé. On était en effet dans une espèce de loge de théâtre, à peine éclairée par le jour vague de la porte vitrée, étroite, meublée de deux vieilles chaises et d'un paillasson tout démaillé, véritable loge avec sa devanture à hauteur d'appui qui portait une tablette en bois noir. Cette loge était grillée, seulement ce n'était pas une grille de bois doré comme à l'Opéra, c'était un monstrueux treillis de barres de fer affreusement enchevêtrées et scellées au mur par des scellements énormes qui ressemblaient à des poings fermés.

Les premières minutes passées, quand le regard commençait à se faire à ce demi-jour de cave, il essayait de franchir la grille, mais il n'allait pas plus loin que six pouces au delà. Là il rencontrait une barrière de volets noirs, assurés et fortifiés de traverses de bois peintes en jaune pain d'épice. Ces volets étaient à jointures, divisés en longues lames minces, et masquaient toute la longueur de la grille. Ils étaient toujours clos.

Au bout de quelques instants, on entendait une voix qui vous appelait de derrière ces volets et qui vous disait:

— Je suis là. Que me voulez-vous?

C'était une voix aimée, quelquefois une voix adorée. On ne voyait personne. On entendait à peine le bruit d'un souffle. Il semblait que ce fût une évocation qui vous parlait à travers la cloison de la tombe.

Si l'on était dans de certaines conditions voulues, bien rares, l'étroite lame d'un des volets s'ouvrait en face de vous, et l'évocation devenait une apparition. Derrière la grille, derrière le volet, on apercevait, autant que la grille permettait d'apercevoir, une tête dont on ne voyait que la bouche et le menton; le reste était couvert d'un voile noir. On entrevoyait une guimpe noire et une forme à peine distincte couverte d'un suaire noir. Cette tête vous parlait, mais ne vous regardait pas et ne vous souriait jamais.

Le jour qui venait de derrière vous était disposé de telle façon que vous la voyiez blanche et qu'elle vous voyait noir. Ce jour était un symbole.

Cependant les yeux plongeaient avidement par cette ouverture qui s'était faite dans ce lieu clos à tous les regards. Un vague profond enveloppait cette forme vêtue de deuil. Les yeux fouillaient ce vague et cherchaient à démêler ce qui était autour de l'apparition. Au bout de très peu de temps on s'apercevait qu'on ne voyait rien. Ce qu'on voyait, c'était la nuit, le vide, les ténèbres, une brume de l'hiver mêlée à une vapeur du tombeau, une sorte de paix effrayante, un silence où l'on ne recueillait rien, pas même des soupirs, une ombre où l'on ne distinguait rien, pas même des fantômes.

Ce qu'on voyait, c'était l'intérieur d'un cloître.

C'était l'intérieur de cette maison morne et sévère qu'on appelait le couvent des bernardines de l'Adoration Perpétuelle. Cette loge où l'on était, c'était le parloir. Cette voix, la première qui vous avait parlé, c'était la voix de la tourière qui était toujours assise, immobile et silencieuse, de l'autre côté du mur, près de l'ouverture carrée, défendue par la grille de fer et par la plaque à mille trous comme par une double visière.

L'obscurité où plongeait la loge grillée venait de ce que le parloir qui avait une fenêtre du côté du monde n'en avait aucune du côté du couvent. Les yeux profanes ne devaient rien voir de ce lieu sacré.

Pourtant il y avait quelque chose au delà de cette ombre, il y avait une lumière; il y avait une vie dans cette mort. Quoique ce couvent fût le plus muré de tous, nous allons essayer d’y pénétrer et d’y faire pénétrer le lecteur, et de dire, sans oublier la mesure, des choses que les raconteurs n’ont jamais vues et par conséquent jamais dites.

Chapitre II

L’obédience de Martin Verga

Ce couvent, qui en 1824 existait depuis longues années déjà petite rue Picpus, était une communauté de bernardines de l’obédience de Martin Verga.

Ces bernardines, par conséquent, se rattachaient non à Clairvaux, comme les bernardins, mais à Cîteaux, comme les bénédictins. En d’autres termes, elles étaient sujettes, non de saint Bernard, mais de saint Benoît.

Quiconque a un peu remué des in-folio sait que Martin Verga fonda en 1425 une congrégation de bernardines-bénédictines, ayant pour chef d’ordre Salamanque et pour succursale Alcala.

Cette congrégation avait poussé des rameaux dans tous les pays catholiques de l’Europe.

Ces greffes d’un ordre sur l’autre n’ont rien d’inusité dans l’église latine. Pour ne parler que du seul ordre de saint Benoît dont il est ici question, à cet ordre se rattachent, sans compter l’obédience de Martin Verga, quatre congrégations: deux en Italie, le Mont-Cassin et Sainte-Justine de Padoue, deux en France, Cluny et Saint-Maur; et neuf ordres, Valombrosa, Grammont, les célestins, les camaldules, les chartreux, les humiliés, les olivateurs, et les silvestrins, enfin Cîteaux; car Cîteaux lui-même, tronc pour d’autres ordres, n’est qu’un rejeton pour saint Benoît. Cîteaux date de saint Robert, abbé de Molesme dans le diocèse de Langres en 1098. Or c’est en 529 que le diable, retiré au désert de Subiaco (il était vieux; s’était-il fait ermite?), fut chassé de l’ancien temple d’Apollon où il demeurait, par saint Benoît, âgé de dix-sept ans.

Après la règle des carmélites, lesquelles vont pieds nus, portent une pièce d’osier sur la gorge et ne s’asseyent jamais, la règle la plus dure est celle des bernardines-bénédictines de Martin Verga. Elles sont vêtues de noir avec une guimpe qui, selon la prescription expresse de saint Benoît, monte jusqu’au menton. Une robe de serge à manches larges, un grand voile de laine, la guimpe qui monte jusqu’au menton coupée carrément sur la poitrine, le bandeau qui descend jusqu’aux yeux, voilà leur habit. Tout est noir, excepté le bandeau qui est blanc. Les novices portent le même habit, tout blanc. Les professes ont en outre un rosaire au côté.

Les bernardines-bénédictines de Martin Verga pratiquent l’Adoration Perpétuelle, comme les bénédictines dites dames du Saint-Sacrement, lesquelles, au commencement de ce siècle, avaient à Paris deux maisons, l’une au Temple, l’autre rue Neuve-Sainte-Geneviève. Du reste les bernardines-bénédictines du Petit-Picpus, dont nous parlons, étaient un ordre absolument autre que les dames du Saint-Sacrement cloîtrées rue Neuve-Sainte-Geneviève et au Temple. Il y avait de nombreuses différences dans la règle; il y en avait dans le costume. Les bernardines-bénédictines du Petit-Picpus portaient la guimpe noire, et les bénédictines du Saint-Sacrement et de la rue Neuve-Sainte-Geneviève la portaient blanche, et avaient de plus sur la poitrine un Saint-Sacrement d’environ trois pouces de haut en vermeil ou en cuivre doré. Les religieuses du Petit-Picpus ne portaient point ce Saint-Sacrement. L’Adoration Perpétuelle, commune à la maison du Petit-Picpus et à la maison du Temple, laisse les deux ordres parfaitement distincts. Il y a seulement ressemblance pour cette pratique entre les dames du Saint-Sacrement et les bernardines de Martin Verga, de même qu’il y avait similitude, pour l’étude et la glorification de tous les mystères relatifs à l’enfance, à la vie et à la mort de Jésus-Christ, et à la Vierge, entre deux ordres pourtant fort séparés et dans l’occasion ennemis, l’oratoire d’Italie, établi à Florence par Philippe de Néri, et l’oratoire de France, établi à Paris par Pierre de Bérulle. L’oratoire de Paris prétendait le pas, Philippe de Néri n’étant que saint, et Bérulle étant cardinal.

Revenons à la dure règle espagnole de Martin Verga.

Les bernardines-bénédictines de cette obédience font maigre toute l’année, jeûnent le carême et beaucoup d’autres jours qui leur sont spéciaux, se relèvent dans leur premier sommeil depuis une heure du matin jusqu’à trois pour lire le bréviaire et chanter matines, couchent dans des draps de serge en toute saison et sur la paille, n’usent point de bains, n’allument jamais de feu, se donnent la discipline tous les vendredis, observent la règle du silence, ne se parlent qu’aux récréations, lesquelles sont très courtes, et portent des chemises de bure pendant six mois, du 14 septembre, qui est l’exaltation de la sainte-croix, jusqu’à Pâques. Ces six mois sont une modération, la règle dit toute l’année; mais cette chemise de bure, insupportable dans les chaleurs de l’été, produisait des fièvres et des spasmes nerveux. Il a fallu en restreindre l’usage. Même avec cet adoucissement, le 14 septembre, quand les religieuses mettent cette chemise, elles ont trois ou quatre jours de fièvre. Obéissance, pauvreté, chasteté, stabilité sous clôture; voilà leurs vœux, fort aggravés par la règle.

La prieure est élue pour trois ans par les mères, qu’on appelle mères vocales parce qu’elles ont voix au chapitre. Une prieure ne peut être réélue que deux fois, ce qui fixe à neuf ans le plus long règne possible d’une prieure.

Elles ne voient jamais le prêtre officiant, qui leur est toujours caché par une serge tendue à neuf pieds de haut. Au sermon, quand le prédicateur est dans la chapelle, elles baissent leur voile sur leur visage. Elles doivent toujours parler bas, marcher les yeux à terre et la tête inclinée. Un seul homme peut entrer dans le couvent, l’archevêque diocésain.

Il y en a bien un autre, qui est le jardinier; mais c’est toujours un vieillard, et afin qu’il soit perpétuellement seul dans le jardin et que les religieuses soient averties de l’éviter, on lui attache une clochette au genou.

Elles sont soumises à la prieure d’une soumission absolue et passive. C’est la sujétion canonique dans toute son abnégation. Comme à la voix du Christ, ut voci Christi, au geste, au premier signe, ad nutum, ad primum signum, tout de suite, avec bonheur, avec persévérance, avec une certaine obéissance aveugle, prompte, hilariter perseveranter et caeca quadam obedientia, comme la lime dans la main de l’ouvrier, quasi limam in manibus fabri, ne pouvant lire ni écrire quoi que ce soit sans permission expresse, legere vel scribere non addiscerit sine expressa superioris licentia.

À tour de rôle chacune d’elles fait ce qu’elles appellent la réparation. La réparation, c’est la prière pour tous les péchés, pour toutes les fautes, pour tous les désordres, pour toutes les violations, pour toutes les iniquités, pour tous les crimes qui se commettent sur la terre. Pendant douze heures consécutives, de quatre heures du soir à quatre heures du matin, ou de quatre heures du matin à quatre heures du soir, la sœur qui fait la réparation reste à genoux sur la pierre devant le Saint-Sacrement, les mains jointes, la corde au cou. Quand la fatigue devient insupportable, elle se prosterne à plat ventre, la face contre terre, les bras en croix; c’est là tout son soulagement. Dans cette attitude, elle prie pour tous les coupables de l’univers. Ceci est grand jusqu’au sublime.

Comme cet acte s’accomplit devant un poteau au haut duquel brûle un cierge, on dit indistinctement faire la réparation ou être au poteau. Les religieuses préfèrent même, par humilité, cette dernière expression qui contient une idée de supplice et d’abaissement.

Faire la réparation est une fonction où toute l’âme s’absorbe. La sœur au poteau ne se retournerait pas pour le tonnerre tombant derrière elle.

En outre, il y a toujours une religieuse à genoux devant le Saint-Sacrement. Cette station dure une heure. Elles se relèvent comme des soldats en faction. C’est là l’Adoration Perpétuelle.

Les prieures et les mères portent presque toujours des noms empreints d’une gravité particulière, rappelant, non des saintes et des martyres, mais des moments de la vie de Jésus-Christ, comme la mère Nativité, la mère Conception, la mère Présentation, la mère Passion. Cependant les noms de saintes ne sont pas interdits.

Quand on les voit, on ne voit jamais que leur bouche. Toutes ont les dents jaunes. Jamais une brosse à dents n’est entrée dans le couvent. Se brosser les dents, est au haut d’une échelle au bas de laquelle il y a: perdre son âme.

Elles ne disent de rien ma ni mon. Elles n’ont rien à elles et ne doivent tenir à rien. Elles disent de toute chose notre; ainsi: notre voile, notre chapelet; si elles parlaient de leur chemise, elles diraient notre chemise. Quelquefois elles s’attachent à quelque petit objet, à un livre d’heures, à une relique, à une médaille bénite. Dès qu’elles s’aperçoivent qu’elles commencent à tenir à cet objet, elles doivent le donner. Elles se rappellent le mot de sainte Thérèse à laquelle une grande dame, au moment d’entrer dans son ordre, disait: Permettez, ma mère, que j’envoie chercher une sainte bible à laquelle je tiens beaucoup. — Ah! vous tenez à quelque chose! En ce cas, n’entrez pas chez nous.

Défense à qui que ce soit de s’enfermer, et d’avoir un chez-soi, une chambre. Elles vivent cellules ouvertes. Quand elles s’abordent, l’une dit: Loué soit et adoré le très Saint-Sacrement de l’autel! L’autre répond: À jamais. Même cérémonie quand l’une frappe à la porte de l’autre. À peine la porte a-t-elle été touchée qu’on entend de l’autre côté une voix douce dire précipitamment: À jamais! Comme toutes les pratiques, cela devient machinal par l’habitude; et l’une dit quelquefois à jamais avant que l’autre ait eu le temps de dire, ce qui est assez long d’ailleurs: Loué soit et adoré le très Saint-Sacrement de l’autel! Chez les visitandines, celle qui entre dit: Ave Maria, et celle chez laquelle on entre dit: Gratiâ plena. C’est leur bonjour, qui est «plein de grâce» en effet.

À chaque heure du jour, trois coups supplémentaires sonnent à la cloche de l’église du couvent. À ce signal, prieure, mères vocales, professes, converses, novices, postulantes, interrompent ce qu’elles disent, ce qu’elles font ou ce qu’elles pensent, et toutes disent à la fois, s’il est cinq heures, par exemple: — À cinq heures et à toute heure, loué soit et adoré le très Saint-Sacrement de l’autel! S’il est huit heures: — À huit heures et à toute heure, etc., et ainsi de suite, selon l’heure qu’il est.

Cette coutume, qui a pour but de rompre la pensée et de la ramener toujours à Dieu, existe dans beaucoup de communautés; seulement la formule varie. Ainsi, à l’Enfant-Jésus, on dit: — À l’heure qu’il est et à toute heure que l’amour de Jésus enflamme mon cœur!

Les bénédictines-bernardines de Martin Verga, cloîtrées il y a cinquante ans au Petit-Picpus, chantent les offices sur une psalmodie grave, plain-chant pur, et toujours à pleine voix toute la durée de l’office. Partout où il y a un astérisque dans le missel, elles font une pause et disent à voix basse: Jésus-Marie-Joseph. Pour l’office des morts, elles prennent le ton si bas, que c’est à peine si des voix de femmes peuvent descendre jusque-là. Il en résulte un effet saisissant et tragique.

Celles du Petit-Picpus avaient fait faire un caveau sous leur maître-autel pour la sépulture de leur communauté. Le gouvernement, comme elles disent, ne permit pas que ce caveau reçût les cercueils. Elles sortaient donc du couvent quand elles étaient mortes. Ceci les affligeait et les consternait comme une infraction.

Elles avaient obtenu, consolation médiocre, d’être enterrées à une heure spéciale et en un coin spécial dans l’ancien cimetière Vaugirard, qui était fait d’une terre appartenant jadis à leur communauté.

Le jeudi ces religieuses entendent la grand’messe, vêpres et tous les offices comme le dimanche. Elles observent en outre scrupuleusement toutes les petites fêtes, inconnues aux gens du monde, que l’église prodiguait autrefois en France et prodigue encore en Espagne et en Italie. Leurs stations à la chapelle sont interminables. Quant au nombre et à la durée de leurs prières, nous ne pouvons en donner une meilleure idée qu’en citant le mot naïf de l’une d’elles: Les prières des postulantes sont effrayantes, les prières des novices encore pires, et les prières des professes encore pires.

Une fois par semaine, on assemble le chapitre; la prieure préside, les mères vocales assistent. Chaque sœur vient à son tour s’agenouiller sur la pierre, et confesser à haute voix, devant toutes, les fautes et les péchés qu’elle a commis dans la semaine. Les mères vocales se consultent après chaque confession, et infligent tout haut les pénitences.

Outre la confession à haute voix, pour laquelle on réserve toutes les fautes un peu graves, elles ont pour les fautes vénielles ce qu’elles appellent la coulpe. Faire sa coulpe, c’est se prosterner à plat ventre durant l’office devant la prieure jusqu’à ce que celle-ci, qu’on ne nomme jamais que notre mère, avertisse la patiente par un petit coup frappé sur le bois de sa stalle qu’elle peut se relever. On fait sa coulpe pour très peu de chose, un verre cassé, un voile déchiré, un retard involontaire de quelques secondes à un office, une fausse note à l’église, etc., cela suffit, on fait sa coulpe. La coulpe est toute spontanée; c’est la coupable elle-même (ce mot est ici étymologiquement à sa place) qui se juge et qui se l’inflige. Les jours de fêtes et les dimanches il y a quatre mères chantres qui psalmodient les offices devant un grand lutrin à quatre pupitres. Un jour une mère chantre entonna un psaume qui commençait par Ecce, et, au lieu de Ecce, dit à haute voix ces trois notes: ut, si, sol; elle subit pour cette distraction une coulpe qui dura tout l’office. Ce qui rendait la faute énorme, c’est que le chapitre avait ri.

Lorsqu’une religieuse est appelée au parloir, fût-ce la prieure, elle baisse son voile de façon, l’on s’en souvient, à ne laisser voir que sa bouche.

La prieure seule peut communiquer avec des étrangers. Les autres ne peuvent voir que leur famille étroite, et très rarement. Si par hasard une personne du dehors se présente pour voir une religieuse qu’elle a connue ou aimée dans le monde, il faut toute une négociation. Si c’est une femme, l’autorisation peut être quelquefois accordée, la religieuse vient et on lui parle à travers les volets, lesquels ne s’ouvrent que pour une mère ou une sœur. Il va sans dire que la permission est toujours refusée aux hommes.

Telle est la règle de saint Benoît, aggravée par Martin Verga.

Ces religieuses ne sont point gaies, roses et fraîches comme le sont souvent les filles des autres ordres. Elles sont pâles et graves. De 1825 à 1830 trois sont devenues folles.

Chapitre III

Sévérités

On est au moins deux ans postulante, souvent quatre; quatre ans novice. Il est rare que les vœux définitifs puissent être prononcés avant vingt-trois ou vingt-quatre ans. Les bernardines-bénédictines de Martin Verga n'admettent point de veuves dans leur ordre.

Elles se livrent dans leurs cellules à beaucoup de macérations inconnues dont elles ne doivent jamais parler.

Le jour où une novice fait profession, on l'habille de ses plus beaux atours, on la coiffe de roses blanches, on lustre et on boucle ses cheveux, puis elle se prosterne; on étend sur elle un grand voile noir et l'on chante l'office des morts. Alors les religieuses se divisent en deux files, une file passe près d'elle en disant d'un accent plaintif: notre sœur est morte, et l'autre file répond d'une voix éclatante: vivante en Jésus-Christ!

À l'époque où se passe cette histoire, un pensionnat était joint au couvent. Pensionnat de jeunes filles nobles, la plupart riches, parmi lesquelles on remarquait mesdemoiselles de Sainte-Aulaire et de Bélissen et une anglaise portant l'illustre nom catholique de Talbot. Ces jeunes filles, élevées par ces religieuses entre quatre murs, grandissaient dans l'horreur du monde et du siècle. Une d'elles nous disait un jour: Voir le pavé de la rue me faisait frissonner de la tête aux pieds. Elles étaient vêtues de bleu avec un bonnet blanc et un Saint-Esprit de vermeil ou de cuivre fixé sur la poitrine. À de certains jours de grande fête, particulièrement à la Sainte-Marthe, on leur accordait, comme haute faveur et bonheur suprême, de s'habiller en religieuses et de faire les offices et les pratiques de saint Benoît pendant toute une journée. Dans les premiers temps, les religieuses leur prêtaient leurs vêtements noirs. Cela parut profane, et la prieure le défendit. Ce prêt ne fut permis qu'aux novices. Il est remarquable que ces représentations, tolérées sans doute et encouragées dans le couvent par un secret esprit de prosélytisme, et pour donner à ces enfants quelque avant-goût du saint habit, étaient un bonheur réel et une vraie récréation pour les pensionnaires. Elles s'en amusaient tout simplement. C'était nouveau, cela les changeait. Candides raisons de l'enfance qui ne réussissent pas d'ailleurs à faire comprendre à nous mondains cette félicité de tenir en main un goupillon et de rester debout des heures entières chantant à quatre devant un lutrin.

Les élèves, aux austérités près, se conformaient à toutes les pratiques du couvent. Il est telle jeune femme qui, entrée dans le monde et après plusieurs années de mariage, n'était pas encore parvenue à se déshabituer de dire en toute hâte chaque fois qu'on frappait à sa porte: à jamais! Comme les religieuses, les pensionnaires ne voyaient leurs parents qu'au parloir. Leurs mères elles-mêmes n'obtenaient pas de les embrasser. Voici jusqu'où allait la sévérité sur ce point. Un jour une jeune fille fut visitée par sa mère accompagnée d'une petite sœur de trois ans. La jeune fille pleurait, car elle eût bien voulu embrasser sa sœur. Impossible. Elle supplia du moins qu'il fût permis à l'enfant de passer à travers les barreaux sa petite main pour qu'elle pût la baiser. Ceci fut refusé presque avec scandale.

Chapitre IV

Gaîtés

Ces jeunes filles n’en ont pas moins rempli cette grave maison de souvenirs charmants.

À de certaines heures, l’enfance étincelait dans ce cloître. La récréation sonnait. Une porte tournait sur ses gonds. Les oiseaux disaient: Bon! voilà les enfants! Une irruption de jeunesse inondait ce jardin coupé d’une croix comme un linceul. Des visages radieux, des fronts blancs, des yeux ingénus pleins de gaie lumière, toutes sortes d’aurores, s’éparpillaient dans ces ténèbres. Après les psalmodies, les cloches, les sonneries, les glas, les offices, tout à coup éclatait ce bruit des petites filles, plus doux qu’un bruit d’abeilles. La ruche de la joie s’ouvrait, et chacune apportait son miel. On jouait, on s’appelait, on se groupait, on courait; de jolies petites dents blanches jasaient dans des coins; les voiles, de loin, surveillaient les rires, les ombres guettaient les rayons, mais qu’importe! on rayonnait et on riait. Ces quatre murs lugubres avaient leur minute d’éblouissement. Ils assistaient, vaguement blanchis du reflet de tant de joie, à ce doux tourbillonnement d’essaims. C’était comme une pluie de roses traversant ce deuil. Les jeunes filles folâtraient sous l’œil des religieuses; le regard de l’impeccabilité ne gêne pas l’innocence. Grâce à ces enfants, parmi tant d’heures austères, il y avait l’heure naïve. Les petites sautaient, les grandes dansaient. Dans ce cloître, le jeu était mêlé de ciel. Rien n’était ravissant et auguste comme toutes ces fraîches âmes épanouies. Homère fût venu rire là avec Perrault, et il y avait, dans ce jardin noir, de la jeunesse, de la santé, du bruit, des cris, de l’étourdissement, du plaisir, du bonheur, à dérider toutes les aïeules, celles de l’épopée comme celles du conte, celles du trône comme celles du chaume, depuis Hécube jusqu’à la Mère-Grand.

Il s’est dit dans cette maison, plus que partout ailleurs peut-être, de ces mots d’enfants qui ont tant de grâce et qui font rire d’un rire plein de rêverie. C’est entre ces quatre murs funèbres qu’une enfant de cinq ans s’écria un jour: — Ma mère! une grande vient de me dire que je n’ai plus que neuf ans et dix mois à rester ici. Quel bonheur!

C’est encore là qu’eut lieu ce dialogue mémorable:

Une mère vocale. — Pourquoi pleurez-vous, mon enfant?

L’enfant: (six ans), sanglotant: — J’ai dit à Alix que je savais mon histoire de France. Elle me dit que je ne la sais pas, et je la sais.

Alix (la grande, neuf ans). — Non. Elle ne la sait pas.

La mère. — Comment cela, mon enfant?

Alix. — Elle m’a dit d’ouvrir le livre au hasard et de lui faire une question qu’il y a dans le livre, et qu’elle répondrait.

— Eh bien?

— Elle n’a pas répondu.

— Voyons. Que lui avez-vous demandé?

— J’ai ouvert le livre au hasard comme elle disait, et je lui ai demandé la première demande que j’ai trouvée.

— Et qu’est-ce que c’était que cette demande?

— C’était: Qu’arriva-t-il ensuite?

C’est là qu’a été faite cette observation profonde sur une perruche un peu gourmande qui appartenait à une dame pensionnaire:

— Est-elle gentille! elle mange le dessus de sa tartine, comme une personne!

C’est sur une des dalles de ce cloître qu’a été ramassée cette confession, écrite d’avance, pour ne pas l’oublier, par une pécheresse âgée de sept ans:

« — Mon père, je m’accuse d’avoir été avarice.

« — Mon père, je m’accuse d’avoir été adultère.

« — Mon père, je m’accuse d’avoir élevé mes regards vers les monsieurs.»

C’est sur un des bancs de gazon de ce jardin qu’a été improvisé par une bouche rose de six ans ce conte écouté par des yeux bleus de quatre à cinq ans:

« — Il y avait trois petits coqs qui avaient un pays où il y avait beaucoup de fleurs. Ils ont cueilli les fleurs, et ils les ont mises dans leur poche. Après ça, ils ont cueilli les feuilles, et ils les ont mises dans leurs joujoux. Il y avait un loup dans le pays, et il y avait beaucoup de bois; et le loup était dans le bois; et il a mangé les petits coqs.»

Et encore cet autre poème:

« — Il est arrivé un coup de bâton.

«C’est Polichinelle qui l’a donné au chat.

«Ça ne lui a pas fait de bien, ça lui a fait du mal.

«Alors une dame a mis Polichinelle en prison.»

C’est là qu’a été dit, par une petite abandonnée, enfant trouvé que le couvent élevait par charité, ce mot doux et navrant. Elle entendait les autres parler de leurs mères, et elle murmura dans son coin:

— Moi, ma mère n’était pas là quand je suis née!

Il y avait une grosse tourière qu’on voyait toujours se hâter dans les corridors avec son trousseau de clefs et qui se nommait sœur Agathe. Les grandes grandes, au-dessus de dix ans, — l’appelaient Agathoclès.

Le réfectoire, grande pièce oblongue et carrée, qui ne recevait de jour que par un cloître à archivoltes de plain-pied avec le jardin, était obscur et humide, et, comme disent les enfants, — plein de bêtes. Tous les lieux circonvoisins y fournissaient leur contingent d’insectes. Chacun des quatre coins en avait reçu, dans le langage des pensionnaires, un nom particulier et expressif. Il y avait le coin des Araignées, le coin des Chenilles, le coin des Cloportes et le coin des Cricris. Le coin des Cricris était voisin de la cuisine et fort estimé. On y avait moins froid qu’ailleurs. Du réfectoire les noms avaient passé au pensionnat et servaient à y distinguer comme à l’ancien collège Mazarin quatre nations. Toute élève était de l’une de ces quatre nations selon le coin du réfectoire où elle s’asseyait aux heures des repas. Un jour, Mr l’archevêque, faisant la visite pastorale, vit entrer dans la classe où il passait une jolie petite fille toute vermeille avec d’admirables cheveux blonds, il demanda à une autre pensionnaire, charmante brune aux joues fraîches qui était près de lui:

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que celle-ci?

— C’est une araignée, monseigneur.

— Bah! et cette autre?

— C’est un cricri.

— Et celle-là?

— C’est une chenille.

— En vérité! et vous-même?

— Je suis un cloporte, monseigneur.

Chaque maison de ce genre a ses particularités. Au commencement de ce siècle, Écouen était un de ces lieux gracieux et sévères où grandit, dans une ombre presque auguste, l’enfance des jeunes filles. À Écouen, pour prendre rang dans la procession du Saint-Sacrement, on distinguait entre les vierges et les fleuristes. Il y avait aussi «les dais» et «les encensoirs», les unes portant les cordons du dais, les autres encensant le Saint-Sacrement. Les fleurs revenaient de droit aux fleuristes. Quatre “vierges” marchaient en avant. Le matin de ce grand jour, il n’était pas rare d’entendre demander dans le dortoir:

— Qui est-ce qui est vierge?

Madame Campan citait ce mot d’une «petite» de sept ans à une «grande» de seize, qui prenait la tête de la procession pendant qu’elle, la petite, restait à la queue:

— Tu es vierge, toi; moi, je ne le suis pas.

Chapitre V

Distractions

Au-dessus de la porte du réfectoire était écrite en grosses lettres noires cette prière qu'on appelait la Patenôtre blanche, et qui avait pour vertu de mener les gens droit en paradis:

«Petite patenôtre blanche, que Dieu fit, que Dieu dit, que Dieu mit en paradis. Au soir, m'allant coucher, je trouvis (sic) trois anges à mon lit couchés, un aux pieds, deux au chevet, la bonne vierge Marie au milieu, qui me dit que je m'y couchis, que rien ne doutis. Le bon Dieu est mon père, la bonne Vierge est ma mère, les trois apôtres sont mes frères, les trois vierges sont mes sœurs. La chemise où Dieu fut né, mon corps en est enveloppé; la croix Sainte-Marguerite à ma poitrine est écrite; madame la Vierge s'en va sur les champs, Dieu pleurant, rencontrit Mr saint Jean. Monsieur saint Jean, d'où venez-vous? Je viens d'Ave Salus. Vous n'avez pas vu le bon Dieu, si est? Il est dans l'arbre de la croix, les pieds pendants, les mains clouants, un petit chapeau d'épine blanche sur la tête. Qui la dira trois fois au soir, trois fois au matin, gagnera le paradis à la fin.»

En 1827, cette oraison caractéristique avait disparu du mur sous une triple couche de badigeon. Elle achève à cette heure de s'effacer dans la mémoire de quelques jeunes filles d'alors, vieilles femmes aujourd'hui.

Un grand crucifix accroché au mur complétait la décoration de ce réfectoire, dont la porte unique, nous croyons l'avoir dit, s'ouvrait sur le jardin. Deux tables étroites, côtoyées chacune de deux bancs de bois, faisaient deux longues lignes parallèles d'un bout à l'autre du réfectoire. Les murs étaient blancs, les tables étaient noires; ces deux couleurs du deuil sont le seul rechange des couvents. Les repas étaient revêches et la nourriture des enfants eux-mêmes sévère. Un seul plat, viande et légumes mêlés, ou poisson salé, tel était le luxe. Ce bref ordinaire, réservé aux pensionnaires seules, était pourtant une exception. Les enfants mangeaient et se taisaient sous le guet de la mère semainière qui, de temps en temps, si une mouche s'avisait de voler et de bourdonner contre la règle, ouvrait et fermait bruyamment un livre de bois. Ce silence était assaisonné de la vie des saints, lue à haute voix dans une petite chaire à pupitre située au pied du crucifix. La lectrice était une grande élève, de semaine. Il y avait de distance en distance sur la table nue des terrines vernies où les élèves lavaient elles-mêmes leur timbale et leur couvert, et quelquefois jetaient quelque morceau de rebut, viande dure ou poisson gâté; ceci était puni. On appelait ces terrines ronds d'eau.

L'enfant qui rompait le silence faisait une «croix de langue». Où? à terre. Elle léchait le pavé. La poussière, cette fin de toutes les joies, était chargée de châtier ces pauvres petites feuilles de rose, coupables de gazouillement.

Il y avait dans le couvent un livre qui n'a jamais été imprimé qu'à exemplaire unique, et qu'il est défendu de lire. C'est la règle de saint Benoît. Arcane où nul œil profane ne doit pénétrer. Nemo regulas, seu constitutiones nostras, externis communicabit.

Les pensionnaires parvinrent un jour à dérober ce livre, et se mirent à le lire avidement, lecture souvent interrompue par des terreurs d'être surprises qui leur faisaient refermer le volume précipitamment. Elles ne tirèrent de ce grand danger couru qu'un plaisir médiocre. Quelques pages inintelligibles sur les péchés des jeunes garçons, voilà ce qu'elles eurent de «plus intéressant».

Elles jouaient dans une allée du jardin, bordée de quelques maigres arbres fruitiers. Malgré l'extrême surveillance et la sévérité des punitions, quand le vent avait secoué les arbres, elles réussissaient quelquefois à ramasser furtivement une pomme verte, ou un abricot gâté, ou une poire habitée. Maintenant je laisse parler une lettre que j'ai sous les yeux, lettre écrite il y a vingt-cinq ans par une ancienne pensionnaire, aujourd'hui madame la duchesse de — , une des plus élégantes femmes de Paris. Je cite textuellement: «On cache sa poire ou sa pomme, comme on peut. Lorsqu'on monte mettre le voile sur le lit en attendant le souper, on les fourre sous son oreiller et le soir on les mange dans son lit, et lorsqu'on ne peut pas, on les mange dans les commodités.» C'était là une de leurs voluptés les plus vives.

Une fois, c'était encore à l'époque d'une visite de Mr l'archevêque au couvent, une des jeunes filles, mademoiselle Bouchard, qui était un peu Montmorency, gagea qu'elle lui demanderait un jour de congé, énormité dans une communauté si austère. La gageure fut acceptée, mais aucune de celles qui tenaient le pari n'y croyait. Au moment venu, comme l'archevêque passait devant les pensionnaires, mademoiselle Bouchard, à l'indescriptible épouvante de ses compagnes, sortit des rangs, et dit: «Monseigneur, un jour de congé.» Mademoiselle Bouchard était fraîche et grande, avec la plus jolie petite mine rose du monde. Mr de Quélen sourit et dit: Comment donc, ma chère enfant, un jour de congé! Trois jours, s’il vous plaît. J’accorde trois jours. La prieure n’y pouvait rien, l’archevêque avait parlé. Scandale pour le couvent, mais joie pour le pensionnat. Qu’on juge de l’effet.

Ce cloître bourru n’était pourtant pas si bien muré que la vie des passions du dehors, que le drame, que le roman même, n’y pénétrassent. Pour le prouver, nous nous bornerons à constater ici et à indiquer brièvement un fait réel et incontestable, qui d’ailleurs n’a en lui-même aucun rapport et ne tient par aucun fil à l’histoire que nous racontons. Nous mentionnons ce fait pour compléter dans l’esprit du lecteur la physionomie du couvent.

Vers cette époque donc, il y avait dans le couvent une personne mystérieuse qui n’était pas religieuse, qu’on traitait avec grand respect, et qu’on nommait madame Albertine. On ne savait rien d’elle sinon qu’elle était folle, et que dans le monde elle passait pour morte. Il y avait sous cette histoire, disait-on, des arrangements de fortune nécessaires pour un grand mariage.

Cette femme, de trente ans à peine, brune, assez belle, regardait vaguement avec de grands yeux noirs. Voyait-elle? On en doutait. Elle glissait plutôt qu’elle ne marchait; elle ne parlait jamais; on n’était pas bien sûr qu’elle respirât. Ses narines étaient pincées et livides comme après le dernier soupir. Toucher sa main, c’était toucher de la neige. Elle avait une étrange grâce spectrale. Là où elle entrait, on avait froid. Un jour une sœur, la voyant passer, dit à une autre: Elle passe pour morte. — Elle l’est peut-être, répondit l’autre.

On faisait sur madame Albertine cent récits. C’était l’éternelle curiosité des pensionnaires. Il y avait dans la chapelle une tribune qu’on appelait l’Œiil-de-Bœuf. C’est dans cette tribune qui n’avait qu’une baie circulaire, un œil-de-bœuf, que madame Albertine assistait aux offices. Elle y était habituellement seule, parce que de cette tribune, placée au premier étage, on pouvait voir le prédicateur ou l’officiant; ce qui était interdit aux religieuses. Un jour la chaire était occupée par un jeune prêtre de haut rang, Mr le duc de Rohan, pair de France, officier des mousquetaires rouges en 1815 lorsqu’il était prince de Léon, mort après 1830 cardinal et archevêque de Besançon. C’était la première fois que Mr de Rohan prêchait au couvent du Petit-Picpus. Madame Albertine assistait ordinairement aux sermons et aux offices dans un calme parfait et dans une immobilité complète. Ce jour-là, dès qu’elle aperçut Mr de Rohan, elle se dressa à demi, et dit à haute voix dans le silence de la chapelle: Tiens! Auguste! Toute la communauté stupéfaite tourna la tête, le prédicateur leva les yeux, mais madame Albertine était retombée dans son immobilité. Un souffle du monde extérieur, une lueur de vie avait passé un moment sur cette figure éteinte et glacée, puis tout s'était évanoui, et la folle était redevenue cadavre.

Ces deux mots cependant firent jaser tout ce qui pouvait parler dans le couvent. Que de choses dans ce tiens! Auguste! que de révélations! Mr de Rohan s'appelait en effet Auguste. Il était évident que madame Albertine sortait du plus grand monde, puisqu'elle connaissait Mr de Rohan, qu'elle y était elle-même haut placée, puisqu'elle parlait d'un si grand seigneur si familièrement, et qu'elle avait avec lui une relation, de parenté peut-être, mais à coup sûr bien étroite, puisqu'elle savait son «petit nom».

Deux duchesses très sévères, mesdames de Choiseul et de Sérent, visitaient souvent la communauté, où elles pénétraient sans doute en vertu du privilège Magnates mulieres, et faisaient grand'peur au pensionnat. Quand les deux vieilles dames passaient, toutes les pauvres jeunes filles tremblaient et baissaient les yeux.

M. de Rohan était du reste, à son insu, l'objet de l'attention des pensionnaires. Il venait à cette époque d'être fait, en attendant l'épiscopat, grand vicaire de l'archevêque de Paris. C'était une de ses habitudes de venir assez souvent chanter aux offices de la chapelle des religieuses du Petit-Picpus. Aucune des jeunes recluses ne pouvait l'apercevoir, à cause du rideau de serge, mais il avait une voix douce et un peu grêle, qu'elles étaient parvenues à reconnaître et à distinguer. Il avait été mousquetaire; et puis on le disait fort coquet, fort bien coiffé avec de beaux cheveux châtains arrangés en rouleau autour de la tête, et qu'il avait une large ceinture moire magnifique, et que sa soutane noire était coupée le plus élégamment du monde. Il occupait fort toutes ces imaginations de seize ans.

Aucun bruit du dehors ne pénétrait dans le couvent. Cependant il y eut une année où le son d'une flûte y parvint. Ce fut un événement, et les pensionnaires d'alors s'en souviennent encore.

C'était une flûte dont quelqu'un jouait dans le voisinage. Cette flûte jouait toujours le même air, un air aujourd'hui bien lointain: Ma Zétulbé, viens régner sur mon âme, et on l'entendait deux ou trois fois dans la journée. Les jeunes filles passaient des heures à écouter, les mères vocales étaient bouleversées, les cervelles travaillaient, les punitions pleuvaient. Cela dura plusieurs mois. Les pensionnaires étaient toutes plus ou moins amoureuses du musicien inconnu. Chacune se rêvait Zétulbé. Le bruit de flûte venait du côté de la rue Droit-Mur; elles auraient tout donné, tout compromis, tout tenté, pour voir, ne fût-ce qu’une seconde, pour entrevoir, pour apercevoir, le «jeune homme» qui jouait si délicieusement de cette flûte et qui, sans s’en douter, jouait en même temps de toutes ces âmes. Il y en eut qui s’échappèrent par une porte de service et qui montèrent au troisième sur la rue Droit-Mur, afin d’essayer de voir par les jours de souffrance. Impossible. Une alla jusqu’à passer son bras au-dessus de sa tête par la grille et agita son mouchoir blanc. Deux furent plus hardies encore. Elles trouvèrent moyen de grimper jusque sur un toit et s’y risquèrent et réussirent enfin à voir «le jeune homme». C’était un vieux gentilhomme émigré, aveugle et ruiné, qui jouait de la flûte dans son grenier pour se désennuyer.

Chapitre VI

Le petit couvent

Il y avait dans cette enceinte du Petit-Picpus trois bâtiments parfaitement distincts, le grand couvent qu'habitaient les religieuses, le pensionnat où logeaient les élèves, et enfin ce qu'on appelait le petit couvent. C'était un corps de logis avec jardin où demeuraient en commun toutes sortes de vieilles religieuses de divers ordres, restes des cloîtres détruits par la révolution; une réunion de toutes les bigarrures noires, grises et blanches, de toutes les communautés et de toutes les variétés possibles; ce qu'on pourrait appeler, si un pareil accouplement de mots était permis, une sorte de couvent-arlequin.

Dès l'Empire, il avait été accordé à toutes ces pauvres filles dispersées et dépaysées de venir s'abriter là sous les ailes des bénédictines-bernardines. Le gouvernement leur payait une petite pension; les dames du Petit-Picpus les avaient reçues avec empressement. C'était un pêle-mêle bizarre. Chacune suivait sa règle. On permettait quelquefois aux élèves pensionnaires, comme grande récréation, de leur rendre visite; ce qui fait que ces jeunes mémoires ont gardé entre autres le souvenir de la mère Saint-Basile, de la mère Sainte-Scolastique et de la mère Jacob.

Une de ces réfugiées se retrouvait presque chez elle. C'était une religieuse de Sainte-Aure, la seule de son ordre qui eût survécu. L'ancien couvent des dames de Sainte-Aure occupait dès le commencement du XVIIIème siècle précisément cette même maison du Petit-Picpus qui appartint plus tard aux bénédictines de Martin Verga. Cette sainte fille, trop pauvre pour porter le magnifique habit de son ordre, qui était une robe blanche avec le scapulaire écarlate, en avait revêtu pieusement un petit mannequin qu'elle montrait avec complaisance et qu'à sa mort elle a légué à la maison. En 1824, il ne restait de cet ordre qu'une religieuse; aujourd'hui il n'en reste qu'une poupée.

Outre ces dignes mères, quelques vieilles femmes du monde avaient obtenu de la prieure, comme madame Albertine, la permission de se retirer dans le petit couvent. De ce nombre étaient madame de Beaufort d'Hautpoul et madame la marquise Dufresne. Une autre n'a jamais été connue dans le couvent que par le bruit formidable qu’elle faisait en se mouchant. Les élèves l’appelaient madame Vacarmini.

Vers 1820 ou 1821, madame de Genlis, qui rédigeait à cette époque un petit recueil périodique intitulé l’Intrépide, demanda à entrer dame en chambre au couvent du Petit-Picpus. Mr le duc d’Orléans la recommandait. Rumeur dans la ruche; les mères vocales étaient toutes tremblantes. Madame de Genlis avait fait des romans. Mais elle déclara qu’elle était la première à les détester, et puis elle était arrivée à sa phase de dévotion farouche. Dieu aidant, et le prince aussi, elle entra. Elle s’en alla au bout de six ou huit mois, donnant pour raison que le jardin n’avait pas d’ombre. Les religieuses en furent ravies. Quoique très vieille, elle jouait encore de la harpe, et fort bien.

En s’en allant, elle laissa sa marque à sa cellule. Madame de Genlis était superstitieuse et latiniste. Ces deux mots donnent d’elle un assez bon profil. On voyait encore, il y a quelques années, collés dans l’intérieur d’une petite armoire de sa cellule où elle serrait son argent et ses bijoux, ces cinq vers latins écrits de sa main à l’encre rouge sur papier jaune, et qui, dans son opinion, avaient la vertu d’effaroucher les voleurs:

Imparibus meritis pendent tria corpora ramis:
Dismas et Gesmas, media est divina potestas;
Alta petit Dismas, infelix, infima, Gesmas.
Nos et res nostras conservet summa potestas.
Hos versus dicas, ne tu furto tua perdas.

Ces vers, en latin du sixième siècle, soulèvent la question de savoir si les deux larrons du calvaire s’appelaient, comme on le croit communément, Dimas et Gestas, ou Dismas et Gesmas. Cette orthographe eût pu contrarier les prétentions qu’avait, au siècle dernier, le vicomte de Gestas à descendre du mauvais larron. Du reste, la vertu utile attachée à ces vers fait article de foi dans l’ordre des hospitalières.

L’église de la maison, construite de manière à séparer, comme une véritable coupure, le grand couvent du pensionnat, était, bien entendu, commune au pensionnat, au grand couvent et au petit couvent. On y admettait même le public par une sorte d’entrée de lazaret ménagée sur la rue. Mais tout était disposé de façon qu’aucune des habitantes du cloître ne pût voir un visage du dehors. Supposez une église dont le chœur serait saisi par une main gigantesque, et plié de manière à former, non plus, comme dans les églises ordinaires un prolongement derrière l’autel, mais une sorte de salle ou de caverne obscure à la droite de l’officiant; supposez cette salle fermée par le rideau de sept pieds de haut dont nous avons déjà parlé; entassez dans l’ombre de ce rideau, sur des stalles de bois, les religieuses de chœur à gauche, les pensionnaires à droite, les converses et les novices au fond, et vous aurez quelque idée des religieuses du Petit-Picpus, assistant au service divin. Cette caverne, qu’on appelait le chœur, communiquait avec le cloître par un couloir. L’église prenait jour sur le jardin. Quand les religieuses assistaient à des offices où leur règle leur commandait le silence, le public n’était averti de leur présence que par le choc des miséricordes des stalles se levant ou s’abaissant avec bruit.

Chapitre VII

Quelques silhouettes de cette ombre

Pendant les six années qui séparent 1819 de 1825, la prieure du Petit-Picpus était mademoiselle de Blemeur qui en religion s’appelait mère Innocente. Elle était de la famille de la Marguerite de Blemeur, auteur de la Vie des saints de l’ordre de Saint-Benoît. Elle avait été réélue. C’était une femme d’une soixantaine d’années, courte, grosse, «chantant comme un pot fêlé», dit la lettre que nous avons déjà citée; du reste excellente, la seule gaie dans tout le couvent, et pour cela adorée.

Mère Innocente tenait de son ascendante Marguerite, la Dacier de l’Ordre. Elle était lettrée, érudite, savante, compétente, curieusement historienne, farcie de latin, bourrée de grec, pleine d’hébreu, et plutôt bénédictin que bénédictine.

La sous-prieure était une vieille religieuse espagnole presque aveugle, la mère Cineres.

Les plus comptées parmi les vocales étaient la mère Sainte-Honorine, trésorière, la mère Sainte-Gertrude, première maîtresse des novices, la mère Sainte-Ange, deuxième maîtresse, la mère Annonciation, sacristaine, la mère Saint-Augustin, infirmière, la seule dans tout le couvent qui fût méchante; puis mère Sainte-Mechtilde (Mlle Gauvain), toute jeune, ayant une admirable voix; mère des Anges (Mlle Drouet), qui avait été au couvent des Filles-Dieu et au couvent du Trésor entre Gisors et Magny; mère Saint-Joseph (Mlle de Cogolludo); mère Sainte-Adélaïde (Mlle d’Auverney); mère Miséricorde (Mlle de Cifuentes, qui ne put résister aux austérités); mère Compassion (Mlle de la Miltière, reçue à soixante ans, malgré la règle, très riche); mère Providence (Mlle de Laudinière); mère Présentation (Mlle de Siguenza), qui fut prieure en 1847; enfin, mère Sainte-Céligne (la sœur du sculpteur Ceracchi), devenue folle; mère Sainte-Chantal (Mlle de Suzon), devenue folle.

Il y avait encore parmi les plus jolies une charmante fille de vingt-trois ans, qui était de l’île Bourbon et descendante du chevalier Roze, qui se fût appelée dans le monde mademoiselle Roze et qui s’appelait mère Assomption.

La mère Sainte-Mechtilde, chargée du chant et du chœur, y employait volontiers les pensionnaires. Elle en prenait ordinairement une gamme complète, c'est-à-dire sept, de dix ans à seize inclusivement, voix et tailles assorties, qu'elle faisait chanter debout, alignées côte à côte par rang d'âge de la plus petite à la plus grande. Cela offrait aux regards quelque chose comme un pipeau de jeunes filles, une sorte de flûte de Pan vivante faite avec des anges.

Celles des sœurs converses que les pensionnaires aimaient le mieux, c'étaient la sœur Sainte-Euphrasie, la sœur Sainte-Marguerite, la sœur Sainte-Marthe, qui était en enfance, et la sœur Saint-Michel, dont le long nez les faisait rire.

Toutes ces femmes étaient douces pour tous ces enfants. Les religieuses n'étaient sévères que pour elles-mêmes. On ne faisait de feu qu'au pensionnat, et la nourriture, comparée à celle du couvent, y était recherchée. Avec cela mille soins. Seulement, quand un enfant passait près d'une religieuse et lui parlait, la religieuse ne répondait jamais.

Cette règle du silence avait engendré ceci que, dans tout le couvent, la parole était retirée aux créatures humaines et donnée aux objets inanimés. Tantôt c'était la cloche de l'église qui parlait, tantôt le grelot du jardinier. Un timbre très sonore, placé à côté de la tourière et qu'on entendait de toute la maison, indiquait par des sonneries variées, qui étaient une façon de télégraphe acoustique, toutes les actions de la vie matérielle à accomplir, et appelait au parloir, si besoin était, telle ou telle habitante de la maison. Chaque personne et chaque chose avait sa sonnerie. La prieure avait un et un; la sous-prieure un et deux. Six-cinq annonçait la classe, de telle sorte que les élèves ne disaient jamais rentrer en classe, mais aller à six-cinq. Quatre-quatre était le timbre de madame de Genlis. On l'entendait très souvent. C'est le diable à quatre, disaient celles qui n'étaient point charitables. Dix-neuf coups annonçaient un grand événement. C'était l'ouverture de la porte de clôture, effroyable planche de fer hérissée de verrous qui ne tournait sur ses gonds que devant l'archevêque.

Lui et le jardinier exceptés, nous l'avons dit, aucun homme n'entrait dans le couvent. Les pensionnaires en voyaient deux autres; l'aumônier, l'abbé Banès, vieux et laid, qu'il leur était donné de contempler au chœur à travers une grille; l'autre, le maître de dessin, Mr Ansiaux, que la lettre dont on a déjà lu quelques lignes appelle Mr Anciot, et qualifie vieux affreux bossu.

On voit que tous les hommes étaient choisis.
Telle était cette curieuse maison.

Chapitre VIII

Post corda lapides

Après en avoir esquissé la figure morale, il n’est pas inutile d’en indiquer en quelques mots la configuration matérielle. Le lecteur en a déjà quelque idée.

Le couvent du Petit-Picpus-Saint-Antoine emplissait presque entièrement le vaste trapèze qui résultait des intersections de la rue Polonceau, de la rue Droit-Mur, de la petite rue Picpus et de la ruelle condamnée nommée dans les vieux plans rue Aumarais. Ces quatre rues entouraient ce trapèze comme ferait un fossé. Le couvent se composait de plusieurs bâtiments et d’un jardin. Le bâtiment principal, pris dans son entier, était une juxtaposition de constructions hybrides qui, vues à vol d’oiseau, dessinaient assez exactement une potence posée sur le sol. Le grand bras de la potence occupait tout le tronçon de la rue Droit-Mur compris entre la petite rue Picpus et la rue Polonceau; le petit bras était une haute, grise et sévère façade grillée qui regardait la petite rue Picpus; la porte cochère nº 62 en marquait l’extrémité. Vers le milieu de cette façade, la poussière et la cendre blanchissaient une vieille porte basse cintrée où les araignées faisaient leur toile et qui ne s’ouvrait qu’une heure ou deux le dimanche et aux rares occasions où le cercueil d’une religieuse sortait du couvent. C’était l’entrée publique de l’église. Le coude de la potence était une salle carrée qui servait d’office et que les religieuses nommaient la dépense. Dans le grand bras étaient les cellules des mères et des sœurs et le noviciat. Dans le petit bras les cuisines, le réfectoire, doublé du cloître, et l’église. Entre la porte nº 62 et le coin de la ruelle fermée Aumarais était le pensionnat, qu’on ne voyait pas du dehors. Le reste du trapèze formait le jardin qui était beaucoup plus bas que le niveau de la rue Polonceau; ce qui faisait les murailles bien plus élevées encore au dedans qu’à l’extérieur. Le jardin, légèrement bombé, avait à son milieu, au sommet d’une butte, un beau sapin aigu et conique duquel partaient, comme du rond-point à pique d’un bouclier, quatre grandes allées, et, disposées deux par deux dans les embranchements des grandes, huit petites, de façon que, si l’enclos eût été circulaire, le plan géométral des allées eût ressemblé à une croix posée sur une roue. Les allées, venant toutes aboutir aux murs très irréguliers du jardin, étaient de longueurs inégales. Elles étaient bordées de groseilliers. Au fond une allée de grands peupliers allait des ruines du vieux couvent, qui était à l’angle de la rue Droit-Mur, à la maison du petit couvent, qui était à l’angle de la ruelle Aumarais. En avant du petit couvent, il y avait ce qu’on intitulait le petit jardin. Qu’on ajoute à cet ensemble une cour, toutes sortes d’angles variés que faisaient les corps de logis intérieurs, des murailles de prison, pour toute perspective et pour tout voisinage la longue ligne noire de toits qui bordait l’autre côté de la rue Polonceau, et l’on pourra se faire une image complète de ce qu’était, il y a quarante-cinq ans, la maison des bernardines du Petit-Picpus. Cette sainte maison avait été bâtie précisément sur l’emplacement d’un jeu de paume fameux du quatorzième au seizième siècle qu’on appelait le tripot des onze mille diables.

Toutes ces rues du reste étaient des plus anciennes de Paris. Ces noms, Droit-Mur et Aumarais, sont bien vieux; les rues qui les portent sont beaucoup plus vieilles encore. La ruelle Aumarais s’est appelée la ruelle Maugout; la rue Droit-Mur s’est appelée la rue des Églantiers, car Dieu ouvrait les fleurs avant que l’homme taillât les pierres.

Chapitre IX

Un siècle sous une guimpe

Puisque nous sommes en train de détails sur ce qu'était autrefois le couvent du Petit-Picpus et que nous avons osé ouvrir une fenêtre sur ce discret asile, que le lecteur nous permette encore une petite digression, étrangère au fond de ce livre, mais caractéristique et utile en ce qu'elle fait comprendre que le cloître lui-même a ses figures originales.

Il y avait dans le petit couvent une centenaire qui venait de l'abbaye de Fontevrault. Avant la révolution elle avait même été du monde. Elle parlait beaucoup de Mr de Miromesnil, garde des sceaux sous Louis XVI, et d'une présidente Duplat qu'elle avait beaucoup connue. C'était son plaisir et sa vanité de ramener ces deux noms à tout propos. Elle disait merveilles de l'abbaye de Fontevrault, que c'était comme une ville, et qu'il y avait des rues dans le monastère.

Elle parlait avec un parler picard qui égayait les pensionnaires. Tous les ans, elle renouvelait solennellement ses vœux, et, au moment de faire serment, elle disait au prêtre: Monseigneur saint François l'a baillé à monseigneur saint Julien, monseigneur saint Julien l'a baillé à monseigneur saint Eusèbe, monseigneur saint Eusèbe l'a baillé à monseigneur saint Procope, etc., etc.; ainsi je vous le baille, mon père. — Et les pensionnaires de rire, non sous cape, mais sous voile; charmants petits rires étouffés qui faisaient froncer le sourcil aux mères vocales.

Une autre fois, la centenaire racontait des histoires. Elle disait que dans sa jeunesse les bernardins ne le cédaient pas aux mousquetaires. C'était un siècle qui parlait, mais c'était le dix-huitième siècle. Elle contait la coutume champenoise et bourguignonne des quatre vins avant la révolution. Quand un grand personnage, un maréchal de France, un prince, un duc et pair, traversait une ville de Bourgogne ou de Champagne, le corps de ville venait le haranguer et lui présentait quatre gondoles d'argent dans lesquelles on avait versé de quatre vins différents. Sur le premier gobelet on lisait cette inscription: vin de singe, sur le deuxième: vin de lion, sur le troisième: vin de mouton, sur le quatrième: vin de cochon. Ces quatre légendes exprimaient les quatre degrés que descend l'ivrogne; la première ivresse, celle qui égaye; la deuxième, celle qui irrite; la troisième, celle qui hébète; la dernière enfin, celle qui abrutit.

Elle avait dans une armoire, sous clef, un objet mystérieux auquel elle tenait fort. La règle de Fontevrault ne le lui défendait pas. Elle ne voulait montrer cet objet à personne. Elle s’enfermait, ce que sa règle lui permettait, et se cachait chaque fois qu’elle voulait le contempler. Si elle entendait marcher dans le corridor, elle refermait l’armoire aussi précipitamment qu’elle le pouvait avec ses vieilles mains. Dès qu’on lui parlait de cela, elle se taisait, elle qui parlait si volontiers. Les plus curieuses échouèrent devant son silence et les plus tenaces devant son obstination. C’était aussi là un sujet de commentaires pour tout ce qui était désœuvré ou ennuyé dans le couvent. Que pouvait donc être cette chose si précieuse et si secrète qui était le trésor de la centenaire? Sans doute quelque saint livre? quelque chapelet unique? quelque relique prouvée? On se perdait en conjectures. À la mort de la pauvre vieille, on courut à l’armoire plus vite peut-être qu’il n’eût convenu, et on l’ouvrit. On trouva l’objet sous un triple linge comme une patène bénite. C’était un plat de Faënza représentant des amours qui s’envolent poursuivis par des garçons apothicaires armés d’énormes seringues. La poursuite abonde en grimaces et en postures comiques. Un des charmants petits amours est déjà tout embroché. Il se débat, agite ses petites ailes et essaye encore de voler, mais le matassin rit d’un rire satanique. Moralité: l’amour vaincu par la colique. Ce plat, fort curieux d’ailleurs, et qui a peut-être eu l’honneur de donner une idée à Molière, existait encore en septembre 1845; il était à vendre chez un marchand de bric-à-brac du boulevard Beaumarchais.

Cette bonne vieille ne voulait recevoir aucune visite du dehors, à cause, disait-elle, que le parloir est trop triste.

Chapitre X

Origine de l’Adoration Perpétuelle

Du reste, ce parloir presque sépulcral dont nous avons essayé de donner une idée est un fait tout local qui ne se reproduit pas avec la même sévérité dans d’autres couvents. Au couvent de la rue du Temple en particulier qui, à la vérité, était d’un autre ordre, les volets noirs étaient remplacés par des rideaux bruns, et le parloir lui-même était un salon parqueté dont les fenêtres s’encadraient de bonnes-grâces en mousseline blanche et dont les murailles admettaient toutes sortes de cadres, un portrait d’une bénédictine à visage découvert, des bouquets en peinture, et jusqu’à une tête de turc.

C’est dans le jardin du couvent de la rue du Temple que se trouvait ce marronnier d’Inde qui passait pour le plus beau et le plus grand de France et qui avait parmi le bon peuple du dix-huitième siècle la renommée d’être le père de tous les marronniers du royaume.

Nous l’avons dit, ce couvent du Temple était occupé par des bénédictines de l’Adoration Perpétuelle, bénédictines tout autres que celles qui relevaient de Cîteaux. Cet ordre de l’Adoration Perpétuelle n’est pas très ancien et ne remonte pas à plus de deux cents ans. En 1649, le Saint-Sacrement fut profané deux fois, à quelques jours de distance, dans deux églises de Paris, à Saint-Sulpice et à Saint-Jean en Grève, sacrilège effrayant et rare qui émut toute la ville. Mr le prieur grand vicaire de Saint-Germain-des-Prés ordonna une procession solennelle de tout son clergé où officia le nonce du pape. Mais l’expiation ne suffit pas à deux dignes femmes, madame Courtin, marquise de Boucs, et la comtesse de Châteauvieux. Cet outrage, fait au «très auguste sacrement de l’autel», quoique passager, ne sortait pas de ces deux saintes âmes, et leur parut ne pouvoir être réparé que par une «Adoration Perpétuelle» dans quelque monastère de filles. Toutes deux, l’une en 1652, l’autre en 1653, firent donation de sommes notables à la mère Catherine de Bar, dite du Saint-Sacrement, religieuse bénédictine, pour fonder, dans ce but pieux, un monastère de l’ordre de Saint-Benoît; la première permission pour cette fondation fut donnée à la mère Catherine de Bar par Mr de Metz, abbé de Saint-Germain, «à la charge qu’aucune fille ne pourrait être reçue, qu’elle n’apportât trois cents livres de pension, qui font six mille livres au principal». Après l’abbé de Saint-Germain, le roi accorda des lettres patentes, et le tout, charte abbatiale et lettres royales, fut homologué en 1654 à la chambre des comptes et au parlement.

Telle est l'origine et la consécration légale de l'établissement des bénédictines de l'Adoration Perpétuelle du Saint-Sacrement à Paris. Leur premier couvent fut «bâti à neuf», rue Cassette, des deniers de mesdames de Boucs et de Châteauvieux.

Cet ordre, comme on voit, ne se confondait point avec les bénédictines dites de Cîteaux. Il relevait de l'abbé de Saint-Germain des Prés, de la même manière que les dames du Sacré-Cœur relèvent du général des jésuites et les sœurs de charité du général des lazaristes.

Il était également tout à fait différent des bernardines du Petit-Picpus dont nous venons de montrer l'intérieur. En 1657, le pape Alexandre VII avait autorisé, par bref spécial, les bernardines du Petit-Picpus à pratiquer l'Adoration Perpétuelle comme les bénédictines du Saint-Sacrement. Mais les deux ordres n'en étaient pas moins restés distincts.

Chapitre XI

Fin du Petit-Picpus

Dès le commencement de la Restauration, le couvent du Petit-Picpus dépérissait; ce qui fait partie de la mort générale de l’ordre, lequel, après le dix-huitième siècle, s’en va comme tous les ordres religieux. La contemplation est, ainsi que la prière, un besoin de l’humanité; mais, comme tout ce que la Révolution a touché, elle se transformera, et, d’hostile au progrès social, lui deviendra favorable.

La maison du Petit-Picpus se dépeuplait rapidement. En 1840, le petit couvent avait disparu, le pensionnat avait disparu. Il n’y avait plus ni les vieilles femmes, ni les jeunes filles; les unes étaient mortes, les autres s’en étaient allées. Volaverunt.

La règle de l’Adoration Perpétuelle est d’une telle rigidité qu’elle épouvante; les vocations reculent, l’ordre ne se recrute pas. En 1845, il se faisait encore çà et là quelques sœurs converses; mais de religieuses de chœur, point. Il y a quarante ans, les religieuses étaient près de cent; il y a quinze ans, elles n’étaient plus que vingt-huit. Combien sont-elles aujourd’hui? En 1847, la prieure était jeune, signe que le cercle du choix se restreint. Elle n’avait pas quarante ans. À mesure que le nombre diminue, la fatigue augmente; le service de chacune devient plus pénible; on voyait dès lors approcher le moment où elles ne seraient plus qu’une douzaine d’épaules douloureuses et courbées pour porter la lourde règle de saint Benoît. Le fardeau est implacable et reste le même à peu comme à beaucoup. Il pesait, il écrase. Aussi elles meurent. Du temps que l’auteur de ce livre habitait encore Paris, deux sont mortes. L’une avait vingt-cinq ans, l’autre vingt-trois. Celle-ci peut dire comme Julia Alpinula: Hic jaceo. Vvixi annos viginti et tres. C’est à cause de cette décadence que le couvent a renoncé à l’éducation des filles.

Nous n’avons pu passer devant cette maison extraordinaire, inconnue, obscure, sans y entrer et sans y faire entrer les esprits qui nous accompagnent et qui nous écoutent raconter, pour l’utilité de quelques-uns peut-être, l’histoire mélancolique de Jean Valjean. Nous avons pénétré dans cette communauté toute pleine de ces vieilles pratiques qui semblent si nouvelles aujourd’hui. C’est le jardin fermé. Hortus conclusus. Nous avons parlé de ce lieu singulier avec détail, mais avec respect, autant du moins que le respect et le détail sont conciliables. Nous ne comprenons pas tout, mais nous n’insultons rien. Nous sommes à égale distance de l’hosanna de Joseph de Maistre qui aboutit à sacrer le bourreau et du ricanement de Voltaire qui va jusqu’à railler le crucifix.

Illogisme de Voltaire, soit dit en passant; car Voltaire eût défendu Jésus comme il défendait Calas; et, pour ceux-là mêmes qui nient les incarnations surhumaines, que représente le crucifix? Le sage assassiné.

Au dix-neuvième siècle, l’idée religieuse subit une crise. On désapprend de certaines choses, et l’on fait bien, pourvu qu’en désapprenant ceci, on apprenne cela. Pas de vide dans le cœur humain. De certaines démolitions se font, et il est bon qu’elles se fassent, mais à la condition d’être suivies de reconstructions.

En attendant, étudions les choses qui ne sont plus. Il est nécessaire de les connaître, ne fût-ce que pour les éviter. Les contrefaçons du passé prennent de faux noms et s’appellent volontiers l’avenir. Ce revenant, le passé, est sujet à falsifier son passeport. Mettons-nous au fait du piège. Défions-nous. Le passé a un visage, la superstition, et un masque, l’hypocrisie. Dénonçons le visage et arrachons le masque.

Quant aux couvents, ils offrent une question complexe. Question de civilisation, qui les condamne; question de liberté, qui les protège.

Livre septième — Parenthèse

Chapitre I

Le couvent, idée abstraite

Ce livre est un drame dont le premier personnage est l’infini.

L’homme est le second.

Cela étant, comme un couvent s’est trouvé sur notre chemin, nous avons dû y pénétrer. Pourquoi? C’est que le couvent, qui est propre à l’orient comme à l’occident, à l’antiquité comme aux temps modernes, au paganisme, au bouddhisme, au mahométisme, comme au christianisme, est un des appareils d’optique appliqués par l’homme sur l’infini.

Ce n’est point ici le lieu de développer hors de mesure de certaines idées; cependant, tout en maintenant absolument nos réserves, nos restrictions, et même nos indignations, nous devons le dire, toutes les fois que nous rencontrons dans l’homme l’infini, bien ou mal compris, nous nous sentons pris de respect. Il y a dans la synagogue, dans la mosquée, dans la pagode, dans le wigwam, un côté hideux que nous exécrons et un côté sublime que nous adorons. Quelle contemplation pour l’esprit et quelle rêverie sans fond! la réverbération de Dieu sur le mur humain.

Chapitre II

Le couvent, fait historique

Au point de vue de l’histoire, de la raison et de la vérité, le monachisme est condamné.

Les monastères, quand ils abondent chez une nation, sont des nœuds à la circulation, des établissements encombrants, des centres de paresse là où il faut des centres de travail. Les communautés monastiques sont à la grande communauté sociale ce que le gui est au chêne, ce que la verrue est au corps humain. Leur prospérité et leur embonpoint sont l’appauvrissement du pays. Le régime monacal, bon au début des civilisations, utile à produire la réduction de la brutalité par le spirituel, est mauvais à la virilité des peuples. En outre, lorsqu’il se relâche, et qu’il entre dans sa période de dérèglement, comme il continue à donner l’exemple il devient mauvais par toutes les raisons qui le faisaient salutaire dans sa période de pureté.

Les claustrations ont fait leur temps. Les cloîtres, utiles à la première éducation de la civilisation moderne, ont été gênants pour sa croissance et sont nuisibles à son développement. En tant qu’institution et que mode de formation pour l’homme, les monastères, bons au dixième siècle, discutables au quinzième, sont détestables au dix-neuvième. La lèpre monacale a presque rongé jusqu’au squelette deux admirables nations, l’Italie et l’Espagne, l’une la lumière, l’autre la splendeur de l’Europe pendant des siècles, et, à l’époque où nous sommes, ces deux illustres peuples ne commencent à guérir que grâce à la saine et vigoureuse hygiène de 1789.

Le couvent, l’antique couvent de femmes particulièrement, tel qu’il apparaît encore au seuil de ce siècle en Italie, en Autriche, en Espagne, est une des plus sombres concrétions du Moyen Age. Le cloître, ce cloître-là, est le point d’intersection des terreurs. Le cloître catholique proprement dit est tout rempli du rayonnement noir de la mort.

Le couvent espagnol surtout est funèbre. Là montent dans l’obscurité, sous des voûtes pleines de brume, sous des dômes vagues à force d’ombre, de massifs autels babéliques, hauts comme des cathédrales; là pendent à des chaînes dans les ténèbres d’immenses crucifix blancs; là s’étalent, nus sur l’ébène, de grands Christs d’ivoire; plus que sanglants, saignants; hideux et magnifiques, les coudes montrant les os, les rotules montrant les téguments, les plaies montrant les chairs, couronnés d’épines d’argent, cloués de clous d’or, avec des gouttes de sang en rubis sur le front et des larmes en diamants dans les yeux. Les diamants et les rubis semblent mouillés, et font pleurer en bas dans l’ombre des êtres voilés qui ont les flancs meurtris par le cilice et par le fouet aux pointes de fer, les seins écrasés par des claies d’osier, les genoux écorchés par la prière; des femmes qui se croient des épouses; des spectres qui se croient des séraphins. Ces femmes pensent-elles? non. Veulent-elles? non. Aiment-elles? non. Vivent-elles? non. Leurs nerfs sont devenus des os; leurs os sont devenus des pierres. Leur voile est de la nuit tissue. Leur souffle sous le voile ressemble à on ne sait quelle tragique respiration de la mort. L’abbesse, une larve, les sanctifie et les terrifie. L’immaculé est là, farouche. Tels sont les vieux monastères d’Espagne. Repaires de la dévotion terrible; antres de vierges; lieux féroces.

L’Espagne catholique était plus romaine que Rome même. Le couvent espagnol était par excellence le couvent catholique. On y sentait l’orient. L’archevêque, kislar-aga du ciel, verrouillait et espionnait ce sérail d’âmes réservé à Dieu. La nonne était l’odalisque, le prêtre était l’eunuque. Les ferventes étaient choisies en songe et possédaient Christ. La nuit, le beau jeune homme nu descendait de la croix et devenait l’extase de la cellule. De hautes murailles gardaient de toute distraction vivante la sultane mystique qui avait le crucifié pour sultan. Un regard dehors était une infidélité. L’ in-pace remplaçait le sac de cuir. Ce qu’on jetait à la mer en orient, on le jetait à la terre en occident. Des deux côtés, des femmes se tordaient les bras; la vague aux unes, la fosse aux autres; ici les noyées, là les enterrées. Parallélisme monstrueux.

Aujourd’hui les souteneurs du passé, ne pouvant nier ces choses, ont pris le parti d’en sourire. On a mis à la mode une façon commode et étrange de supprimer les révélations de l’histoire, d’infirmer les commentaires de la philosophie, et d’élider tous les faits gênants et toutes les questions sombres. Matière à déclamations, disent les habiles. Déclamations, répètent les niais. Jean-Jacques, déclamateur; Diderot, déclamateur; Voltaire sur Calas, Labarre et Sirven, déclamateur. Je ne sais qui a trouvé dernièrement que Tacite était un déclamateur, que Néron était une victime, et que décidément il fallait s’apitoyer «sur ce pauvre Holopherne».

Les faits pourtant sont malaisés à déconcerter, et s’obstinent. L’auteur de ce livre a vu, de ses yeux, à huit lieues de Bruxelles, c’est là du Moyen Age que tout le monde a sous la main, à l’abbaye de Villers, le trou des oubliettes au milieu du pré qui a été la cour du cloître et, au bord de la Dyle, quatre cachots de pierre, moitié sous terre, moitié sous l’eau. C’étaient des in-pace. Chacun de ces cachots a un reste de porte de fer, une latrine, et une lucarne grillée qui, dehors, est à deux pieds au-dessus de la rivière, et, dedans, à six pieds au-dessus du sol. Quatre pieds de rivière coulent extérieurement le long du mur. Le sol est toujours mouillé. L’habitant de l’ in-pace avait pour lit cette terre mouillée. Dans l’un des cachots, il y a un tronçon de carcan scellé au mur; dans un autre on voit une espèce de boîte carrée faite de quatre lames de granit, trop courte pour qu’on s’y couche, trop basse pour qu’on s’y dresse. On mettait là dedans un être avec un couvercle de pierre par-dessus. Cela est. On le voit. On le touche. Ces in-pace, ces cachots, ces gonds de fer, ces carcans, cette haute lucarne au ras de laquelle coule la rivière, cette boîte de pierre fermée d’un couvercle de granit comme une tombe, avec cette différence qu’ici le mort était un vivant, ce sol qui est de la boue, ce trou de latrines, ces murs qui suintent, quels déclamateurs!

Chapitre III

À quelle condition on peut respecter le passé

Le monachisme, tel qu'il existait en Espagne et tel qu'il existe au Thibet, est pour la civilisation une sorte de phtisie. Il arrête net la vie. Il dépeuple, tout simplement. Claustration, castration. Il a été fléau en Europe. Ajoutez à cela la violence si souvent faite à la conscience, les vocations forcées, la féodalité s'appuyant au cloître, l'aînesse versant dans le monachisme le trop-plein de la famille, les férocités dont nous venons de parler, les in-pace, les bouches closes, les cerveaux murés, tant d'intelligences infortunées mises au cachot des vœux éternels, la prise d'habit, enterrement des âmes toutes vives. Ajoutez les supplices individuels aux dégradations nationales, et, qui que vous soyez, vous vous sentirez tressaillir devant le froc et le voile, ces deux suaires d'invention humaine.

Pourtant, sur certains points et en certains lieux, en dépit de la philosophie, en dépit du progrès, l'esprit claustral persiste en plein dix-neuvième siècle, et une bizarre recrudescence ascétique étonne en ce moment le monde civilisé. L'entêtement des institutions vieillies à se perpétuer ressemble à l'obstination du parfum ranci qui réclamerait notre chevelure, à la prétention du poisson gâté qui voudrait être mangé, à la persécution du vêtement d'enfant qui voudrait habiller l'homme, et à la tendresse des cadavres qui reviendraient embrasser les vivants.

Ingrats! dit le vêtement, je vous ai protégés dans le mauvais temps, pourquoi ne voulez-vous plus de moi? Je viens de la pleine mer, dit le poisson. J'ai été la rose, dit le parfum. Je vous ai aimés, dit le cadavre. Je vous ai civilisés, dit le couvent.

À cela une seule réponse: Jadis.

Rêver la prolongation indéfinie des choses défuntes et le gouvernement des hommes par embaumement, restaurer les dogmes en mauvais état, redorer les châsses, recrépir les cloîtres, rebénir les reliquaires, remeubler les superstitions, ravitailler les fanatismes, remmancher les goupillons et les sabres, reconstituer le monachisme et le militarisme, croire au salut de la société par la multiplication des parasites, imposer le passé au présent, cela semble étrange. Il y a cependant des théoriciens pour ces théories-là. Ces théoriciens, gens d'esprit d'ailleurs, ont un procédé bien simple, ils appliquent sur le passé un enduit qu’ils appellent ordre social, droit divin, morale, famille, respect des aïeux, autorité antique, tradition sainte, légitimité, religion; et ils vont criant: — Voyez! prenez ceci, honnêtes gens. — Cette logique était connue des anciens. Les aruspices la pratiquaient. Ils frottaient de craie une génisse noire, et disaient: Elle est blanche. Bos cretatus.

Quant à nous, nous respectons çà et là et nous épargnons partout le passé, pourvu qu’il consente à être mort. S’il veut être vivant, nous l’attaquons, et nous tâchons de le tuer.

Superstitions, bigotismes, cagotismes, préjugés, ces larves, toutes larves qu’elles sont, sont tenaces à la vie, elles ont des dents et des ongles dans leur fumée, et il faut les étreindre corps à corps, et leur faire la guerre, et la leur faire sans trêve, car c’est une des fatalités de l’humanité d’être condamnée à l’éternel combat des fantômes. L’ombre est difficile à prendre à la gorge et à terrasser.

Un couvent en France, en plein midi du dix-neuvième siècle, c’est un collège de hiboux faisant face au jour. Un cloître, en flagrant délit d’ascétisme au beau milieu de la cité de 89, de 1830 et de 1848, Rome s’épanouissant dans Paris, c’est un anachronisme. En temps ordinaire, pour dissoudre un anachronisme et le faire évanouir, on n’a qu’à lui faire épeler le millésime. Mais nous ne sommes point en temps ordinaire.

Combattons.

Combattons, mais distinguons. Le propre de la vérité, c’est de n’être jamais excessive. Quel besoin a-t-elle d’exagérer? Il y a ce qu’il faut détruire, et il y a ce qu’il faut simplement éclairer et regarder. L’examen bienveillant et grave, quelle force! N’apportons point la flamme là où la lumière suffit.

Donc, le dix-neuvième siècle étant donné, nous sommes contraire, en thèse générale, et chez tous les peuples, en Asie comme en Europe, dans l’Inde comme en Turquie, aux claustrations ascétiques. Qui dit couvent dit marais. Leur putrescibilité est évidente, leur stagnation est malsaine, leur fermentation enfièvre les peuples et les étiole; leur multiplication devient plaie d’Égypte. Nous ne pouvons penser sans effroi à ces pays où les fakirs, les bonzes, les santons, les caloyers, les marabouts, les talapoins et les derviches pullulent jusqu’au fourmillement vermineux.

Cela dit, la question religieuse subsiste. Cette question a de certains côtés mystérieux, presque redoutables; qu’il nous soit permis de la regarder fixement.

Chapitre IV

Le couvent au point de vue des principes

Des hommes se réunissent et habitent en commun. En vertu de quel droit? en vertu du droit d’association.

Ils s’enferment chez eux. En vertu de quel droit? en vertu du droit qu’a tout homme d’ouvrir ou de fermer sa porte.

Ils ne sortent pas. En vertu de quel droit? en vertu du droit d’aller et de venir, qui implique le droit de rester chez soi.

Là, chez eux, que font-ils?

Ils parlent bas; ils baissent les yeux; ils travaillent. Ils renoncent au monde, aux villes, aux sensualités, aux plaisirs, aux vanités, aux orgueils, aux intérêts. Ils sont vêtus de grosse laine ou de grosse toile. Pas un d’eux ne possède en propriété quoi que ce soit. En entrant là, celui qui était riche se fait pauvre. Ce qu’il a, il le donne à tous. Celui qui était ce qu’on appelle noble, gentilhomme et seigneur, est l’égal de celui qui était paysan. La cellule est identique pour tous. Tous subissent la même tonsure, portent le même froc, mangent le même pain noir, dorment sur la même paille, meurent sur la même cendre. Le même sac sur le dos, la même corde autour des reins. Si le parti pris est d’aller pieds nus, tous vont pieds nus. Il peut y avoir là un prince, ce prince est la même ombre que les autres. Plus de titres. Les noms de famille même ont disparu. Ils ne portent que des prénoms. Tous sont courbés sous l’égalité des noms de baptême. Ils ont dissous la famille charnelle et constitué dans leur communauté la famille spirituelle. Ils n’ont plus d’autres parents que tous les hommes. Ils secourent les pauvres, ils soignent les malades. Ils élisent ceux auxquels ils obéissent. Ils se disent l’un à l’autre: mon frère. Vous m’arrêtez, et vous vous écriez: — Mais c’est là le couvent idéal!

Il suffit que ce soit le couvent possible, pour que j’en doive tenir compte.

De là vient que, dans le livre précédent, j’ai parlé d’un couvent avec un accent respectueux. Le moyen-âge écarté, l’Asie écartée, la question historique et politique réservée, au point de vue philosophique pur, en dehors des nécessités de la politique militante, à la condition que le monastère soit absolument volontaire et ne renferme que des consentements, je considérerai toujours la communauté claustrale avec une certaine gravité attentive et, à quelques égards, déférente. Là où il y a la communauté, il y a la commune; là où il y a la commune, il y a le droit. Le monastère est le produit de la formule: Égalité, Fraternité. Oh! que la Liberté est grande! et quelle transfiguration splendide! la Liberté suffit à transformer le monastère en république.

Continuons.

Mais ces hommes, ou ces femmes, qui sont derrière ces quatre murs, ils s’habillent de bure, ils sont égaux, ils s’appellent frères; c’est bien; mais ils font encore autre chose?

Oui.

Quoi?

Ils regardent l’ombre, ils se mettent à genoux, et ils joignent les mains.

Qu’est-ce que cela signifie?

Chapitre V

La prière

Ils prient.

Qui?

Dieu.

Prier Dieu, que veut dire ce mot?

Y a-t-il un infini hors de nous? Cet infini est-il un, immanent, permanent; nécessairement substantiel, puisqu'il est infini, et que, si la matière lui manquait, il serait borné là, nécessairement intelligent, puisqu'il est infini, et que, si l'intelligence lui manquait, il serait fini là? Cet infini éveille-t-il en nous l'idée d'essence, tandis que nous ne pouvons nous attribuer à nous-mêmes que l'idée d'existence? En d'autres termes, n'est-il pas l'absolu dont nous sommes le relatif?

En même temps qu'il y a un infini hors de nous, n'y a-t-il pas un infini en nous? Ces deux infinis (quel pluriel effrayant!) ne se superposent-ils pas l'un à l'autre? Le second infini n'est-il pas pour ainsi dire sous-jacent au premier? n'en est-il pas le miroir, le reflet, l'écho, abîme concentrique à un autre abîme? Ce second infini est-il intelligent lui aussi? Pense-t-il? aime-t-il? veut-il? Si les deux infinis sont intelligents, chacun d'eux a un principe voulant, et il y a un moi dans l'infini d'en haut comme il y a un moi dans l'infini d'en bas. Le moi d'en bas, c'est l'âme; le moi d'en haut, c'est Dieu.

Mettre par la pensée l'infini d'en bas en contact avec l'infini d'en haut, cela s'appelle prier.

Ne retirons rien à l'esprit humain; supprimer est mauvais. Il faut réformer et transformer. Certaines facultés de l'homme sont dirigées vers l'Inconnu; la pensée, la rêverie, la prière. L'Inconnu est un océan. Qu'est-ce que la conscience? C'est la boussole de l'Inconnu. Pensée, rêverie, prière, ce sont là de grands rayonnements mystérieux. Respectons-les. Où vont ces irradiations majestueuses de l'âme? à l'ombre; c'est-à-dire à la lumière.

La grandeur de la démocratie, c'est de ne rien nier et de ne rien renier de l'humanité. Près du droit de l'Homme, au moins à côté, il y a le droit de l'Âme.

Écraser les fanatismes et vénérer l'infini, telle est la loi. Ne nous bornons pas à nous prosterner sous l'arbre Création, et à contempler ses immenses branchages pleins d’astres. Nous avons un devoir: travailler à l’âme humaine, défendre le mystère contre le miracle, adorer l’incompréhensible et rejeter l’absurde, n’admettre, en fait d’inexplicable, que le nécessaire, assainir la croyance, ôter les superstitions de dessus la religion; écheniller Dieu.

Chapitre VI

Bonté absolue de la prière

Quant au mode de prier, tous sont bons, pourvu qu'ils soient sincères. Tournez votre livre à l'envers, et soyez dans l'infini.

Il y a, nous le savons, une philosophie qui nie l'infini. Il y a aussi une philosophie, classée pathologiquement, qui nie le soleil; cette philosophie s'appelle cécité.

Ériger un sens qui nous manque en source de vérité, c'est un bel aplomb d'aveugle.

Le curieux, ce sont les airs hautains, supérieurs et compatissants que prend, vis-à-vis de la philosophie qui voit Dieu, cette philosophie à tâtons. On croit entendre une taupe s'écrier: Ils me font pitié avec leur soleil!

Il y a, nous le savons, d'illustres et puissants athées. Ceux-là, au fond, ramenés au vrai par leur puissance même, ne sont pas bien sûrs d'être athées, ce n'est guère avec eux qu'une affaire de définition, et, dans tous les cas, s'ils ne croient pas Dieu, étant de grands esprits, ils prouvent Dieu.

Nous saluons en eux les philosophes, tout en qualifiant inexorablement leur philosophie.

Continuons.

L'admirable aussi, c'est la facilité à se payer de mots. Une école métaphysique du nord, un peu imprégnée de brouillard, a cru faire une révolution dans l'entendement humain en remplaçant le mot Force par le mot Volonté.

Dire: la plante veut; au lieu de: la plante croît; cela serait fécond, en effet, si l'on ajoutait: l'univers veut. Pourquoi? C'est qu'il en sortirait ceci: la plante veut, donc elle a un moi; l'univers veut, donc il a un Dieu.

Quant à nous, qui pourtant, au rebours de cette école, ne rejetons rien à priori, une volonté dans la plante, acceptée par cette école, nous paraît plus difficile à admettre qu'une volonté dans l'univers, niée par elle.

Nier la volonté de l'infini, c'est-à-dire Dieu, cela ne se peut qu'à la condition de nier l'infini. Nous l'avons démontré.

La négation de l'infini mène droit au nihilisme. Tout devient «une conception de l'esprit».

Avec le nihilisme pas de discussion possible. Car le nihilisme logique doute que son interlocuteur existe, et n’est pas bien sûr d’exister lui-même.

À son point de vue, il est possible qu’il ne soit lui-même pour lui-même qu’une «conception de son esprit».

Seulement, il ne s’aperçoit point que tout ce qu’il a nié, il l’admet en bloc, rien qu’en prononçant ce mot: Esprit.

En somme, aucune voie n’est ouverte pour la pensée par une philosophie qui fait tout aboutir au monosyllabe Non.

À: Non, il n’y a qu’une réponse: Oui.

Le nihilisme est sans portée.

Il n’y a pas de néant. Zéro n’existe pas. Tout est quelque chose. Rien n’est rien.

L’homme vit d’affirmation plus encore que de pain.

Voir et montrer, cela même ne suffit pas. La philosophie doit être une énergie; elle doit avoir pour effort et pour effet d’améliorer l’homme. Socrate doit entrer dans Adam et produire Marc-Aurèle; en d’autres termes, faire sortir de l’homme de la félicité l’homme de la sagesse. Changer l’Eden en Lycée. La science doit être un cordial. Jouir, quel triste but et quelle ambition chétive! La brute jouit. Penser, voilà le triomphe vrai de l’âme. Tendre la pensée à la soif des hommes, leur donner à tous en élixir la notion de Dieu, faire fraterniser en eux la conscience et la science, les rendre justes par cette confrontation mystérieuse, telle est la fonction de la philosophie réelle. La morale est un épanouissement de vérités. Contempler mène à agir. L’absolu doit être pratique. Il faut que l’idéal soit respirable, potable et mangeable à l’esprit humain. C’est l’idéal qui a le droit de dire: Prenez, ceci est ma chair, ceci est mon sang. La sagesse est une communion sacrée. C’est à cette condition qu’elle cesse d’être un stérile amour de la science pour devenir le mode un et souverain du ralliement humain, et que de philosophie elle est promue religion.

La philosophie ne doit pas être un encorbellement bâti sur le mystère pour le regarder à son aise, sans autre résultat que d’être commode à la curiosité.

Pour nous, en ajournant le développement de notre pensée à une autre occasion, nous nous bornons à dire que nous ne comprenons ni l’homme comme point de départ, ni le progrès comme but, sans ces deux forces qui sont les deux moteurs: croire et aimer.

Le progrès est le but, l’idéal est le type.

Qu’est-ce que l’idéal? C’est Dieu.
Idéal, absolu, perfection, infini; mots identiques.

Chapitre VII

Précautions à prendre dans le blâme

L’histoire et la philosophie ont d’éternels devoirs qui sont en même temps des devoirs simples; combattre Caïphe évêque, Dracon juge, Trimalcion législateur, Tibère empereur, cela est clair, direct et limpide, et n’offre aucune obscurité. Mais le droit de vivre à part, même avec ses inconvénients et ses abus, veut être constaté et ménagé. Le cénobitisme est un problème humain.

Lorsqu’on parle des couvents, ces lieux d’erreur, mais d’innocence, d’égarement, mais de bonne volonté, d’ignorance, mais de dévouement, de supplice, mais de martyre, il faut presque toujours dire oui et non.

Un couvent, c’est une contradiction. Pour but, le salut; pour moyen, le sacrifice. Le couvent, c’est le suprême égoïsme ayant pour résultante la suprême abnégation.

Abdiquer pour régner, semble être la devise du monachisme.

Au cloître, on souffre pour jouir. On tire une lettre de change sur la mort. On escompte en nuit terrestre la lumière céleste. Au cloître, l’enfer est accepté en avance d’hoirie sur le paradis.

La prise de voile ou de froc est un suicide payé d’éternité.

Il ne nous parait pas qu’en un pareil sujet la moquerie soit de mise. Tout y est sérieux, le bien comme le mal.

L’homme juste fronce le sourcil, mais ne sourit jamais du mauvais sourire. Nous comprenons la colère, non la malignité.

Chapitre VIII

Foi, loi

Encore quelques mots.

Nous blâmons l'Église quand elle est saturée d'intrigue, nous méprisons le spirituel âpre au temporel; mais nous honorons partout l'homme pensif.

Nous saluons qui s'agenouille.

Une foi; c'est là pour l'homme le nécessaire. Malheur à qui ne croit rien!

On n'est pas inoccupé parce qu'on est absorbé. Il y a le labeur visible et le labeur invisible.

Contempler, c'est labourer; penser, c'est agir. Les bras croisés travaillent, les mains jointes font. Le regard au ciel est une œuvre.

Thalès resta quatre ans immobile. Il fonda la philosophie.

Pour nous les cénobites ne sont pas des oisifs, et les solitaires ne sont pas des fainéants.

Songer à l'Ombre est une chose sérieuse.

Sans rien infirmer de ce que nous venons de dire, nous croyons qu'un perpétuel souvenir du tombeau convient aux vivants. Sur ce point le prêtre et le philosophe sont d'accord. Il faut mourir. L'abbé de La Trappe donne la réplique à Horace.

Mêler à sa vie une certaine présence du sépulcre, c'est la loi du sage; et c'est la loi de l'ascète. Sous ce rapport l'ascète et le sage convergent.

Il y a la croissance matérielle; nous la voulons. Il y a aussi la grandeur morale; nous y tenons.

Les esprits irréfléchis et rapides disent:

— À quoi bon ces figures immobiles du côté du mystère? À quoi servent-elles? qu'est-ce qu'elles font?

Hélas! en présence de l'obscurité qui nous environne et qui nous attend, ne sachant pas ce que la dispersion immense fera de nous, nous répondons: Il n'y a pas d'œuvre plus sublime peut-être que celle que font ces âmes. Et nous ajoutons: Il n'y a peut-être pas de travail plus utile.

Il faut bien ceux qui prient toujours pour ceux qui ne prient jamais.

Pour nous, toute la question est dans la quantité de pensée qui se mêle à la prière.

Leibniz priant, cela est grand; Voltaire adorant, cela est beau. Deo erexit Voltaire.

Nous sommes pour la religion contre les religions.

Nous sommes de ceux qui croient à la misère des oraisons et à la sublimité de la prière.

Du reste, dans cette minute que nous traversons, minute qui heureusement ne laissera pas au dix-neuvième siècle sa figure, à cette heure où tant d’hommes ont le front bas et l’âme peu haute, parmi tant de vivants ayant pour morale de jouir, et occupés des choses courtes et difformes de la matière, quiconque s’exile nous semble vénérable. Le monastère est un renoncement. Le sacrifice qui porte à faux est encore le sacrifice. Prendre pour devoir une erreur sévère, cela a sa grandeur.

Pris en soi, et idéalement, et pour tourner autour de la vérité jusqu’à épuisement impartial de tous les aspects, le monastère, le couvent de femmes surtout, car dans notre société c’est la femme qui souffre le plus, et dans cet exil du cloître il y a de la protestation, le couvent de femmes a incontestablement une certaine majesté.

Cette existence claustrale si austère et si morne, dont nous venons d’indiquer quelques linéaments, ce n’est pas la vie, car ce n’est pas la liberté; ce n’est pas la tombe, car ce n’est pas la plénitude; c’est le lieu étrange d’où l’on aperçoit, comme de la crête d’une haute montagne, d’un côté l’abîme où nous sommes, de l’autre l’abîme où nous serons; c’est une frontière étroite et brumeuse séparant deux mondes, éclairée et obscurcie par les deux à la fois, où le rayon affaibli de la vie se mêle au rayon vague de la mort; c’est la pénombre du tombeau.

Quant à nous, qui ne croyons pas ce que ces femmes croient, mais qui vivons comme elles par la foi, nous n’avons jamais pu considérer sans une espèce de terreur religieuse et tendre, sans une sorte de pitié pleine d’envie, ces créatures dévouées, tremblantes et confiantes, ces âmes humbles et augustes qui osent vivre au bord même du mystère, attendant, entre le monde qui est fermé et le ciel qui n’est pas ouvert, tournées vers la clarté qu’on ne voit pas, ayant seulement le bonheur de penser qu’elles savent où elle est, aspirant au gouffre et à l’inconnu, l’œil fixé sur l’obscurité immobile, agenouillées, éperdues, stupéfaites, frissonnantes, à demi soulevées à de certaines heures par les souffles profonds de l’éternité.

Livre huitième — Les cimetières prennent ce qu’on leur donne

Chapitre I

Où il est traité de la manière d’entrer au couvent

C’est dans cette maison que Jean Valjean était, comme avait dit Fauchelevent, «tombé du ciel».

Il avait franchi le mur du jardin qui faisait l’angle de la rue Polonceau. Cet hymne des anges qu’il avait entendu au milieu de la nuit, c’étaient les religieuses chantant matines; cette salle qu’il avait entrevue dans l’obscurité, c’était la chapelle; ce fantôme qu’il avait vu étendu à terre, c’était la sœur faisant la réparation; ce grelot dont le bruit l’avait si étrangement surpris, c’était le grelot du jardinier attaché au genou du père Fauchelevent.

Une fois Cosette couchée, Jean Valjean et Fauchelevent avaient, comme on l’a vu, soupé d’un verre de vin et d’un morceau de fromage devant un bon fagot flambant; puis, le seul lit qu’il y eût dans la baraque étant occupé par Cosette, ils s’étaient jetés chacun sur une botte de paille. Avant de fermer les yeux, Jean Valjean avait dit: — Il faut désormais que je reste ici. — Cette parole avait trotté toute la nuit dans la tête de Fauchelevent.

À vrai dire, ni l’un ni l’autre n’avaient dormi.

Jean Valjean, se sentant découvert et Javert sur sa piste, comprenait que lui et Cosette étaient perdus s’ils rentraient dans Paris. Puisque le nouveau coup de vent qui venait de souffler sur lui l’avait échoué dans ce cloître, Jean Valjean n’avait plus qu’une pensée, y rester. Or, pour un malheureux dans sa position, ce couvent était à la fois le lieu le plus dangereux et le plus sûr; le plus dangereux, car, aucun homme ne pouvant y pénétrer, si on l’y découvrait, c’était un flagrant délit, et Jean Valjean ne faisait qu’un pas du couvent à la prison; le plus sûr, car si l’on parvenait à s’y faire accepter et à y demeurer, qui viendrait vous chercher là? Habiter un lieu impossible, c’était le salut.

De son côté, Fauchelevent se creusait la cervelle. Il commençait par se déclarer qu’il n’y comprenait rien. Comment Mr Madeleine se trouvait-il là, avec les murs qu’il y avait? Des murs de cloître ne s’enjambent pas. Comment s’y trouvait-il avec un enfant? On n’escalade pas une muraille à pic avec un enfant dans ses bras. Qu’était-ce que cet enfant? D’où venaient-ils tous les deux? Depuis que Fauchelevent était dans le couvent, il n’avait plus entendu parler de Montreuil-sur-Mer, et il ne savait rien de ce qui s’était passé. Le père Madeleine avait cet air qui décourage les questions; et d’ailleurs Fauchelevent se disait: On ne questionne pas un saint. Mr Madeleine avait conservé pour lui tout son prestige. Seulement, de quelques mots échappés à Jean Valjean, le jardinier crut pouvoir conclure que Mr Madeleine avait probablement fait faillite par la dureté des temps, et qu’il était poursuivi par ses créanciers; ou bien qu’il était compromis dans une affaire politique et qu’il se cachait; ce qui ne déplut point à Fauchelevent, lequel, comme beaucoup de nos paysans du nord, avait un vieux fond bonapartiste. Se cachant, Mr Madeleine avait pris le couvent pour asile, et il était simple qu’il voulût y rester. Mais l’inexplicable, où Fauchelevent revenait toujours et où il se cassait la tête, c’était que Mr Madeleine fût là, et qu’il y fût avec cette petite. Fauchelevent les voyait, les touchait, leur parlait, et n’y croyait pas. L’incompréhensible venait de faire son entrée dans la cahute de Fauchelevent. Fauchelevent était à tâtons dans les conjectures, et ne voyait plus rien de clair sinon ceci: Mr Madeleine m’a sauvé la vie. Cette certitude unique suffisait, et le détermina. Il se dit à part lui: C’est mon tour. Il ajouta dans sa conscience: Mr Madeleine n’a pas tant délibéré quand il s’est agi de se fourrer sous la voiture pour m’en tirer. Il décida qu’il sauverait Mr Madeleine.

Il se fit pourtant diverses questions et diverses réponses: — Après ce qu’il a été pour moi, si c’était un voleur, le sauverais-je? Tout de même. Si c’était un assassin, le sauverais-je? Tout de même. Puisque c’est un saint, le sauverai-je? Tout de même.

Mais le faire rester dans le couvent, quel problème! Devant cette tentative presque chimérique, Fauchelevent ne recula point; ce pauvre paysan picard, sans autre échelle que son dévouement, sa bonne volonté, et un peu de cette vieille finesse campagnarde mise cette fois au service d’une intention généreuse, entreprit d’escalader les impossibilités du cloître et les rudes escarpements de la règle de saint Benoît. Le père Fauchelevent était un vieux qui toute sa vie avait été égoïste, et qui, à la fin de ses jours, boiteux, infirme, n’ayant plus aucun intérêt au monde, trouva doux d’être reconnaissant, et, voyant une vertueuse action à faire, se jeta dessus comme un homme qui, au moment de mourir, rencontrerait sous sa main un verre d’un bon vin dont il n’aurait jamais goûté et le boirait avidement. On peut ajouter que l’air qu’il respirait depuis plusieurs années déjà dans ce couvent avait détruit la personnalité en lui, et avait fini par lui rendre nécessaire une bonne action quelconque.

Il prit donc sa résolution: se dévouer à Mr Madeleine.

Nous venons de le qualifier pauvre paysan picard. La qualification est juste, mais incomplète. Au point de cette histoire où nous sommes, un peu de physiologie du père Fauchelevent devient utile. Il était paysan, mais il avait été tabellion, ce qui ajoutait de la chicane à sa finesse, et de la pénétration à sa naïveté. Ayant, pour des causes diverses, échoué dans ses affaires, de tabellion il était tombé charretier et manœuvre. Mais, en dépit des jurons et des coups de fouet, nécessaires aux chevaux, à ce qu'il paraît, il était resté du tabellion en lui. Il avait quelque esprit naturel; il ne disait ni j'ons ni j'avons; il causait, chose rare au village; et les autres paysans disaient de lui: Il parle quasiment comme un monsieur à chapeau. Fauchelevent était en effet de cette espèce que le vocabulaire impertinent et léger du dernier siècle qualifiait: demi-bourgeois, demi-manant; et que les métaphores tombant du château sur la chaumière étiquetaient dans le casier de la roture: un peu rustre, un peu citadin; poivre et sel. Fauchelevent, quoique fort éprouvé et fort usé par le sort, espèce de pauvre vieille âme montrant la corde, était pourtant homme de premier mouvement, et très spontané; qualité précieuse qui empêche qu'on soit jamais mauvais. Ses défauts et ses vices, car il en avait eu, étaient de surface; en somme, sa physionomie était de celles qui réussissent près de l'observateur. Ce vieux visage n'avait aucune de ces fâcheuses rides du haut du front qui signifient méchanceté ou bêtise.

Au point du jour, ayant énormément songé, le père Fauchelevent ouvrit les yeux et vit Mr Madeleine qui, assis sur sa botte de paille, regardait Cosette dormir. Fauchelevent se dressa sur son séant et dit:

— Maintenant que vous êtes ici, comment allez-vous faire pour y entrer?

Ce mot résumait la situation, et réveilla Jean Valjean de sa rêverie.

Les deux bonshommes tinrent conseil.

— D'abord, dit Fauchelevent, vous allez commencer par ne pas mettre les pieds hors de cette chambre. La petite ni vous. Un pas dans le jardin, nous sommes flambés.

— C'est juste.

— Monsieur Madeleine, reprit Fauchelevent, vous êtes arrivé dans un moment très bon, je veux dire très mauvais, il y a une de ces dames fort malade. Cela fait qu'on ne regardera pas beaucoup de notre côté. Il paraît qu'elle se meurt. On dit les prières de quarante heures. Toute la communauté est en l'air. Ça les occupe. Celle qui est en train de s'en aller est une sainte. Au fait, nous sommes tous des saints ici. Toute la différence entre elles et moi, c'est qu'elles disent: notre cellule, et que je dis: ma piolle. Il va y avoir l'oraison pour les agonisants, et puis l'oraison pour les morts. Pour aujourd'hui nous serons tranquilles ici; mais je ne réponds pas de demain.

— Pourtant, observa Jean Valjean, cette baraque est dans le rentrant du mur, elle est cachée par une espèce de ruine, il y a des arbres, on ne la voit pas du couvent.

— Et j'ajoute que les religieuses n'en approchent jamais.

— Eh bien? fit Jean Valjean.

Le point d'interrogation qui accentuait cet: eh bien, signifiait: il me semble qu'on peut y demeurer caché. C'est à ce point d'interrogation que Fauchelevent répondit:

— Il y a les petites.

— Quelles petites? demanda Jean Valjean.

Comme Fauchelevent ouvrait la bouche pour expliquer le mot qu'il venait de prononcer, une cloche sonna un coup.

— La religieuse est morte, dit-il. Voici le glas.

Et il fit signe à Jean Valjean d'écouter.

La cloche sonna un second coup.

— C'est le glas, monsieur Madeleine. La cloche va continuer de minute en minute pendant vingt-quatre heures jusqu'à la sortie du corps de l'église. Voyez-vous, ça joue. Aux récréations, il suffit qu'une balle roule pour qu'elles s'en viennent, malgré les défenses, chercher et fourbanser partout par ici. C'est des diables, ces chérubins-là.

— Qui? demanda Jean Valjean.

— Les petites. Vous seriez bien vite découvert, allez. Elles crieraient: Tiens! un homme! Mais il n'y a pas de danger aujourd'hui. Il n'y aura pas de récréation. La journée va être tout prières. Vous entendez la cloche. Comme je vous le disais, un coup par minute. C'est le glas.

— Je comprends, père Fauchelevent. Il y a des pensionnaires.

Et Jean Valjean pensa à part lui:

— Ce serait l'éducation de Cosette toute trouvée.

Fauchelevent s'exclama:

— Pardine! s'il y a des petites filles! Et qui piailleraient autour de vous! et qui se sauveraient! Ici, être homme, c'est avoir la peste. Vous voyez bien qu'on m'attache un grelot à la patte comme à une bête féroce.

Jean Valjean songeait de plus en plus profondément.

— Ce couvent nous sauverait, murmurait-il. Puis il éleva la voix:

— Oui, le difficile, c'est de rester.

— Non, dit Fauchelevent, c'est de sortir.

Jean Valjean sentit le sang lui refluer au cœur.

— Sortir!

— Oui, monsieur Madeleine, pour rentrer, il faut que vous sortiez.

Et, après avoir laissé passer un coup de cloche du glas, Fauchelevent poursuivit:

— On ne peut pas vous trouver ici comme ça. D'où venez-vous? Pour moi vous tombez du ciel, parce que je vous connais; mais des religieuses, ça a besoin qu'on entre par la porte.

Tout à coup on entendit une sonnerie assez compliquée d'une autre cloche.

— Ah! dit Fauchelevent, on sonne les mères vocales. Elles vont au chapitre. On tient toujours chapitre quand quelqu'un est mort. Elle est morte au point du jour. C'est ordinairement au point du jour qu'on meurt. Mais est-ce que vous ne pourriez pas sortir par où vous êtes entré? Voyons, ce n'est pas pour vous faire une question, par où êtes-vous entré?

Jean Valjean devint pâle. La seule idée de redescendre dans cette rue formidable le faisait frissonner. Sortez d'une forêt pleine de tigres, et, une fois dehors, imaginez-vous un conseil d'ami qui vous engage à y rentrer. Jean Valjean se figurait toute la police encore grouillante dans le quartier, des agents en observation, des vedettes partout, d'affreux poings tendus vers son collet, Javert peut-être au coin du carrefour.

— Impossible! dit-il. Père Fauchelevent, mettez que je suis tombé de là-haut.

— Mais je le crois, je le crois, reprit Fauchelevent. Vous n'avez pas besoin de me le dire. Le bon Dieu vous aura pris dans sa main pour vous regarder de près, et puis vous aura lâché. Seulement il voulait vous mettre dans un couvent d'hommes; il s'est trompé. Allons, encore une sonnerie. Celle-ci est pour avertir le portier d'aller prévenir la municipalité pour qu'elle aille prévenir le médecin des morts pour qu'il vienne voir qu'il y a une morte. Tout ça, c'est la cérémonie de mourir. Elles n'aiment pas beaucoup cette visite-là, ces bonnes dames. Un médecin, ça ne croit à rien. Il lève le voile. Il lève même quelquefois autre chose. Comme elles ont vite fait avertir le médecin, cette fois-ci! Qu’est-ce qu’il y a donc? Votre petite dort toujours. Comment se nomme-t-elle?

— Cosette.

— C’est votre fille? comme qui dirait: vous seriez son grand-père?

— Oui.

— Pour elle, sortir d’ici, ce sera facile. J’ai ma porte de service qui donne sur la cour. Je cogne. Le portier ouvre. J’ai ma hotte sur le dos, la petite est dedans. Je sors. Le père Fauchelevent sort avec sa hotte, c’est tout simple. Vous direz à la petite de se tenir bien tranquille. Elle sera sous la bâche. Je la déposerai le temps qu’il faudra chez une vieille bonne amie de fruitière que j’ai rue du Chemin-Vert, qui est sourde et où il y a un petit lit. Je crierai dans l’oreille à la fruitière que c’est une nièce à moi, et de me la garder jusqu’à demain. Puis la petite rentrera avec vous. Car je vous ferai rentrer. Il le faudra bien. Mais vous, comment ferez-vous pour sortir? Jean Valjean hocha la tête.

— Que personne ne me voie. Tout est là, père Fauchelevent. Trouvez moyen de me faire sortir comme Cosette dans une hotte et sous une bâche.

Fauchelevent se grattait le bas de l’oreille avec le médium de la main gauche, signe de sérieux embarras.

Une troisième sonnerie fit diversion.

— Voici le médecin des morts qui s’en va, dit Fauchelevent. Il a regardé, et dit: elle est morte, c’est bon. Quand le médecin a visé le passeport pour le paradis, les pompes funèbres envoient une bière. Si c’est une mère, les mères l’ensevelissent; si c’est une sœur, les sœurs l’ensevelissent. Après quoi, je cloue. Cela fait partie de mon jardinage. Un jardinier est un peu un fossoyeur. On la met dans une salle basse de l’église qui communique à la rue et où pas un homme ne peut entrer que le médecin des morts. Je ne compte pas pour des hommes les croque-morts et moi. C’est dans cette salle que je cloue la bière. Les croque-morts viennent la prendre, et fouette cocher! c’est comme cela qu’on s’en va au ciel. On apporte une boîte où il n’y a rien, on la remporte avec quelque chose dedans. Voilà ce que c’est qu’un enterrement. De profundis.

Un rayon de soleil horizontal effleurait le visage de Cosette endormie qui entrouvrait vaguement la bouche, et avait l’air d’un ange buvant de la lumière. Jean Valjean s’était mis à la regarder. Il n’écoutait plus Fauchelevent.

N’être pas écouté, ce n’est pas une raison pour se taire. Le brave vieux jardinier continuait paisiblement son rabâchage:

— On fait la fosse au cimetière Vaugirard. On prétend qu’on va le supprimer, ce cimetière Vaugirard. C’est un ancien cimetière qui est en dehors des règlements, qui n’a pas l’uniforme, et qui va prendre sa retraite. C’est dommage, car il est commode. J’ai là un ami, le père Mestienne, le fossoyeur. Les religieuses d’ici ont un privilège, c’est d’être portées à ce cimetière-là à la tombée de la nuit. Il y a un arrêté de la préfecture exprès pour elles. Mais que d’événements depuis hier! la mère Crucifixion est morte, et le père Madeleine....

— Est enterré, dit Jean Valjean souriant tristement.

Fauchelevent fit ricocher le mot.

— Dame! si vous étiez ici tout à fait, ce serait un véritable enterrement.

Une quatrième sonnerie éclata. Fauchelevent détacha vivement du clou la genouillère à grelot et la reboucla à son genou.

— Cette fois, c’est moi. La mère prieure me demande. Bon, je me pique à l’ardillon de ma boucle. Monsieur Madeleine, ne bougez pas, et attendez-moi. Il y a du nouveau. Si vous avez faim, il y a là le vin, le pain et le fromage.

Et il sortit de la cahute en disant: On y va! on y va!

Jean Valjean le vit se hâter à travers le jardin, aussi vite que sa jambe torse le lui permettait, tout en regardant de côté ses melonnières.

Moins de dix minutes après, le père Fauchelevent, dont le grelot mettait sur son passage les religieuses en déroute, frappait un petit coup à une porte, et une voix douce répondait: À jamais. À jamais, c’est-à-dire: Entrez.

Cette porte était celle du parloir réservé au jardinier pour les besoins du service. Ce parloir était contigu à la salle du chapitre. La prieure, assise sur l’unique chaise du parloir, attendait Fauchelevent.

Chapitre II

Fauchelevent en présence de la difficulté

Avoir l’air agité et grave, cela est particulier, dans les occasions critiques, à de certains caractères et à de certaines professions, notamment aux prêtres et aux religieux. Au moment où Fauchelevent entra, cette double forme de la préoccupation était empreinte sur la physionomie de la prieure, qui était cette charmante et savante Mlle de Blemeur, mère Innocente, ordinairement gaie.

Le jardinier fit un salut craintif, et resta sur le seuil de la cellule. La prieure, qui égrenait son rosaire, leva les yeux et dit:

— Ah! c’est vous, père Fauvent.

Cette abréviation avait été adoptée dans le couvent.

Fauchelevent recommença son salut.

— Père Fauvent, je vous ai fait appeler.

— Me voici, révérende mère.

— J’ai à vous parler.

— Et moi, de mon côté, dit Fauchelevent avec une hardiesse dont il avait peur intérieurement, j’ai quelque chose à dire à la très révérende mère.

La prieure le regarda.

— Ah! vous avez une communication à me faire.

— Une prière.

— Eh bien, parlez.

Le bonhomme Fauchelevent, ex-tabellion, appartenait à la catégorie des paysans qui ont de l’aplomb. Une certaine ignorance habile est une force; on ne s’en défie pas et cela vous prend. Depuis un peu plus de deux ans qu’il habitait le couvent, Fauchelevent avait réussi dans la communauté. Toujours solitaire, et tout en vaquant à son jardinage, il n’avait guère autre chose à faire que d’être curieux. À distance comme il était de toutes ces femmes voilées allant et venant, il ne voyait guère devant lui qu’une agitation d’ombres. À force d’attention et de pénétration, il était parvenu à remettre de la chair dans tous ces fantômes, et ces mortes vivaient pour lui. Il était comme un sourd dont la vue s’allonge et comme un aveugle dont l’ouïe s’aiguise. Il s’était appliqué à démêler le sens des diverses sonneries, et il y était arrivé, de sorte que ce cloître énigmatique et taciturne n’avait rien de caché pour lui; ce sphinx lui bavardait tous ses secrets à l'oreille. Fauchelevent, sachant tout, cachait tout. C'était là son art. Tout le couvent le croyait stupide. Grand mérite en religion. Les mères vocales faisaient cas de Fauchelevent. C'était un curieux muet. Il inspirait la confiance. En outre, il était régulier, et ne sortait que pour les nécessités démontrées du verger et du potager. Cette discrétion d'allures lui était comptée. Il n'en avait pas moins fait jaser deux hommes; au couvent, le portier, et il savait les particularités du parloir; et, au cimetière, le fossoyeur, et il savait les singularités de la sépulture; de la sorte, il avait, à l'endroit de ces religieuses, une double lumière, l'une sur la vie, l'autre sur la mort. Mais il n'abusait de rien. La congrégation tenait à lui. Vieux, boiteux, n'y voyant goutte, probablement un peu sourd, que de qualités! On l'eût difficilement remplacé.

Le bonhomme, avec l'assurance de celui qui se sent apprécié, entama, vis-à-vis de la révérende prieure, une harangue campagnarde assez diffuse et très profonde. Il parla longuement de son âge, de ses infirmités, de la surcharge des années comptant double désormais pour lui, des exigences croissantes du travail, de la grandeur du jardin, des nuits à passer, comme la dernière, par exemple, où il avait fallu mettre des paillassons sur les melonnières à cause de la lune, et il finit par aboutir à ceci: qu'il avait un frère, — (la prieure fit un mouvement) — un frère point jeune, — (second mouvement de la prieure, mais mouvement rassuré) — que, si on le voulait bien, ce frère pourrait venir loger avec lui et l'aider, qu'il était excellent jardinier, que la communauté en tirerait de bons services, meilleurs que les siens à lui; — que, autrement, si l'on n'admettait point son frère, comme, lui, l'aîné, il se sentait cassé, et insuffisant à la besogne, il serait, avec bien du regret, obligé de s'en aller; — et que son frère avait une petite fille qu'il amènerait avec lui, qui s'élèverait en Dieu dans la maison, et qui peut-être, qui sait? ferait une religieuse un jour.

Quand il eut fini de parler, la prieure interrompit le glissement de son rosaire entre ses doigts, et lui dit:

— Pourriez-vous, d'ici à ce soir, vous procurer une forte barre de fer?

— Pourquoi faire?

— Pour servir de levier.

— Oui, révérende mère, répondit Fauchelevent.

La prieure, sans ajouter une parole, se leva, et entra dans la chambre voisine, qui était la salle du chapitre et où les mères vocales étaient probablement assemblées. Fauchelevent demeura seul.

Chapitre III

Mère Innocente

Un quart d'heure environ s'écoula. La prieure rentra et revint s'asseoir sur la chaise.

Les deux interlocuteurs semblaient préoccupés. Nous sténographions de notre mieux le dialogue qui s'engagea.

— Père Fauvent?

— Révérende mère?

— Vous connaissez la chapelle?

— J'y ai une petite cage pour entendre la messe et les offices.

— Et vous êtes entré dans le chœur pour votre ouvrage?

— Deux ou trois fois.

— Il s'agit de soulever une pierre.

— Lourde?

— La dalle du pavé qui est à côté de l'autel.

— La pierre qui ferme le caveau?

— Oui.

— C'est là une occasion où il serait bon d'être deux hommes.

— La mère Ascension, qui est forte comme un homme, vous aidera.

— Une femme n'est jamais un homme.

— Nous n'avons qu'une femme pour vous aider. Chacun fait ce qu'il peut. Parce que dom Mabillon donne quatre cent dix-sept épîtres de saint Bernard et que Merlonus Horstius n'en donne que trois cent soixante-sept, je ne méprise point Merlonus Horstius.

— Ni moi non plus.

— Le mérite est de travailler selon ses forces. Un cloître n'est pas un chantier.

— Et une femme n'est pas un homme. C'est mon frère qui est fort!

— Et puis vous aurez un levier.

— C'est la seule espèce de clef qui aille à ces espèces de portes.

— Il y a un anneau à la pierre.

— J'y passerai le levier.

— Et la pierre est arrangée de façon à pivoter.

— C'est bien, révérende mère. J'ouvrirai le caveau.

— Et les quatre mères chantres vous assisteront.

— Et quand le caveau sera ouvert?

— Il faudra le refermer.

— Sera-ce tout?

— Non.

— Donnez-moi vos ordres, très révérende mère.

— Fauvent, nous avons confiance en vous.

— Je suis ici pour tout faire.

— Et pour tout taire.

— Oui, révérende mère.

— Quand le caveau sera ouvert....

— Je le refermerai.

— Mais auparavant....

— Quoi, révérende mère?

— Il faudra y descendre quelque chose.

Il y eut un silence. La prieure, après une moue de la lèvre inférieure qui ressemblait à de l'hésitation, le rompit.

— Père Fauvent?

— Révérende mère?

— Vous savez qu'une mère est morte ce matin.

— Non.

— Vous n'avez donc pas entendu la cloche?

— On n'entend rien au fond du jardin.

— En vérité?

— C'est à peine si je distingue ma sonnerie.

— Elle est morte à la pointe du jour.

— Et puis, ce matin, le vent ne portait pas de mon côté.

— C'est la mère Crucifixion. Une bienheureuse.

La prieure se tut, remua un moment les lèvres, comme pour une oraison mentale, et reprit:

— Il y a trois ans, rien que pour avoir vu prier la mère Crucifixion, une janséniste, madame de Béthune, s'est faite orthodoxe.

— Ah oui, j'entends le glas maintenant, révérende mère.

— Les mères l'ont portée dans la chambre des mortes qui donne dans l'église.

— Je sais.

— Aucun autre homme que vous ne peut et ne doit entrer dans cette chambre-là. Veillez-y bien. Il ferait beau voir qu’un homme entrât dans la chambre des mortes!

— Plus souvent!

— Hein?

— Plus souvent!

— Qu’est-ce que vous dites?

— Je dis plus souvent.

— Plus souvent que quoi?

— Révérende mère, je ne dis pas plus souvent que quoi, je dis plus souvent.

— Je ne vous comprends pas. Pourquoi dites-vous plus souvent?

— Pour dire comme vous, révérende mère.

— Mais je n’ai pas dit plus souvent.

— Vous ne l’avez pas dit, mais je l’ai dit pour dire comme vous.

En ce moment neuf heures sonnèrent.

— À neuf heures du matin et à toute heure loué soit et adoré le très Saint-Sacrement de l’autel, dit la prieure.

— Amen, dit Fauchelevent.

L’heure sonna à propos. Elle coupa court à Plus Souvent. Il est probable que sans elle la prieure et Fauchelevent ne se fussent jamais tirés de cet écheveau.

Fauchelevent s’essuya le front.

La prieure fit un nouveau petit murmure intérieur, probablement sacré, puis haussa la voix.

— De son vivant, mère Crucifixion faisait des conversions; après sa mort, elle fera des miracles.

— Elle en fera! répondit Fauchelevent emboîtant le pas, et faisant effort pour ne plus broncher désormais.

— Père Fauvent, la communauté a été bénie en la mère Crucifixion. Sans doute il n’est point donné à tout le monde de mourir comme le cardinal de Bérulle en disant la sainte messe, et d’exhaler son âme vers Dieu en prononçant ces paroles: Hanc igitur oblationem. Mais, sans atteindre à tant de bonheur, la mère Crucifixion a eu une mort très précieuse. Elle a eu sa connaissance jusqu’au dernier instant. Elle nous parlait, puis elle parlait aux anges. Elle nous a fait ses derniers commandements. Si vous aviez un peu plus de foi, et si vous aviez pu être dans sa cellule, elle vous aurait guéri votre jambe en y touchant. Elle souriait. On sentait qu'elle ressuscitait en Dieu. Il y a eu du paradis dans cette mort-là.

Fauchelevent crut que c'était une oraison qui finissait.

— Amen, dit-il.

— Père Fauvent, il faut faire ce que veulent les morts.

La prieure dévida quelques grains de son chapelet. Fauchelevent se taisait. Elle poursuivit.

— J'ai consulté sur cette question plusieurs ecclésiastiques travaillant en Notre-Seigneur qui s'occupent dans l'exercice de la vie cléricale et qui font un fruit admirable.

— Révérende mère, on entend bien mieux le glas d'ici que dans le jardin.

— D'ailleurs, c'est plus qu'une morte, c'est une sainte.

— Comme vous, révérende mère.

— Elle couchait dans son cercueil depuis vingt ans, par permission expresse de notre saint-père Pie VII.

— Celui qui a couronné l'emp.... Buonaparte.

Pour un habile homme comme Fauchelevent, le souvenir était malencontreux. Heureusement la prieure, toute à sa pensée, ne l'entendit pas. Elle continua:

— Père Fauvent?

— Révérende mère?

— Saint Diodore, archevêque de Cappadoce, voulut qu'on écrivît sur sa sépulture ce seul mot: Acarus, qui signifie ver de terre; cela fut fait. Est-ce vrai?

— Oui, révérende mère.

— Le bienheureux Mezzocane, abbé d'Aquila, voulut être inhumé sous la potence; cela fut fait.

— C'est vrai.

— Saint Térence, évêque de Port sur l'embouchure du Tibre dans la mer, demanda qu'on gravât sur sa pierre le signe qu'on mettait sur la fosse des parricides, dans l'espoir que les passants cracheraient sur son tombeau. Cela fut fait. Il faut obéir aux morts.

— Ainsi soit-il.

— Le corps de Bernard Guidonis, né en France près de Roche-Abeille, fut, comme il l'avait ordonné et malgré le roi de Castille, porté en l'église des Dominicains de Limoges, quoique Bernard Guidonis fût évêque de Tuy en Espagne. Peut-on dire le contraire?

— Pour ça non, révérende mère.

— Le fait est attesté par Plantavit de la Fosse.

Quelques grains du chapelet s'égrenèrent encore silencieusement. La prieure reprit:

— Père Fauvent, la mère Crucifixion sera ensevelie dans le cercueil où elle a couché depuis vingt ans.

— C'est juste.

— C'est une continuation de sommeil.

— J'aurai donc à la clouer dans ce cercueil-là?

— Oui.

— Et nous laisserons de côté la bière des pompes?

— Précisément.

— Je suis aux ordres de la très révérende communauté.

— Les quatre mères chantres vous aideront.

— À clouer le cercueil? Je n'ai pas besoin d'elles.

— Non. À le descendre.

— Où?

— Dans le caveau.

— Quel caveau?

— Sous l'autel.

Fauchelevent fit un soubresaut.

— Le caveau sous l'autel!

— Sous l'autel.

— Mais....

— Vous aurez une barre de fer.

— Oui, mais....

— Vous lèverez la pierre avec la barre au moyen de l'anneau.

— Mais....

— Il faut obéir aux morts. Être enterrée dans le caveau sous l'autel de la chapelle, ne point aller en sol profane, rester morte là où elle a prié vivante; ç'a été le vœu suprême de la mère Crucifixion. Elle nous l'a demandé, c'est-à-dire commandé.

— Mais c'est défendu.

— Défendu par les hommes, ordonné par Dieu.

— Si cela venait à se savoir?

— Nous avons confiance en vous.

— Oh, moi, je suis une pierre de votre mur.

— Le chapitre s’est assemblé. Les mères vocales, que je viens de consulter encore et qui sont en délibération, ont décidé que la mère Crucifixion serait, selon son vœu, enterrée dans son cercueil sous notre autel. Jugez, père Fauvent, s’il allait se faire des miracles ici! quelle gloire en Dieu pour la communauté! Les miracles sortent des tombeaux.

— Mais, révérende mère, si l’agent de la commission de salubrité....

— Saint Benoît II, en matière de sépulture, a résisté à Constantin Pogonat.

— Pourtant le commissaire de police....

— Chonodemaire, un des sept rois allemands qui entrèrent dans les Gaules sous l’empire de Constance, a reconnu expressément le droit des religieux d’être inhumés en religion, c’est-à-dire sous l’autel.

— Mais l’inspecteur de la préfecture....

— Le monde n’est rien devant la croix. Martin, onzième général des chartreux, a donné cette devise à son ordre: Stat crux dum volvitur orbis.

— Amen, dit Fauchelevent, imperturbable dans cette façon de se tirer d’affaire toutes les fois qu’il entendait du latin.

Un auditoire quelconque suffit à qui s’est tu trop longtemps. Le jour où le rhéteur Gymnastoras sortit de prison, ayant dans le corps beaucoup de dilemmes et de syllogismes rentrés, il s’arrêta devant le premier arbre qu’il rencontra, le harangua, et fit de très grands efforts pour le convaincre. La prieure, habituellement sujette au barrage du silence, et ayant du trop-plein dans son réservoir, se leva et s’écria avec une loquacité d’écluse lâchée:

— J’ai à ma droite Benoît et à ma gauche Bernard. Qu’est-ce que Bernard? c’est le premier abbé de Clairvaux. Fontaines en Bourgogne est un pays béni pour l’avoir vu naître. Son père s’appelait Técelin et sa mère Alèthe. Il a commencé par Cîteaux pour aboutir à Clairvaux; il a été ordonné abbé par l’évêque de Châlon-sur-Saône, Guillaume de Champeaux; il a eu sept cents novices et fondé cent soixante monastères; il a terrassé Abeilard au concile de Sens, en 1140, et Pierre de Bruys et Henry son disciple, et une autre sorte de dévoyés qu’on nommait les Apostoliques; il a confondu Arnaud de Bresce, foudroyé le moine Raoul, le tueur de juifs, dominé en 1148 le concile de Reims, fait condamner Gilbert de la Porée, évêque de Poitiers, fait condamner Eon de l’Étoile, arrangé les différends des princes, éclairé le roi Louis le Jeune, conseillé le pape Eugène III, réglé le Temple, prêché la croisade, fait deux cent cinquante miracles dans sa vie, et jusqu'à trente-neuf en un jour. Qu'est-ce que Benoît? c'est le patriarche de Mont-Cassin; c'est le deuxième fondateur de la sainteté claustrale, c'est le Basile de l'occident. Son ordre a produit quarante papes, deux cents cardinaux, cinquante patriarches, seize cents archevêques, quatre mille six cents évêques, quatre empereurs, douze impératrices, quarante-six rois, quarante et une reines, trois mille six cents saints canonisés, et subsiste depuis quatorze cents ans. D'un côté saint Bernard; de l'autre l'agent de la salubrité! D'un côté saint Benoît; de l'autre l'inspecteur de la voirie! L'état, la voirie, les pompes funèbres, les règlements, l'administration, est-ce que nous connaissons cela? Aucuns passants seraient indignés de voir comme on nous traite. Nous n'avons même pas le droit de donner notre poussière à Jésus-Christ! Votre salubrité est une invention révolutionnaire. Dieu subordonné au commissaire de police; tel est le siècle. Silence, Fauvent!

Fauchelevent, sous cette douche, n'était pas fort à son aise. La prieure continua.

— Le droit du monastère à la sépulture ne fait doute pour personne. Il n'y a pour le nier que les fanatiques et les errants. Nous vivons dans des temps de confusion terrible. On ignore ce qu'il faut savoir, et l'on sait ce qu'il faut ignorer. On est crasse et impie. Il y a dans cette époque des gens qui ne distinguent pas entre le grandissime saint Bernard et le Bernard dit des Pauvres Catholiques, certain bon ecclésiastique qui vivait dans le treizième siècle. D'autres blasphèment jusqu'à rapprocher l'échafaud de Louis XVI de la croix de Jésus-Christ. Louis XVI n'était qu'un roi. Prenons donc garde à Dieu! Il n'y a plus ni juste ni injuste. On sait le nom de Voltaire et l'on ne sait pas le nom de César de Bus. Pourtant César de Bus est un bienheureux et Voltaire est un malheureux. Le dernier archevêque, le cardinal de Périgord, ne savait même pas que Charles de Gondren a succédé à Bérulle, et François Bourgoin à Gondren, et Jean-François Senault à Bourgoin, et le père de Sainte-Marthe à Jean-François Senault. On connaît le nom du père Coton, non parce qu'il a été un des trois qui ont poussé à la fondation de l'Oratoire, mais parce qu'il a été matière à juron pour le roi huguenot Henri IV. Ce qui fait saint François de Sales aimable aux gens du monde, c'est qu'il trichait au jeu. Et puis on attaque la religion. Pourquoi? Parce qu'il y a eu de mauvais prêtres, parce que Sagittaire, évêque de Gap, était frère de Salone, évêque d'Embrun, et que tous les deux ont suivi Mommol. Qu'est-ce que cela fait? Cela empêche-t-il Martin de Tours d'être un saint et d’avoir donné la moitié de son manteau à un pauvre? On persécute les saints. On ferme les yeux aux vérités. Les ténèbres sont l’habitude. Les plus féroces bêtes sont les bêtes aveugles. Personne ne pense à l’enfer pour de bon. Oh! le méchant peuple! De par le Roi signifie aujourd’hui de par la Révolution. On ne sait plus ce qu’on doit, ni aux vivants, ni aux morts. Il est défendu de mourir saintement. Le sépulcre est une affaire civile. Ceci fait horreur. Saint Léon II a écrit deux lettres exprès, l’une à Pierre Notaire, l’autre au roi des Visigoths, pour combattre et rejeter, dans les questions qui touchent aux morts, l’autorité de l’exarque et la suprématie de l’empereur. Gautier, évêque de Châlons, tenait tête en cette matière à Othon, duc de Bourgogne. L’ancienne magistrature en tombait d’accord. Autrefois nous avions voix au chapitre même dans les choses du siècle. L’abbé de Cîteaux, général de l’ordre, était conseiller-né au parlement de Bourgogne. Nous faisons de nos morts ce que nous voulons. Est-ce que le corps de saint Benoît lui-même n’est pas en France dans l’abbaye de Fleury, dite Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire, quoiqu’il soit mort en Italie au Mont-Cassin, un samedi 21 du mois de mars de l’an 543? Tout ceci est incontestable. J’abhorre les psallants, je hais les prieurs, j’exècre les hérétiques, mais je détesterais plus encore quiconque me soutiendrait le contraire. On n’a qu’à lire Arnoul Wion, Gabriel Bucelin, Trithème, Maurolicus et dom Luc d’Achery.

La prieure respira, puis se tourna vers Fauchelevent:

— Père Fauvent, est-ce dit?

— C’est dit, révérende mère.

— Peut-on compter sur vous?

— J’obéirai.

— C’est bien.

— Je suis tout dévoué au couvent.

— C’est entendu. Vous fermerez le cercueil. Les sœurs le porteront dans la chapelle. On dira l’office des morts. Puis on rentrera dans le cloître. Entre onze heures et minuit, vous viendrez avec votre barre de fer. Tout se passera dans le plus grand secret. Il n’y aura dans la chapelle que les quatre mères chantres, la mère Ascension, et vous.

— Et la sœur qui sera au poteau?

— Elle ne se retournera pas.

— Mais elle entendra.

— Elle n'écoutera pas. D'ailleurs, ce que le cloître sait, le monde l'ignore.

Il y eut encore une pause. La prieure poursuivit:

— Vous ôterez votre grelot. Il est inutile que la sœur au poteau s'aperçoive que vous êtes là.

— Révérende mère?

— Quoi, père Fauvent?

— Le médecin des morts a-t-il fait sa visite?

— Il va la faire aujourd'hui à quatre heures. On a sonné la sonnerie qui fait venir le médecin des morts. Mais vous n'entendez donc aucune sonnerie?

— Je ne fais attention qu'à la mienne.

— Cela est bien, père Fauvent.

— Révérende mère, il faudra un levier d'au moins six pieds.

— Où le prendrez-vous?

— Où il ne manque pas de grilles, il ne manque pas de barres de fer. J'ai mon tas de ferrailles au fond du jardin.

— Trois quarts d'heure environ avant minuit; n'oubliez pas.

— Révérende mère?

— Quoi?

— Si jamais vous aviez d'autres ouvrages comme ça, c'est mon frère qui est fort. Un Turc!

— Vous ferez le plus vite possible.

— Je ne vais pas hardi vite. Je suis infirme; c'est pour cela qu'il me faudrait un aide. Je boite.

— Boiter n'est pas un tort, et peut être une bénédiction. L'empereur Henri II, qui combattit l'antipape Grégoire et rétablit Benoît VIII, a deux surnoms: le Saint et le Boiteux.

— C'est bien bon, deux surtout, murmura Fauchelevent, qui, en réalité, avait l'oreille un peu dure.

— Père Fauvent, j'y pense, prenons une heure entière. Ce n'est pas trop. Soyez près du maître-autel avec votre barre de fer à onze heures. L'office commence à minuit. Il faut que tout soit fini un bon quart d'heure auparavant.

— Je ferai tout pour prouver mon zèle à la communauté. Voilà qui est dit. Je clouerai le cercueil. À onze heures précises je serai dans la chapelle. Les mères chantres y seront, la mère Ascension y sera. Deux hommes, cela vaudrait mieux. Enfin, n’importe! J’aurai mon levier. Nous ouvrirons le caveau, nous descendrons le cercueil, et nous refermerons le caveau. Après quoi, plus trace de rien. Le gouvernement ne s’en doutera pas. Révérende mère, tout est arrangé ainsi?

— Non.

— Qu’y a-t-il donc encore?

— Il reste la bière vide.

Ceci fit un temps d’arrêt. Fauchelevent songeait. La prieure songeait.

— Père Fauvent, que fera-t-on de la bière?

— On la portera en terre.

— Vide?

Autre silence. Fauchelevent fit de la main gauche cette espèce de geste qui donne congé à une question inquiétante.

— Révérende mère, c’est moi qui cloue la bière dans la chambre basse de l’église, et personne n’y peut entrer que moi, et je couvrirai la bière du drap mortuaire.

— Oui, mais les porteurs, en la mettant dans le corbillard et en la descendant dans la fosse, sentiront bien qu’il n’y a rien dedans.

— Ah! di...! s’écria Fauchelevent.

La prieure commença un signe de croix, et regarda fixement le jardinier. Able lui resta dans le gosier.

Il se hâta d’improviser un expédient pour faire oublier le juron.

— Révérende mère, je mettrai de la terre dans la bière. Cela fera l’effet de quelqu’un.

— Vous avez raison. La terre, c’est la même chose que l’homme. Ainsi vous arrangerez la bière vide?

— J’en fais mon affaire.

Le visage de la prieure, jusqu’alors trouble et obscur, se rasséréna. Elle lui fit le signe du supérieur congédiant l’inférieur. Fauchelevent se dirigea vers la porte. Comme il allait sortir, la prieure éleva doucement la voix:

— Père Fauvent, je suis contente de vous; demain, après l’enterrement, amenez-moi votre frère, et dites-lui qu’il m’amène sa fille.

Chapitre IV

Où Jean Valjean a tout à fait l’air d’avoir lu Austin Castillejo

Des enjambées de boiteux sont comme des œillades de borgne; elles n’arrivent pas vite au but. En outre, Fauchelevent était perplexe. Il mit près d’un quart d’heure à revenir dans la baraque du jardin. Cosette était éveillée. Jean Valjean l’avait assise près du feu. Au moment où Fauchelevent entra, Jean Valjean lui montrait la hotte du jardinier accrochée au mur et lui disait:

— Écoute-moi bien, ma petite Cosette. Il faudra nous en aller de cette maison, mais nous y reviendrons et nous y serons très bien. Le bonhomme d’ici t’emportera sur son dos là-dedans. Tu m’attendras chez une dame. J’irai te retrouver. Surtout, si tu ne veux pas que la Thénardier te reprenne, obéis et ne dis rien!

Cosette fit un signe de tête d’un air grave.

Au bruit de Fauchelevent poussant la porte, Jean Valjean se retourna.

— Eh bien?

— Tout est arrangé, et rien ne l’est, dit Fauchelevent. J’ai permission de vous faire entrer; mais avant de vous faire entrer, il faut vous faire sortir. C’est là qu’est l’embarras de charrettes. Pour la petite, c’est aisé.

— Vous l’emporterez?

— Et elle se taira?

— J’en réponds.

— Mais vous, père Madeleine?

Et, après un silence où il y avait de l’anxiété, Fauchelevent s’écria:

— Mais sortez donc par où vous êtes entré!

Jean Valjean, comme la première fois, se borna à répondre:

— Impossible.

Fauchelevent, se parlant plus à lui-même qu’à Jean Valjean, grommela:

— Il y a une autre chose qui me tourmente. J’ai dit que j’y mettrais de la terre. C’est que je pense que de la terre là-dedans, au lieu d’un corps, ça ne sera pas ressemblant, ça n’ira pas, ça se déplacera, ça remuera. Les hommes le sentiront. Vous comprenez, père Madeleine, le gouvernement s’en apercevra.

Jean Valjean le considéra entre les deux yeux, et crut qu’il délirait.

Fauchelevent reprit:

— Comment di — antre allez-vous sortir? C’est qu’il faut que tout cela soit fait demain! C’est demain que je vous amène. La prieure vous attend.

Alors il expliqua à Jean Valjean que c’était une récompense pour un service que lui, Fauchelevent, rendait à la communauté. Qu’il entrait dans ses attributions de participer aux sépultures, qu’il clouait les bières et assistait le fossoyeur au cimetière. Que la religieuse morte le matin avait demandé d’être ensevelie dans le cercueil qui lui servait de lit et enterrée dans le caveau sous l’autel de la chapelle. Que cela était défendu par les règlements de police, mais que c’était une de ces mortes à qui l’on ne refuse rien. Que la prieure et les mères vocales entendaient exécuter le vœu de la défunte. Que tant pis pour le gouvernement. Que lui Fauchelevent clouerait le cercueil dans la cellule, lèverait la pierre dans la chapelle, et descendrait la morte dans le caveau. Et que, pour le remercier, la prieure admettait dans la maison son frère comme jardinier et sa nièce comme pensionnaire. Que son frère, c’était Mr Madeleine, et que sa nièce, c’était Cosette. Que la prieure lui avait dit d’amener son frère le lendemain soir, après l’enterrement postiche au cimetière. Mais qu’il ne pouvait pas amener du dehors Mr Madeleine, si Mr Madeleine n’était pas dehors. Que c’était là le premier embarras. Et puis qu’il avait encore un embarras, la bière vide.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que la bière vide? demanda Jean Valjean.

Fauchelevent répondit:

— La bière de l’administration.

— Quelle bière? et quelle administration?

— Une religieuse meurt. Le médecin de la municipalité vient et dit: il y a une religieuse morte. Le gouvernement envoie une bière. Le lendemain il envoie un corbillard et des croque-morts pour reprendre la bière et la porter au cimetière. Les croque-morts viendront et soulèveront la bière; il n’y aura rien dedans.

— Mettez-y quelque chose.

— Un mort? je n’en ai pas.

— Non.

— Quoi donc?

— Un vivant.

— Quel vivant?

— Moi, dit Jean Valjean.

Fauchelevent, qui s’était assis, se leva comme si un pétard fût parti sous sa chaise.

— Vous!

— Pourquoi pas?

Jean Valjean eut un de ces rares sourires qui lui venaient comme une lueur dans un ciel d’hiver.

— Vous savez, Fauchelevent, que vous avez dit: La mère Crucifixion est morte, et j’ai ajouté: Et le père Madeleine est enterré. Ce sera cela.

— Ah, bon, vous riez. Vous ne parlez pas sérieusement.

— Très sérieusement. Il faut sortir d’ici?

— Sans doute.

— Je vous ai dit de me trouver pour moi aussi une hotte et une bâche.

— Eh bien?

— La hotte sera en sapin, et la bâche sera un drap noir.

— D’abord, un drap blanc. On enterre les religieuses en blanc.

— Va pour le drap blanc.

— Vous n’êtes pas un homme comme les autres, père Madeleine.

Voir de telles imaginations, qui ne sont pas autre chose que les sauvages et téméraires inventions du bagne, sortir des choses paisibles qui l’entouraient et se mêler à ce qu’il appelait le «petit train-train du couvent», c’était pour Fauchelevent une stupeur comparable à celle d’un passant qui verrait un goéland pêcher dans le ruisseau de la rue Saint-Denis.

Jean Valjean poursuivit:

— Il s’agit de sortir d’ici sans être vu. C’est un moyen. Mais d’abord renseignez-moi. Comment cela se passe-t-il? Où est cette bière?

— Celle qui est vide?

— Oui.

— En bas, dans ce qu’on appelle la salle des mortes. Elle est sur deux tréteaux et sous le drap mortuaire.

— Quelle est la longueur de la bière?

— Six pieds.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que la salle des mortes?

— C’est une chambre du rez-de-chaussée qui a une fenêtre grillée sur le jardin qu’on ferme du dehors avec un volet, et deux portes; l’une qui va au couvent, l’autre qui va à l’église.

— Quelle église?

— L’église de la rue, l’église de tout le monde.

— Avez-vous les clefs de ces deux portes?

— Non. J’ai la clef de la porte qui communique au couvent; le concierge a la clef de la porte qui communique à l’église.

— Quand le concierge ouvre-t-il cette porte-là?

— Uniquement pour laisser entrer les croque-morts qui viennent chercher la bière. La bière sortie, la porte se referme.

— Qui est-ce qui cloue la bière?

— C’est moi.

— Qui est-ce qui met le drap dessus?

— C’est moi.

— Êtes-vous seul?

— Pas un autre homme, excepté le médecin de la police, ne peut entrer dans la salle des mortes. C’est même écrit sur le mur.

— Pourriez-vous, cette nuit, quand tout dormira dans le couvent, me cacher dans cette salle?

— Non. Mais je puis vous cacher dans un petit réduit noir qui donne dans la salle des mortes, où je mets mes outils d’enterrement, et dont j’ai la garde et la clef.

— À quelle heure le corbillard viendra-t-il chercher la bière demain?

— Vers trois heures du soir. L’enterrement se fait au cimetière Vaugirard, un peu avant la nuit. Ce n’est pas tout près.

— Je resterai caché dans votre réduit à outils toute la nuit et toute la matinée. Et à manger? J’aurai faim.

— Je vous porterai de quoi.

— Vous pourriez venir me clouer dans la bière à deux heures.

Fauchelevent recula et se fît craquer les os des doigts.

— Mais c’est impossible!

— Bah! prendre un marteau et clouer des clous dans une planche!

Ce qui semblait inouï à Fauchelevent était, nous le répétons, simple pour Jean Valjean. Jean Valjean avait traversé de pires détroits. Quiconque a été prisonnier sait l’art de se rapetisser selon le diamètre des évasions. Le prisonnier est sujet à la fuite comme le malade à la crise qui le sauve ou qui le perd. Une évasion, c’est une guérison. Que n’accepte-t-on pas pour guérir? Se faire clouer et emporter dans une caisse comme un colis, vivre longtemps dans une boîte, trouver de l’air où il n’y en a pas, économiser sa respiration des heures entières, savoir étouffer sans mourir, c’était là un des sombres talents de Jean Valjean.

Du reste, une bière dans laquelle il y a un être vivant, cet expédient de forçat, est aussi un expédient d'empereur. S'il faut en croire le moine Austin Castillejo, ce fut le moyen que Charles-Quint, voulant après son abdication revoir une dernière fois la Plombes, employa pour la faire entrer dans le monastère de Saint-Just et pour l'en faire sortir.

Fauchelevent, un peu revenu à lui, s'écria:

— Mais comment ferez-vous pour respirer?

— Je respirerai.

— Dans cette boîte! Moi, seulement d'y penser, je suffoque.

— Vous avez bien une vrille, vous ferez quelques petits trous autour de la bouche çà et là, et vous clouerez sans serrer la planche de dessus.

— Bon! Et s'il vous arrive de tousser ou d'éternuer?

— Celui qui s'évade ne tousse pas et n'éternue pas.

Et Jean Valjean ajouta:

— Père Fauchelevent, il faut se décider: ou être pris ici, ou accepter la sortie par le corbillard.

Tout le monde a remarqué le goût qu'ont les chats de s'arrêter et de flâner entre les deux battants d'une porte entre-bâillée. Qui n'a dit à un chat: Mais entre donc! Il y a des hommes qui, dans un incident entr'ouvert devant eux, ont aussi une tendance à rester indécis entre deux résolutions, au risque de se faire écraser par le destin fermant brusquement l'aventure. Les trop prudents, tout chats qu'ils sont, et parce qu'ils sont chats, courent quelquefois plus de danger que les audacieux. Fauchelevent était de cette nature hésitante. Pourtant le sang-froid de Jean Valjean le gagnait malgré lui. Il grommela:

— Au fait, c'est qu'il n'y a pas d'autre moyen.

Jean Valjean reprit:

— La seule chose qui m'inquiète, c'est ce qui se passera au cimetière.

— C'est justement cela qui ne m'embarrasse pas, s'écria Fauchelevent. Si vous êtes sûr de vous tirer de la bière, moi je suis sûr de vous tirer de la fosse. Le fossoyeur est un ivrogne de mes amis. C'est le père Mestienne. Un vieux de la vieille vigne. Le fossoyeur met les morts dans la fosse, et moi je mets le fossoyeur dans ma poche. Ce qui se passera je vais vous le dire. On arrivera un peu avant la brune, trois quarts d'heure avant la fermeture des grilles du cimetière. Le corbillard roulera jusqu'à la fosse. Je suivrai; c'est ma besogne. J'aurai un marteau, un ciseau et des tenailles dans ma poche. Le corbillard s'arrête, les croque-morts vous nouent une corde autour de votre bière et vous descendent. Le prêtre dit les prières, fait le signe de croix, jette l’eau bénite, et file. Je reste seul avec le père Mestienne. C’est mon ami, je vous dis. De deux choses l’une, ou il sera soûl, ou il ne sera pas soûl. S’il n’est pas soûl, je lui dis: Viens boire un coup pendant que le Bon Coing est encore ouvert. Je l’emmène, je le grise, le père Mestienne n’est pas long à griser, il est toujours commencé, je te le couche sous la table, je lui prends sa carte pour rentrer au cimetière, et je reviens sans lui. Vous n’avez plus affaire qu’à moi. S’il est soûl, je lui dis: Va-t’en, je vais faire ta besogne. Il s’en va, et je vous tire du trou.

Jean Valjean lui tendit sa main sur laquelle Fauchelevent se précipita avec une touchante effusion paysanne.

— C’est convenu, père Fauchelevent. Tout ira bien.

— Pourvu que rien ne se dérange, pensa Fauchelevent. Si cela allait devenir terrible!

Chapitre V

Il ne suffit pas d'être ivrogne pour être immortel

Le lendemain, comme le soleil déclinait, les allants et venants fort clairsemés du boulevard du Maine ôtaient leur chapeau au passage d'un corbillard vieux modèle, orné de têtes de mort, de tibias et de larmes. Dans ce corbillard il y avait un cercueil couvert d'un drap blanc sur lequel s'étalait une vaste croix noire, pareille à une grande morte dont les bras pendent. Un carrosse drapé, où l'on apercevait un prêtre en surplis et un enfant de chœur en calotte rouge, suivait. Deux croque-morts en uniforme gris à parements noirs marchaient à droite et à gauche du corbillard. Derrière venait un vieux homme en habits d'ouvrier, qui boitait. Ce cortège se dirigeait vers le cimetière Vaugirard.

On voyait passer de la poche de l'homme le manche d'un marteau, la lame d'un ciseau à froid et la double antenne d'une paire de tenailles.

Le cimetière Vaugirard faisait exception parmi les cimetières de Paris. Il avait ses usages particuliers, de même qu'il avait sa porte cochère et sa porte bâtarde que, dans le quartier, les vieilles gens, tenaces aux vieux mots, appelaient la porte cavalière et la porte piétonne. Les bernardines-bénédictines du Petit-Picpus avaient obtenu, nous l'avons dit, d'y être enterrées dans un coin à part et le soir, ce terrain ayant jadis appartenu à leur communauté. Les fossoyeurs, ayant de cette façon dans le cimetière un service du soir l'été et de nuit l'hiver, y étaient astreints à une discipline particulière. Les portes des cimetières de Paris se fermaient à cette époque au coucher du soleil, et, ceci étant une mesure d'ordre municipal, le cimetière Vaugirard y était soumis comme les autres. La porte cavalière et la porte piétonne étaient deux grilles contiguës, accostées d'un pavillon bâti par l'architecte Perronet et habité par le portier du cimetière. Ces grilles tournaient donc inexorablement sur leurs gonds à l'instant où le soleil disparaissait derrière le dôme des Invalides. Si quelque fossoyeur, à ce moment-là, était attardé dans le cimetière, il n'avait qu'une ressource pour sortir, sa carte de fossoyeur délivrée par l'administration des pompes funèbres. Une espèce de boîte aux lettres était pratiquée dans le volet de la fenêtre du concierge. Le fossoyeur jetait sa carte dans cette boîte, le concierge l'entendait tomber, tirait le cordon, et la porte piétonne s'ouvrait.

Si le fossoyeur n'avait pas sa carte, il se nommait, le concierge, parfois couché et endormi, se levait, allait reconnaître le fossoyeur, et ouvrait la porte avec la clef; le fossoyeur sortait, mais payait quinze francs d'amende.

Ce cimetière, avec ses originalités en dehors de la règle, gênait la symétrie administrative. On l'a supprimé peu après 1830. Le cimetière Montparnasse, dit cimetière de l'Est, lui a succédé, et a hérité de ce fameux cabaret mitoyen au cimetière Vaugirard qui était surmonté d'un coing peint sur une planche, et qui faisait angle, d'un côté sur les tables des buveurs, de l'autre sur les tombeaux, avec cette enseigne: Au Bon Coing.

Le cimetière Vaugirard était ce qu'on pourrait appeler un cimetière fané. Il tombait en désuétude. La moisissure l'envahissait, les fleurs le quittaient. Les bourgeois se souciaient peu d'être enterrés à Vaugirard; cela sentait le pauvre. Le Père-Lachaise, à la bonne heure! Être enterré au Père-Lachaise, c'est comme avoir des meubles en acajou. L'élégance se reconnaît là. Le cimetière Vaugirard était un enclos vénérable, planté en ancien jardin français. Des allées droites, des buis, des thuias, des houx, de vieilles tombes sous de vieux ifs, l'herbe très haute. Le soir y était tragique. Il y avait là des lignes très lugubres.

Le soleil n'était pas encore couché quand le corbillard au drap blanc et à la croix noire entra dans l'avenue du cimetière Vaugirard. L'homme boiteux qui le suivait n'était autre que Fauchelevent.

L'enterrement de la mère Crucifixion dans le caveau sous l'autel, la sortie de Cosette, l'introduction de Jean Valjean dans la salle des mortes, tout s'était exécuté sans encombre, et rien n'avait accroché.

Disons-le en passant, l'inhumation de la mère Crucifixion sous l'autel du couvent est pour nous chose parfaitement vénielle. C'est une de ces fautes qui ressemblent à un devoir. Les religieuses l'avaient accomplie, non seulement sans trouble, mais avec l'applaudissement de leur conscience. Au cloître, ce qu'on appelle «le gouvernement» n'est qu'une immixtion dans l'autorité, immixtion toujours discutable. D'abord la règle; quant au code, on verra. Hommes, faites des lois tant qu'il vous plaira, mais gardez-les pour vous. Le péage à César n'est jamais que le reste du péage à Dieu. Un prince n'est rien près d'un principe.

Fauchelevent boitait derrière le corbillard, très content. Ses deux complots jumeaux, l'un avec les religieuses, l'autre avec Mr Madeleine, l'un pour le couvent, l'autre contre, avaient réussi de front. Le calme de Jean Valjean était de ces tranquillités puissantes qui se communiquent.

Fauchelevent ne doutait plus du succès. Ce qui restait à faire n’était rien. Depuis deux ans, il avait grisé dix fois le fossoyeur, le brave père Mestienne, un bonhomme joufflu. Il en jouait, du père Mestienne. Il en faisait ce qu’il voulait. Il le coiffait de sa volonté et de sa fantaisie. La tête de Mestienne s’ajustait au bonnet de Fauchelevent. La sécurité de Fauchelevent était complète.

Au moment où le convoi entra dans l’avenue menant au cimetière, Fauchelevent, heureux, regarda le corbillard et se frotta ses grosses mains en disant à demi-voix:

— En voilà une farce!

Tout à coup le corbillard s’arrêta; on était à la grille. Il fallait exhiber le permis d’inhumer. L’homme des pompes funèbres s’aboucha avec le portier du cimetière. Pendant ce colloque, qui produit toujours un temps d’arrêt d’une ou deux minutes, quelqu’un, un inconnu, vint se placer derrière le corbillard à côté de Fauchelevent. C’était une espèce d’ouvrier qui avait une veste aux larges poches, et une pioche sous le bras.

Fauchelevent regarda cet inconnu.

— Qui êtes-vous? demanda-t-il.

L’homme répondit:

— Le fossoyeur.

Si l’on survivait à un boulet de canon en pleine poitrine, on ferait la figure que fit Fauchelevent.

— Le fossoyeur!

— Oui.

— Vous?

— Moi.

— Le fossoyeur, c’est le père Mestienne.

— C’était.

— Comment! c’était?

— Il est mort.

Fauchelevent s’était attendu à tout, excepté à ceci, qu’un fossoyeur pût mourir. C’est pourtant vrai; les fossoyeurs eux-mêmes meurent.

À force de creuser la fosse des autres, on ouvre la sienne.

Fauchelevent demeura béant. Il eut à peine la force de bégayer:

— Mais ce n’est pas possible!

— Cela est.

— Mais, reprit-il faiblement, le fossoyeur, c’est le père Mestienne.

— Après Napoléon, Louis XVIII. Après Mestienne, Gribier. Paysan, je m'appelle Gribier.

Fauchelevent, tout pâle, considéra ce Gribier.

C'était un homme long, maigre, livide, parfaitement funèbre. Il avait l'air d'un médecin manqué tourné fossoyeur.

Fauchelevent éclata de rire.

— Ah! comme il arrive de drôles de choses! le père Mestienne est mort. Le petit père Mestienne est mort, mais vive le petit père Lenoir! Vous savez ce que c'est que le petit père Lenoir? C'est le cruchon du rouge à six sur le plomb. C'est le cruchon du Suresne, morbigou! du vrai Suresne de Paris! Ah! il est mort, le vieux Mestienne! J'en suis fâché; c'était un bon vivant. Mais vous aussi, vous êtes un bon vivant. Pas vrai, camarade? Nous allons aller boire ensemble un coup, tout à l'heure.

L'homme répondit: — J'ai étudié. J'ai fait ma quatrième. Je ne bois jamais.

Le corbillard s'était remis en marche et roulait dans la grande allée du cimetière.

Fauchelevent avait ralenti son pas. Il boitait, plus encore d'anxiété que d'infirmité.

Le fossoyeur marchait devant lui.

Fauchelevent passa encore une fois l'examen du Gribier inattendu.

C'était un de ces hommes qui, jeunes, ont l'air vieux, et qui, maigres, sont très forts.

— Camarade! cria Fauchelevent.

L'homme se retourna.

— Je suis le fossoyeur du couvent.

— Mon collègue, dit l'homme.

Fauchelevent, illettré, mais très fin, comprit qu'il avait affaire à une espèce redoutable, à un beau parleur.

Il grommela:

— Comme ça, le père Mestienne est mort.

L'homme répondit:

— Complètement. Le bon Dieu a consulté son carnet d'échéances. C'était le tour du père Mestienne. Le père Mestienne est mort.

Fauchelevent répéta machinalement:

— Le bon Dieu....

— Le bon Dieu, fit l’homme avec autorité. Pour les philosophes, le Père éternel; pour les jacobins, l’Être suprême.

— Est-ce que nous ne ferons pas connaissance? balbutia Fauchelevent.

— Elle est faite. Vous êtes paysan, je suis parisien.

— On ne se connaît pas tant qu’on n’a pas bu ensemble. Qui vide son verre vide son cœur. Vous allez venir boire avec moi. Ça ne se refuse pas.

— D’abord la besogne.

Fauchelevent pensa: je suis perdu.

On n’était plus qu’à quelques tours de roue de la petite allée qui menait au coin des religieuses. Le fossoyeur reprit:

— Paysan, j’ai sept mioches qu’il faut nourrir. Comme il faut qu’ils mangent, il ne faut pas que je boive.

Et il ajouta avec la satisfaction d’un être sérieux qui fait une phrase:

— Leur faim est ennemie de ma soif.

Le corbillard tourna un massif de cyprès, quitta la grande allée, en prit une petite, entra dans les terres et s’enfonça dans un fourré. Ceci indiquait la proximité immédiate de la sépulture. Fauchelevent ralentissait son pas, mais ne pouvait ralentir le corbillard. Heureusement la terre meuble, et mouillée par les pluies d’hiver, engluait les roues et alourdissait la marche.

Il se rapprocha du fossoyeur.

— Il y a un si bon petit vin d’Argenteuil, murmura Fauchelevent.

— Villageois, reprit l’homme, cela ne devrait pas être que je sois fossoyeur. Mon père était portier au Prytanée. Il me destinait à la littérature. Mais il a eu des malheurs. Il a fait des pertes à la Bourse. J’ai dû renoncer à l’état d’auteur. Pourtant je suis encore écrivain public.

— Mais vous n’êtes donc pas fossoyeur? repartit Fauchelevent, se raccrochant à cette branche, bien faible.

— L’un n’empêche pas l’autre. Je cumule.

Fauchelevent ne comprit pas ce dernier mot.

— Venons boire, dit-il.

Ici une observation est nécessaire. Fauchelevent, quelle que fût son angoisse, offrait à boire, mais ne s’expliquait pas sur un point: qui payera? D’ordinaire Fauchelevent offrait, et le père Mestienne payait. Une offre à boire résultait évidemment de la situation nouvelle créée par le fossoyeur nouveau, et cette offre il fallait la faire, mais le vieux jardinier laissait, non sans intention, le proverbial quart d’heure, dit de Rabelais, dans l’ombre. Quant à lui, Fauchelevent, si ému qu’il fût, il ne se souciait point de payer.

Le fossoyeur poursuivit, avec un sourire supérieur:

— Il faut manger. J’ai accepté la survivance du père Mestienne. Quand on a fait presque ses classes, on est philosophe. Au travail de la main, j’ai ajouté le travail du bras. J’ai mon échoppe d’écrivain au marché de la rue de Sèvres. Vous savez? le marché aux Parapluies. Toutes les cuisinières de la Croix-Rouge s’adressent à moi. Je leur bâcle leurs déclarations aux tourlourous. Le matin j’écris des billets doux, le soir je creuse des fosses. Telle est la vie, campagnard.

Le corbillard avançait. Fauchelevent, au comble de l’inquiétude, regardait de tous les côtés autour de lui. De grosses larmes de sueur lui tombaient du front.

— Pourtant, continua le fossoyeur, on ne peut pas servir deux maîtresses. Il faudra que je choisisse de la plume ou de la pioche. La pioche me gâte la main.

Le corbillard s’arrêta.

L’enfant de chœur descendit de la voiture drapée, puis le prêtre.

Une des petites roues de devant du corbillard montait un peu sur un tas de terre au delà duquel on voyait une fosse ouverte.

— En voilà une farce! répéta Fauchelevent consterné.

Chapitre VI

Entre quatre planches

Qui était dans la bière? on le sait. Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean s’était arrangé pour vivre là dedans, et il respirait à peu près.

C’est une chose étrange à quel point la sécurité de la conscience donne la sécurité du reste. Toute la combinaison préméditée par Jean Valjean marchait, et marchait bien, depuis la veille. Il comptait, comme Fauchelevent, sur le père Mestienne. Il ne doutait pas de la fin. Jamais situation plus critique, jamais calme plus complet.

Les quatre planches du cercueil dégagent une sorte de paix terrible. Il semblait que quelque chose du repos des morts entrât dans la tranquillité de Jean Valjean.

Du fond de cette bière, il avait pu suivre et il suivait toutes les phases du drame redoutable qu’il jouait avec la mort.

Peu après que Fauchelevent eut achevé de clouer la planche de dessus, Jean Valjean s’était senti emporter, puis rouler. À moins de secousses, il avait senti qu’on passait du pavé à la terre battue, c’est-à-dire qu’on quittait les rues et qu’on arrivait aux boulevards. À un bruit sourd, il avait deviné qu’on traversait le pont d’Austerlitz. Au premier temps d’arrêt, il avait compris qu’on entrait dans le cimetière; au second temps d’arrêt, il s’était dit: voici la fosse.

Brusquement il sentit que des mains saisissaient la bière, puis un frottement rauque sur les planches; il se rendit compte que c’était une corde qu’on nouait autour du cercueil pour le descendre dans l’excavation.

Puis il eut une espèce d’étourdissement.

Probablement les croque-morts et le fossoyeur avaient laissé basculer le cercueil et descendu la tête avant les pieds. Il revint pleinement à lui en se sentant horizontal et immobile. Il venait de toucher le fond.

Il sentit un certain froid.

Une voix s’éleva au-dessus de lui, glaciale et solennelle. Il entendit passer, si lentement qu’il pouvait les saisir l’un après l’autre, des mots latins qu’il ne comprenait pas:

— Qui dormiunt in terrae pulvere, evigilabunt; alii in vitam aeternam, et alii in opprobrium, ut videant semper.

Une voix d’enfant dit:

— De profundis.

La voix grave recommença:

— Requiem aeternam dona ei, Domine.

La voix d’enfant répondit:

— Et lux perpetua luceat ei.

Il entendit sur la planche qui le recouvrait quelque chose comme le frappement doux de quelques gouttes de pluie. C’était probablement l’eau bénite.

Il songea: Cela va être fini. Encore un peu de patience. Le prêtre va s’en aller. Fauchelevent emmènera Mestienne boire. On me laissera. Puis Fauchelevent reviendra seul, et je sortirai. Ce sera l’affaire d’une bonne heure.

La voix grave reprit:

— Requiescat in pace.

Et la voix d’enfant dit:

— Amen.

Jean Valjean, l’oreille tendue, perçut quelque chose comme des pas qui s’éloignaient.

— Les voilà qui s’en vont, pensa-t-il. Je suis seul.

Tout à coup il entendit sur sa tête un bruit qui lui sembla la chute du tonnerre.

C’était une pelletée de terre qui tombait sur le cercueil.

Une seconde pelletée de terre tomba.

Un des trous par où il respirait venait de se boucher.

Une troisième pelletée de terre tomba.

Puis une quatrième.

Il est des choses plus fortes que l’homme le plus fort. Jean Valjean perdit connaissance.

Chapitre VII

Où l'on trouvera l'origine du mot: ne pas perdre la carte

Voici ce qui se passait au-dessus de la bière où était Jean Valjean.

Quand le corbillard se fut éloigné, quand le prêtre et l'enfant de chœur furent remontés en voiture et partis, Fauchelevent, qui ne quittait pas des yeux le fossoyeur, le vit se pencher et empoigner sa pelle, qui était enfoncée droite dans le tas de terre.

Alors Fauchelevent prit une résolution suprême.

Il se plaça entre la fosse et le fossoyeur, croisa les bras, et dit:

— C'est moi qui paye!

Le fossoyeur le regarda avec étonnement, et répondit:

— Quoi, paysan?

Fauchelevent répéta:

— C'est moi qui paye!

— Quoi?

— Le vin.

— Quel vin?

— L'Argenteuil.

— Où ça l'Argenteuil?

— Au Bon Coing.

— Va-t'en au diable! dit le fossoyeur.

Et il jeta une pelletée de terre sur le cercueil.

La bière rendit un son creux. Fauchelevent se sentit chanceler et prêt à tomber lui-même dans la fosse. Il cria, d'une voix où commençait à se mêler l'étranglement du râle:

— Camarade, avant que le Bon Coing soit fermé!

Le fossoyeur reprit de la terre dans la pelle. Fauchelevent continua:

— Je paye!

Et il saisit le bras du fossoyeur.

— Écoutez-moi, camarade. Je suis le fossoyeur du couvent. Je viens pour vous aider. C'est une besogne qui peut se faire la nuit. Commençons donc par aller boire un coup.

Et tout en parlant, tout en se cramponnant à cette insistance désespérée, il faisait cette réflexion lugubre:

— Et quand il boirait! se griserait-il?

— Provincial, dit le fossoyeur, si vous le voulez absolument, j'y consens. Nous boirons. Après l'ouvrage, jamais avant.

Et il donna le branle à sa pelle. Fauchelevent le retint.

— C'est de l'Argenteuil à six!

— Ah çà, dit le fossoyeur, vous êtes sonneur de cloches. Din don, din don; vous ne savez dire que ça. Allez vous faire lanlaire.

Et il lança la seconde pelletée.

Fauchelevent arrivait à ce moment où l'on ne sait plus ce qu'on dit.

— Mais venez donc boire, cria-t-il, puisque c'est moi qui paye!

— Quand nous aurons couché l'enfant, dit le fossoyeur.

Il jeta la troisième pelletée.

Puis il enfonça la pelle dans la terre et ajouta:

— Voyez-vous, il va faire froid cette nuit, et la morte crierait derrière nous si nous la plantions là sans couverture.

En ce moment, tout en chargeant sa pelle, le fossoyeur se courbait et la poche de sa veste bâillait.

Le regard effaré de Fauchelevent tomba machinalement dans cette poche, et s'y arrêta.

Le soleil n'était pas encore caché par l'horizon; il faisait assez jour pour qu'on pût distinguer quelque chose de blanc au fond de cette poche béante.

Toute la quantité d'éclair que peut avoir l'œil d'un paysan picard traversa la prunelle de Fauchelevent. Il venait de lui venir une idée.

Sans que le fossoyeur, tout à sa pelletée de terre, s'en aperçût, il lui plongea par derrière la main dans la poche, et il retira de cette poche la chose blanche qui était au fond.

Le fossoyeur envoya dans la fosse la quatrième pelletée.

Au moment où il se retournait pour prendre la cinquième, Fauchelevent le regarda avec un profond calme et lui dit:

— À propos, nouveau, avez-vous votre carte?

Le fossoyeur s'interrompit.

— Quelle carte?

— Le soleil va se coucher.

— C'est bon, qu'il mette son bonnet de nuit.

— La grille du cimetière va se fermer.

— Eh bien, après?

— Avez-vous votre carte?

— Ah, ma carte! dit le fossoyeur.

Et il fouilla dans sa poche.

Une poche fouillée, il fouilla l’autre. Il passa aux goussets, explora le premier, retourna le second.

— Mais non, dit-il, je n’ai pas ma carte. Je l’aurai oubliée.

— Quinze francs d’amende, dit Fauchelevent.

Le fossoyeur devint vert. Le vert est la pâleur des gens livides.

— Ah Jésus-mon-Dieu-bancroche-à-bas-la-lune! s’écria-t-il. Quinze francs d’amende!

— Trois pièces-cent-sous, dit Fauchelevent.

Le fossoyeur laissa tomber sa pelle.

Le tour de Fauchelevent était venu.

— Ah çà, dit Fauchelevent, conscrit, pas de désespoir. Il ne s’agit pas de se suicider, et de profiter de la fosse. Quinze francs, c’est quinze francs, et d’ailleurs vous pouvez ne pas les payer. Je suis vieux, vous êtes nouveau. Je connais les trucs, les trocs, les trics et les tracs. Je vas vous donner un conseil d’ami. Une chose est claire, c’est que le soleil se couche, il touche au dôme, le cimetière va fermer dans cinq minutes.

— C’est vrai, répondit le fossoyeur.

— D’ici à cinq minutes, vous n’avez pas le temps de remplir la fosse, elle est creuse comme le diable, cette fosse, et d’arriver à temps pour sortir avant que la grille soit fermée.

— C’est juste.

— En ce cas quinze francs d’amende.

— Quinze francs.

— Mais vous avez le temps... — Où demeurez-vous?

— À deux pas de la barrière. À un quart d’heure d’ici. Rue de Vaugirard, numéro 87.

— Vous avez le temps, en pendant vos guiboles à votre cou, de sortir tout de suite.

— C’est exact.

— Une fois hors de la grille, vous galopez chez vous, vous prenez votre carte, vous revenez, le portier du cimetière vous ouvre. Ayant votre carte, rien à payer. Et vous enterrez votre mort. Moi, je vas vous le garder en attendant pour qu’il ne se sauve pas.

— Je vous dois la vie, paysan.

— Fichez-moi le camp, dit Fauchelevent.

Le fossoyeur, éperdu de reconnaissance, lui secoua la main, et partit en courant.

Quand le fossoyeur eut disparu dans le fourré, Fauchelevent écouta jusqu’à ce qu’il eût entendu le pas se perdre, puis il se pencha vers la fosse et dit à demi-voix:

— Père Madeleine!

Rien ne répondit. Fauchelevent eut un frémissement. Il se laissa rouler dans la fosse plutôt qu’il n’y descendit, se jeta sur la tête du cercueil et cria:

— Êtes-vous là?

Silence dans la bière.

Fauchelevent, ne respirant plus à force de tremblement, prit son ciseau à froid et son marteau, et fit sauter la planche de dessus. La face de Jean Valjean apparut dans le crépuscule, les yeux fermés, pâle.

Les cheveux de Fauchelevent se hérissèrent, il se leva debout, puis tomba adossé à la paroi de la fosse, prêt à s’affaisser sur la bière. Il regarda Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean gisait, blême et immobile.

Fauchelevent murmura d’une voix basse comme un souffle:

— Il est mort!

Et se redressant, croisant les bras si violemment que ses deux poings fermés vinrent frapper ses deux épaules, il cria:

— Voilà comme je le sauve, moi!

Alors le pauvre bonhomme se mit à sangloter. Monologuant, car c’est une erreur de croire que le monologue n’est pas dans la nature. Les fortes agitations parlent souvent à haute voix.

— C’est la faute au père Mestienne. Pourquoi est-il mort, cet imbécile-là? qu’est-ce qu’il avait besoin de crever au moment où on ne s’y attend pas? c’est lui qui fait mourir monsieur Madeleine. Père Madeleine! Il est dans la bière. Il est tout porté. C’est fini.

— Aussi, ces choses-là, est-ce que ça a du bon sens? Ah! mon Dieu! il est mort! Eh bien, et sa petite, qu’est-ce que je vas en faire? qu’est-ce que la fruitière va dire? Qu’un homme comme çà meure comme ça, si c’est Dieu possible! Quand je pense qu’il s’était mis sous ma charrette! Père Madeleine! père Madeleine! Pardine, il a étouffé, je disais bien. Il n’a pas voulu me croire. Eh bien, voilà une jolie polissonnerie de faite! Il est mort, ce brave homme, le plus bon homme qu’il y eût dans les bonnes gens du bon Dieu! Et sa petite Ah! d’abord je ne rentre pas là-bas, moi. Je reste ici.

Avoir fait un coup comme çà! C’est bien la peine d’être deux vieux pour être deux vieux fous. Mais d’abord comment avait-il fait pour entrer dans le couvent? c’était déjà le commencement. On ne doit pas faire de ces choses-là. Père Madeleine! père Madeleine! Madeleine! monsieur Madeleine! monsieur le maire! Il ne m’entend pas. Tirez-vous donc de là à présent!

Et il s’arracha les cheveux.

On entendit au loin dans les arbres un grincement aigu. C’était la grille du cimetière qui se fermait.

Fauchelevent se pencha sur Jean Valjean, et tout à coup eut une sorte de rebondissement et tout le recul qu’on peut avoir dans une fosse. Jean Valjean avait les yeux ouverts, et le regardait.

Voir une mort est effrayant, voir une résurrection l’est presque autant. Fauchelevent devint comme de pierre, pâle, hagard, bouleversé par tous ces excès d’émotions, ne sachant s’il avait affaire à un vivant ou à un mort, regardant Jean Valjean qui le regardait.

— Je m’endormais, dit Jean Valjean.

Et il se mit sur son séant.

Fauchelevent tomba à genoux.

— Juste bonne Vierge! m’avez-vous fait peur!

Puis il se releva et cria:

— Merci, père Madeleine!

Jean Valjean n’était qu’évanoui. Le grand air l’avait réveillé.

La joie est le reflux de la terreur. Fauchelevent avait presque autant à faire que Jean Valjean pour revenir à lui.

— Vous n’êtes donc pas mort! Oh! comme vous avez de l’esprit, vous! Je vous ai tant appelé que vous êtes revenu. Quand j’ai vu vos yeux fermés, j’ai dit: bon! le voilà étouffé. Je serais devenu fou furieux, vrai fou à camisole. On m’aurait mis à Bicêtre. Qu’est-ce que vous voulez que je fasse si vous étiez mort? Et votre petite! c’est la fruitière qui n’y aurait rien compris! On lui campe l’enfant sur les bras, et le grand-père est mort! Quelle histoire! mes bons saints du paradis, quelle histoire! Ah! vous êtes vivant, voilà le bouquet.

— J’ai froid, dit Jean Valjean.

Ce mot rappela complètement Fauchelevent à la réalité, qui était urgente. Ces deux hommes, même revenus à eux, avaient, sans s’en rendre compte, l’âme trouble, et en eux quelque chose d’étrange qui était l’égarement sinistre du lieu.

— Sortons vite d’ici, s’écria Fauchelevent.

Il fouilla dans sa poche, et en tira une gourde dont il s’était pourvu.

— Mais d’abord la goutte! dit-il.

La gourde acheva ce que le grand air avait commencé. Jean Valjean but une gorgée d’eau-de-vie et reprit pleine possession de lui-même.

Il sortit de la bière, et aida Fauchelevent à en reclouer le couvercle.

Trois minutes après, ils étaient hors de la fosse.

Du reste Fauchelevent était tranquille. Il prit son temps. Le cimetière était fermé. La survenue du fossoyeur Gribier n’était pas à craindre. Ce «conscrit» était chez lui, occupé à chercher sa carte, et bien empêché de la trouver dans son logis puisqu’elle était dans la poche de Fauchelevent. Sans carte, il ne pouvait rentrer au cimetière.

Fauchelevent prit la pelle et Jean Valjean la pioche, et tous deux firent l’enterrement de la bière vide.

Quand la fosse fut comblée, Fauchelevent dit à Jean Valjean:

— Venons-nous-en. Je garde la pelle; emportez la pioche.

La nuit tombait.

Jean Valjean eut quelque peine à se remuer et à marcher. Dans cette bière, il s’était roidi et était devenu un peu cadavre. L’ankylose de la mort l’avait saisi entre ces quatre planches. Il fallut, en quelque sorte, qu’il se dégelât du sépulcre.

— Vous êtes gourd, dit Fauchelevent. C’est dommage que je sois bancal, nous battrions la semelle.

— Bah! répondit Jean Valjean, quatre pas me mettront la marche dans les jambes.

Ils s’en allèrent par les allées où le corbillard avait passé. Arrivés devant la grille fermée et le pavillon du portier, Fauchelevent, qui tenait à sa main la carte du fossoyeur, la jeta dans la boîte, le portier tira le cordon, la porte s’ouvrit, ils sortirent.

— Comme tout cela va bien! dit Fauchelevent; quelle bonne idée vous avez eue, père Madeleine!

Ils franchirent la barrière Vaugirard de la façon la plus simple du monde. Aux alentours d’un cimetière, une pelle et une pioche sont deux passeports.

La rue de Vaugirard était déserte.

— Père Madeleine, dit Fauchelevent tout en cheminant et en levant les yeux vers les maisons, vous avez de meilleurs yeux que moi. Indiquez-moi donc le numéro 87.

— Le voici justement, dit Jean Valjean.

— Il n’y a personne dans la rue, reprit Fauchelevent. Donnez-moi la pioche, et attendez-moi deux minutes.

Fauchelevent entra au numéro 87, monta tout en haut, guidé par l’instinct qui mène toujours le pauvre au grenier, et frappa dans l’ombre à la porte d’une mansarde. Une voix répondit:

— Entrez.

C’était la voix de Gribier.

Fauchelevent poussa la porte. Le logis du fossoyeur était, comme toutes ces infortunées demeures, un galetas démeublé et encombré. Une caisse d’emballage, — une bière peut-être, — y tenait lieu de commode, un pot à beurre y tenait lieu de fontaine, une paillasse y tenait lieu de lit, le carreau y tenait lieu de chaises et de table. Il y avait dans un coin, sur une loque qui était un vieux lambeau de tapis, une femme maigre et force enfants, faisant un tas. Tout ce pauvre intérieur portait les traces d’un bouleversement. On eût dit qu’il y avait eu là un tremblement de terre «pour un». Les couvercles étaient déplacés, les haillons étaient épars, la cruche était cassée, la mère avait pleuré, les enfants probablement avaient été battus; traces d’une perquisition acharnée et bourrue. Il était visible que le fossoyeur avait éperdument cherché sa carte, et fait tout responsable de cette perte dans le galetas, depuis sa cruche jusqu’à sa femme. Il avait l’air désespéré.

Mais Fauchelevent se hâtait trop vers le dénouement de l’aventure pour remarquer ce côté triste de son succès.

Il entra et dit:

— Je vous rapporte votre pioche et votre pelle.

Gribier le regarda stupéfait.

— C’est vous, paysan?

— Et demain matin chez le concierge du cimetière vous trouverez votre carte.

Et il posa la pelle et la pioche sur le carreau.

— Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire? demanda Gribier.

— Cela veut dire que vous aviez laissé tomber votre carte de votre poche, que je l’ai trouvée à terre quand vous avez été parti, que j’ai enterré le mort, que j’ai rempli la fosse, que j’ai fait votre besogne, que le portier vous rendra votre carte, et que vous ne payerez pas quinze francs. Voilà, conscrit.

— Merci, villageois! s’écria Gribier ébloui. La prochaine fois, c’est moi qui paye à boire.

Chapitre VIII

Interrogatoire réussi

Une heure après, par la nuit noire, deux hommes et un enfant se présentaient au numéro 62 de la petite rue Picpus. Le plus vieux de ces hommes levait le marteau et frappait.

C’étaient Fauchelevent, Jean Valjean et Cosette.

Les deux bonshommes étaient allés chercher Cosette chez la fruitière de la rue du Chemin-Vert où Fauchelevent l’avait déposée la veille. Cosette avait passé ces vingt-quatre heures à ne rien comprendre et à trembler silencieusement. Elle tremblait tant qu’elle n’avait pas pleuré. Elle n’avait pas mangé non plus, ni dormi. La digne fruitière lui avait fait cent questions, sans obtenir d’autre réponse qu’un regard morne, toujours le même. Cosette n’avait rien laissé transpirer de tout ce qu’elle avait entendu et vu depuis deux jours. Elle devinait qu’on traversait une crise. Elle sentait profondément qu’il fallait «être sage». Qui n’a éprouvé la souveraine puissance de ces trois mots prononcés avec un certain accent dans l’oreille d’un petit être effrayé: Ne dis rien! La peur est une muette. D’ailleurs, personne ne garde un secret comme un enfant.

Seulement, quand, après ces lugubres vingt-quatre heures, elle avait revu Jean Valjean, elle avait poussé un tel cri de joie, que quelqu’un de pensif qui l’eût entendu eût deviné dans ce cri la sortie d’un abîme.

Fauchelevent était du couvent et savait les mots de passe. Toutes les portes s’ouvrirent.

Ainsi fut résolu le double et effrayant problème: sortir, et entrer.

Le portier, qui avait ses instructions, ouvrit la petite porte de service qui communiquait de la cour au jardin, et qu’il y a vingt ans on voyait encore de la rue, dans le mur du fond de la cour, faisant face à la porte cochère. Le portier les introduisit tous les trois par cette porte, et de là, ils gagnèrent ce parloir intérieur réservé où Fauchelevent, la veille, avait pris les ordres de la prieure.

La prieure, son rosaire à la main, les attendait. Une mère vocale, le voile bas, était debout près d’elle. Une chandelle discrète éclairait, on pourrait presque dire faisait semblant d’éclairer le parloir.

La prieure passa en revue Jean Valjean. Rien n'examine comme un œil baissé.

Puis elle le questionna:

— C'est vous le frère?

— Oui, révérende mère, répondit Fauchelevent.

— Comment vous appelez-vous?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Ultime Fauchelevent.

Il avait eu en effet un frère nommé Ultime qui était mort.

— De quel pays êtes-vous?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— De Picquigny, près Amiens.

— Quel âge avez-vous?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Cinquante ans.

— Quel est votre état?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Jardinier.

— Êtes-vous bon chrétien?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Tout le monde l'est dans la famille.

— Cette petite est à vous?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Oui, révérende mère.

— Vous êtes son père?

Fauchelevent répondit:

— Son grand-père.

La mère vocale dit à la prieure à demi-voix:

— Il répond bien.

Jean Valjean n'avait pas prononcé un mot.

La prieure regarda Cosette avec attention, et dit à demi-voix à la mère vocale:

— Elle sera laide.

Les deux mères causèrent quelques minutes très bas dans l'angle du parloir, puis la prieure se retourna et dit:

— Père Fauvent, vous aurez une autre genouillère avec grelot. Il en faut deux maintenant.

Le lendemain en effet on entendait deux grelots dans le jardin, et les religieuses ne résistaient pas à soulever un coin de leur voile. On voyait au fond sous les arbres deux hommes bêcher côte à côte, Fauvent et un autre. Événement énorme. Le silence fut rompu jusqu'à s'entre-dire: C'est un aide-jardinier.

Les mères vocales ajoutaient: C'est un frère au père Fauvent.

Jean Valjean en effet était régulièrement installé; il avait la genouillère de cuir, et le grelot; il était désormais officiel. Il s'appelait Ultime Fauchelevent.

La plus forte cause déterminante de l'admission avait été l'observation de la prieure sur Cosette: Elle sera laide.

La prieure, ce pronostic prononcé, prit immédiatement Cosette en amitié, et lui donna place au pensionnat comme élève de charité.

Ceci n'a rien que de très logique. On a beau n'avoir point de miroir au couvent, les femmes ont une conscience pour leur figure; or, les filles qui se sentent jolies se laissent malaisément faire religieuses; la vocation étant assez volontiers en proportion inverse de la beauté, on espère plus des laides que des belles. De là un goût vif pour les laiderons.

Toute cette aventure grandit le bon vieux Fauchelevent; il eut un triple succès; auprès de Jean Valjean qu'il sauva et abrita; auprès du fossoyeur Gribier qui se disait: il m'a épargné l'amende; auprès du couvent qui, grâce à lui, en gardant le cercueil de la mère Crucifixion sous l'autel, éluda César et satisfit Dieu. Il y eut une bière avec cadavre au Petit-Picpus et une bière sans cadavre au cimetière Vaugirard; l'ordre public en fut sans doute profondément troublé, mais ne s'en aperçut pas. Quant au couvent, sa reconnaissance pour Fauchelevent fut grande. Fauchelevent devint le meilleur des serviteurs et le plus précieux des jardiniers. À la plus prochaine visite de l'archevêque, la prieure conta la chose à Sa Grandeur, en s'en confessant un peu et en s'en vantant aussi. L'archevêque, au sortir du couvent, en parla, avec applaudissement et tout bas, à Mr de Latil, confesseur de Monsieur, plus tard archevêque de Reims et cardinal. L'admiration pour Fauchelevent fit du chemin, car elle alla à Rome. Nous avons eu sous les yeux un billet adressé par le pape régnant alors, Léon XII, à un de ses parents, monsignor dans la nonciature de Paris, et nommé comme lui Della Genga; on y lit ces lignes: «Il paraît qu'il y a dans un couvent de Paris un jardinier excellent, qui est un saint homme, appelé Fauvent.» Rien de tout ce triomphe ne parvint jusqu'à Fauchelevent dans sa baraque; il continua de greffer, de sarcler, et de couvrir ses melonnières, sans être au fait de son excellence et de sa sainteté. Il ne se douta pas plus de sa gloire que ne s’en doute un bœuf de Durham ou de Surrey dont le portrait est publié dans l’ Illustrated London News avec cette inscription: Bœuf qui a remporté le prix au concours des bêtes à cornes.

Chapitre IX

Clôture

Cosette au couvent continua de se taire.

Cosette se croyait tout naturellement la fille de Jean Valjean. Du reste, ne sachant rien, elle ne pouvait rien dire, et puis, dans tous les cas, elle n'aurait rien dit. Nous venons de le faire remarquer, rien ne dresse les enfants au silence comme le malheur. Cosette avait tant souffert qu'elle craignait tout, même de parler, même de respirer. Une parole avait si souvent fait crouler sur elle une avalanche! À peine commençait-elle à se rassurer depuis qu'elle était à Jean Valjean. Elle s'habitua assez vite au couvent. Seulement elle regrettait Catherine, mais elle n'osait pas le dire. Une fois pourtant elle dit à Jean Valjean:

— Père, si j'avais su, je l'aurais emmenée.

Cosette, en devenant pensionnaire du couvent, dut prendre l'habit des élèves de la maison. Jean Valjean obtint qu'on lui remît les vêtements qu'elle dépouillait. C'était ce même habillement de deuil qu'il lui avait fait revêtir lorsqu'elle avait quitté la gargote Thénardier. Il n'était pas encore très usé. Jean Valjean enferma ces nippes, plus les bas de laine et les souliers, avec force camphre et tous les aromates dont abondent les couvents, dans une petite valise qu'il trouva moyen de se procurer. Il mit cette valise sur une chaise près de son lit, et il en avait toujours la clef sur lui. — Père, lui demanda un jour Cosette, qu'est-ce que c'est donc que cette boîte-là qui sent si bon?

Le père Fauchelevent, outre cette gloire que nous venons de raconter et qu'il ignora, fut récompensé de sa bonne action; d'abord il en fut heureux; puis il eut beaucoup moins de besogne, la partageant. Enfin, comme il aimait beaucoup le tabac, il trouvait à la présence de Mr Madeleine cet avantage qu'il prenait trois fois plus de tabac que par le passé, et d'une manière infiniment plus voluptueuse, attendu que Mr Madeleine le lui payait.

Les religieuses n'adoptèrent point ce nom d'Ultime; elles appelèrent Jean Valjean l'autre Fauvent.

Si ces saintes filles avaient eu quelque chose du regard de Javert, elles auraient pu finir par remarquer que, lorsqu'il y avait quelque course à faire au dehors pour l’entretien du jardin, c’était toujours l’aîné Fauchelevent, le vieux, l’infirme, le bancal, qui sortait, et jamais l’autre; mais, soit que les yeux toujours fixés sur Dieu ne sachent pas espionner, soit qu’elles fussent, de préférence, occupées à se guetter entre elles, elles n’y firent point attention.

Du reste bien en prit à Jean Valjean de se tenir coi et de ne pas bouger. Javert observa le quartier plus d’un grand mois.

Ce couvent était pour Jean Valjean comme une île entourée de gouffres. Ces quatre murs étaient désormais le monde pour lui. Il y voyait le ciel assez pour être serein et Cosette assez pour être heureux.

Une vie très douce recommença pour lui.

Il habitait avec le vieux Fauchelevent la baraque du fond du jardin. Cette bicoque, bâtie en plâtras, qui existait encore en 1845, était composée, comme on sait, de trois chambres, lesquelles étaient toutes nues et n’avaient que les murailles. La principale avait été cédée de force, car Jean Valjean avait résisté en vain, par le père Fauchelevent à Mr Madeleine. Le mur de cette chambre, outre les deux clous destinés à l’accrochement de la genouillère et de la hotte, avait pour ornement un papier-monnaie royaliste de 93 appliqué à la muraille au-dessus de la cheminée et dont voici le fac-similé exact:

Cet assignat vendéen avait été cloué au mur par le précédent jardinier, ancien chouan qui était mort dans le couvent et que Fauchelevent avait remplacé.

Jean Valjean travaillait tous les jours dans le jardin et y était très utile. Il avait été jadis émondeur et se retrouvait volontiers jardinier. On se rappelle qu’il avait toutes sortes de recettes et de secrets de culture. Il en tira parti. Presque tous les arbres du verger étaient des sauvageons; il les écussonna et leur fit donner d’excellents fruits.

Cosette avait permission de venir tous les jours passer une heure près de lui. Comme les sœurs étaient tristes et qu’il était bon, l’enfant le comparait et l’adorait. À l’heure fixée, elle accourait vers la baraque. Quand elle entrait dans la masure, elle l’emplissait de paradis. Jean Valjean s’épanouissait, et sentait son bonheur s’accroître du bonheur qu’il donnait à Cosette. La joie que nous inspirons a cela de charmant que, loin de s’affaiblir comme tout reflet, elle nous revient plus rayonnante. Aux heures des récréations, Jean Valjean regardait de loin Cosette jouer et courir, et il distinguait son rire du rire des autres.

Car maintenant Cosette riait.

La figure de Cosette en était même jusqu'à un certain point changée. Le sombre en avait disparu. Le rire, c'est le soleil; il chasse l'hiver du visage humain.

La récréation finie, quand Cosette rentrait, Jean Valjean regardait les fenêtres de sa classe, et la nuit il se relevait pour regarder les fenêtres de son dortoir.

Du reste Dieu a ses voies; le couvent contribua, comme Cosette, à maintenir et à compléter dans Jean Valjean l'œuvre de l'évêque. Il est certain qu'un des côtés de la vertu aboutit à l'orgueil. Il y a là un pont bâti par le diable. Jean Valjean était peut-être à son insu assez près de ce côté-là et de ce pont-là, lorsque la providence le jeta dans le couvent du Petit-Picpus. Tant qu'il ne s'était comparé qu'à l'évêque, il s'était trouvé indigne et il avait été humble; mais depuis quelque temps il commençait à se comparer aux hommes, et l'orgueil naissait. Qui sait? il aurait peut-être fini par revenir tout doucement à la haine.

Le couvent l'arrêta sur cette pente.

C'était le deuxième lieu de captivité qu'il voyait. Dans sa jeunesse, dans ce qui avait été pour lui le commencement de la vie, et plus tard, tout récemment encore, il en avait vu un autre, lieu affreux, lieu terrible, et dont les sévérités lui avaient toujours paru être l'iniquité de la justice et le crime de la loi. Aujourd'hui après le bagne il voyait le cloître; et songeant qu'il avait fait partie du bagne et qu'il était maintenant, pour ainsi dire, spectateur du cloître, il les confrontait dans sa pensée avec anxiété.

Quelquefois il s'accoudait sur sa bêche et descendait lentement dans les spirales sans fond de la rêverie.

Il se rappelait ses anciens compagnons; comme ils étaient misérables; ils se levaient dès l'aube et travaillaient jusqu'à la nuit; à peine leur laissait-on le sommeil; ils couchaient sur des lits de camp, où l'on ne leur tolérait que des matelas de deux pouces d'épaisseur, dans des salles qui n'étaient chauffées qu'aux mois les plus rudes de l'année; ils étaient vêtus d'affreuses casaques rouges; on leur permettait, par grâce, un pantalon de toile dans les grandes chaleurs et une roulière de laine sur le dos dans les grands froids; ils ne buvaient de vin et ne mangeaient de viande que lorsqu'ils allaient «à la fatigue». Ils vivaient, n'ayant plus de noms, désignés seulement par des numéros et en quelque sorte faits chiffres, baissant les yeux, baissant la voix, les cheveux coupés, sous le bâton, dans la honte.

Puis son esprit retombait sur les êtres qu’il avait devant les yeux.

Ces êtres vivaient, eux aussi, les cheveux coupés, les yeux baissés, la voix basse, non dans la honte, mais au milieu des railleries du monde, non le dos meurtri par le bâton, mais les épaules déchirées par la discipline. À eux aussi, leur nom parmi les hommes s’était évanoui; ils n’existaient plus que sous des appellations austères. Ils ne mangeaient jamais de viande et ne buvaient jamais de vin; ils restaient souvent jusqu’au soir sans nourriture; ils étaient vêtus, non d’une veste rouge, mais d’un suaire noir, en laine, pesant l’été, léger l’hiver, sans pouvoir y rien retrancher ni y rien ajouter; sans même avoir, selon la saison, la ressource du vêtement de toile ou du surtout de laine; et ils portaient six mois de l’année des chemises de serge qui leur donnaient la fièvre. Ils habitaient, non des salles chauffées seulement dans les froids rigoureux, mais des cellules où l’on n’allumait jamais de feu; ils couchaient, non sur des matelas épais de deux pouces, mais sur la paille. Enfin on ne leur laissait pas même le sommeil; toutes les nuits, après une journée de labeur, il fallait, dans l’accablement du premier repos, au moment où l’on s’endormait et où l’on se réchauffait à peine, se réveiller, se lever, et s’en aller prier dans une chapelle glacée et sombre, les deux genoux sur la pierre.

À de certains jours, il fallait que chacun de ces êtres, à tour de rôle, restât douze heures de suite agenouillé sur la dalle ou prosterné la face contre terre et les bras en croix.

Les autres étaient des hommes; ceux-ci étaient des femmes.

Qu’avaient fait ces hommes? Ils avaient volé, violé, pillé, tué, assassiné. C’étaient des bandits, des faussaires, des empoisonneurs, des incendiaires, des meurtriers, des parricides. Qu’avaient fait ces femmes? Elles n’avaient rien fait.

D’un côté le brigandage, la fraude, le dol, la violence, la lubricité, l’homicide, toutes les espèces du sacrilège, toutes les variétés de l’attentat; de l’autre une seule chose, l’innocence.

L’innocence parfaite, presque enlevée dans une mystérieuse assomption, tenant encore à la terre par la vertu, tenant déjà au ciel par la sainteté.

D’un côté des confidences de crimes qu’on se fait à voix basse. De l’autre la confession des fautes qui se fait à voix haute. Et quels crimes! et quelles fautes!

D’un côté des miasmes, de l’autre un ineffable parfum. D’un côté une peste morale, gardée à vue, parquée sous le canon, et dévorant lentement ses pestiférés; de l’autre un chaste embrasement de toutes les âmes dans le même foyer. Là les ténèbres; ici l’ombre; mais une ombre pleine de clartés, et des clartés pleines de rayonnements.

Deux lieux d’esclavage; mais dans le premier la délivrance possible, une limite légale toujours entrevue, et puis l’évasion. Dans le second, la perpétuité; pour toute espérance, à l’extrémité lointaine de l’avenir, cette lueur de liberté que les hommes appellent la mort.

Dans le premier, on n’était enchaîné que par des chaînes; dans l’autre, on était enchaîné par sa foi.

Que se dégageait-il du premier? Une immense malédiction, le grincement de dents, la haine, la méchanceté désespérée, un cri de rage contre l’association humaine, un sarcasme au ciel.

Que sortait-il du second? La bénédiction et l’amour.

Et dans ces deux endroits si semblables et si divers, ces deux espèces d’êtres si différents accomplissaient la même œuvre, l’expiation.

Jean Valjean comprenait bien l’expiation des premiers; l’expiation personnelle, l’expiation pour soi-même. Mais il ne comprenait pas celle des autres, celle de ces créatures sans reproche et sans souillure, et il se demandait avec un tremblement: Expiation de quoi? quelle expiation?

Une voix répondait dans sa conscience: La plus divine des générosités humaines, l’expiation pour autrui.

Ici toute théorie personnelle est réservée, nous ne sommes que narrateur; c’est au point de vue de Jean Valjean que nous nous plaçons, et nous traduisons ses impressions.

Il avait sous les yeux le sommet sublime de l’abnégation, la plus haute cime de la vertu possible; l’innocence qui pardonne aux hommes leurs fautes et qui les expie à leur place; la servitude subie, la torture acceptée, le supplice réclamé par les âmes qui n’ont pas péché pour en dispenser les âmes qui ont failli; l’amour de l’humanité s’abîmant dans l’amour de Dieu, mais y demeurant distinct, et suppliant; de doux êtres faibles ayant la misère de ceux qui sont punis et le sourire de ceux qui sont récompensés.

Et il se rappelait qu’il avait osé se plaindre!

Souvent, au milieu de la nuit, il se relevait pour écouter le chant reconnaissant de ces créatures innocentes et accablées de sévérités, et il se sentait froid dans les veines en songeant que ceux qui étaient châtiés justement n’élevaient la voix vers le ciel que pour blasphémer, et que lui, misérable, il avait montré le poing à Dieu.

Chose frappante et qui le faisait rêver profondément comme un avertissement à voix basse de la providence même, l’escalade, les clôtures franchies, l’aventure acceptée jusqu’à la mort, l’ascension difficile et dure, tous ces mêmes efforts qu’il avait faits pour sortir de l’autre lieu d’expiation, il les avait faits pour entrer dans celui-ci. Était-ce un symbole de sa destinée?

Cette maison était une prison aussi, et ressemblait lugubrement à l’autre demeure dont il s’était enfui, et pourtant il n’avait jamais eu l’idée de rien de pareil.

Il revoyait des grilles, des verrous, des barreaux de fer, pour garder qui? Des anges.

Ces hautes murailles qu’il avait vues autour des tigres, il les revoyait autour des brebis.

C’était un lieu d’expiation, et non de châtiment; et pourtant il était plus austère encore, plus morne et plus impitoyable que l’autre. Ces vierges étaient plus durement courbées que les forçats. Un vent froid et rude, ce vent qui avait glacé sa jeunesse, traversait la fosse grillée et cadenassée des vautours; une bise plus âpre et plus douloureuse encore soufflait dans la cage des colombes. Pourquoi?

Quand il pensait à ces choses, tout ce qui était en lui s’abîmait devant ce mystère de sublimité.

Dans ces méditations l’orgueil s’évanouit. Il fit toutes sortes de retours sur lui-même; il se sentit chétif et pleura bien des fois. Tout ce qui était entré dans sa vie depuis six mois le ramenait vers les saintes injonctions de l’évêque, Cosette par l’amour, le couvent par l’humilité.

Quelquefois, le soir, au crépuscule, à l’heure où le jardin était désert, on le voyait à genoux au milieu de l’allée qui côtoyait la chapelle, devant la fenêtre où il avait regardé la nuit de son arrivée, tourné vers l’endroit où il savait que la sœur qui faisait la réparation était prosternée et en prière. Il priait, ainsi agenouillé devant cette sœur.

Il semblait qu’il n’osait s’agenouiller directement devant Dieu.

Tout ce qui l’entourait, ce jardin paisible, ces fleurs embaumées, ces enfants poussant des cris joyeux, ces femmes graves et simples, ce cloître silencieux, le pénétraient lentement, et peu à peu son âme se composait de silence comme ce cloître, de parfum comme ces fleurs, de paix comme ce jardin, de simplicité comme ces femmes, de joie comme ces enfants. Et puis il songeait que c’étaient deux maisons de Dieu qui l’avaient successivement recueilli aux deux instants critiques de sa vie, la première lorsque toutes les portes se fermaient et que la société humaine le repoussait, la deuxième au moment où la société humaine se remettait à sa poursuite et où le bagne se rouvrait; et que sans la première il serait retombé dans le crime et sans la seconde dans le supplice.

Tout son cœur se fondait en reconnaissance et il aimait de plus en plus.

Plusieurs années s'écoulèrent ainsi; Cosette grandissait.

Tome III — MARIUS

Livre premier — Paris étudié dans son atome

Chapitre I

Parvulus

Paris a un enfant et la forêt a un oiseau; l’oiseau s’appelle le moineau; l’enfant s’appelle le gamin.

Accouplez ces deux idées qui contiennent, l’une toute la fournaise, l’autre toute l’aurore, choquez ces étincelles, Paris, l’enfance; il en jaillit un petit être. Homuncio, dirait Plaute.

Ce petit être est joyeux. Il ne mange pas tous les jours et il va au spectacle, si bon lui semble, tous les soirs. Il n’a pas de chemise sur le corps, pas de souliers aux pieds, pas de toit sur la tête; il est comme les mouches du ciel qui n’ont rien de tout cela. Il a de sept à treize ans, vit par bandes, bat le pavé, loge en plein air, porte un vieux pantalon de son père qui lui descend plus bas que les talons, un vieux chapeau de quelque autre père qui lui descend plus bas que les oreilles, une seule bretelle en lisière jaune, court, guette, quête, perd le temps, culotte des pipes, jure comme un damné, hante le cabaret, connaît des voleurs, tutoie des filles, parle argot, chante des chansons obscènes, et n’a rien de mauvais dans le cœur. C’est qu’il a dans l’âme une perle, l’innocence, et les perles ne se dissolvent pas dans la boue. Tant que l’homme est enfant, Dieu veut qu’il soit innocent.

Si l’on demandait à l’énorme ville: Qu’est-ce que c’est que cela? elle répondrait: C’est mon petit.

Chapitre II

Quelques-uns de ses signes particuliers

Le gamin de Paris, c’est le nain de la géante.

N’exagérons point, ce chérubin du ruisseau a quelquefois une chemise mais alors il n’en a qu’une; il a quelquefois des souliers, mais alors ils n’ont point de semelles; il a quelquefois un logis, et il l’aime, car il y trouve sa mère; mais il préfère la rue, parce qu’il y trouve la liberté. Il a ses jeux à lui, ses malices à lui dont la haine des bourgeois fait le fond; ses métaphores à lui; être mort, cela s’appelle manger des pissenlits par la racine; ses métiers à lui, amener des fiacres, baisser les marchepieds des voitures, établir des péages d’un côté de la rue à l’autre dans les grosses pluies, ce qu’il appelle faire des ponts des arts, crier les discours prononcés par l’autorité en faveur du peuple français, gratter l’entre-deux des pavés; il a sa monnaie à lui, qui se compose de tous les petits morceaux de cuivre façonné qu’on peut trouver sur la voie publique. Cette curieuse monnaie, qui prend le nom de loques, a un cours invariable et fort bien réglé dans cette petite bohème d’enfants.

Enfin il a sa faune à lui, qu’il observe studieusement dans des coins; la bête à bon Dieu, le puceron tête-de-mort, le faucheux, le «diable», insecte noir qui menace en tordant sa queue armée de deux cornes. Il a son monstre fabuleux qui a des écailles sous le ventre et qui n’est pas un lézard, qui a des pustules sur le dos et qui n’est pas un crapaud, qui habite les trous des vieux fours à chaux et des puisards desséchés, noir, velu, visqueux, rampant, tantôt lent, tantôt rapide, qui ne crie pas, mais qui regarde, et qui est si terrible que personne ne l’a jamais vu; il nomme ce monstre «le sourd». Chercher des sourds dans les pierres, c’est un plaisir du genre redoutable. Autre plaisir, lever brusquement un pavé, et voir des cloportes. Chaque région de Paris est célèbre par les trouvailles intéressantes qu’on peut y faire. Il y a des perce-oreilles dans les chantiers des Ursulines, il y a des mille-pieds au Panthéon, il y a des têtards dans les fossés du Champ de Mars.

Quant à des mots, cet enfant en a comme Talleyrand. Il n’est pas moins cynique, mais il est plus honnête. Il est doué d’on ne sait quelle jovialité imprévue; il ahurit le boutiquier de son fou rire. Sa gamme va gaillardement de la haute comédie à la farce.

Un enterrement passe. Parmi ceux qui accompagnent le mort, il y a un médecin. — Tiens, s'écrie un gamin, depuis quand les médecins reportent-ils leur ouvrage?

Un autre est dans une foule. Un homme grave, orné de lunettes et de breloques, se retourne indigné: — Vaurien, tu viens de prendre «la taille» à ma femme.

— Moi, monsieur! fouillez-moi.

Chapitre III

Il est agréable

Le soir, grâce à quelques sous qu'il trouve toujours moyen de se procurer, l'homuncio entre dans un théâtre. En franchissant ce seuil magique, il se transfigure; il était le gamin, il devient le titi. Les théâtres sont des espèces de vaisseaux retournés qui ont la cale en haut. C'est dans cette cale que le titi s'entasse. Le titi est au gamin ce que la phalène est à la larve; le même être envolé et planant. Il suffit qu'il soit là, avec son rayonnement de bonheur, avec sa puissance d'enthousiasme et de joie, avec son battement de mains qui ressemble à un battement d'ailes, pour que cette cale étroite, fétide, obscure, sordide, malsaine, hideuse, abominable, se nomme le Paradis.

Donnez à un être l'inutile et ôtez-lui le nécessaire, vous aurez le gamin.

Le gamin n'est pas sans quelque intuition littéraire. Sa tendance, nous le disons avec la quantité de regret qui convient, ne serait point le goût classique. Il est, de sa nature, peu académique. Ainsi, pour donner un exemple, la popularité de mademoiselle Mars dans ce petit public d'enfants orageux était assaisonnée d'une pointe d'ironie. Le gamin l'appelait mademoiselle Muche.

Cet être braille, raille, gouaille, bataille, a des chiffons comme un bambin et des guenilles comme un philosophe, pêche dans l'égout, chasse dans le cloaque, extrait la gaîté de l'immondice, fouaille de sa verve les carrefours, ricane et mord, siffle et chante, acclame et engueule, tempère Alleluia par Matanturlurette, psalmodie tous les rythmes depuis le De Profundis jusqu'à la Chienlit, trouve sans chercher, sait ce qu'il ignore, est spartiate jusqu'à la filouterie, est fou jusqu'à la sagesse, est lyrique jusqu'à l'ordure, s'accroupirait sur l'Olympe, se vautre dans le fumier et en sort couvert d'étoiles. Le gamin de Paris, c'est Rabelais petit.

Il n'est pas content de sa culotte, s'il n'y a point de gousset de montre.

Il s'étonne peu, s'effraye encore moins, chansonne les superstitions, dégonfle les exagérations, blague les mystères, tire la langue aux revenants, dépoétise les échasses, introduit la caricature dans les grossissements épiques. Ce n'est pas qu'il est prosaïque; loin de là; mais il remplace la vision solennelle par la fantasmagorie farce. Si Adamastor lui apparaissait, le gamin dirait: Tiens! Croquemitaine!

Chapitre IV

Il peut être utile

Paris commence au badaud et finit au gamin, deux êtres dont aucune autre ville n'est capable; l'acceptation passive qui se satisfait de regarder, et l'initiative inépuisable; Prudhomme et Fouillou. Paris seul a cela dans son histoire naturelle. Toute la monarchie est dans le badaud. Toute l'anarchie est dans le gamin.

Ce pâle enfant des faubourgs de Paris vit et se développe, se noue et «se dénoue» dans la souffrance, en présence des réalités sociales et des choses humaines, témoin pensif. Il se croit lui-même insouciant; il ne l'est pas. Il regarde, prêt à rire; prêt à autre chose aussi. Qui que vous soyez qui vous nommez Préjugé, Abus, Ignominie, Oppression, Iniquité, Despotisme, Injustice, Fanatisme, Tyrannie, prenez garde au gamin béant.

Ce petit grandira.

De quelle argile est-il fait? de la première fange venue. Une poignée de boue, un souffle, et voilà Adam. Il suffît qu'un dieu passe. Un dieu a toujours passé sur le gamin. La fortune travaille à ce petit être. Par ce mot la fortune, nous entendons un peu l'aventure. Ce pygmée pétri à même dans la grosse terre commune, ignorant, illettré, ahuri, vulgaire, populacier, sera-ce un ionien ou un béotien? Attendez, currit rota, l'esprit de Paris, ce démon qui crée les enfants du hasard et les hommes du destin, au rebours du potier latin, fait de la cruche une amphore.

Chapitre V

Ses frontières

Le gamin aime la ville, il aime aussi la solitude, ayant du sage en lui. Urbis amator, comme Fuscus; ruris amator, comme Flaccus.

Errer songeant, c’est-à-dire flâner, est un bon emploi du temps pour le philosophe; particulièrement dans cette espèce de campagne un peu bâtarde, assez laide, mais bizarre et composée de deux natures, qui entoure certaines grandes villes, notamment Paris. Observer la banlieue, c’est observer l’amphibie. Fin des arbres, commencement des toits, fin de l’herbe, commencement du pavé, fin des sillons, commencement des boutiques, fin des ornières, commencement des passions, fin du murmure divin, commencement de la rumeur humaine; de là un intérêt extraordinaire.

De là, dans ces lieux peu attrayants, et marqués à jamais par le passant de l’épithète: triste, les promenades, en apparence sans but, du songeur.

Celui qui écrit ces lignes a été longtemps rôdeur de barrières à Paris, et c’est pour lui une source de souvenirs profonds. Ce gazon ras, ces sentiers pierreux, cette craie, ces marnes, ces plâtres, ces âpres monotonies des friches et des jachères, les plants de primeurs des maraîchers aperçus tout à coup dans un fond, ce mélange du sauvage et du bourgeois, ces vastes recoins déserts où les tambours de la garnison tiennent bruyamment école et font une sorte de bégayement de la bataille, ces thébaïdes le jour, coupe-gorge la nuit, le moulin dégingandé qui tourne au vent, les roues d’extraction des carrières, les guinguettes au coin des cimetières, le charme mystérieux des grands murs sombres coupant carrément d’immenses terrains vagues inondés de soleil et pleins de papillons, tout cela l’attirait.

Presque personne sur la terre ne connaît ces lieux singuliers, la Glacière, la Cunette, le hideux mur de Grenelle tigré de balles, le Mont-Parnasse, la Fosse-aux-Loups, les Aubiers sur la berge de la Marne, Montsouris, la Tombe-Issoire, la Pierre-Plate de Châtillon où il y a une vieille carrière épuisée qui ne sert plus qu’à faire pousser des champignons, et que ferme à fleur de terre une trappe en planches pourries. La campagne de Rome est une idée, la banlieue de Paris en est une autre; ne voir dans ce que nous offre un horizon rien que des champs, des maisons ou des arbres, c’est rester à la surface; tous les aspects des choses sont des pensées de Dieu. Le lieu où une plaine fait sa jonction avec une ville est toujours empreint d’on ne sait quelle mélancolie pénétrante. La nature et l’humanité vous y parlent à la fois. Les originalités locales y apparaissent.

Quiconque a erré comme nous dans ces solitudes contiguës à nos faubourgs qu’on pourrait nommer les limbes de Paris, y a entrevu çà et là, à l’endroit le plus abandonné, au moment le plus inattendu, derrière une haie maigre ou dans l’angle d’un mur lugubre, des enfants, groupés tumultueusement, fétides, boueux, poudreux, dépenaillés, hérissés, qui jouent à la pigoche couronnés de bleuets. Ce sont tous les petits échappés des familles pauvres. Le boulevard extérieur est leur milieu respirable; la banlieue leur appartient. Ils y font une éternelle école buissonnière. Ils y chantent ingénument leur répertoire de chansons malpropres. Ils sont là, ou pour mieux dire, ils existent là, loin de tout regard, dans la douce clarté de mai ou de juin, agenouillés autour d’un trou dans la terre, chassant des billes avec le pouce, se disputant des liards, irresponsables, envolés, lâchés, heureux; et, dès qu’ils vous aperçoivent, ils se souviennent qu’ils ont une industrie, et qu’il leur faut gagner leur vie, et ils vous offrent à vendre un vieux bas de laine plein de hannetons ou une touffe de lilas. Ces rencontres d’enfants étranges sont une des grâces charmantes, et en même temps poignantes, des environs de Paris.

Quelquefois, dans ces tas de garçons, il y a des petites filles, — sont-ce leurs sœurs? — presque jeunes filles, maigres, fiévreuses, gantées de hâle, marquées de taches de rousseur, coiffées d’épis de seigle et de coquelicots, gaies, hagardes, pieds nus. On en voit qui mangent des cerises dans les blés. Le soir on les entend rire. Ces groupes, chaudement éclairés de la pleine lumière de midi ou entrevus dans le crépuscule, occupent longtemps le songeur, et ces visions se mêlent à son rêve.

Paris, centre, la banlieue, circonférence; voilà pour ces enfants toute la terre. Jamais ils ne se hasardent au delà. Ils ne peuvent pas plus sortir de l’atmosphère parisienne que les poissons ne peuvent sortir de l’eau. Pour eux, à deux lieues des barrières, il n’y a plus rien. Ivry, Gentilly, Arcueil, Belleville, Aubervilliers, Ménilmontant Choisy-le-Roi, Billancourt, Meudon, Issy, Vanves, Sèvres, Puteaux, Neuilly, Gennevilliers, Colombes, Romainville, Chatou, Asnières, Bougival, Nanterre, Enghien, Noisy-le-Sec, Nogent, Gournay, Drancy, Gonesse, c’est là que finit l’univers.

Chapitre VI

Un peu d'histoire

À l'époque, d'ailleurs presque contemporaine, où se passe l'action de ce livre, il n'y avait pas, comme aujourd'hui, un sergent de ville à chaque coin de rue (bienfait qu'il n'est pas temps de discuter); les enfants errants abondaient dans Paris. Les statistiques donnent une moyenne de deux cent soixante enfants sans asile ramassés alors annuellement par les rondes de police dans les terrains non clos, dans les maisons en construction et sous les arches des ponts. Un de ces nids, resté fameux, a produit «les hirondelles du pont d'Arcole». C'est là, du reste, le plus désastreux des symptômes sociaux. Tous les crimes de l'homme commencent au vagabondage de l'enfant.

Exceptons Paris pourtant. Dans une mesure relative, et nonobstant le souvenir que nous venons de rappeler, l'exception est juste. Tandis que dans toute autre grande ville un enfant vagabond est un homme perdu, tandis que, presque partout, l'enfant livré à lui-même est en quelque sorte dévoué et abandonné à une sorte d'immersion fatale dans les vices publics qui dévore en lui l'honnêteté et la conscience, le gamin de Paris, insistons-y, si fruste, et si entamé à la surface, est intérieurement à peu près intact. Chose magnifique à constater et qui éclate dans la splendide probité de nos révolutions populaires, une certaine incorruptibilité résulte de l'idée qui est dans l'air de Paris comme du sel qui est dans l'eau de l'océan. Respirer Paris, cela conserve l'âme.

Ce que nous disons là n'ôte rien au serrement de cœur dont on se sent pris chaque fois qu'on rencontre un de ces enfants autour desquels il semble qu'on voie flotter les fils de la famille brisée. Dans la civilisation actuelle, si incomplète encore, ce n'est point une chose très anormale que ces fractures de familles se vidant dans l'ombre, ne sachant plus trop ce que leurs enfants sont devenus, et laissant tomber leurs entrailles sur la voie publique. De là des destinées obscures. Cela s'appelle, car cette chose triste a fait locution, «être jeté sur le pavé de Paris».

Soit dit en passant, ces abandons d'enfants n'étaient point découragés par l'ancienne monarchie. Un peu d'Égypte et de Bohême dans les basses régions accommodait les hautes sphères, et faisait l'affaire des puissants. La haine de l’enseignement des enfants du peuple était un dogme. À quoi bon les «demi-lumières»? Tel était le mot d’ordre. Or l’enfant errant est le corollaire de l’enfant ignorant.

D’ailleurs, la monarchie avait quelquefois besoin d’enfants, et alors elle écumait la rue. Sous Louis XIV, pour ne pas remonter plus haut, le roi voulait, avec raison, créer une flotte. L’idée était bonne. Mais voyons le moyen. Pas de flotte si, à côté du navire à voiles, jouet du vent, et pour le remorquer au besoin, on n’a pas le navire qui va où il veut, soit par la rame, soit par la vapeur; les galères étaient alors à la marine ce que sont aujourd’hui les steamers. Il fallait donc des galères; mais la galère ne se meut que par le galérien; il fallait donc des galériens. Colbert faisait faire par les intendants de province et par les parlements le plus de forçats qu’il pouvait. La magistrature y mettait beaucoup de complaisance. Un homme gardait son chapeau sur sa tête devant une procession, attitude huguenote; on l’envoyait aux galères. On rencontrait un enfant dans la rue, pourvu qu’il eût quinze ans et qu’il ne sût où coucher, on l’envoyait aux galères. Grand règne; grand siècle.

Sous Louis XV, les enfants disparaissaient dans Paris; la police les enlevait, on ne sait pour quel mystérieux emploi. On chuchotait avec épouvante de monstrueuses conjectures sur les bains de pourpre du roi. Barbier parle naïvement de ces choses. Il arrivait parfois que les exempts, à court d’enfants, en prenaient qui avaient des pères. Les pères, désespérés, couraient sus aux exempts. En ce cas-là, le parlement intervenait, et faisait pendre, qui? Les exempts? Non. Les pères.

Chapitre VII

Le gamin aurait sa place dans les classifications de l'Inde

La gaminerie parisienne est presque une caste. On pourrait dire: n'en est pas qui veut.

Ce mot, gamin, fut imprimé pour la première fois et arriva de la langue populaire dans la langue littéraire en 1834. C'est dans un opuscule intitulé Claude Gueux que ce mot fit son apparition. Le scandale fut vif. Le mot a passé.

Les éléments qui constituent la considération des gamins entre eux sont très variés. Nous en avons connu et pratiqué un qui était fort respecté et fort admiré pour avoir vu tomber un homme du haut des tours de Notre-Dame; un autre, pour avoir réussi à pénétrer dans l'arrière-cour où étaient momentanément déposées les statues du dôme des Invalides et leur avoir «chipé» du plomb; un troisième, pour avoir vu verser une diligence; un autre encore, parce qu'il «connaissait» un soldat qui avait manqué crever un œil à un bourgeois.

C'est ce qui explique cette exclamation d'un gamin parisien, épiphonème profond dont le vulgaire rit sans le comprendre: — Dieu de Dieu! ai-je du malheur! dire que je n'ai pas encore vu quelqu'un tomber d'un cinquième! (Ai-je se prononce j'ai-t-y; cinquième se prononce cintième.)

Certes, c'est un beau mot de paysan que celui-ci: Père un tel, votre femme est morte de sa maladie; pourquoi n'avez-vous pas envoyé chercher de médecin? Que voulez-vous, monsieur, nous autres pauvres gens, j'nous mourons nous-mêmes. Mais si toute la passivité narquoise du paysan est dans ce mot, toute l'anarchie libre-penseuse du mioche faubourien est, à coup sûr, dans cet autre. Un condamné à mort dans la charrette écoute son confesseur. L'enfant de Paris se récrie: — Il parle à son calotin. Oh! le capon!

Une certaine audace en matière religieuse rehausse le gamin. Être esprit fort est important.

Assister aux exécutions constitue un devoir. On se montre la guillotine et l'on rit. On l'appelle de toutes sortes de petits noms: — Fin de la soupe, — Grognon, — La mère au Bleu (au ciel), — La dernière bouchée, — etc., etc.

Pour ne rien perdre de la chose, on escalade les murs, on se hisse aux balcons, on monte aux arbres, on se suspend aux grilles, on s’accroche aux cheminées. Le gamin naît couvreur comme il naît marin. Un toit ne lui fait pas plus peur qu’un mât. Pas de fête qui vaille la Grève. Samson et l’abbé Montés sont les vrais noms populaires. On hue le patient pour l’encourager. On l’admire quelquefois. Lacenaire, gamin, voyant l’affreux Dautun mourir bravement, a dit ce mot où il y a un avenir: J’en étais jaloux. Dans la gaminerie, on ne connaît pas Voltaire, mais on connaît Papavoine. On mêle dans la même légende «les politiques» aux assassins. On a les traditions du dernier vêtement de tous. On sait que Tolleron avait un bonnet de chauffeur, Avril une casquette de loutre, Louvel un chapeau rond, que le vieux Delaporte était chauve et nu-tête, que Castaing était tout rose et très joli, que Bories avait une barbiche romantique, que Jean Martin avait gardé ses bretelles, que Lecouffé et sa mère se querellaient. — Ne vous reprochez donc pas votre panier, leur cria un gamin. Un autre, pour voir passer Debacker, trop petit dans la foule, avise la lanterne du quai et y grimpe. Un gendarme, de station là, fronce le sourcil. — Laissez-moi monter, m’sieu le gendarme, dit le gamin. Et pour attendrir l’autorité, il ajoute: Je ne tomberai pas. — Je m’importe peu que tu tombes, répond le gendarme.

Dans la gaminerie, un accident mémorable est fort compté. On parvient au sommet de la considération s’il arrive qu’on se coupe très profondément, «jusqu’à l’os».

Le poing n’est pas un médiocre élément de respect. Une des choses que le gamin dit le plus volontiers, c’est: Je suis joliment fort, va! — Être gaucher vous rend fort enviable. Loucher est une chose estimée.

Chapitre VIII

Où on lira un mot charmant du dernier roi

L’été, il se métamorphose en grenouille; et le soir, à la nuit tombante, devant les ponts d’Austerlitz et d’Iéna, du haut des trains à charbon et des bateaux de blanchisseuses, il se précipite tête baissée dans la Seine et dans toutes les infractions possibles aux lois de la pudeur et de la police. Cependant les sergents de ville veillent, et il en résulte une situation hautement dramatique qui a donné lieu une fois à un cri fraternel et mémorable; ce cri, qui fut célèbre vers 1830, est un avertissement stratégique de gamin à gamin; il se scande comme un vers d’Homère, avec une notation presque aussi inexprimable que la mélopée éleusiaque des Panathénées, et l’on y retrouve l’antique Évohé. Le voici: — Ohé, Titi, ohéée! y a de la grippe, y a de la cogne, prends tes zardes et va-t’en, pâsse par l’égout!

Quelquefois ce moucheron — c’est ainsi qu’il se qualifie lui-même — sait lire; quelquefois il sait écrire, toujours il sait barbouiller. Il n’hésite pas à se donner, par on ne sait quel mystérieux enseignement mutuel, tous les talents qui peuvent être utiles à la chose publique: de 1815 à 1830, il imitait le cri du dindon; de 1830 à 1848, il griffonnait une poire sur les murailles. Un soir d’été, Louis-Philippe, rentrant à pied, en vit un, tout petit, haut comme cela, qui suait et se haussait pour charbonner une poire gigantesque sur un des piliers de la grille de Neuilly; le roi, avec cette bonhomie qui lui venait de Henri IV, aida le gamin, acheva la poire, et donna un louis à l’enfant en lui disant: La poire est aussi là-dessus. Le gamin aime le hourvari. Un certain état violent lui plaît. Il exècre «les curés». Un jour, rue de l’université, un de ces jeunes drôles faisait un pied de nez à la porte cochère du numéro 69. — Pourquoi fais-tu cela à cette porte? lui demanda un passant. L’enfant répondit: Il y a là un curé. C’est là, en effet, que demeure le nonce du pape. Cependant, quel que soit le voltairianisme du gamin, si l’occasion se présente d’être enfant de chœur, il se peut qu’il accepte, et dans ce cas il sert la messe poliment. Il y a deux choses dont il est le Tantale et qu’il désire toujours sans y atteindre jamais: renverser le gouvernement et faire recoudre son pantalon.

Le gamin à l’état parfait possède tous les sergents de ville de Paris, et sait toujours, lorsqu’il en rencontre un, mettre le nom sous la figure. Il les dénombre sur le bout du doigt. Il étudie leurs mœurs et il a sur chacun des notes spéciales. Il lit à livre ouvert dans les âmes de la police. Il vous dira couramment et sans broncher: — «Un tel est traître; — un tel est très méchant; — un tel est grand; — un tel est ridicule;» (tous ces mots, traître, méchant, grand, ridicule, ont dans sa bouche une acception particulière) — «celui-ci s’imagine que le Pont-Neuf est à lui et empêche le monde de se promener sur la corniche en dehors des parapets; celui-là a la manie de tirer les oreilles aux personnes etc., etc...»

Chapitre IX

La vieille âme de la Gaule

Il y avait de cet enfant-là dans Poquelin, fils des Halles; il y en avait dans Beaumarchais. La gaminerie est une nuance de l'esprit gaulois. Mêlée au bon sens, elle lui ajoute parfois de la force, comme l'alcool au vin. Quelquefois elle est défaut. Homère rabâche, soit; on pourrait dire que Voltaire gamine. Camille Desmoulins était faubourien. Championnet, qui brutalisait les miracles, était sorti du pavé de Paris; il avait, tout petit, inondé les portiques de Saint-Jean de Beauvais et de Saint-Etienne du Mont; il avait assez tutoyé la châsse de sainte Geneviève pour donner des ordres à la fiole de saint Janvier.

Le gamin de Paris est respectueux, ironique et insolent. Il a de vilaines dents parce qu'il est mal nourri et que son estomac souffre, et de beaux yeux parce qu'il a de l'esprit. Jéhovah présent, il sauterait à cloche-pied les marches du paradis. Il est fort à la savate. Toutes les croissances lui sont possibles. Il joue dans le ruisseau et se redresse par l'émeute; son effronterie persiste devant la mitraille; c'était un polisson, c'est un héros; ainsi que le petit thébain, il secoue la peau du lion; le tambour Bara était un gamin de Paris; il crie: En avant! comme le cheval de l'Écriture dit: Vah! et en une minute, il passe du marmot au géant.

Cet enfant du bourbier est aussi l'enfant de l'idéal. Mesurez cette envergure qui va de Molière à Bara.

Somme toute, et pour tout résumer d'un mot, le gamin est un être qui s'amuse, parce qu'il est malheureux.

Chapitre X

Ecce Paris, ecce homo

Pour tout résumer encore, le gamin de Paris aujourd'hui, comme autrefois le gracculus de Rome, c'est le peuple enfant ayant au front la ride du monde vieux.

Le gamin est une grâce pour la nation, et en même temps une maladie. Maladie qu'il faut guérir. Comment? Par la lumière.

La lumière assainit.

La lumière allume.

Toutes les généreuses irradiations sociales sortent de la science, des lettres, des arts, de l'enseignement. Faites des hommes, faites des hommes. Éclairez-les pour qu'ils vous échauffent. Tôt ou tard la splendide question de l'instruction universelle se posera avec l'irrésistible autorité du vrai absolu; et alors ceux qui gouverneront sous la surveillance de l'idée française auront à faire ce choix: les enfants de la France, ou les gamins de Paris; des flammes dans la lumière ou des feux follets dans les ténèbres.

Le gamin exprime Paris, et Paris exprime le monde.

Car Paris est un total. Paris est le plafond du genre humain. Toute cette prodigieuse ville est un raccourci des mœurs mortes et des mœurs vivantes. Qui voit Paris croit voir le dessous de toute l'histoire avec du ciel et des constellations dans les intervalles. Paris a un Capitole, l'Hôtel de ville, un Parthénon, Notre-Dame, un Mont Aventin, le faubourg Saint-Antoine, un Asinarium, la Sorbonne, un Panthéon, le Panthéon, une Voie Sacrée, le boulevard des Italiens, une Tour des Vents, l'opinion; et il remplace les gémonies par le ridicule. Son majo s'appelle le faraud, son transtévérin s'appelle le faubourien, son hammal s'appelle le fort de la halle, son lazzarone s'appelle la pègre, son cockney s'appelle le gandin. Tout ce qui est ailleurs est à Paris. La poissarde de Dumarsais peut donner la réplique à la vendeuse d'herbes d'Euripide, le discobole Vejanus revit dans le danseur de corde Forioso, Therapontigonus Miles prendrait bras dessus bras dessous le grenadier Vadeboncœur, Damasippe le brocanteur serait heureux chez les marchands de bric-à-brac, Vincennes empoignerait Socrate tout comme l'Agora coffrerait Diderot, Grimod de la Reynière a découvert le roastbeef au suif comme Curtillus avait inventé le hérisson rôti, nous voyons reparaître sous le ballon de l’arc de l’Étoile le trapèze qui est dans Plaute, le mangeur d’épées du Poecile rencontré par Apulée est avaleur de sabres sur le Pont-Neuf, le neveu de Rameau et Curculion le parasite font la paire, Ergasile se ferait présenter chez Cambacérès par d’Aigrefeuille; les quatre muscadins de Rome, Alcesimarchus, Phoedromus, Diabolus et Argirippe descendent de la Courtille dans la chaise de poste de Labatut; Aulu-Gelle ne s’arrêtait pas plus longtemps devant Congrio que Charles Nodier devant Polichinelle; Marton n’est pas une tigresse, mais Pardalisca n’était point un dragon; Pantolabus le loustic blague au café anglais Nomentanus le viveur, Hermogène est ténor aux Champs-Élysées, et, autour de lui, Thrasius le gueux, vêtu en Bobèche, fait la quête; l’importun qui vous arrête aux Tuileries par le bouton de votre habit vous fait répéter après deux mille ans l’apostrophe de Thesprion: quis properantem me prehendit pallio? le vin de Suresnes parodie le vin d’Albe, le rouge bord de Desaugiers fait équilibre à la grande coupe de Balatron, le Père-Lachaise exhale sous les pluies nocturnes les mêmes lueurs que les Esquilies, et la fosse du pauvre achetée pour cinq ans vaut la bière de louage de l’Esclave.

Cherchez quelque chose que Paris n’ait pas. La cuve de Trophonius ne contient rien qui ne soit dans le baquet de Mesmer; Ergaphilos ressuscite dans Cagliostro; le brahmine Vâsaphantâ s’incarne dans le comte de Saint-Germain; le cimetière de Saint-Médard fait de tout aussi bons miracles que la mosquée Oumoumié de Damas.

Paris a un Ésope qui est Mayeux, et une Canidie qui est mademoiselle Lenormand. Il s’effare comme Delphes aux réalités fulgurantes de la vision; il fait tourner les tables comme Dodone les trépieds. Il met la grisette sur le trône comme Rome y met la courtisane; et, somme toute, si Louis XV est pire que Claude, madame Dubarry vaut mieux que Messaline. Paris combine dans un type inouï, qui a vécu et que nous avons coudoyé, la nudité grecque, l’ulcère hébraïque et le quolibet gascon. Il mêle Diogène, Job et Paillasse, habille un spectre de vieux numéros du Constitutionnel, et fait Chodruc Duclos.

Bien que Plutarque dise: le tyran n’envieillit guère, Rome, sous Sylla comme sous Domitien, se résignait et mettait volontiers de l’eau dans son vin. Le Tibre était un Léthé, s’il faut en croire l’éloge un peu doctrinaire qu’en faisait Varus Vibiscus: Contra Gracchos Tiberim habemus. Bibere Tiberim, id est seditionem oblivisci. Paris boit un million de litres d’eau par jour, mais cela ne l’empêche pas dans l’occasion de battre la générale et de sonner le tocsin.

À cela près, Paris est bon enfant. Il accepte royalement tout; il n’est pas difficile en fait de Vénus; sa callipyge est hottentote; pourvu qu’il rie, il amnistie; la laideur l’égaye, la difformité le désopile, le vice le distrait; soyez drôle, et vous pourrez être un drôle; l’hypocrisie même, ce cynisme suprême, ne le révolte pas; il est si littéraire qu’il ne se bouche pas le nez devant Basile, et il ne se scandalise pas plus de la prière de Tartuffe qu’Horace ne s’effarouche du «hoquet» de Priape. Aucun trait de la face universelle ne manque au profil de Paris. Le bal Mabille n’est pas la danse polymnienne du Janicule, mais la revendeuse à la toilette y couve des yeux la lorette exactement comme l’entremetteuse Staphyla guettait la vierge Planesium. La barrière du Combat n’est pas un Colisée, mais on y est féroce comme si César regardait. L’hôtesse syrienne a plus de grâce que la mère Saguet, mais, si Virgile hantait le cabaret romain, David d’Angers, Balzac et Charlet se sont attablés à la gargote parisienne. Paris règne. Les génies y flamboient, les queues rouges y prospèrent. Adonaï y passe sur son char aux douze roues de tonnerre et d’éclairs; Silène y fait son entrée sur sa bourrique. Silène, lisez Ramponneau.

Paris est synonyme de Cosmos. Paris est Athènes, Rome, Sybaris, Jérusalem, Pantin. Toutes les civilisations y sont en abrégé, toutes les barbaries aussi. Paris serait bien fâché de n’avoir pas une guillotine.

Un peu de place de Grève est bon. Que serait toute cette fête éternelle sans cet assaisonnement? Nos lois y ont sagement pourvu, et, grâce à elles, ce couperet s’égoutte sur ce mardi gras.

Chapitre XI

Railler, régner

De limite à Paris, point. Aucune ville n’a eu cette domination qui bafoue parfois ceux qu’elle subjugue. Vous plaire, ô Athéniens! s’écriait Alexandre. Paris fait plus que la loi, il fait la mode; Paris fait plus que la mode, il fait la routine. Paris peut être bête si bon lui semble, il se donne quelquefois ce luxe; alors l’univers est bête avec lui; puis Paris se réveille, se frotte les yeux, dit: Suis-je stupide! et éclate de rire à la face du genre humain. Quelle merveille qu’une telle ville! Chose étrange que ce grandiose et ce burlesque fassent bon voisinage, que toute cette majesté ne soit pas dérangée par toute cette parodie, et que la même bouche puisse souffler aujourd’hui dans le clairon du jugement dernier et demain dans la flûte à l’oignon! Paris a une jovialité souveraine. Sa gaîté est de la foudre et sa farce tient un sceptre. Son ouragan sort parfois d’une grimace. Ses explosions, ses journées, ses chefs-d’œuvre, ses prodiges, ses épopées, vont au bout de l’univers, et ses coq-à-l’âne aussi. Son rire est une bouche de volcan qui éclabousse toute la terre. Ses lazzis sont des flammèches. Il impose aux peuples ses caricatures aussi bien que son idéal; les plus hauts monuments de la civilisation humaine acceptent ses ironies et prêtent leur éternité à ses polissonneries. Il est superbe; il a un prodigieux 14 juillet qui délivre le globe; il fait faire le serment du Jeu de Paume à toutes les nations; sa nuit du 4 août dissout en trois heures mille ans de féodalité; il fait de sa logique le muscle de la volonté unanime; il se multiplie sous toutes les formes du sublime; il emplit de sa lueur Washington, Kosciusko, Bolivar, Botzaris, Riego, Bem, Manin, Lopez, John Brown, Garibaldi; il est partout où l’avenir s’allume, à Boston en 1779, à l’île de Léon en 1820, à Pesth en 1848, à Palerme en 1860; il chuchote le puissant mot d’ordre: Liberté, à l’oreille des abolitionnistes américains groupés au bac de Harper’s Ferry, et à l’oreille des patriotes d’Ancône assemblés dans l’ombre aux Archi, devant l’auberge Gozzi, au bord de la mer; il crée Canaris; il crée Quiroga; il crée Pisacane; il rayonne le grand sur la terre; c’est en allant où son souffle les pousse que Byron meurt à Missolonghi et que Mazet meurt à Barcelone; il est tribune sous les pieds de Mirabeau et cratère sous les pieds de Robespierre; ses livres, son théâtre, son art, sa science, sa littérature, sa philosophie, sont les manuels du genre humain; il a Pascal, Régnier, Corneille, Descartes, Jean-Jacques, Voltaire pour toutes les minutes, Molière pour tous les siècles; il fait parler sa langue à la bouche universelle, et cette langue devient verbe; il construit dans tous les esprits l'idée de progrès; les dogmes libérateurs qu'il forge sont pour les générations des épées de chevet, et c'est avec l'âme de ses penseurs et de ses poètes que sont faits depuis 1789 tous les héros de tous les peuples; cela ne l'empêche pas de gaminer; et ce génie énorme qu'on appelle Paris, tout en transfigurant le monde par sa lumière, charbonne le nez de Bouginier au mur du temple de Thésée et écrit Crédeville voleur sur les Pyramides.

Paris montre toujours les dents; quand il ne gronde pas, il rit.

Tel est ce Paris. Les fumées de ses toits sont les idées de l'univers. Tas de boue et de pierres si l'on veut, mais, par-dessus tout, être moral. Il est plus que grand, il est immense. Pourquoi? parce qu'il ose.

Oser; le progrès est à ce prix.

Toutes les conquêtes sublimes sont plus ou moins des prix de hardiesse. Pour que la révolution soit, il ne suffit pas que Montesquieu la pressente, que Diderot la prêche, que Beaumarchais l'annonce, que Condorcet la calcule, qu'Arouet la prépare, que Rousseau la prémédite; il faut que Danton l'ose.

Le cri: Audace! est un Fiat Lux. Il faut, pour la marche en avant du genre humain, qu'il y ait sur les sommets en permanence de fières leçons de courage. Les témérités éblouissent l'histoire et sont une des grandes clartés de l'homme. L'aurore ose quand elle se lève. Tenter, braver, persister, persévérer, s'être fidèle à soi-même, prendre corps à corps le destin, étonner la catastrophe par le peu de peur qu'elle nous fait, tantôt affronter la puissance injuste, tantôt insulter la victoire ivre, tenir bon, tenir tête; voilà l'exemple dont les peuples ont besoin, et la lumière qui les électrise. Le même éclair formidable va de la torche de Prométhée au brûle-gueule de Cambronne.

Chapitre XII

L’avenir latent dans le peuple

Quant au peuple parisien, même homme fait, il est toujours le gamin; peindre l’enfant, c’est peindre la ville; et c’est pour cela que nous avons étudié cet aigle dans ce moineau franc.

C’est surtout dans les faubourgs, insistons-y, que la race parisienne apparaît; là est le pur sang; là est la vraie physionomie; là ce peuple travaille et souffre, et la souffrance et le travail sont les deux figures de l’homme. Il y a là des quantités profondes d’êtres inconnus où fourmillent les types les plus étranges depuis le déchargeur de la Râpée jusqu’à l’équarrisseur de Montfaucon. Fex urbis, s’écrie Cicéron; mob, ajoute Burke indigné; tourbe, multitude, populace. Ces mots-là sont vite dits. Mais soit. Qu’importe? qu’est-ce que cela fait qu’ils aillent pieds nus? Ils ne savent pas lire; tant pis. Les abandonnerez-vous pour cela? leur ferez-vous de leur détresse une malédiction? la lumière ne peut-elle pénétrer ces masses? Revenons à ce cri: Lumière! et obstinons-nous-y! Lumière! lumière! — Qui sait si ces opacités ne deviendront pas transparentes? les révolutions ne sont-elles pas des transfigurations? Allez, philosophes, enseignez, éclairez, allumez, pensez haut, parlez haut, courez joyeux au grand soleil, fraternisez avec les places publiques, annoncez les bonnes nouvelles, prodiguez les alphabets, proclamez les droits, chantez les Marseillaises, semez les enthousiasmes, arrachez des branches vertes aux chênes. Faites de l’idée un tourbillon. Cette foule peut être sublimée. Sachons nous servir de ce vaste embrasement des principes et des vertus qui pétille, éclate et frissonne à de certaines heures. Ces pieds nus, ces bras nus, ces haillons, ces ignorances, ces abjections, ces ténèbres, peuvent être employés à la conquête de l’idéal. Regardez à travers le peuple et vous apercevrez la vérité. Ce vil sable que vous foulez aux pieds, qu’on le jette dans la fournaise, qu’il y fonde et qu’il y bouillonne, il deviendra cristal splendide, et c’est grâce à lui que Galilée et Newton découvriront les astres.

Chapitre XIII

Le petit Gavroche

Huit ou neuf ans environ après les évènements racontés dans la deuxième partie de cette histoire, on remarquait sur le boulevard du Temple et dans les régions du Château-d’Eau un petit garçon de onze à douze ans qui eût assez correctement réalisé cet idéal du gamin ébauché plus haut, si, avec le rire de son âge sur les lèvres, il n’eût pas eu le cœur absolument sombre et vide. Cet enfant était bien affublé d’un pantalon d’homme, mais il ne le tenait pas de son père, et d’une camisole de femme, mais il ne la tenait pas de sa mère. Des gens quelconques l’avaient habillé de chiffons par charité. Pourtant il avait un père et une mère. Mais son père ne songeait pas à lui et sa mère ne l’aimait point. C’était un de ces enfants dignes de pitié entre tous qui ont père et mère et qui sont orphelins.

Cet enfant ne se sentait jamais si bien que dans la rue. Le pavé lui était moins dur que le cœur de sa mère.

Ses parents l’avaient jeté dans la vie d’un coup de pied.

Il avait tout bonnement pris sa volée.

C’était un garçon bruyant, blême, leste, éveillé, goguenard, à l’air vivace et maladif. Il allait, venait, chantait, jouait à la fayousse, grattait les ruisseaux, volait un peu, mais comme les chats et les passereaux, gaîment, riait quand on l’appelait galopin, se fâchait quand on l’appelait voyou. Il n’avait pas de gîte, pas de pain, pas de feu, pas d’amour; mais il était joyeux parce qu’il était libre.

Quand ces pauvres êtres sont des hommes, presque toujours la meule de l’ordre social les rencontre et les broie, mais tant qu’ils sont enfants, ils échappent, étant petits. Le moindre trou les sauve.

Pourtant, si abandonné que fût cet enfant, il arrivait parfois, tous les deux ou trois mois, qu’il disait: Tiens, je vais voir maman! Alors il quittait le boulevard, le Cirque, la porte Saint-Martin, descendait aux quais, passait les ponts, gagnait les faubourgs, atteignait la Salpêtrière, et arrivait où? Précisément à ce double numéro 50-52 que le lecteur connaît, à la masure Gorbeau.

À cette époque, la masure 50-52, habituellement déserte et éternellement décorée de l’écriteau: «Chambres à louer», se trouvait, chose rare, habitée par plusieurs individus qui, du reste, comme cela est toujours à Paris, n’avaient aucun lien ni aucun rapport entre eux. Tous appartenaient à cette classe indigente qui commence à partir du dernier petit bourgeois gêné et qui se prolonge de misère en misère dans les bas-fonds de la société jusqu’à ces deux êtres auxquels toutes les choses matérielles de la civilisation viennent aboutir, l’égoutier qui balaye la boue et le chiffonnier qui ramasse les guenilles.

La «principale locataire» du temps de Jean Valjean était morte et avait été remplacée par toute pareille. Je ne sais quel philosophe a dit: On ne manque jamais de vieilles femmes.

Cette nouvelle vieille s’appelait madame Burgon, et n’avait rien de remarquable dans sa vie qu’une dynastie de trois perroquets, lesquels avaient successivement régné sur son âme.

Les plus misérables entre ceux qui habitaient la masure étaient une famille de quatre personnes, le père, la mère et deux filles déjà assez grandes, tous les quatre logés dans le même galetas, une de ces cellules dont nous avons déjà parlé.

Cette famille n’offrait au premier abord rien de très particulier que son extrême dénûment. Le père en louant la chambre avait dit s’appeler Jondrette. Quelque temps après son emménagement qui avait singulièrement ressemblé, pour emprunté l’expression mémorable de la principale locataire, à l’entrée de rien du tout, ce Jondrette avait dit à cette femme qui, comme sa devancière, était en même temps portière et balayait l’escalier: — Mère une telle, si quelqu’un venait par hasard demander un polonais ou un italien, ou peut-être un espagnol, ce serait moi.

Cette famille était la famille du joyeux va-nu-pieds. Il y arrivait et il y trouvait la pauvreté, la détresse, et, ce qui est plus triste, aucun sourire; le froid dans l’âtre et le froid dans les cœurs. Quand il entrait, on lui demandait: — D’où viens-tu? Il répondait: — De la rue. Quand il s’en allait, on lui demandait: — Où vas-tu? il répondait: — Dans la rue. Sa mère lui disait: — Qu’est-ce que tu viens faire ici?

Cet enfant vivait dans cette absence d’affection comme ces herbes pâles qui viennent dans les caves. Il ne souffrait pas d’être ainsi et n’en voulait à personne. Il ne savait pas au juste comment devaient être un père et une mère.

Du reste sa mère aimait ses sœurs.

Nous avons oublié de dire que sur le boulevard du Temple on nommait cet enfant le petit Gavroche. Pourquoi s’appelait-il Gavroche? Probablement parce que son père s’appelait Jondrette.

Casser le fil semble être l’instinct de certaines familles misérables.

La chambre que les Jondrette habitaient dans la masure Gorbeau était la dernière au bout du corridor. La cellule d’à côté était occupée par un jeune homme très pauvre qu’on nommait Marius.

Disons ce que c’était que monsieur Marius.

Livre deuxième — Le grand bourgeois

Chapitre I

Quatrevingt-dix ans et trente-deux dents

Rue Boucherat, rue de Normandie et rue de Saintonge, il existe encore quelques anciens habitants qui ont gardé le souvenir d’un bonhomme appelé M. Gillenormand, et qui en parlent avec complaisance. Ce bonhomme était vieux quand ils étaient jeunes. Cette silhouette, pour ceux qui regardent mélancoliquement ce vague fourmillement d’ombres qu’on nomme le passé, n’a pas encore tout à fait disparu du labyrinthe des rues voisines du Temple auxquelles, sous Louis XIV, on a attaché les noms de toutes les provinces de France, absolument comme on a donné de nos jours aux rues du nouveau quartier Tivoli les noms de toutes les capitales d’Europe; progression, soit dit en passant, où est visible le progrès.

M. Gillenormand, lequel était on ne peut plus vivant en 1831, était un de ces hommes devenus curieux à voir uniquement à cause qu’ils ont longtemps vécu, et qui sont étranges parce qu’ils ont jadis ressemblé à tout le monde et que maintenant ils ne ressemblent plus à personne. C’était un vieillard particulier, et bien véritablement l’homme d’un autre âge, le vrai bourgeois complet et un peu hautain du dix-huitième siècle, portant sa bonne vieille bourgeoisie de l’air dont les marquis portaient leur marquisat. Il avait dépassé quatre-vingt-dix ans, marchait droit, parlait haut, voyait clair, buvait sec, mangeait, dormait et ronflait. Il avait ses trente-deux dents. Il ne mettait de lunettes que pour lire. Il était d’humeur amoureuse, mais disait que depuis une dizaine d’années il avait décidément et tout à fait renoncé aux femmes. Il ne pouvait plus plaire, disait-il; il n’ajoutait pas: Je suis trop vieux, mais: Je suis trop pauvre. Il disait: Si je n’étais pas ruiné... hééé! — Il ne lui restait en effet qu’un revenu d’environ quinze mille livres. Son rêve était de faire un héritage et d’avoir cent mille francs de rente pour avoir des maîtresses. Il n’appartenait point, comme on voit, à cette variété malingre d’octogénaires qui, comme M. de Voltaire, ont été mourants toute leur vie; ce n’était pas une longévité de pot fêlé; ce vieillard gaillard s’était toujours bien porté. Il était superficiel, rapide, aisément courroucé. Il entrait en tempête à tout propos, le plus souvent à contre-sens du vrai. Quand on le contredisait, il levait la canne; il battait les gens, comme au grand siècle. Il avait une fille de cinquante ans passés, non mariée, qu’il rossait très fort quand il se mettait en colère, et qu'il eût volontiers fouettée. Elle lui faisait l'effet d'avoir huit ans. Il souffletait énergiquement ses domestiques et disait: Ah! carogne! Un de ses jurons était: Par la pantoufloche de la pantouflochade! Il avait des tranquillités singulières; il se faisait raser tous les jours par un barbier qui avait été fou, et qui le détestait, étant jaloux de M. Gillenormand à cause de sa femme, jolie barbière coquette. M. Gillenormand admirait son propre discernement en toute chose, et se déclarait très sagace; voici un de ses mots: «J'ai, en vérité, quelque pénétration; je suis de force à dire, quand une puce me pique, de quelle femme elle me vient.» Les mots qu'il prononçait le plus souvent, c'était: l'homme sensible et la nature. Il ne donnait pas à ce dernier mot la grande acception que notre époque lui a rendue. Mais il le faisait entrer à sa façon dans ses petites satires du coin du feu: — La nature, disait-il, pour que la civilisation ait un peu de tout, lui donne jusqu'à des spécimens de barbarie amusante. L'Europe a des échantillons de l'Asie et de l'Afrique, en petit format. Le chat est un tigre de salon, le lézard est un crocodile de poche. Les danseuses de l'Opéra sont des sauvagesses roses. Elles ne mangent pas les hommes, elles les grugent. Ou bien, les magiciennes! elles les changent en huîtres, et les avalent. Les caraïbes ne laissent que les os, elles ne laissent que l'écaille. Telles sont nos mœurs. Nous ne dévorons pas, nous rongeons; nous n'exterminons pas, nous griffons.

Chapitre II

Tel maître, tel logis

Il demeurait au Marais, rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, nº 6. La maison était à lui. Cette maison a été démolie et rebâtie depuis, et le chiffre en a probablement été changé dans ces révolutions de numérotage que subissent les rues de Paris. Il occupait un vieil et vaste appartement au premier, entre la rue et des jardins, meublé jusqu'aux plafonds de grandes tapisseries des Gobelins et de Beauvais représentant des bergerades; les sujets des plafonds et des panneaux étaient répétés en petit sur les fauteuils. Il enveloppait son lit d'un vaste paravent à neuf feuilles en laque de Coromandel. De longs rideaux diffus pendaient aux croisées et y faisaient de grands plis cassés très magnifiques. Le jardin immédiatement situé sous ses fenêtres se rattachait à celle d'entre elles qui faisait l'angle au moyen d'un escalier de douze ou quinze marches fort allégrement monté et descendu par ce bonhomme. Outre une bibliothèque contiguë à sa chambre, il avait un boudoir auquel il tenait fort, réduit galant tapissé d'une magnifique tenture de paille fleurdelysée et fleurie faite sur les galères de Louis XIV et commandée par M. de Vivonne à ses forçats pour sa maîtresse. M. Gillenormand avait hérité cela d'une farouche grand'tante maternelle, morte centenaire. Il avait eu deux femmes. Ses manières tenaient le milieu entre l'homme de cour qu'il n'avait jamais été et l'homme de robe qu'il aurait pu être. Il était gai, et caressant quand il voulait. Dans sa jeunesse, il avait été de ces hommes qui sont toujours trompés par leur femme et jamais par leur maîtresse, parce qu'ils sont à la fois les plus maussades maris et les plus charmants amants qu'il y ait. Il était connaisseur en peinture. Il avait dans sa chambre un merveilleux portrait d'on ne sait qui, peint par Jordaens, fait à grands coups de brosse, avec des millions de détails, à la façon fouillis et comme au hasard. Le vêtement de M. Gillenormand n'était pas l'habit Louis XV, ni même l'habit Louis XVI; c'était le costume des incroyables du Directoire. Il s'était cru tout jeune jusque-là et avait suivi les modes. Son habit était en drap léger, avec de spacieux revers, une longue queue de morue et de larges boutons d'acier. Avec cela la culotte course et les souliers à boucles. Il mettait toujours les mains dans ses goussets. Il disait avec autorité: La Révolution française est un tas de chenapans.

Chapitre III

Luc-Esprit

À l’âge de seize ans, un soir, à l’Opéra, il avait eu l’honneur d’être lorgné à la fois par deux beautés alors mûres et célèbres et chantées par Voltaire, la Camargo et la Sallé. Pris entre deux feux, il avait fait une retraite héroïque vers une petite danseuse, fillette appelée Nahenry, qui avait seize ans comme lui, obscure comme un chat, et dont il était amoureux. Il abondait en souvenirs. Il s’écriait: — Qu’elle était jolie, cette Guimard-Guimardini-Guimardinette, la dernière fois que je l’ai vue à Longchamps, frisée en sentiments soutenus, avec ses venez-y-voir en turquoises, sa robe couleur de gens nouvellement arrivés, et son manchon d’agitation! — Il avait porté dans son adolescence une veste de Nain-Londrin dont il parlait volontiers et avec effusion. — J’étais vêtu comme un turc du Levant levantin, disait-il. Mme de Boufflers, l’ayant vu par hasard quand il avait vingt ans, l’avait qualifié «un fol charmant». Il se scandalisait de tous les noms qu’il voyait dans la politique et au pouvoir, les trouvant bas et bourgeois. Il lisait les journaux, les papiers nouvelles, les gazettes, comme il disait, en étouffant des éclats de rire. Oh! disait-il, quelles sont ces gens-là! Corbière! Humann! Casimir-Perier! cela vous est ministre. Je me figure ceci dans un journal: M. Gillenormand, ministre! ce serait farce. Eh bien! ils sont si bêtes que ça irait! Il appelait allégrement toutes choses par le mot propre ou malpropre et ne se gênait pas devant les femmes. Il disait des grossièretés, des obscénités et des ordures avec je ne sais quoi de tranquille et de peu étonné qui était élégant. C’était le sans-façon de son siècle. Il est à remarquer que le temps des périphrases en vers a été le temps des crudités en prose. Son parrain avait prédit qu’il serait un homme de génie, et lui avait donné ces deux prénoms significatifs: Luc-Esprit.

Chapitre IV

Aspirant centenaire

Il avait eu des prix en son enfance au collège de Moulins où il était né, et il avait été couronné de la main du duc de Nivernais qu’il appelait le duc de Nevers. Ni la Convention ni la mort de Louis XVI, ni Napoléon, ni le retour des Bourbons, rien n’avait pu effacer le souvenir de ce couronnement. Le duc de Nevers était pour lui la grande figure du siècle. Quel charmant grand seigneur, disait-il, et qu’il avait bon air avec son cordon bleu! Aux yeux de M. Gillenormand, Catherine II avait réparé le crime du partage de la Pologne en achetant pour trois mille roubles le secret de l’élixir d’or à Bestuchef. Là-dessus, il s’animait: — L’élixir d’or, s’écriait-il, la teinture jaune de Bestuchef, les gouttes du général Lamotte, c’était, au dix-huitième siècle, à un louis le flacon d’une demi-once, le grand remède aux catastrophes de l’amour, la panacée contre Vénus. Louis XV en envoyait deux cents flacons au pape. — On l’eût fort exaspéré et mis hors des gonds si on lui eût dit que l’élixir d’or n’est autre chose que le perchlorure de fer. M. Gillenormand adorait les Bourbons et avait en horreur 1789; il racontait sans cesse de quelle façon il s’était sauvé dans la Terreur, et comment il lui avait fallu bien de la gaîté et bien de l’esprit pour ne pas avoir la tête coupée. Si quelque jeune homme s’avisait de faire devant lui l’éloge de la République, il devenait bleu et s’irritait à s’évanouir. Quelquefois il faisait allusion à son âge de quatrevingt-dix ans, et disait: J’espère bien que je ne verrai pas deux fois quatrevingt-treize. D’autres fois, il signifiait aux gens qu’il entendait vivre cent ans.

Chapitre V

Basque et Nicolette

Il avait des théories. En voici une: «Quand un homme aime passionnément les femmes, et qu’il a lui-même une femme à lui dont il se soucie peu, laide, revêche, légitime, pleine de droits, juchée sur le code et jalouse au besoin, il n’a qu’une façon de s’en tirer et d’avoir la paix, c’est de laisser à sa femme les cordons de la bourse. Cette abdication le fait libre. La femme s’occupe alors, se passionne au maniement des espèces, s’y vert-de-grise les doigts, entreprend l’élève des métayers et le dressage des fermiers, convoque les avoués, préside les notaires, harangue les tabellions, visite les robins, suit les procès, rédige les baux, dicte les contrats, se sent souveraine, vend, achète, règle, jordonne, promet et compromet, lie et résilie, cède, concède et rétrocède, arrange, dérange, thésaurise, prodigue, elle fait des sottises, bonheur magistral et personnel, et cela console. Pendant que son mari la dédaigne, elle a la satisfaction de ruiner son mari.» Cette théorie, M. Gillenormand se l’était appliquée, et elle était devenue son histoire. Sa femme, la deuxième, avait administré sa fortune de telle façon qu’il restait à M. Gillenormand, quand un beau jour il se trouva veuf, juste de quoi vivre, en plaçant presque tout en viager, une quinzaine de mille francs de rente dont les trois quarts devaient s’éteindre avec lui. Il n’avait pas hésité, peu préoccupé du souci de laisser un héritage. D’ailleurs il avait vu que les patrimoines avaient des aventures, et, par exemple, devenaient des biens nationaux; il avait assisté aux avatars du tiers consolidé, et il croyait peu au grand-livre. — Rue Quincampoix que tout cela! disait-il. Sa maison de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, nous l’avons dit, lui appartenait. Il avait deux domestiques, «un mâle et un femelle». Quand un domestique entrait chez lui, M. Gillenormand le rebaptisait. Il donnait aux hommes le nom de leur province: Nîmois, Comtois, Poitevin, Picard. Son dernier valet était un gros homme fourbu et poussif de cinquante-cinq ans, incapable de courir vingt pas, mais, comme il était né à Bayonne, M. Gillenormand l’appelait Basque. Quant aux servantes, toutes s’appelaient chez lui Nicolette (même la Magnon dont il sera question plus loin). Un jour une fière cuisinière, cordon bleu, de haute race de concierges, se présenta. — Combien voulez-vous gagner de gages par mois? lui demanda M. Gillenormand. — Trente francs.

— Comment vous nommez-vous? — Olympie. — Tu auras cinquante francs, et tu t’appelleras Nicolette.

Chapitre VI

Où l'on entrevoit la Magnon et ses deux petits

Chez M. Gillenormand la douleur se traduisait en colère; il était furieux d'être désespéré. Il avait tous les préjugés et prenait toutes les licences. Une des choses dont il composait son relief extérieur et sa satisfaction intime, c'était, nous venons de l'indiquer, d'être resté vert galant, et de passer énergiquement pour tel. Il appelait cela avoir «royale renommée». La royale renommée lui attirait parfois de singulières aubaines. Un jour on apporta chez lui dans une bourriche, comme une cloyère d'huîtres, un gros garçon nouveau-né, criant le diable et dûment emmitouflé de langes, qu'une servante chassée six mois auparavant lui attribuait. M. Gillenormand avait alors ses parfaits quatrevingt-quatre ans. Indignation et clameur dans l'entourage. Et à qui cette effrontée drôlesse espérait-elle faire accroire cela? Quelle audace! quelle abominable calomnie! M. Gillenormand, lui, n'eut aucune colère. Il regarda le maillot avec l'aimable sourire d'un bonhomme flatté de la calomnie, et dit à la cantonade: « — Eh bien quoi? qu'est-ce? qu'y a-t-il? qu'est-ce qu'il y a? vous vous ébahissez bellement, et, en vérité, comme aucunes personnes ignorantes. Monsieur le duc d'Angoulême, bâtard de sa majesté Charles IX, se maria à quatrevingt-cinq ans avec une péronnelle de quinze ans, monsieur Virginal, marquis d'Alluye, frère du cardinal de Sourdis, archevêque de Bordeaux, eut à quatrevingt-trois ans d'une fille de chambre de madame la présidente Jacquin un fils, un vrai fils d'amour, qui fut chevalier de Malte et conseiller d'état d'épée; un des grands hommes de ce siècle-ci, l'abbé Tabaraud, est fils d'un homme de quatrevingt-sept ans. Ces choses-là n'ont rien que d'ordinaire. Et la Bible donc! Sur ce, je déclare que ce petit monsieur n'est pas de moi. Qu'on en prenne soin. Ce n'est pas sa faute.» — Le procédé était débonnaire. La créature, celle-là qui se nommait Magnon, lui fit un deuxième envoi l'année d'après. C'était encore un garçon. Pour le coup, M. Gillenormand capitula. Il remit à la mère les deux mioches, s'engageant à payer pour leur entretien quatre-vingts francs par mois, à la condition que ladite mère ne recommencerait plus. Il ajouta: «J'entends que la mère les traite bien. Je les irai voir de temps en temps.» Ce qu'il fit. Il avait eu un frère prêtre, lequel avait été trente-trois ans recteur de l'académie de Poitiers, et était mort à soixante-dix-neuf ans. Je l’ai perdu jeune, disait-il. Ce frère, dont il est resté peu de souvenir, était un paisible avare qui, étant prêtre, se croyait obligé de faire l’aumône aux pauvres qu’il rencontrait, mais il ne leur donnait jamais que des monnerons ou des sous démonétisés, trouvant ainsi moyen d’aller en enfer par le chemin du paradis. Quant à M. Gillenormand aîné, il ne marchandait pas l’aumône et donnait volontiers, et noblement. Il était bienveillant, brusque, charitable, et s’il eût été riche, sa pente eût été le magnifique. Il voulait que tout ce qui le concernait fût fait grandement, même les friponneries. Un jour, dans une succession, ayant été dévalisé par un homme d’affaires d’une manière grossière et visible, il jeta cette exclamation solennelle: — «Fi! c’est malproprement fait! j’ai vraiment honte de ces grivelleries. Tout a dégénéré dans ce siècle, même les coquins. Morbleu! ce n’est pas ainsi qu’on doit voler un homme de ma sorte. Je suis volé comme dans un bois, mais mal volé. Sylvae sint consule dignae!» — il avait eu, nous l’avons dit, deux femmes; de la première une fille qui était restée fille, et de la seconde une autre fille, morte vers l’âge de trente ans, laquelle avait épousé par amour ou hasard ou autrement un soldat de fortune qui avait servi dans les armées de la République et de l’Empire, avait eu la croix à Austerlitz et avait été fait colonel à Waterloo. C’est la honte de ma famille, disait le vieux bourgeois. Il prenait force tabac, et avait une grâce particulière à chiffonner son jabot de dentelle d’un revers de main. Il croyait fort peu en Dieu.

Chapitre VII

Règle: Ne recevoir personne que le soir

Tel était M. Luc-Esprit Gillenormand, lequel n’avait point perdu ses cheveux, plutôt gris que blancs, et était toujours coiffé en oreilles de chien. En somme, et avec tout cela, vénérable.

Il tenait du dix-huitième siècle: frivole et grand.

Dans les premières années de la Restauration, M. Gillenormand, qui était encore jeune, — il n’avait que soixante-quatorze ans en 1814, — avait habité le faubourg Saint-Germain, rue Servandoni, près Saint-Sulpice. Il ne s’était retiré au Marais qu’en sortant du monde, bien après ses quatre-vingts ans sonnés.

Et en sortant du monde, il s’était muré dans ses habitudes. La principale, et où il était invariable, c’était de tenir sa porte absolument fermée le jour, et de ne jamais recevoir qui que ce soit, pour quelque affaire que ce fût, que le soir. Il dînait à cinq heures, puis sa porte était ouverte. C’était la mode de son siècle, et il n’en voulait point démordre. — Le jour est canaille, disait-il, et ne mérite qu’un volet fermé. Les gens comme il faut allument leur esprit quand le zénith allume ses étoiles. — Et il se barricadait pour tout le monde, fût-ce pour le roi. Vieille élégance de son temps.

Chapitre VIII

Les deux ne font pas la paire

Quant aux deux filles de M. Gillenormand, nous venons d’en parler. Elles étaient nées à dix ans d’intervalle. Dans leur jeunesse elles s’étaient fort peu ressemblé, et, par le caractère comme par le visage, avaient été aussi peu sœurs que possible. La cadette était une charmante âme tournée vers tout ce qui est lumière, occupée de fleurs, de vers et de musique, envolée dans des espaces glorieux, enthousiaste, éthérée, fiancée dès l’enfance dans l’idéal à une vague figure héroïque. L’aînée avait aussi sa chimère; elle voyait dans l’azur un fournisseur, quelque bon gros munitionnaire bien riche, un mari splendidement bête, un million fait homme, ou bien, un préfet; les réceptions de la préfecture, un huissier d’antichambre chaîne au cou, les bals officiels, les harangues de la mairie, être «madame la préfète», cela tourbillonnait dans son imagination. Les deux sœurs s’égaraient ainsi, chacune dans son rêve, à l’époque où elles étaient jeunes filles. Toutes deux avaient des ailes, l’une comme un ange, l’autre comme une oie.

Aucune ambition ne se réalise pleinement, ici-bas du moins. Aucun paradis ne devient terrestre à l’époque où nous sommes. La cadette avait épousé l’homme de ses songes, mais elle était morte. L’aînée ne s’était pas mariée.

Au moment où elle fait son entrée dans l’histoire que nous racontons, c’était une vieille vertu, une prude incombustible, un des nez les plus pointus et un des esprits les plus obtus qu’on pût voir. Détail caractéristique: en dehors de la famille étroite, personne n’avait jamais su son petit nom. On l’appelait mademoiselle Gillenormand l’aînée.

En fait de cant, mademoiselle Gillenormand l’aînée eût rendu des points à une miss. C’était la pudeur poussée au noir. Elle avait un souvenir affreux dans sa vie; un jour, un homme avait vu sa jarretière.

L’âge n’avait fait qu’accroître cette pudeur impitoyable. Sa guimpe n’était jamais assez opaque, et ne montait jamais assez haut. Elle multipliait les agrafes et les épingles là où personne ne songeait à regarder. Le propre de la pruderie, c’est de mettre d’autant plus de factionnaires que la forteresse est moins menacée.

Pourtant, explique qui pourra ces vieux mystères d’innocence, elle se laissait embrasser sans déplaisir par un officier de lanciers qui était son petit-neveu et qui s’appelait Théodule.

En dépit de ce lancier favorisé, l’étiquette: Prude, sous laquelle nous l’avons classée, lui convenait absolument. Mlle Gillenormand était une espèce d’âme crépusculaire. La pruderie est une demi-vertu et un demi-vice.

Elle ajoutait à la pruderie le bigotisme, doublure assortie. Elle était de la confrérie de la Vierge, portait un voile blanc à de certaines fêtes, marmottait des oraisons spéciales, révérait «le saint sang», vénérait «le sacré cœur», restait des heures en contemplation devant un autel rococo-jésuite dans une chapelle fermée au commun des fidèles, et y laissait envoler son âme parmi de petites nuées de marbre et à travers de grands rayons de bois doré.

Elle avait une amie de chapelle, vieille vierge comme elle, appelée Mlle Vaubois, absolument hébétée, et près de laquelle Mlle Gillenormand avait le plaisir d’être un aigle. En dehors des agnus dei et des ave maria, Mlle Vaubois n’avait de lumières que sur les différentes façons de faire les confitures. Mlle Vaubois, parfaite en son genre, était l’hermine de la stupidité sans une seule tache d’intelligence.

Disons-le, en vieillissant Mlle Gillenormand avait plutôt gagné que perdu. C’est le fait des natures passives. Elle n’avait jamais été méchante, ce qui est une bonté relative; et puis, les années usent les angles, et l’adoucissement de la durée lui était venu. Elle était triste d’une tristesse obscure dont elle n’avait pas elle-même le secret. Il y avait dans toute sa personne la stupeur d’une vie finie qui n’a pas commencé.

Elle tenait la maison de son père. M. Gillenormand avait près de lui sa fille comme on a vu que monseigneur Bienvenu avait près de lui sa sœur. Ces ménages d’un vieillard et d’une vieille fille ne sont point rares et ont l’aspect toujours touchant de deux faiblesses qui s’appuient l’une sur l’autre.

Il y avait en outre dans la maison, entre cette vieille fille et ce vieillard, un enfant, un petit garçon toujours tremblant et muet devant M. Gillenormand. M. Gillenormand ne parlait jamais à cet enfant que d’une voix sévère et quelquefois la canne levée: — Ici! monsieur! — Maroufle, polisson, approchez! — Répondez, drôle! — Que je vous voie, vaurien! etc., etc. Il l’idolâtrait.

C’était son petit-fils. Nous retrouverons cet enfant.

Livre troisième — Le grand-père et le petit-fils

Chapitre I

Un ancien salon

Lorsque M. Gillenormand habitait la rue Servandoni, il hantait plusieurs salons très bons et très nobles. Quoique bourgeois, M. Gillenormand était reçu. Comme il avait deux fois de l’esprit, d’abord l’esprit qu’il avait, ensuite l’esprit qu’on lui prêtait, on le recherchait même, et on le fêtait. Il n’allait nulle part qu’à la condition d’y dominer. Il est des gens qui veulent à tout prix l’influence et qu’on s’occupe d’eux; là où ils ne peuvent être oracles, ils se font loustics. M. Gillenormand n’était pas de cette nature; sa domination dans les salons royalistes qu’il fréquentait ne coûtait rien à son respect de lui-même. Il était oracle partout. Il lui arrivait de tenir tête à M. de Bonald, et même à M. Bengy-Puy-Vallée.

Vers 1817, il passait invariablement deux après-midi par semaine dans une maison de son voisinage, rue Férou, chez madame la baronne de T., digne et respectable personne dont le mari avait été, sous Louis XVI, ambassadeur de France à Berlin. Le baron de T., qui de son vivant donnait passionnément dans les extases et les visions magnétiques, était mort ruiné dans l’émigration, laissant, pour toute fortune, en dix volumes manuscrits reliés en maroquin rouge et dorés sur tranche, des mémoires fort curieux sur Mesmer et son baquet. Madame de T. n’avait point publié les mémoires par dignité, et se soutenait d’une petite rente, qui avait surnagé on ne sait comment. Madame de T. vivait loin de la cour, monde fort mêlé, disait-elle, dans un isolement noble, fier et pauvre. Quelques amis se réunissaient deux fois par semaine autour de son feu de veuve et cela constituait un salon royaliste pur. On y prenait le thé, et l’on y poussait, selon que le vent était à l’élégie ou au dithyrambe, des gémissements ou des cris d’horreur sur le siècle, sur la charte, sur les buonapartistes, sur la prostitution du cordon bleu à des bourgeois, sur le jacobinisme de Louis XVIII, et l’on s’y entretenait tout bas des espérances que donnait Monsieur, depuis Charles X.

On y accueillait avec des transports de joie des chansons poissardes où Napoléon était appelé Nicolas. Des duchesses, les plus délicates et les plus charmantes femmes du monde, s’y extasiaient sur des couplets comme celui-ci adressé «aux fédérés»:

Renfoncez dans vos culottes

Le bout d'chemis' qui vous pend.
Qu'on n'dis'pas qu'les patriotes
Ont arboré l'drapeau blanc!

On s'y amusait à des calembours qu'on croyait terribles, à des jeux de mots innocents qu'on supposait venimeux, à des quatrains, même à des distiques; ainsi sur le ministère Dessolles, cabinet modéré dont faisaient partie MM. Decazes et Deserre:

Pour raffermir le trône ébranlé sur sa base,
Il faut changer de sol, et de serre et de case.

Ou bien on y façonnait la liste de la chambre des pairs, «chambre abominablement jacobine», et l'on combinait sur cette liste des alliances de noms, de manière à faire, par exemple, des phrases comme celle-ci: Damas, Sabran, Gouvion Saint-Cyr. Le tout gaîment.

Dans ce monde-là on parodiait la Révolution. On avait je ne sais quelles velléités d'aiguiser les mêmes colères en sens inverse. On chantait son petit Ça ira:

Ah! ça ira! ça ira! ça ira
Les buonapartist'à la lanterne!

Les chansons sont comme la guillotine; elles coupent indifféremment, aujourd'hui cette tête-ci, demain celle-là. Ce n'est qu'une variante.

Dans l'affaire Fualdès, qui est de cette époque, 1816, on prenait parti pour Bastide et Jausion, parce que Fualdès était «buonapartiste». On qualifiait les libéraux, les frères et amis; c'était le dernier degré de l'injure.

Comme certains clochers d'église, le salon de madame la baronne de T. avait deux coqs. L'un était M. Gillenormand, l'autre était le comte de Lamothe-Valois, duquel on se disait à l'oreille avec une sorte de considération: Vous savez? C'est le Lamothe de l'affaire du collier. Les partis ont de ces amnisties singulières.

Ajoutons ceci: dans la bourgeoisie, les situations honorées s'amoindrissent par des relations trop faciles; il faut prendre garde à qui l'on admet; de même qu'il y a perte de calorique dans le voisinage de ceux qui ont froid, il y a diminution de considération dans l'approche des gens méprisés. L'ancien monde d'en haut se tenait au-dessus de cette loi-là comme de toutes les autres. Marigny, frère de la Pompadour, a ses entrées chez M. le prince de Soubise. Quoique? non, parce que. Du Barry, parrain de la Vaubernier, est le très bien venu chez M. le maréchal de Richelieu. Ce monde-là, c'est l'olympe. Mercure et le prince de Guéménée y sont chez eux. Un voleur y est admis, pourvu qu'il soit dieu.

Le comte de Lamothe qui, en 1815, était un vieillard de soixante-quinze ans, n'avait de remarquable que son air silencieux et sentencieux, sa figure anguleuse et froide, ses manières parfaitement polies, son habit boutonné jusqu'à la cravate, et ses grandes jambes toujours croisées dans un long pantalon flasque couleur de terre de Sienne brûlée. Son visage était de la couleur de son pantalon.

Ce M. de Lamothe était «compté» dans ce salon, à cause de sa «célébrité», et, chose étrange à dire, mais exacte, à cause du nom de Valois.

Quant à M. Gillenormand, sa considération était absolument de bon aloi. Il faisait autorité. Il avait, tout léger qu'il était et sans que cela coûtât rien à sa gaîté, une certaine façon d'être, imposante, digne, honnête et bourgeoisement altière; et son grand âge s'y ajoutait. On n'est pas impunément un siècle. Les années finissent par faire autour d'une tête un échevellement vénérable.

Il avait en outre de ces mots qui sont tout à fait l'étincelle de la vieille roche. Ainsi quand le roi de Prusse, après avoir restauré Louis XVIII, vint lui faire visite sous le nom de comte de Ruppin, il fut reçu par le descendant de Louis XIV un peu comme marquis de Brandebourg et avec l'impertinence la plus délicate. M. Gillenormand approuva. — Tous les rois qui ne sont pas le roi de France, dit-il, sont des rois de province. On fit un jour devant lui cette demande et cette réponse: — À quoi donc a été condamné le rédacteur du Courrier français? — À être suspendu. — Sus est de trop, observa Gillenormand. Des paroles de ce genre fondent une situation.

À un te deum anniversaire du retour des Bourbons, voyant passer M. de Talleyrand, il dit: Voilà son excellence le Mal.

M. Gillenormand venait habituellement accompagné de sa fille, cette longue mademoiselle qui avait alors passé quarante ans et en semblait cinquante, et d'un beau petit garçon de sept ans, blanc, rose, frais, avec des yeux heureux et confiants, lequel n'apparaissait jamais dans ce salon sans entendre toutes les voix bourdonner autour de lui: Qu'il est joli! quel dommage! pauvre enfant! Cet enfant était celui dont nous avons dit un mot tout à l'heure. On l'appelait — pauvre enfant — parce qu'il avait pour père «un brigand de la Loire».

Ce brigand de la Loire était ce gendre de M. Gillenormand dont il a déjà été fait mention, et que M. Gillenormand qualifiait la honte de sa famille.

Chapitre II

Un des spectres rouges de ce temps-là

Quelqu’un qui aurait passé à cette époque dans la petite ville de Vernon et qui s’y serait promené sur ce beau pont monumental auquel succédera bientôt, espérons-le, quelque affreux pont en fil de fer, aurait pu remarquer, en laissant tomber ses yeux du haut du parapet, un homme d’une cinquantaine d’années coiffé d’une casquette de cuir, vêtu d’un pantalon et d’une veste de gros drap gris, à laquelle était cousu quelque chose de jaune qui avait été un ruban rouge, chaussé de sabots, hâlé par le soleil, la face presque noire et les cheveux presque blancs, une large cicatrice sur le front se continuant sur la joue, courbé, voûté, vieilli avant l’âge, se promenant à peu près tous les jours, une bêche et une serpe à la main, dans un de ces compartiments entourés de murs qui avoisinent le pont et qui bordent comme une chaîne de terrasses la rive gauche de la Seine, charmants enclos pleins de fleurs desquels on dirait, s’ils étaient beaucoup plus grands: ce sont des jardins, et, s’ils étaient un peu plus petits: ce sont des bouquets. Tous ces enclos aboutissent par un bout à la rivière et par l’autre à une maison. L’homme en veste et en sabots dont nous venons de parler habitait vers 1817 le plus étroit de ces enclos et la plus humble de ces maisons. Il vivait là seul, et solitaire, silencieusement et pauvrement, avec une femme ni jeune, ni vieille, ni belle, ni laide, ni paysanne, ni bourgeoise, qui le servait. Le carré de terre qu’il appelait son jardin était célèbre dans la ville pour la beauté des fleurs qu’il y cultivait. Les fleurs étaient son occupation.

À force de travail, de persévérance, d’attention et de seaux d’eau, il avait réussi à créer après le créateur, et il avait inventé de certaines tulipes et de certains dahlias qui semblaient avoir été oubliés par la nature. Il était ingénieux; il avait devancé Soulange Bodin dans la formation des petits massifs de terre de bruyère pour la culture des rares et précieux arbustes d’Amérique et de Chine. Dès le point du jour, en été, il était dans ses allées, piquant, taillant, sarclant, arrosant, marchant au milieu de ses fleurs avec un air de bonté, de tristesse et de douceur, quelquefois rêveur et immobile des heures entières, écoutant le chant d’un oiseau dans un arbre, le gazouillement d’un enfant dans une maison, ou bien les yeux fixés au bout d’un brin d’herbe sur quelque goutte de rosée dont le soleil faisait une escarboucle. Il avait une table fort maigre, et buvait plus de lait que de vin. Un marmot le faisait céder, sa servante le grondait. Il était timide jusqu'à sembler farouche, sortait rarement, et ne voyait personne que les pauvres qui frappaient à sa porte et son curé, l'abbé Mabeuf, bon vieux homme. Pourtant si des habitants de la ville ou des étrangers, les premiers venus, curieux de voir ses tulipes et ses roses, venaient sonner à sa petite maison, il ouvrait sa porte en souriant. C'était le brigand de la Loire.

Quelqu'un qui, dans le même temps, aurait lu les mémoires militaires, les biographies, le Moniteur et les bulletins de la grande Armée, aurait pu être frappé d'un nom qui y revient assez souvent, le nom de Georges Pontmercy. Tout jeune, ce Georges Pontmercy était soldat au régiment de Saintonge. La Révolution éclata. Le régiment de Saintonge fit partie de l'armée du Rhin. Car les anciens régiments de la monarchie gardèrent leurs noms de province, même après la chute de la monarchie, et ne furent embrigadés qu'en 1794. Pontmercy se battit à Spire, à Worms, à Neustadt, à Turkheim, à Alzey, à Mayence où il était des deux cents qui formaient l'arrière-garde de Houchard. Il tint, lui douzième, contre le corps du prince de Hesse, derrière le vieux rempart d'Andernach, et ne se replia sur le gros de l'armée que lorsque le canon ennemi eut ouvert la brèche depuis le cordon du parapet jusqu'au talus de plongée. Il était sous Kléber à Marchiennes et au combat du Mont-Palissel où il eut le bras cassé d'un biscaïen. Puis il passa à la frontière d'Italie, et il fut un des trente grenadiers qui défendirent le col de Tende avec Joubert. Joubert en fut nommé adjudant-général et Pontmercy sous-lieutenant. Pontmercy était à côté de Berthier au milieu de la mitraille dans cette journée de Lodi qui fit dire à Bonaparte: Berthier a été canonnier, cavalier et grenadier. Il vit son ancien général Joubert tomber à Novi, au moment où, le sabre levé, il criait: «En avant!» Ayant été embarqué avec sa compagnie pour les besoins de la campagne dans une péniche qui allait de Gênes à je ne sais plus quel petit port de la côte, il tomba dans un guêpier de sept ou huit voiles anglaises. Le commandant génois voulait jeter les canons à la mer, cacher les soldats dans l'entre-pont et se glisser dans l'ombre comme navire marchand. Pontmercy fit frapper les couleurs à la drisse du mât de pavillon, et passa fièrement sous le canon des frégates britanniques. À vingt lieues de là, son audace croissant, avec sa péniche il attaqua et captura un gros transport anglais qui portait des troupes en Sicile, si chargé d'hommes et de chevaux que le bâtiment était bondé jusqu'aux hiloires. En 1805, il était de cette division

Malher qui enleva Günzbourg à l’archiduc Ferdinand. À Weltingen, il reçut dans ses bras, sous une grêle de balles, le colonel Maupetit blessé mortellement à la tête du 9ème dragons. Il se distingua à Austerlitz dans cette admirable marche en échelons faite sous le feu de l’ennemi. Lorsque la cavalerie de la garde impériale russe écrasa un bataillon du 4ème de ligne, Pontmercy fut de ceux qui prirent la revanche et qui culbutèrent cette garde. L’empereur lui donna la croix. Pontmercy vit successivement faire prisonniers Wurmser dans Mantoue, Mélas dans Alexandrie, Mack dans Ulm. Il fit partie du huitième corps de la grande Armée que Mortier commandait et qui s’empara de Hambourg. Puis il passa dans le 55ème de ligne qui était l’ancien régiment de Flandre. À Eylau, il était dans le cimetière où l’héroïque capitaine Louis Hugo, oncle de l’auteur de ce livre, soutint seul avec sa compagnie de quatrevingt-trois hommes, pendant deux heures, tout l’effort de l’armée ennemie. Pontmercy fut un des trois qui sortirent de ce cimetière vivants. Il fut de Friedland. Puis il vit Moscou, puis la Bérésina, puis Lutzen, Bautzen, Dresde, Wachau, Leipsick, et les défilés de Gelenhausen; puis Montmirail, Château-Thierry, Craon, les bords de la Marne, les bords de l’Aisne et la redoutable position de Laon. À Arnay-le-Duc, étant capitaine, il sabra dix cosaques, et sauva, non son général, mais son caporal. Il fut haché à cette occasion, et on lui tira vingt-sept esquilles rien que du bras gauche. Huit jours avant la capitulation de Paris, il venait de permuter avec un camarade et d’entrer dans la cavalerie. Il avait ce qu’on appelait dans l’ancien régime la double-main, c’est-à-dire une aptitude égale à manier, soldat, le sabre ou le fusil, officier, un escadron ou un bataillon. C’est de cette aptitude, perfectionnée par l’éducation militaire, que sont nées certaines armes spéciales, les dragons, par exemple, qui sont tout ensemble cavaliers et fantassins. Il accompagna Napoléon à l’île d’Elbe. À Waterloo, il était chef d’escadron de cuirassiers dans la brigade Dubois. Ce fut lui qui prit le drapeau du bataillon de Lunebourg. Il vint jeter le drapeau aux pieds de l’empereur. Il était couvert de sang. Il avait reçu, en arrachant le drapeau, un coup de sabre à travers le visage. L’empereur, content, lui cria: Tu es colonel, tu es baron, tu es officier de la légion d’honneur! Pontmercy répondit: Sire, je vous remercie pour ma veuve. Une heure après, il tombait dans le ravin d’Ohain. Maintenant qu’était-ce que ce Georges Pontmercy? C’était ce même brigand de la Loire.

On a déjà vu quelque chose de son histoire. Après Waterloo, Pontmercy, tiré, on s’en souvient, du chemin creux d’Ohain, avait réussi à regagner l’armée, et s’était traîné d’ambulance en ambulance jusqu’aux cantonnements de la Loire.

La Restauration l’avait mis à la demi-solde, puis l’avait envoyé en résidence, c’est-à-dire en surveillance, à Vernon. Le roi Louis XVIII, considérant comme non avenu tout ce qui s’était fait dans les Cent-Jours, ne lui avait reconnu ni sa qualité d’officier de la légion d’honneur, ni son grade de colonel, ni son titre de baron. Lui de son côté ne négligeait aucune occasion de signer le colonel baron Pontmercy. Il n’avait qu’un vieil habit bleu, et il ne sortait jamais sans y attacher la rosette d’officier de la légion d’honneur. Le procureur du roi le fit prévenir que le parquet le poursuivrait pour «port illégal de cette décoration». Quand cet avis lui fut donné par un intermédiaire officieux, Pontmercy répondit avec un amer sourire: Je ne sais point si c’est moi qui n’entends plus le français, ou si c’est vous qui ne le parlez plus, mais le fait est que je ne comprends pas. — Puis il sortit huit jours de suite avec sa rosette. On n’osa point l’inquiéter. Deux ou trois fois le ministre de la guerre et le général commandant le département lui écrivirent avec cette suscription: À monsieur le commandant Pontmercy. Il renvoya les lettres non décachetées. En ce même moment, Napoléon à Sainte-Hélène traitait de la même façon les missives de sir Hudson Lowe adressées au général Bonaparte. Pontmercy avait fini, qu’on nous passe le mot, par avoir dans la bouche la même salive que son empereur.

Il y avait ainsi à Rome des soldats carthaginois prisonniers qui refusaient de saluer Flaminius et qui avaient un peu de l’âme d’Annibal.

Un matin, il rencontra le procureur du roi dans une rue de Vernon, alla à lui, et lui dit: — Monsieur le procureur du roi, m’est-il permis de porter ma balafre?

Il n’avait rien, que sa très chétive demi-solde de chef d’escadron. Il avait loué à Vernon la plus petite maison qu’il avait pu trouver. Il y vivait seul, on vient de voir comment. Sous l’Empire, entre deux guerres, il avait trouvé le temps d’épouser mademoiselle Gillenormand. Le vieux bourgeois, indigné au fond, avait consenti en soupirant et en disant: Les plus grandes familles y sont forcées. En 1815, madame Pontmercy, femme du reste de tout point admirable, élevée et rare et digne de son mari, était morte, laissant un enfant. Cet enfant eût été la joie du colonel dans sa solitude; mais l’aïeul avait impérieusement réclamé son petit-fils, déclarant que, si on ne le lui donnait pas, il le déshériterait. Le père avait cédé dans l’intérêt du petit, et, ne pouvant avoir son enfant, il s’était mis à aimer les fleurs.

Il avait du reste renoncé à tout, ne remuant ni ne conspirant. Il partageait sa pensée entre les choses innocentes qu'il faisait et les choses grandes qu'il avait faites. Il passait son temps à espérer un œillet ou à se souvenir d'Austerlitz.

M. Gillenormand n'avait aucune relation avec son gendre. Le colonel était pour lui «un bandit», et il était pour le colonel «une ganache». M. Gillenormand ne parlait jamais du colonel, si ce n'est quelquefois pour faire des allusions moqueuses à «sa baronnie». Il était expressément convenu que Pontmercy n'essayerait jamais de voir son fils ni de lui parler, sous peine qu'on le lui rendît chassé et déshérité. Pour les Gillenormand, Pontmercy était un pestiféré. Ils entendaient élever l'enfant à leur guise. Le colonel eut tort peut-être d'accepter ces conditions, mais il les subit, croyant bien faire et ne sacrifier que lui. L'héritage du père Gillenormand était peu de chose, mais l'héritage de Mlle Gillenormand aînée était considérable. Cette tante, restée fille, était fort riche du côté maternel, et le fils de sa sœur était son héritier naturel.

L'enfant, qui s'appelait Marius, savait qu'il avait un père, mais rien de plus. Personne ne lui en ouvrait la bouche. Cependant, dans le monde où son grand-père le menait, les chuchotements, les demi-mots, les clins d'yeux, s'étaient fait jour à la longue jusque dans l'esprit du petit, il avait fini par comprendre quelque chose, et comme il prenait naturellement, par une sorte d'infiltration et de pénétration lente, les idées et les opinions qui étaient, pour ainsi dire, son milieu respirable, il en vint peu à peu à ne songer à son père qu'avec honte et le cœur serré.

Pendant qu'il grandissait ainsi, tous les deux ou trois mois, le colonel s'échappait, venait furtivement à Paris comme un repris de justice qui rompt son ban, et allait se poster à Saint-Sulpice, à l'heure où la tante Gillenormand menait Marius à la messe. Là, tremblant que la tante ne se retournât, caché derrière un pilier, immobile, n'osant respirer, il regardait son enfant. Ce balafré avait peur de cette vieille fille.

De là même était venue sa liaison avec le curé de Vernon, M. l'abbé Mabeuf.

Ce digne prêtre était frère d'un marguillier de Saint-Sulpice, lequel avait plusieurs fois remarqué cet homme contemplant cet enfant, et la cicatrice qu'il avait sur la joue, et la grosse larme qu'il avait dans les yeux. Cet homme qui avait si bien l'air d'un homme et qui pleurait comme une femme avait frappé le marguillier. Cette figure lui était restée dans l'esprit.

Un jour, étant allé à Vernon voir son frère, il rencontra sur le pont le colonel Pontmercy et reconnut l'homme de Saint-Sulpice. Le marguillier en parla au curé, et tous deux sous un prétexte quelconque firent une visite au colonel. Cette visite en amena d'autres. Le colonel d'abord très fermé finit par s'ouvrir, et le curé et le marguillier arrivèrent à savoir toute l'histoire, et comment Pontmercy sacrifiait son bonheur à l'avenir de son enfant. Cela fit que le curé le prit en vénération et en tendresse, et le colonel de son côté prit en affection le curé. D'ailleurs, quand d'aventure ils sont sincères et bons tous les deux, rien ne se pénètre et ne s'amalgame plus aisément qu'un vieux prêtre et un vieux soldat. Au fond, c'est le même homme. L'un s'est dévoué pour la patrie d'en bas, l'autre pour la patrie d'en haut; pas d'autre différence.

Deux fois par an, au 1er janvier et à la Saint-Georges, Marius écrivait à son père des lettres de devoir que sa tante dictait, et qu'on eût dit copiées dans quelque formulaire; c'était tout ce que tolérait M. Gillenormand; et le père répondait des lettres fort tendres que l'aïeul fourrait dans sa poche sans les lire.

Chapitre III

Requiescant

Le salon de madame de T. était tout ce que Marius Pontmercy connaissait du monde. C'était la seule ouverture par laquelle il pût regarder dans la vie. Cette ouverture était sombre, et il lui venait par cette lucarne plus de froid que de chaleur, plus de nuit que de jour. Cet enfant, qui n'était que joie et lumière en entrant dans ce monde étrange, y devint en peu de temps triste, et, ce qui est plus contraire encore à cet âge, grave. Entouré de toutes ces personnes imposantes et singulières, il regardait autour de lui avec un étonnement sérieux. Tout se réunissait pour accroître en lui cette stupeur. Il y avait dans le salon de madame de T. de vieilles nobles dames très vénérables qui s'appelaient Mathan, Noé, Lévis qu'on prononçait Lévi, Cambis qu'on prononçait Cambyse. Ces antiques visages et ces noms bibliques se mêlaient dans l'esprit de l'enfant à son ancien testament qu'il apprenait par cœur, et quand elles étaient là toutes, assises en cercle autour d'un feu mourant, à peine éclairées par une lampe voilée de vert, avec leurs profils sévères, leurs cheveux gris ou blancs, leurs longues robes d'un autre âge dont on ne distinguait que les couleurs lugubres, laissant tomber à de rares intervalles des paroles à la fois majestueuses et farouches, le petit Marius les considérait avec des yeux effarés, croyant voir, non des femmes, mais des patriarches et des mages, non des êtres réels, mais des fantômes.

À ces fantômes se mêlaient plusieurs prêtres, habitués de ce salon vieux, et quelques gentilshommes; le marquis de Sassenaye, secrétaire des commandements de madame de Berry, le vicomte de Valory, qui publiait sous le pseudonyme de Charles-Antoine des odes monorimes, le prince de Beauffremont qui, assez jeune, avait un chef grisonnant et une jolie et spirituelle femme dont les toilettes de velours écarlate à torsades d'or, fort décolletées, effarouchaient ces ténèbres, le marquis de Coriolis d'Espinouse, l'homme de France qui savait le mieux «la politesse proportionnée», le comte d'Amendre, le bonhomme au menton bienveillant, et le chevalier de Port-de-Guy, pilier de la bibliothèque du Louvre, dite le cabinet du roi. M. de Port-de-Guy, chauve et plutôt vieilli que vieux, contait qu'en 1793, âgé de seize ans, on l'avait mis au bagne comme réfractaire, et ferré avec un octogénaire, l'évêque de Mirepoix, réfractaire aussi, mais comme prêtre, tandis que lui l’était comme soldat. C’était à Toulon. Leur fonction était d’aller la nuit ramasser sur l’échafaud les têtes et les corps des guillotinés du jour; ils emportaient sur leur dos ces troncs ruisselants, et leurs capes rouges de galériens avaient derrière leur nuque une croûte de sang, sèche le matin, humide le soir. Ces récits tragiques abondaient dans le salon de madame de T.; et à force d’y maudire Marat, on y applaudissait Trestaillon. Quelques députés du genre introuvable y faisaient leur whist, M. Thibord du Chalard, M. Lemarchant de Gomicourt, et le célèbre railleur de la droite, M. Cornet-Dincourt. Le bailli de Ferrette, avec ses culottes courtes et ses jambes maigres, traversait quelquefois ce salon en allant chez M. de Talleyrand. Il avait été le camarade de plaisir de M. le comte d’Artois, et, à l’inverse d’Aristote accroupi sous Campaspe, il avait fait marcher la Guimard à quatre pattes, et de la sorte montré aux siècles un philosophe vengé par un bailli.

Quant aux prêtres, c’étaient l’abbé Halma, le même à qui M. Larose, son collaborateur à la Foudre, disait: Bah! qui est-ce qui n’a pas cinquante ans? quelques blancs-becs peut-être! l’abbé Letourneur, prédicateur du roi, l’abbé Frayssinous, qui n’était encore ni comte, ni évêque, ni ministre, ni pair, et qui portait une vieille soutane où il manquait des boutons, et l’abbé Keravenant, curé de Saint-Germain des Prés; plus le nonce du pape, alors monsignor Macchi, archevêque de Nisibi, plus tard cardinal, remarquable par son long nez pensif, et un autre monsignor ainsi intitulé: abbate Palmieri, prélat domestique, un des sept protonotaires participants du saint-siège, chanoine de l’insigne basilique libérienne, avocat des saints, postulatore di santi, ce qui se rapporte aux affaires de canonisation et signifie à peu près maître des requêtes de la section du paradis; enfin deux cardinaux, M. de la Luzerne et M. de Clermont-Tonnerre. M. le cardinal de la Luzerne était un écrivain et devait avoir, quelques années plus tard, l’honneur de signer dans le Conservateur des articles côte à côte avec Chateaubriand; M. de Clermont-Tonnerre était archevêque de Toulouse, et venait souvent en villégiature à Paris chez son neveu le marquis de Tonnerre, qui a été ministre de la marine et de la guerre. Le cardinal de Clermont-Tonnerre était un petit vieillard gai montrant ses bas rouges sous sa soutane troussée; il avait pour spécialité de haïr l’encyclopédie et de jouer éperdument au billard, et les gens qui, à cette époque, passaient dans les soirs d’été rue Madame, où était alors l’hôtel de Clermont-Tonnerre, s’arrêtaient pour entendre le choc des billes, et la voix aiguë du cardinal criant à son conclaviste, monseigneur Cottret, évêque in partibus de Caryste: Marque, l'abbé, je carambole. Le cardinal de Clermont-Tonnerre avait été amené chez madame de T. par son ami le plus intime, M. de Roquelaure, ancien évêque de Senlis et l'un des quarante. M. de Roquelaure était considérable par sa haute taille et par son assiduité à l'académie; à travers la porte vitrée de la salle voisine de la bibliothèque où l'académie française tenait alors ses séances, les curieux pouvaient tous les jeudis contempler l'ancien évêque de Senlis, habituellement debout, poudré à frais, en bas violets, et tournant le dos à la porte, apparemment pour mieux faire voir son petit collet. Tous ces ecclésiastiques, quoique la plupart hommes de cour autant qu'hommes d'église, s'ajoutaient à la gravité du salon de T., dont cinq pairs de France, le marquis de Vibraye, le marquis de Talaru, le marquis d'Herbouville, le vicomte Dambray et le duc de Valentinois, accentuaient l'aspect seigneurial. Ce duc de Valentinois, quoique prince de Monaco, c'est-à-dire prince souverain étranger, avait une si haute idée de la France et de la pairie qu'il voyait tout à travers elles. C'était lui qui disait: Les cardinaux sont les pairs de France de Rome, les lords sont les pairs de France d'Angleterre. Au reste, car il faut en ce siècle que la révolution soit partout, ce salon féodal était, comme nous l'avons dit, dominé par un bourgeois. M. Gillenormand y régnait.

C'était là l'essence et la quintessence de la société parisienne blanche. On y tenait en quarantaine les renommées, même royalistes. Il y a toujours de l'anarchie dans la renommée. Chateaubriand, entrant là, eût fait l'effet du père Duchêne. Quelques ralliés pourtant pénétraient, par tolérance, dans ce monde orthodoxe. Le comte Beugnot y était reçu à correction.

Les salons «nobles» d'aujourd'hui ne ressemblent plus à ces salons-là. Le faubourg Saint-Germain d'à présent sent le fagot. Les royalistes de maintenant sont des démagogues, disons-le à leur louange.

Chez madame de T., le monde étant supérieur, le goût était exquis et hautain, sous une grande fleur de politesse. Les habitudes y comportaient toutes sortes de raffinements involontaires qui étaient l'ancien régime même, enterré, mais vivant. Quelques-unes de ces habitudes, dans le langage surtout, semblaient bizarres. Des connaisseurs superficiels eussent pris pour province ce qui n'était que vétusté. On appelait une femme madame la générale. Madame la colonelle n'était pas absolument inusité. La charmante madame de Léon, en souvenir sans doute des duchesses de Longueville et de Chevreuse, préférait cette appellation à son titre de princesse. La marquise de Créquy, elle aussi, s’était appelée madame la colonelle.

Ce fut ce petit haut monde qui inventa aux Tuileries le raffinement de dire toujours en parlant au roi dans l’intimité le roi à la troisième personne et jamais votre majesté, la qualification votre majesté ayant été «souillée par l’usurpateur».

On jugeait là les faits et les hommes. On raillait le siècle, ce qui dispensait de le comprendre. On s’entr’aidait dans l’étonnement. On se communiquait la quantité de clarté qu’on avait. Mathusalem renseignait Épiménide. Le sourd mettait l’aveugle au courant. On déclarait non avenu le temps écoulé depuis Coblentz. De même que Louis XVIII était, par la grâce de Dieu, à la vingt-cinquième année de son règne, les émigrés étaient, de droit, à la vingt-cinquième année de leur adolescence.

Tout était harmonieux; rien ne vivait trop; la parole était à peine un souffle; le journal, d’accord avec le salon, semblait un papyrus. Il y avait des jeunes gens, mais ils étaient un peu morts. Dans l’antichambre, les livrées étaient vieillottes. Ces personnages, complètement passés, étaient servis par des domestiques du même genre. Tout cela avait l’air d’avoir vécu il y a longtemps, et de s’obstiner contre le sépulcre. Conserver, Conservation, Conservateur, c’était là à peu près tout le dictionnaire. Être en bonne odeur, était la question. Il y avait en effet des aromates dans les opinions de ces groupes vénérables, et leurs idées sentaient le vétyver. C’était un monde momie. Les maîtres étaient embaumés, les valets étaient empaillés.

Une digne vieille marquise émigrée et ruinée, n’ayant plus qu’une bonne, continuait de dire: Mes gens.

Que faisait-on dans le salon de madame de T.? On était ultra.

Être ultra; ce mot, quoique ce qu’il représente n’ait peut-être pas disparu, ce mot n’a plus de sens aujourd’hui. Expliquons-le.

Être ultra, c’est aller au delà. C’est attaquer le sceptre au nom du trône et la mitre au nom de l’autel; c’est malmener la chose qu’on traîne; c’est ruer dans l’attelage; c’est chicaner le bûcher sur le degré de cuisson des hérétiques; c’est reprocher à l’idole son peu d’idolâtrie; c’est insulter par excès de respect; c’est trouver dans le pape pas assez de papisme, dans le roi pas assez de royauté, et trop de lumière à la nuit; c’est être mécontent de l’albâtre, de la neige, du cygne et du lys au nom de la blancheur; c’est être partisan des choses au point d'en devenir l'ennemi; c'est être si fort pour, qu'on est contre.

L'esprit ultra caractérise spécialement la première phase de la Restauration.

Rien dans l'histoire n'a ressemblé à ce quart d'heure qui commence à 1814 et qui se termine vers 1820 à l'avènement de M. de Villèle, l'homme pratique de la droite. Ces six années furent un moment extraordinaire, à la fois brillant et morne, riant et sombre, éclairé comme par le rayonnement de l'aube et tout couvert en même temps des ténèbres des grandes catastrophes qui emplissaient encore l'horizon et s'enfonçaient lentement dans le passé. Il y eut là, dans cette lumière et dans cette ombre, tout un petit monde nouveau et vieux, bouffon et triste, juvénile et sénile, se frottant les yeux; rien ne ressemble au réveil comme le retour; groupe qui regardait la France avec humeur et que la France regardait avec ironie; de bons vieux hiboux marquis plein les rues, les revenus et les revenants, des «ci-devant» stupéfaits de tout, de braves et nobles gentilshommes souriant d'être en France et en pleurant aussi, ravis de revoir leur patrie, désespérés de ne plus retrouver leur monarchie; la noblesse des croisades conspuant la noblesse de l'Empire, c'est-à-dire la noblesse de l'épée; les races historiques ayant perdu le sens de l'histoire; les fils des compagnons de Charlemagne dédaignant les compagnons de Napoléon. Les épées, comme nous venons de le dire, se renvoyaient l'insulte; l'épée de Fontenoy était risible et n'était qu'une rouillarde; l'épée de Marengo était odieuse et n'était qu'un sabre. Jadis méconnaissait Hier. On n'avait plus le sentiment de ce qui était grand, ni le sentiment de ce qui était ridicule. Il y eut quelqu'un qui appela Bonaparte Scapin. Ce monde n'est plus. Rien, répétons-le, n'en reste aujourd'hui. Quand nous en tirons par hasard quelque figure et que nous essayons de le faire revivre par la pensée, il nous semble étrange comme un monde antédiluvien. C'est qu'en effet il a été lui aussi englouti par un déluge. Il a disparu sous deux révolutions. Quels flots que les idées! Comme elles couvrent vite tout ce qu'elles ont mission de détruire et d'ensevelir, et comme elles font promptement d'effrayantes profondeurs!

Telle était la physionomie des salons de ces temps lointains et candides où M. Martainville avait plus d'esprit que Voltaire.

Ces salons avaient une littérature et une politique à eux. On y croyait en Fiévée. M. Agier y faisait loi. On y commentait M. Colnet, le publiciste bouquiniste du quai Malaquais. Napoléon y était pleinement Ogre de Corse.

Plus tard, l'introduction dans l'histoire de M. le marquis de Buonaparte, lieutenant général des armées du roi, fut une concession à l'esprit du siècle.

Ces salons ne furent pas longtemps purs. Dès 1818, quelques doctrinaires commencèrent à y poindre, nuance inquiétante. La manière de ceux-là était d'être royalistes et de s'en excuser. Là où les ultras étaient très fiers, les doctrinaires étaient un peu honteux. Ils avaient de l'esprit; ils avaient du silence; leur dogme politique était convenablement empesé de morgue; ils devaient réussir. Ils faisaient, utilement d'ailleurs, des excès de cravate blanche et d'habit boutonné. Le tort, ou le malheur, du parti doctrinaire a été de créer la jeunesse vieille. Ils prenaient des poses de sages. Ils rêvaient de greffer sur le principe absolu et excessif un pouvoir tempéré. Ils opposaient, et parfois avec une rare intelligence, au libéralisme démolisseur un libéralisme conservateur. On les entendait dire: «Grâce pour le royalisme! il a rendu plus d'un service. Il a rapporté la tradition, le culte, la religion, le respect. Il est fidèle, brave, chevaleresque, aimant, dévoué. Il vient mêler, quoique à regret, aux grandeurs nouvelles de la nation les grandeurs séculaires de la monarchie. Il a le tort de ne pas comprendre la Révolution, l'Empire, la gloire, la liberté, les jeunes idées, les jeunes générations, le siècle. Mais ce tort qu'il a envers nous, ne l'avons-nous pas quelquefois envers lui? La Révolution, dont nous sommes les héritiers, doit avoir l'intelligence de tout. Attaquer le royalisme, c'est le contre-sens du libéralisme. Quelle faute! et quel aveuglement! La France révolutionnaire manque de respect à la France historique, c'est-à-dire à sa mère, c'est-à-dire à elle-même. Après le 5 septembre, on traite la noblesse de la monarchie comme après le 8 juillet on traitait la noblesse de l'Empire. Ils ont été injustes pour l'aigle, nous sommes injustes pour la fleur de lys. On veut donc toujours avoir quelque chose à proscrire! Dédorer la couronne de Louis XIV, gratter l'écusson d'Henri IV, cela est-il bien utile? Nous raillons M. de Vaublanc qui effaçait les N du pont d'Iéna! Que faisait-il donc? Ce que nous faisons. Bouvines nous appartient comme Marengo. Les fleurs de lys sont à nous comme les N. C'est notre patrimoine. À quoi bon l'amoindrir? Il ne faut pas plus renier la patrie dans le passé que dans le présent. Pourquoi ne pas vouloir toute l'histoire? Pourquoi ne pas aimer toute la France?»

C'est ainsi que les doctrinaires critiquaient et protégeaient le royalisme, mécontent d'être critiqué et furieux d'être protégé.

Les ultras marquèrent la première époque du royalisme; la congrégation caractérisa la seconde. À la fougue succéda l'habileté. Bornons ici cette esquisse.

Dans le cours de ce récit, l'auteur de ce livre a trouvé sur son chemin ce moment curieux de l'histoire contemporaine; il a dû y jeter en passant un coup d'œil et retracer quelques-uns des linéaments singuliers de cette société aujourd'hui inconnue. Mais il le fait rapidement et sans aucune idée amère ou dérisoire. Des souvenirs, affectueux et respectueux, car ils touchent à sa mère, l'attachent à ce passé. D'ailleurs, disons-le, ce même petit monde avait sa grandeur. On en peut sourire, mais on ne peut ni le mépriser ni le haïr. C'était la France d'autrefois.

Marius Pontmercy fit comme tous les enfants des études quelconques. Quand il sortit des mains de la tante Gillenormand, son grand-père le confia à un digne professeur de la plus pure innocence classique. Cette jeune âme qui s'ouvrait passa d'une prude à un cuistre. Marius eut ses années de collège, puis il entra à l'école de droit. Il était royaliste, fanatique et austère. Il aimait peu son grand-père dont la gaîté et le cynisme le froissaient, et il était sombre à l'endroit de son père.

C'était du reste un garçon ardent et froid, noble, généreux, fier, religieux, exalté; digne jusqu'à la dureté, pur jusqu'à la sauvagerie.

Chapitre IV

Fin du brigand

L’achèvement des études classiques de Marius coïncida avec la sortie du monde de M. Gillenormand. Le vieillard dit adieu au faubourg Saint-Germain et au salon de madame de T., et vint s’établir au Marais dans sa maison de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire. Il avait là pour domestiques, outre le portier, cette femme de chambre Nicolette qui avait succédé à la Magnon, et ce Basque essoufflé et poussif dont il a été parlé plus haut.

En 1827, Marius venait d’atteindre ses dix-sept ans. Comme il rentrait un soir, il vit son grand-père qui tenait une lettre à la main.

— Marius, dit M. Gillenormand, tu partiras demain pour Vernon.

— Pourquoi? dit Marius.

— Pour voir ton père.

Marius eut un tremblement. Il avait songé à tout, excepté à ceci, qu’il pourrait un jour se faire qu’il eût à voir son père. Rien ne pouvait être pour lui plus inattendu, plus surprenant, et, disons-le, plus désagréable. C’était l’éloignement contraint au rapprochement. Ce n’était pas un chagrin, non, c’était une corvée.

Marius, outre ses motifs d’antipathie politique, était convaincu que son père, le sabreur, comme l’appelait M. Gillenormand dans ses jours de douceur, ne l’aimait pas; cela était évident, puisqu’il l’avait abandonné ainsi et laissé à d’autres. Ne se sentant point aimé, il n’aimait point. Rien de plus simple, se disait-il.

Il fut si stupéfait qu’il ne questionna pas M. Gillenormand. Le grand-père reprit:

— Il paraît qu’il est malade. Il te demande.

Et après un silence il ajouta:

— Pars demain matin. Je crois qu’il y a cour des Fontaines une voiture qui part à six heures et qui arrive le soir. Prends la. Il dit que c’est pressé.

Puis il froissa la lettre et la mit dans sa poche. Marius aurait pu partir le soir même et être près de son père le lendemain matin. Une diligence de la rue du Bouloi faisait à cette époque le voyage de Rouen la nuit et passait par Vernon. Ni M. Gillenormand ni Marius ne songèrent à s’informer.

Le lendemain, à la brune, Marius arrivait à Vernon. Les chandelles commençaient à s’allumer. Il demanda au premier passant venu: la maison de monsieur Pontmercy. Car dans sa pensée il était de l’avis de la Restauration, et, lui non plus, ne reconnaissait son père ni baron ni colonel.

On lui indiqua le logis. Il sonna; une femme vint lui ouvrir, une petite lampe à la main.

— Monsieur Pontmercy? dit Marius.

La femme resta immobile.

— Est-ce ici? demanda Marius.

La femme fit de la tête un signe affirmatif.

— Pourrais-je lui parler?

La femme fit un signe négatif.

— Mais je suis son fils, reprit Marius. Il m’attend.

— Il ne vous attend plus, dit la femme.

Alors il s’aperçut qu’elle pleurait.

Elle lui désigna du doigt la porte d’une salle basse. Il entra.

Dans cette salle qu’éclairait une chandelle de suif posée sur la cheminée, il y avait trois hommes, un qui était debout, un qui était à genoux, et un qui était à terre et en chemise couché tout de son long sur le carreau. Celui qui était à terre était le colonel.

Les deux autres étaient un médecin et un prêtre, qui priait.

Le colonel était depuis trois jours atteint d’une fièvre cérébrale. Au début de la maladie, ayant un mauvais pressentiment, il avait écrit à M. Gillenormand pour demander son fils. La maladie avait empiré. Le soir même de l’arrivée de Marius à Vernon, le colonel avait eu un accès de délire; il s’était levé de son lit malgré la servante, en criant: — Mon fils n’arrive pas! je vais au-devant de lui! — Puis il était sorti de sa chambre et était tombé sur le carreau de l’antichambre. Il venait d’expirer.

On avait appelé le médecin et le curé. Le médecin était arrivé trop tard, le curé était arrivé trop tard. Le fils aussi était arrivé trop tard.

À la clarté crépusculaire de la chandelle, on distinguait sur la joue du colonel gisant et pâle une grosse larme qui avait coulé de son œil mort. L’œil était éteint, mais la larme n’était pas séchée. Cette larme, c’était le retard de son fils.

Marius considéra cet homme qu’il voyait pour la première fois, et pour la dernière, ce visage vénérable et mâle, ces yeux ouverts qui ne regardaient pas, ces cheveux blancs, ces membres robustes sur lesquels on distinguait çà et là des lignes brunes qui étaient des coups de sabre et des espèces d’étoiles rouges qui étaient des trous de balles. Il considéra cette gigantesque balafre qui imprimait l’héroïsme sur cette face où Dieu avait empreint la bonté. Il songea que cet homme était son père et que cet homme était mort, et il resta froid.

La tristesse qu’il éprouvait fut la tristesse qu’il aurait ressentie devant tout autre homme qu’il aurait vu étendu mort.

Le deuil, un deuil poignant, était dans cette chambre. La servante se lamentait dans un coin, le curé priait, et on l’entendait sangloter, le médecin s’essuyait les yeux; le cadavre lui-même pleurait.

Ce médecin, ce prêtre et cette femme regardaient Marius à travers leur affliction sans dire une parole; c’était lui qui était l’étranger. Marius, trop peu ému, se sentit honteux et embarrassé de son attitude; il avait son chapeau à la main, il le laissa tomber à terre, afin de faire croire que la douleur lui ôtait la force de le tenir.

En même temps il éprouvait comme un remords et il se méprisait d’agir ainsi. Mais était-ce sa faute? Il n’aimait pas son père, quoi!

Le colonel ne laissait rien. La vente du mobilier paya à peine l’enterrement. La servante trouva un chiffon de papier qu’elle remit à Marius. Il y avait ceci, écrit de la main du colonel:

« — Pour mon fils. — L’empereur m’a fait baron sur le champ de bataille de Waterloo. Puisque la Restauration me conteste ce titre que j’ai payé de mon sang, mon fils le prendra et le portera. Il va sans dire qu’il en sera digne.»

Derrière, le colonel avait ajouté:

«À cette même bataille de Waterloo, un sergent m’a sauvé la vie. Cet homme s’appelle Thénardier. Dans ces derniers temps, je crois qu’il tenait une petite auberge dans un village des environs de Paris, à Chelles ou à Montfermeil. Si mon fils le rencontre, il fera à Thénardier tout le bien qu’il pourra.»

Non par religion pour son père, mais à cause de ce respect vague de la mort qui est toujours si impérieux au cœur de l’homme, Marius prit ce papier et le serra.

Rien ne resta du colonel. M. Gillenormand fît vendre au fripier son épée et son uniforme. Les voisins dévalisèrent le jardin et pillèrent les fleurs rares. Les autres plantes devinrent ronces et broussailles, ou moururent.

Marius n’était demeuré que quarante-huit heures à Vernon. Après l’enterrement, il était revenu à Paris et s’était remis à son droit, sans plus songer à son père que s’il n’eût jamais vécu. En deux jours le colonel avait été enterré, et en trois jours oublié.

Marius avait un crêpe à son chapeau. Voilà tout.

Chapitre V

Utilité d’aller à la messe pour devenir révolutionnaire

Marius avait gardé les habitudes religieuses de son enfance. Un dimanche qu’il était allé entendre la messe à Saint-Sulpice, à cette même chapelle de la Vierge où sa tante le menait quand il était petit, étant ce jour-là distrait et rêveur plus qu’à l’ordinaire, il s’était placé derrière un pilier et agenouillé, sans y faire attention, sur une chaise en velours d’Utrecht au dossier de laquelle était écrit ce nom: Monsieur Mabeuf, marguillier. La messe commençait à peine qu’un vieillard se présenta et dit à Marius:

— Monsieur, c’est ma place.

Marius s’écarta avec empressement, et le vieillard reprit sa chaise.

La messe finie, Marius était resté pensif à quelques pas; le vieillard s’approcha de nouveau et lui dit:

— Je vous demande pardon, monsieur, de vous avoir dérangé tout à l’heure et de vous déranger encore en ce moment; mais vous avez dû me trouver fâcheux, il faut que je vous explique.

— Monsieur, dit Marius, c’est inutile.

— Si! reprit le vieillard, je ne veux pas que vous ayez mauvaise idée de moi. Voyez-vous, je tiens à cette place. Il me semble que la messe y est meilleure. Pourquoi? je vais vous le dire. C’est à cette place-là que j’ai vu venir pendant dix années, tous les deux ou trois mois régulièrement, un pauvre brave père qui n’avait pas d’autre occasion et pas d’autre manière de voir son enfant, parce que, pour des arrangements de famille, on l’en empêchait. Il venait à l’heure où il savait qu’on menait son fils à la messe. Le petit ne se doutait pas que son père était là. Il ne savait même peut-être pas qu’il avait un père, l’innocent! Le père, lui, se tenait derrière un pilier pour qu’on ne le vît pas. Il regardait son enfant, et il pleurait. Il adorait ce petit, ce pauvre homme! J’ai vu cela. Cet endroit est devenu comme sanctifié pour moi, et j’ai pris l’habitude de venir y entendre la messe. Je le préfère au banc d’œuvre où j’aurais droit d’être comme marguillier. J’ai même un peu connu ce malheureux monsieur. Il avait un beau-père, une tante riche, des parents, je ne sais plus trop, qui menaçaient de déshériter l’enfant si, lui le père, il le voyait. Il s’était sacrifié pour que son fils fût riche un jour et heureux. On l’en séparait pour opinion politique.

Certainement j’approuve les opinions politiques, mais il y a des gens qui ne savent pas s’arrêter. Mon Dieu! parce qu’un homme a été à Waterloo, ce n’est pas un monstre; on ne sépare point pour cela un père de son enfant. C’était un colonel de Bonaparte. Il est mort, je crois. Il demeurait à Vernon où j’ai mon frère curé, et il s’appelait quelque chose comme Pontmarie ou Montpercy.... — Il avait, ma foi, un beau coup de sabre.

— Pontmercy? dit Marius en pâlissant.

— Précisément. Pontmercy. Est-ce que vous l’avez connu?

— Monsieur, dit Marius, c’était mon père.

Le vieux marguillier joignit les mains, et s’écria:

— Ah! vous êtes l’enfant! Oui, c’est cela, ce doit être un homme à présent. Eh bien! pauvre enfant, vous pouvez dire que vous avez eu un père qui vous a bien aimé!

Marius offrit son bras au vieillard et le ramena jusqu’à son logis. Le lendemain, il dit à M. Gillenormand:

— Nous avons arrangé une partie de chasse avec quelques amis. Voulez-vous me permettre de m’absenter trois jours?

— Quatre! répondit le grand-père. Va, amuse-toi.

Et, clignant de l’œil, il dit bas à sa fille:

— Quelque amourette!

Chapitre VI

Ce que c’est que d’avoir rencontrer un marguillier

Où alla Marius, on le verra un peu plus loin.

Marius fut trois jours absent, puis il revint à Paris, alla droit à la bibliothèque de l’école de droit, et demanda la collection du Moniteur.

Il lut le Moniteur, il lut toutes les histoires de la République et de l’empire, le Mémorial de Sainte-Hélène, tous les mémoires, les journaux, les bulletins, les proclamations; il dévora tout. La première fois qu’il rencontra le nom de son père dans les bulletins de la grande Armée, il en eut la fièvre toute une semaine. Il alla voir les généraux sous lesquels Georges Pontmercy avait servi, entre autres le comte H. Le marguillier Mabeuf, qu’il était allé revoir, lui avait conté la vie de Vernon, la retraite du colonel, ses fleurs, sa solitude. Marius arriva à connaître pleinement cet homme rare, sublime et doux, cette espèce de lion-agneau qui avait été son père.

Cependant, occupé de cette étude qui lui prenait tous ses instants comme toutes ses pensées, il ne voyait presque plus les Gillenormand. Aux heures des repas, il paraissait; puis on le cherchait, il n’était plus là. La tante bougonnait. Le père Gillenormand souriait. Bah! bah! c’est le temps des fillettes! — Quelquefois le vieillard ajoutait: — Diable! je croyais que c’était une galanterie, il paraît que c’est une passion.

C’était une passion en effet. Marius était en train d’adorer son père.

En même temps un changement extraordinaire se faisait dans ses idées. Les phases de ce changement furent nombreuses et successives. Comme ceci est l’histoire de beaucoup d’esprits de notre temps, nous croyons utile de suivre ces phases pas à pas et de les indiquer toutes.

Cette histoire où il venait de mettre les yeux l’effarait.

Le premier effet fut l’éblouissement.

La République, l’empire, n’avaient été pour lui jusqu’alors que des mots monstrueux. La République, une guillotine dans un crépuscule; l’empire, un sabre dans la nuit. Il venait d’y regarder, et là où il s’attendait à ne trouver qu’un chaos de ténèbres, il avait vu, avec une sorte de surprise inouïe mêlée de crainte et de joie, étinceler des astres, Mirabeau, Vergniaud, Saint-Just, Robespierre, Camille Desmoulins, Danton, et se lever un soleil, Napoléon. Il ne savait où il en était. Il reculait aveuglé de clartés. Peu à peu, l'étonnement passé, il s'accoutuma à ces rayonnements, il considéra les actions sans vertige, il examina les personnages sans terreur; la révolution et l'empire se mirent lumineusement en perspective devant sa prunelle visionnaire; il vit chacun de ces deux groupes d'événements et d'hommes se résumer dans deux faits énormes; la République dans la souveraineté du droit civique restituée aux masses, l'empire dans la souveraineté de l'idée française imposée à l'Europe; il vit sortir de la révolution la grande figure du peuple et de l'empire la grande figure de la France. Il se déclara dans sa conscience que tout cela avait été bon.

Ce que son éblouissement négligeait dans cette première appréciation beaucoup trop synthétique, nous ne croyons pas nécessaire de l'indiquer ici. C'est l'état d'un esprit en marche que nous constatons. Les progrès ne se font pas tous en une étape. Cela dit, une fois pour toutes, pour ce qui précède comme pour ce qui va suivre, nous continuons.

Il s'aperçut alors que jusqu'à ce moment il n'avait pas plus compris son pays qu'il n'avait compris son père. Il n'avait connu ni l'un ni l'autre, et il avait eu une sorte de nuit volontaire sur les yeux. Il voyait maintenant; et d'un côté il admirait, de l'autre il adorait.

Il était plein de regrets, et de remords, et il songeait avec désespoir que tout ce qu'il avait dans l'âme, il ne pouvait plus le dire maintenant qu'à un tombeau! Oh! si son père avait existé, s'il l'avait eu encore, si Dieu dans sa compassion et dans sa bonté avait permis que ce père fût encore vivant, comme il aurait couru, comme il se serait précipité, comme il aurait crié à son père: Père! me voici! c'est moi! j'ai le même cœur que toi! je suis ton fils! Comme il aurait embrassé sa tête blanche, inondé ses cheveux de larmes, contemplé sa cicatrice, pressé ses mains, adoré ses vêtements, baisé ses pieds! Oh! pourquoi ce père était-il mort si tôt, avant l'âge, avant la justice, avant l'amour de son fils! Marius avait un continuel sanglot dans le cœur qui disait à tout moment: hélas! En même temps, il devenait plus vraiment sérieux, plus vraiment grave, plus sûr de sa foi et de sa pensée. À chaque instant des lueurs du vrai venaient compléter sa raison. Il se faisait en lui comme une croissance intérieure. Il sentait une sorte d'agrandissement naturel que lui apportaient ces deux choses, nouvelles pour lui, son père et sa patrie.

Comme lorsqu'on a une clef, tout s'ouvrait; il s'expliquait ce qu'il avait haï, il pénétrait ce qu'il avait abhorré; il voyait désormais clairement le sens providentiel, divin et humain, des grandes choses qu'on lui avait appris à détester et des grands hommes qu’on lui avait enseigné à maudire. Quand il songeait à ses précédentes opinions, qui n’étaient que d’hier et qui pourtant lui semblaient déjà si anciennes, il s’indignait et il souriait.

De la réhabilitation de son père il avait naturellement passé à la réhabilitation de Napoléon.

Pourtant, celle-ci, disons-le, ne s’était point faite sans labeur.

Dès l’enfance on l’avait imbu des jugements du parti de 1814 sur Bonaparte. Or, tous les préjugés de la Restauration, tous ses intérêts, tous ses instincts, tendaient à défigurer Napoléon. Elle l’exécrait plus encore que Robespierre. Elle avait exploité assez habilement la fatigue de la nation et la haine des mères. Bonaparte était devenu une sorte de monstre presque fabuleux, et, pour le peindre à l’imagination du peuple qui, comme nous l’indiquions tout à l’heure, ressemble à l’imagination des enfants, le parti de 1814 faisait apparaître successivement tous les masques effrayants, depuis ce qui est terrible en restant grandiose jusqu’à ce qui est terrible en devenant grotesque, depuis Tibère jusqu’à Croquemitaine. Ainsi, en parlant de Bonaparte, on était libre de sangloter ou de pouffer de rire, pourvu que la haine fît la basse. Marius n’avait jamais eu — sur cet homme, comme on l’appelait, — d’autres idées dans l’esprit. Elles s’étaient combinées avec la ténacité qui était dans sa nature. Il y avait en lui tout un petit homme têtu qui haïssait Napoléon.

En lisant l’histoire, en l’étudiant surtout dans les documents et les matériaux, le voile qui couvrait Napoléon aux yeux de Marius se déchira peu à peu. Il entrevit quelque chose d’immense, et soupçonna qu’il s’était trompé jusqu’à ce moment sur Bonaparte comme sur tout le reste; chaque jour il voyait mieux; et il se mit à gravir lentement, pas à pas, au commencement presque à regret, ensuite avec enivrement et comme attiré par une fascination irrésistible, d’abord les degrés sombres, puis les degrés vaguement éclairés, enfin les degrés lumineux et splendides de l’enthousiasme.

Une nuit, il était seul dans sa petite chambre située sous le toit. Sa bougie était allumée; il lisait accoudé sur sa table à côté de sa fenêtre ouverte. Toutes sortes de rêveries lui arrivaient de l’espace et se mêlaient à sa pensée. Quel spectacle que la nuit! on entend des bruits sourds sans savoir d’où ils viennent, on voit rutiler comme une braise Jupiter qui est douze cents fois plus gros que la terre, l’azur est noir, les étoiles brillent, c’est formidable.

Il lisait les bulletins de la grande Armée, ces strophes héroïques écrites sur le champ de bataille; il y voyait par intervalles le nom de son père, toujours le nom de l'empereur; tout le grand empire lui apparaissait; il sentait comme une marée qui se gonflait en lui et qui montait; il lui semblait par moments que son père passait près de lui comme un souffle, et lui parlait à l'oreille; il devenait peu à peu étrange; il croyait entendre les tambours, le canon, les trompettes, le pas mesuré des bataillons, le galop sourd et lointain des cavaleries; de temps en temps ses yeux se levaient vers le ciel et regardaient luire dans les profondeurs sans fond les constellations colossales, puis ils retombaient sur le livre et ils y voyaient d'autres choses colossales remuer confusément. Il avait le cœur serré. Il était transporté, tremblant, haletant; tout à coup, sans savoir lui-même ce qui était en lui et à quoi il obéissait, il se dressa, étendit ses deux bras hors de la fenêtre, regarda fixement l'ombre, le silence, l'infini ténébreux, l'immensité éternelle, et cria: Vive l'empereur!

À partir de ce moment, tout fut dit. L'ogre de Corse, — l'usurpateur, — le tyran, — le monstre qui était l'amant de ses sœurs, — l'histrion qui prenait des leçons de Talma, — l'empoisonneur de Jaffa, — le tigre, — Buonaparté, — tout cela s'évanouit, et fit place dans son esprit à un vague et éclatant rayonnement où resplendissait à une hauteur inaccessible le pâle fantôme de marbre de César. L'empereur n'avait été pour son père que le bien-aimé capitaine qu'on admire et pour qui l'on se dévoue; il fut pour Marius quelque chose de plus. Il fut le constructeur prédestiné du groupe français succédant au groupe romain dans la domination de l'univers. Il fut le prodigieux architecte d'un écroulement, le continuateur de Charlemagne, de Louis XI, de Henri IV, de Richelieu, de Louis XIV et du comité de salut public, ayant sans doute ses taches, ses fautes et même son crime, c'est-à-dire étant homme; mais auguste dans ses fautes, brillant dans ses taches, puissant dans son crime. Il fut l'homme prédestiné qui avait forcé toutes les nations à dire: — la grande nation. Il fut mieux encore; il fut l'incarnation même de la France, conquérant l'Europe par l'épée qu'il tenait et le monde par la clarté qu'il jetait. Marius vit en Bonaparte le spectre éblouissant qui se dressera toujours sur la frontière et qui gardera l'avenir. Despote, mais dictateur; despote résultant d'une République et résumant une révolution. Napoléon devint pour lui l'homme-peuple comme Jésus est l'homme-Dieu.

On le voit, à la façon de tous les nouveaux venus dans une religion, sa conversion l'enivrait, il se précipitait dans l'adhésion et il allait trop loin. Sa nature était ainsi: une fois sur une pente, il lui était presque impossible d'enrayer. Le fanatisme pour l'épée le gagnait et compliquait dans son esprit l'enthousiasme pour l'idée. Il ne s'apercevait point qu'avec le génie, et pêle-mêle, il admirait la force, c'est-à-dire qu'il installait dans les deux compartiments de son idolâtrie, d'un côté ce qui est divin, de l'autre ce qui est brutal. À plusieurs égards, il s'était mis à se tromper autrement. Il admettait tout. Il y a une manière de rencontrer l'erreur en allant à la vérité. Il avait une sorte de bonne foi violente qui prenait tout en bloc. Dans la voie nouvelle où il était entré, en jugeant les torts de l'ancien régime comme en mesurant la gloire de Napoléon, il négligeait les circonstances atténuantes.

Quoi qu'il en fût, un pas prodigieux était fait. Où il avait vu autrefois la chute de la monarchie, il voyait maintenant l'avènement de la France. Son orientation était changée. Ce qui avait été le couchant était le levant. Il s'était retourné.

Toutes ces révolutions s'accomplissaient en lui sans que sa famille s'en doutât.

Quand, dans ce mystérieux travail, il eut tout à fait perdu son ancienne peau de bourbonien et d'ultra, quand il eut dépouillé l'aristocrate, le jacobite et le royaliste, lorsqu'il fut pleinement révolutionnaire, profondément démocrate, et presque républicain, il alla chez un graveur du quai des Orfèvres et y commanda cent cartes portant ce nom: le baron Marius Pontmercy.

Ce qui n'était qu'une conséquence très logique du changement qui s'était opéré en lui, changement dans lequel tout gravitait autour de son père. Seulement, comme il ne connaissait personne, et qu'il ne pouvait semer ces cartes chez aucun portier, il les mit dans sa poche.

Par une autre conséquence naturelle, à mesure qu'il se rapprochait de son père, de sa mémoire, et des choses pour lesquelles le colonel avait combattu vingt-cinq ans, il s'éloignait de son grand-père. Nous l'avons dit, dès longtemps l'humeur de M. Gillenormand ne lui agréait point. Il y avait déjà entre eux toutes les dissonances de jeune homme grave à vieillard frivole. La gaîté de Géronte choque et exaspère la mélancolie de Werther. Tant que les mêmes opinions politiques et les mêmes idées leur avaient été communes, Marius s'était rencontré là avec M. Gillenormand comme sur un pont. Quand ce pont tomba, l'abîme se fit. Et puis, par-dessus tout, Marius éprouvait des mouvements de révolte inexprimables en songeant que c'était

M. Gillenormand qui, pour des motifs stupides, l'avait arraché sans pitié au colonel, privant ainsi le père de l'enfant et l'enfant du père.

À force de piété pour son père, Marius en était presque venu à l'aversion pour son aïeul.

Rien de cela du reste, nous l'avons dit, ne se trahissait au dehors. Seulement il était froid de plus en plus; laconique aux repas, et rare dans la maison. Quand sa tante l'en grondait, il était très doux et donnait pour prétexte ses études, les cours, les examens, des conférences, etc. Le grand-père ne sortait pas de son diagnostic infaillible: — Amoureux! Je m'y connais.

Marius faisait de temps en temps quelques absences.

Où va-t-il donc comme cela? demandait la tante.

Dans un de ces voyages, toujours très courts, il était allé à Montfermeil pour obéir à l'indication que son père lui avait laissée, et il avait cherché l'ancien sergent de Waterloo, l'aubergiste Thénardier. Thénardier avait fait faillite, l'auberge était fermée, et l'on ne savait ce qu'il était devenu. Pour ces recherches, Marius fut quatre jours hors de la maison.

— Décidément, dit le grand-père, il se dérange.

On avait cru remarquer qu'il portait sur sa poitrine et sous sa chemise quelque chose qui était attaché à son cou par un ruban noir.

Chapitre VII

Quelque cotillon

C’était un arrière-petit-neveu que M. Gillenormand avait du côté paternel, et qui menait, en dehors de la famille et loin de tous les foyers domestiques, la vie de garnison. Le lieutenant Théodule Gillenormand remplissait toutes les conditions voulues pour être ce qu’on appelle un joli officier. Il avait «une taille de demoiselle», une façon de traîner le sabre victorieuse, et la moustache en croc. Il venait fort rarement à Paris, si rarement que Marius ne l’avait jamais vu. Les deux cousins ne se connaissaient que de nom. Théodule était, nous croyons l’avoir dit, le favori de la tante Gillenormand, qui le préférait parce qu’elle ne le voyait pas. Ne pas voir les gens, cela permet de leur supposer toutes les perfections.

Un matin, Mlle Gillenormand ainée était rentrée chez elle aussi émue que sa placidité pouvait l’être. Marius venait encore de demander à son grand-père la permission de faire un petit voyage, ajoutant qu’il comptait partir le soir même. — Va! avait répondu le grand-père, et M. Gillenormand avait ajouté à part en poussant ses deux sourcils vers le haut de son front: Il découche avec récidive. Mlle Gillenormand était remontée dans sa chambre très intriguée, et avait jeté dans l’escalier ce point d’exclamation: C’est fort! et ce point d’interrogation: Mais où donc est-ce qu’il va? Elle entrevoyait quelque aventure de cœur plus ou moins illicite, une femme dans la pénombre, un rendez-vous, un mystère, et elle n’eût pas été fâchée d’y fourrer ses lunettes. La dégustation d’un mystère, cela ressemble à la primeur d’un esclandre; les saintes âmes ne détestent point cela. Il y a dans les compartiments secrets de la bigoterie quelque curiosité pour le scandale.

Elle était donc en proie au vague appétit de savoir une histoire.

Pour se distraire de cette curiosité qui l’agitait un peu au delà de ses habitudes, elle s’était réfugiée dans ses talents, et elle s’était mise à festonner avec du coton sur du coton une de ces broderies de l’Empire et de la Restauration où il y a beaucoup de roues de cabriolet. Ouvrage maussade, ouvrière revêche. Elle était depuis plusieurs heures sur sa chaise quand la porte s’ouvrit. Mlle Gillenormand leva le nez; le lieutenant Théodule était devant elle, et lui faisait le salut d’ordonnance. Elle poussa un cri de bonheur. On est vieille, on est prude, on est dévote, on est la tante; mais c'est toujours agréable de voir entrer dans sa chambre un lancier.

— Toi ici, Théodule! s'écria-t-elle.

— En passant, ma tante.

— Mais embrasse-moi donc.

— Voilà! dit Théodule.

Et il l'embrassa. La tante Gillenormand alla à son secrétaire, et l'ouvrit.

— Tu nous restes au moins toute la semaine?

— Ma tante, je repars ce soir.

— Pas possible!

— Mathématiquement!

— Reste, mon petit Théodule, je t'en prie.

— Le cœur dit oui, mais la consigne dit non. L'histoire est simple. On nous change de garnison; nous étions à Melun, on nous met à Gaillon. Pour aller de l'ancienne garnison à la nouvelle, il faut passer par Paris. J'ai dit: je vais aller voir ma tante.

— Et voici pour ta peine.

Elle lui mit dix louis dans la main.

— Vous voulez dire pour mon plaisir, chère tante.

Théodule l'embrassa une seconde fois, et elle eut la joie d'avoir le cou un peu écorché par les soutaches de l'uniforme.

— Est-ce que tu fais le voyage à cheval avec ton régiment? lui demanda-t-elle.

— Non, ma tante. J'ai tenu à vous voir. J'ai une permission spéciale. Mon Grosseur mène mon cheval; je vais par la diligence. Et à ce propos, il faut que je vous demande une chose.

— Quoi?

— Mon cousin Marius Pontmercy voyage donc aussi, lui?

— Comment sais-tu cela? fit la tante, subitement chatouillée au vif de la curiosité.

— En arrivant, je suis allé à la diligence retenir une place dans le coupé.

— Eh bien?

— Un voyageur était déjà venu retenir une place sur l'impériale. J'ai vu sur la feuille son nom.

— Quel nom?

— Marius Pontmercy.

— Le mauvais sujet! s’écria la tante. Ah! ton cousin n’est pas un garçon rangé comme toi. Dire qu’il va passer la nuit en diligence!

— Comme moi.

— Mais toi, c’est par devoir; lui, c’est par désordre.

— Bigre! fit Théodule.

Ici, il arriva un événement à Mlle Gillenormand aînée; elle eut une idée. Si elle eût été homme, elle se fût frappée le front. Elle apostropha Théodule:

— Sais-tu que ton cousin ne te connaît pas?

— Non. Je l’ai vu, moi; mais il n’a jamais daigné me remarquer.

— Vous allez donc voyager ensemble comme cela?

— Lui sur l’impériale, moi dans le coupé.

— Où va cette diligence?

— Aux Andelys.

— C’est donc là que va Marius?

— À moins que, comme moi, il ne s’arrête en route. Moi, je descends à Vernon pour prendre la correspondance de Gaillon. Je ne sais rien de l’itinéraire de Marius.

— Marius! quel vilain nom! Quelle idée a-t-on eue de l’appeler Marius! Tandis que toi, au moins, tu t’appelles Théodule!

— J’aimerais mieux m’appeler Alfred, dit l’officier.

— Écoute, Théodule.

— J’écoute, ma tante.

— Fais attention.

— Je fais attention.

— Y es-tu?

— Oui.

— Eh bien, Marius fait des absences.

— Eh! eh!

— Il voyage.

— Ah! ah!

— Il découche.

— Oh! oh!

— Nous voudrions savoir ce qu’il y a là-dessous.

Théodule répondit avec le calme d’un homme bronzé:

— Quelque cotillon.

Et avec ce rire entre cuir et chair qui décèle la certitude, il ajouta:

— Une fillette.

— C’est évident, s’écria la tante qui crut entendre parler M. Gillenormand, et qui sentit sa conviction sortir irrésistiblement de ce mot fillette, accentué presque de la même façon par le grand-oncle et par le petit-neveu. Elle reprit:

— Fais-nous un plaisir. Suis un peu Marius. Il ne te connaît pas, cela te sera facile. Puisque fillette il y a, tâche de voir la fillette. Tu nous écriras l’historiette. Cela amusera le grand-père.

Théodule n’avait point un goût excessif pour ce genre de guet; mais il était fort touché des dix louis, et il croyait leur voir une suite possible. Il accepta la commission et dit: — Comme il vous plaira, ma tante. Et il ajouta à part lui: — Me voilà duègne.

Mlle Gillenormand l’embrassa.

— Ce n’est pas toi, Théodule, qui ferais de ces frasques-là. Tu obéis à la discipline, tu es l’esclave de la consigne, tu es un homme de scrupule et de devoir, et tu ne quitterais pas ta famille pour aller voir une créature.

Le lancier fit la grimace satisfaite de Cartouche loué pour sa probité.

Marius, le soir qui suivit ce dialogue, monta en diligence sans se douter qu’il eût un surveillant. Quant au surveillant, la première chose qu’il fit, ce fut de s’endormir. Le sommeil fut complet et consciencieux. Argus ronfla toute la nuit.

Au point du jour, le conducteur de la diligence cria: — Vernon! relais de Vernon! les voyageurs pour Vernon! — Et le lieutenant Théodule se réveilla.

— Bon, grommela-t-il, à demi endormi encore, c’est ici que je descends.

Puis, sa mémoire se nettoyant par degrés, effet du réveil, il songea à sa tante, aux dix louis, et au compte qu’il s’était chargé de rendre des faits et gestes de Marius. Cela le fit rire.

Il n’est peut-être plus dans la voiture, pensa-t-il, tout en reboutonnant sa veste de petit uniforme. Il a pu s’arrêter à Poissy; il a pu s’arrêter à Triel; s’il n’est pas descendu à Meulan, il a pu descendre à Mantes, à moins qu’il ne soit descendu à Rolleboise, ou qu’il n’ait poussé jusqu’à Pacy, avec le choix de tourner à gauche sur Évreux ou à droite sur Laroche-Guyon. Cours après, ma tante. Que diable vais-je lui écrire, à la bonne vieille?

En ce moment un pantalon noir qui descendait de l’impériale apparut à la vitre du coupé.

— Serait-ce Marius? dit le lieutenant.

C’était Marius.

Une petite paysanne, au bas de la voiture, mêlée aux chevaux et aux postillons, offrait des fleurs aux voyageurs. — Fleurissez vos dames, criait-elle.

Marius s’approcha d’elle et lui acheta les plus belles fleurs de son éventaire.

— Pour le coup, dit Théodule sautant à bas du coupé, voilà qui me pique. À qui diantre va-t-il porter ces fleurs-là? Il faut une fièrement jolie femme pour un si beau bouquet. Je veux la voir.

Et, non plus par mandat maintenant, mais par curiosité personnelle, comme ces chiens qui chassent pour leur compte, il se mit à suivre Marius.

Marius ne faisait nulle attention à Théodule. Des femmes élégantes descendaient de la diligence; il ne les regarda pas. Il semblait ne rien voir autour de lui.

— Est-il amoureux! pensa Théodule.

Marius se dirigea vers l’église.

— À merveille, se dit Théodule. L’église! c’est cela. Les rendez-vous assaisonnés d’un peu de messe sont les meilleurs. Rien n’est exquis comme une œillade qui passe par-dessus le bon Dieu.

Parvenu à l’église, Marius n’y entra point, et tourna derrière le chevet. Il disparut à l’angle d’un des contreforts de l’abside.

— Le rendez-vous est dehors, dit Théodule. Voyons la fillette.

Et il s’avança sur la pointe de ses bottes vers l’angle où Marius avait tourné.

Arrivé là, il s’arrêta stupéfait.

Marius, le front dans ses deux mains, était agenouillé dans l’herbe sur une fosse. Il y avait effeuillé son bouquet. À l’extrémité de la fosse, à un renflement qui marquait la tête, il y avait une croix de bois noir avec ce nom en lettres blanches: Colonel Baron Pontmercy. On entendait Marius sangloter.

La fillette était une tombe.

Chapitre VIII

Marbre contre granit

C’était là que Marius était venu la première fois qu’il s’était absenté de Paris. C’était là qu’il revenait chaque fois que M. Gillenormand disait: Il découche.

Le lieutenant Théodule fut absolument décontenancé par ce coudoiement inattendu d’un sépulcre; il éprouva une sensation désagréable et singulière qu’il était incapable d’analyser, et qui se composait du respect d’un tombeau mêlé au respect d’un colonel. Il recula, laissant Marius seul dans le cimetière, et il y eut de la discipline dans cette reculade. La mort lui apparut avec de grosses épaulettes, et il lui fit presque le salut militaire. Ne sachant qu’écrire à la tante, il prit le parti de ne rien écrire du tout; et il ne serait probablement rien résulté de la découverte faite par Théodule sur les amours de Marius, si, par un de ces arrangements mystérieux si fréquents dans le hasard, la scène de Vernon n’eût eu presque immédiatement une sorte de contre-coup à Paris.

Marius revint de Vernon le troisième jour de grand matin, descendit chez son grand-père, et, fatigué de deux nuits passées en diligence, sentant le besoin de réparer son insomnie par une heure d’école de natation, monta rapidement à sa chambre, ne prit que le temps de quitter sa redingote de voyage et le cordon noir qu’il avait au cou, et s’en alla au bain.

M. Gillenormand, levé de bonne heure comme tous les vieillards qui se portent bien, l’avait entendu rentrer, et s’était hâté d’escalader, le plus vite qu’il avait pu avec ses vieilles jambes, l’escalier des combles où habitait Marius, afin de l’embrasser, et de le questionner dans l’embrassade, et de savoir un peu d’où il venait.

Mais l’adolescent avait mis moins de temps à descendre que l’octogénaire à monter, et quand le père Gillenormand entra dans la mansarde, Marius n’y était plus.

Le lit n’était pas défait, et sur le lit s’étalaient sans défiance la redingote et le cordon noir.

— J’aime mieux ça, dit M. Gillenormand.

Et un moment après il fit son entrée dans le salon où était déjà assise Mlle Gillenormand aînée, brodant ses roues de cabriolet.

L’entrée fut triomphante.

M. Gillenormand tenait d’une main la redingote et de l’autre le ruban de cou, et criait:

— Victoire! nous allons pénétrer le mystère! nous allons savoir le fin du fin, nous allons palper les libertinages de notre sournois! nous voici à même le roman. J’ai le portrait!

En effet, une boîte de chagrin noir, assez semblable à un médaillon, était suspendue au cordon.

Le vieillard prit cette boîte et la considéra quelque temps sans l’ouvrir, avec cet air de volupté, de ravissement et de colère d’un pauvre diable affamé regardant passer sous son nez un admirable dîner qui ne serait pas pour lui.

— Car c’est évidemment là un portrait. Je m’y connais. Cela se porte tendrement sur le cœur. Sont-ils bêtes! Quelque abominable goton, qui fait frémir probablement! Les jeunes gens ont si mauvais goût aujourd’hui!

— Voyons, mon père, dit la vieille fille.

La boîte s’ouvrait en pressant un ressort. Ils n’y trouvèrent rien qu’un papier soigneusement plié.

— De la même au même, dit M. Gillenormand éclatant de rire. Je sais ce que c’est. Un billet doux!

— Ah! lisons donc! dit la tante.

Et elle mit ses lunettes. Ils déplièrent le papier et lurent ceci:

« — Pour mon fils. — L’empereur m’a fait baron sur le champ de bataille de Waterloo. Puisque la Restauration me conteste ce titre que j’ai payé de mon sang, mon fils le prendra et le portera. Il va sans dire qu’il en sera digne.»

Ce que le père et la fille éprouvèrent ne saurait se dire. Ils se sentirent glacés comme par le souffle d’une tête de mort. Ils n’échangèrent pas un mot. Seulement M. Gillenormand dit à voix basse et comme se parlant à lui-même:

— C’est l’écriture de ce sabreur.

La tante examina le papier, le retourna dans tous les sens, puis le remit dans la boîte.

Au même moment, un petit paquet carré long enveloppé de papier bleu tomba d’une poche de la redingote. Mademoiselle Gillenormand le ramassa et développa le papier bleu. C’était le cent de cartes de Marius. Elle en passa une à M. Gillenormand qui lut: Le baron Marius Pontmercy.

Le vieillard sonna. Nicolette vint. M. Gillenormand prit le cordon, la boîte et la redingote, jeta le tout à terre au milieu du salon, et dit:

— Remportez ces nippes.

Une grande heure se passa dans le plus profond silence. Le vieux homme et la vieille fille s’étaient assis se tournant le dos l’un à l’autre, et pensaient, chacun de leur côté, probablement les mêmes choses. Au bout de cette heure, la tante Gillenormand dit:

— Joli!

Quelques instants après, Marius parut. Il rentrait. Avant même d’avoir franchi le seuil du salon, il aperçut son grand-père qui tenait à la main une de ses cartes et qui, en le voyant, s’écria avec son air de supériorité bourgeoise et ricanante qui était quelque chose d’écrasant:

— Tiens! tiens! tiens! tiens! tiens! tu es baron à présent. Je te fais mon compliment. Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire?

Marius rougit légèrement, et répondit:

— Cela veut dire que je suis le fils de mon père.

M. Gillenormand cessa de rire et dit durement:

— Ton père, c’est moi.

— Mon père, reprit Marius les yeux baissés et l’air sévère, c’était un homme humble et héroïque qui a glorieusement servi la République et la France, qui a été grand dans la plus grande histoire que les hommes aient jamais faite, qui a vécu un quart de siècle au bivouac, le jour sous la mitraille et sous les balles, la nuit dans la neige, dans la boue, sous la pluie, qui a pris deux drapeaux, qui a reçu vingt blessures, qui est mort dans l’oubli et dans l’abandon, et qui n’a jamais eu qu’un tort, c’est de trop aimer deux ingrats, son pays et moi!

C’était plus que M. Gillenormand n’en pouvait entendre. À ce mot, la République, il s’était levé, ou pour mieux dire, dressé debout. Chacune des paroles que Marius venait de prononcer avait fait sur le visage du vieux royaliste l’effet des bouffées d’un soufflet de forge sur un tison ardent. De sombre il était devenu rouge, de rouge pourpre, et de pourpre flamboyant.

— Marius! s’écria-t-il. Abominable enfant! je ne sais pas ce qu’était ton père! je ne veux pas le savoir! je n’en sais rien et je ne le sais pas! mais ce que je sais, c’est qu’il n’y a jamais eu que des misérables parmi tous ces gens-là! c’est que c’étaient tous des gueux, des assassins, des bonnets rouges, des voleurs! je dis tous! je dis tous! je ne connais personne! je dis tous! entends-tu, Marius! Vois-tu bien, tu es baron comme ma pantoufle!

C’étaient tous des bandits qui ont servi Robespierre! tous des brigands qui ont servi Bu — o — na — parté! tous des traîtres qui ont trahi, trahi, trahi, leur roi légitime! tous des lâches qui se sont sauvés devant les Prussiens et les Anglais à Waterloo! Voilà ce que je sais. Si monsieur votre père est là-dessous, je l’ignore, j’en suis fâché, tant pis, votre serviteur!

À son tour, c’était Marius qui était le tison, et M. Gillenormand qui était le soufflet. Marius frissonnait dans tous ses membres, il ne savait que devenir, sa tête flambait. Il était le prêtre qui regarde jeter au vent toutes ses hosties, le fakir qui voit un passant cracher sur son idole. Il ne se pouvait que de telles choses eussent été dites impunément devant lui. Mais que faire? Son père venait d’être foulé aux pieds et trépigné en sa présence, mais par qui? par son grand-père. Comment venger l’un sans outrager l’autre? Il était impossible qu’il insultât son grand-père, et il était également impossible qu’il ne vengeât point son père. D’un côté une tombe sacrée, de l’autre des cheveux blancs. Il fut quelques instants ivre et chancelant, ayant tout ce tourbillon dans la tête; puis il leva les yeux, regarda fixement son aïeul, et cria d’une voix tonnante:

— À bas les Bourbons, et ce gros cochon de Louis XVIII!

Louis XVIII était mort depuis quatre ans, mais cela lui était bien égal.

Le vieillard, d’écarlate qu’il était, devint subitement plus blanc que ses cheveux. Il se tourna vers un buste de M. le duc de Berry qui était sur la cheminée et le salua profondément avec une sorte de majesté singulière. Puis il alla deux fois, lentement et en silence, de la cheminée à la fenêtre et de la fenêtre à la cheminée, traversant toute la salle et faisant craquer le parquet comme une figure de pierre qui marche. À la seconde fois, il se pencha vers sa fille, qui assistait à ce choc avec la stupeur d’une vieille brebis, et lui dit en souriant d’un sourire presque calme.

— Un baron comme monsieur et un bourgeois comme moi ne peuvent rester sous le même toit.

Et tout à coup se redressant, blême, tremblant, terrible, le front agrandi par l’effrayant rayonnement de la colère, il étendit le bras vers Marius et lui cria:

— Va-t’en.

Marius quitta la maison.

Le lendemain, M. Gillenormand dit à sa fille:

— Vous enverrez tous les six mois soixante pistoles à ce buveur de sang, et vous ne m’en parlerez jamais.

Ayant un immense reste de fureur à dépenser et ne sachant qu’en faire, il continua de dire vous à sa fille pendant plus de trois mois.

Marius, de son côté, était sorti indigné. Une circonstance qu’il faut dire avait aggravé encore son exaspération. Il y a toujours de ces petites fatalités qui compliquent les drames domestiques. Les griefs s’en augmentent, quoique au fond les torts n’en soient pas accrus. En reportant précipitamment, sur l’ordre du grand-père, «les nippes» de Marius dans sa chambre, Nicolette avait, sans s’en apercevoir, laissé tomber, probablement dans l’escalier des combles, qui était obscur, le médaillon de chagrin noir où était le papier écrit par le colonel. Ce papier ni ce médaillon ne purent être retrouvés. Marius fut convaincu que «monsieur Gillenormand», à dater de ce jour il ne l’appela plus autrement, avait jeté «le testament de son père», au feu. Il savait par cœur les quelques lignes écrites par le colonel, et, par conséquent, rien n’était perdu. Mais le papier, l’écriture, cette relique sacrée, tout cela était son cœur même. Qu’en avait-on fait?

Marius s’en était allé, sans dire où il allait, et sans savoir où il allait, avec trente francs, sa montre, et quelques hardes dans un sac de nuit. Il était monté dans un cabriolet de place, l’avait pris à l’heure et s’était dirigé à tout hasard vers le pays latin.

Qu’allait devenir Marius?

Livre quatrième — Les amis de l’A B C

Chapitre I

Un groupe qui a failli devenir historique

À cette époque, indifférente en apparence, un certain frisson révolutionnaire courait vaguement. Des souffles, revenus des profondeurs de 89 et de 92, étaient dans l’air. La jeunesse était, qu’on nous passe le mot, en train de muer. On se transformait, presque sans s’en douter, par le mouvement même du temps. L’aiguille qui marche sur le cadran marche aussi dans les âmes. Chacun faisait en avant le pas qu’il avait à faire. Les royalistes devenaient libéraux, les libéraux devenaient démocrates.

C’était comme une marée montante compliquée de mille reflux; le propre des reflux, c’est de faire des mélanges; de là des combinaisons d’idées très singulières; on adorait à la fois Napoléon et la liberté. Nous faisons ici de l’histoire. C’étaient les mirages de ce temps-là. Les opinions traversent des phases. Le royalisme voltairien, variété bizarre, a eu un pendant non moins étrange, le libéralisme bonapartiste.

D’autres groupes d’esprits étaient plus sérieux. Là on sondait le principe; là on s’attachait au droit. On se passionnait pour l’absolu, on entrevoyait les réalisations infinies; l’absolu, par sa rigidité même, pousse les esprits vers l’azur et les fait flotter dans l’illimité. Rien n’est tel que le dogme pour enfanter le rêve. Et rien n’est tel que le rêve pour engendrer l’avenir. Utopie aujourd’hui, chair et os demain.

Les opinions avancées avaient des doubles fonds. Un commencement de mystère menaçait «l’ordre établi», lequel était suspect et sournois. Signe au plus haut point révolutionnaire. L’arrière-pensée du pouvoir rencontre dans la sape l’arrière-pensée du peuple. L’incubation des insurrections donne la réplique à la préméditation des coups d’État.

Il n’y avait pas encore en France alors de ces vastes organisations sous-jacentes comme le tugendbund allemand et le carbonarisme italien: mais çà et là des creusements obscurs, se ramifiant. La Cougourde s’ébauchait à Aix; il y avait à Paris, entre autres affiliations de ce genre, la société des Amis de l’A B C.

Qu’était-ce que les Amis de l’A B C? une société ayant pour but, en apparence, l’éducation des enfants, en réalité le redressement des hommes.

On se déclarait les amis de l’A B C. — L’Abaissé, c’était le peuple. On voulait le relever. Calembour dont on aurait tort de rire. Les calembours sont quelquefois graves en politique; témoin le Castratus ad castra qui fit de Narsès un général d’armée; témoin: Barbari et Barberini; témoin: Fueros y Fuegos; témoin: Tu es Petrus et super hanc petram, etc., etc.

Les amis de l’A B C étaient peu nombreux. C’était une société secrète à l’état d’embryon; nous dirions presque une coterie, si les coteries aboutissaient à des héros. Ils se réunissaient à Paris en deux endroits, près des halles, dans un cabaret appelé Corinthe dont il sera question plus tard, et près du Panthéon dans un petit café de la place Saint-Michel appelé le café Musain, aujourd’hui démoli; le premier de ces lieux de rendez-vous était contigu aux ouvriers, le deuxième, aux étudiants.

Les conciliabules habituels des Amis de l’A B C se tenaient dans une arrière-salle du café Musain.

Cette salle, assez éloignée du café, auquel elle communiquait par un très long couloir, avait deux fenêtres et une issue avec un escalier dérobé sur la petite rue des Grès. On y fumait, on y buvait, on y jouait, on y riait. On y causait très haut de tout, et à voix basse d’autre chose. Au mur était clouée, indice suffisant pour éveiller le flair d’un agent de police, une vieille carte de la France sous la République.

La plupart des amis de l’A B C étaient des étudiants, en entente cordiale avec quelques ouvriers. Voici les noms des principaux. Ils appartiennent dans une certaine mesure à l’histoire: Enjolras, Combeferre, Jean Prouvaire, Feuilly, Courfeyrac, Bahorel, Lesgle ou Laigle, Joly, Grantaire.

Ces jeunes gens faisaient entre eux une sorte de famille, à force d’amitié. Tous, Laigle excepté, étaient du midi.

Ce groupe était remarquable. Il s’est évanoui dans les profondeurs invisibles qui sont derrière nous. Au point de ce drame où nous sommes parvenus, il n’est pas inutile peut-être de diriger un rayon de clarté sur ces jeunes têtes avant que le lecteur les voie s’enfoncer dans l’ombre d’une aventure tragique.

Enjolras, que nous avons nommé le premier, on verra plus tard pourquoi, était fils unique et riche.

Enjolras était un jeune homme charmant, capable d’être terrible. Il était angéliquement beau. C’était Antinoüs farouche. On eût dit, à voir la réverbération pensive de son regard, qu’il avait déjà, dans quelque existence précédente, traversé l’apocalypse révolutionnaire. Il en avait la tradition comme un témoin. Il savait tous les petits détails de la grande chose. Nature pontificale et guerrière, étrange dans un adolescent. Il était officiant et militant; au point de vue immédiat, soldat de la démocratie; au-dessus du mouvement contemporain, prêtre de l'idéal. Il avait la prunelle profonde, la paupière un peu rouge, la lèvre inférieure épaisse et facilement dédaigneuse, le front haut. Beaucoup de front dans un visage, c'est comme beaucoup de ciel dans un horizon. Ainsi que certains jeunes hommes du commencement de ce siècle et de la fin du siècle dernier qui ont été illustres de bonne heure, il avait une jeunesse excessive, fraîche comme chez les jeunes filles, quoique avec des heures de pâleur. Déjà homme, il semblait encore enfant. Ses vingt-deux ans en paraissaient dix-sept. Il était grave, il ne semblait pas savoir qu'il y eût sur la terre un être appelé la femme. Il n'avait qu'une passion, le droit, qu'une pensée, renverser l'obstacle. Sur le mont Aventin, il eût été Gracchus; dans la Convention, il eût été Saint-Just. Il voyait à peine les roses, il ignorait le printemps, il n'entendait pas chanter les oiseaux; la gorge nue d'Évadné ne l'eût pas plus ému qu'Aristogiton; pour lui, comme pour Harmodius, les fleurs n'étaient bonnes qu'à cacher l'épée. Il était sévère dans les joies. Devant tout ce qui n'était pas la République, il baissait chastement les yeux. C'était l'amoureux de marbre de la Liberté. Sa parole était âprement inspirée et avait un frémissement d'hymne. Il avait des ouvertures d'ailes inattendues. Malheur à l'amourette qui se fût risquée de son côté! Si quelque grisette de la place Cambrai ou de la rue Saint-Jean-de-Beauvais, voyant cette figure d'échappé de collège, cette encolure de page, ces longs cils blonds, ces yeux bleus, cette chevelure tumultueuse au vent, ces joues roses, ces lèvres neuves, ces dents exquises, eût eu appétit de toute cette aurore, et fût venue essayer sa beauté sur Enjolras, un regard surprenant et redoutable lui eût montré brusquement l'abîme, et lui eût appris à ne pas confondre avec le chérubin galant de Baumarchais le formidable chérubin d'Ézéchiel.

À côté d'Enjolras qui représentait la logique de la révolution, Combeferre en représentait la philosophie. Entre la logique de la révolution et sa philosophie, il y a cette différence que sa logique peut conclure à la guerre, tandis que sa philosophie ne peut aboutir qu'à la paix. Combeferre complétait et rectifiait Enjolras. Il était moins haut et plus large. Il voulait qu'on versât aux esprits les principes étendus d'idées générales; il disait: Révolution, mais civilisation; et autour de la montagne à pic il ouvrait le vaste horizon bleu. De là, dans toutes les vues de Combeferre, quelque chose d’accessible et de praticable. La révolution avec Combeferre était plus respirable qu’avec Enjolras. Enjolras en exprimait le droit divin, et Combeferre le droit naturel. Le premier se rattachait à Robespierre; le second confinait à Condorcet. Combeferre vivait plus qu’Enjolras de la vie de tout le monde. S’il eût été donné à ces deux jeunes hommes d’arriver jusqu’à l’histoire, l’un eût été le juste, l’autre eût été le sage. Enjolras était plus viril, Combeferre était plus humain. Homo et Vir, c’était bien là en effet leur nuance. Combeferre était doux comme Enjolras était sévère, par blancheur naturelle. Il aimait le mot citoyen, mais il préférait le mot homme. Il eût volontiers dit: Hombre, comme les espagnols. Il lisait tout, allait aux théâtres, suivait les cours publics, apprenait d’Arago la polarisation de la lumière, se passionnait pour une leçon où Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire avait expliqué la double fonction de l’artère carotide externe et de l’artère carotide interne, l’une qui fait le visage, l’autre qui fait le cerveau; il était au courant, suivait la science pas à pas, confrontait Saint-Simon avec Fourier, déchiffrait les hiéroglyphes, cassait les cailloux qu’il trouvait et raisonnait géologie, dessinait de mémoire un papillon bombyx, signalait les fautes de français dans le Dictionnaire de l’Académie, étudiait Puységur et Deleuze, n’affirmait rien, pas même les miracles, ne niait rien, pas même les revenants, feuilletait la collection du Moniteur, songeait. Il déclarait que l’avenir est dans la main du maître d’école, et se préoccupait des questions d’éducation. Il voulait que la société travaillât sans relâche à l’élévation du niveau intellectuel et moral, au monnayage de la science, à la mise en circulation des idées, à la croissance de l’esprit dans la jeunesse, et il craignait que la pauvreté actuelle des méthodes, la misère du point de vue littéraire borné à deux ou trois siècles classiques, le dogmatisme tyrannique des pédants officiels, les préjugés scolastiques et les routines ne finissent par faire de nos collèges des huîtrières artificielles. Il était savant, puriste, précis, polytechnique, piocheur, et en même temps pensif «jusqu’à la chimère», disaient ses amis. Il croyait à tous les rêves: les chemins de fer, la suppression de la souffrance dans les opérations chirurgicales, la fixation de l’image de la chambre noire, le télégraphe électrique, la direction des ballons. Du reste peu effrayé des citadelles bâties de toutes parts contre le genre humain par les superstitions, les despotismes et les préjugés. Il était de ceux qui pensent que la science finira par tourner la position. Enjolras était un chef, Combeferre était un guide. On eût voulu combattre avec l’un et marcher avec l’autre. Ce n’est pas que Combeferre ne fût capable de combattre, il ne refusait pas de prendre corps à corps l’obstacle et de l’attaquer de vive force et par explosion; mais mettre peu à peu, par l’enseignement des axiomes et la promulgation des lois positives, le genre humain d’accord avec ses destinées, cela lui plaisait mieux; et, entre deux clartés, sa pente était plutôt pour l’illumination que pour l’embrasement. Un incendie peut faire une aurore sans doute, mais pourquoi ne pas attendre le lever du jour? Un volcan éclaire, mais l’aube éclaire encore mieux. Combeferre préférait peut-être la blancheur du beau au flamboiement du sublime. Une clarté troublée par de la fumée, un progrès acheté par de la violence, ne satisfaisaient qu’à demi ce tendre et sérieux esprit. Une précipitation à pic d’un peuple dans la vérité, un 93, l’effarait; cependant la stagnation lui répugnait plus encore, il y sentait la putréfaction et la mort; à tout prendre, il aimait mieux l’écume que le miasme, et il préférait au cloaque le torrent, et la chute du Niagara au lac de Montfaucon. En somme il ne voulait ni halte, ni hâte. Tandis que ses tumultueux amis, chevaleresquement épris de l’absolu, adoraient et appelaient les splendides aventures révolutionnaires, Combeferre inclinait à laisser faire le progrès, le bon progrès, froid peut-être, mais pur; méthodique, mais irréprochable; flegmatique, mais imperturbable. Combeferre se fût agenouillé et eût joint les mains pour que l’avenir arrivât avec toute sa candeur, et pour que rien ne troublât l’immense évolution vertueuse des peuples. Il faut que le bien soit innocent, répétait-il sans cesse. Et en effet, si la grandeur de la révolution, c’est de regarder fixement l’éblouissant idéal et d’y voler à travers les foudres, avec du sang et du feu à ses serres, la beauté du progrès, c’est d’être sans tache; et il y a entre Washington qui représente l’un et Danton qui incarne l’autre, la différence qui sépare l’ange aux ailes de cygne de l’ange aux ailes d’aigle.

Jean Prouvaire était une nuance plus adoucie encore que Combeferre. Il s’appelait Jehan, par cette petite fantaisie momentanée qui se mêlait au puissant et profond mouvement d’où est sortie l’étude si nécessaire du moyen-âge. Jean Prouvaire était amoureux, cultivait un pot de fleurs, jouait de la flûte, faisait des vers, aimait le peuple, plaignait la femme, pleurait sur l’enfant, confondait dans la même confiance l’avenir et Dieu, et blâmait la révolution d’avoir fait tomber une tête royale, celle d’André Chénier. Il avait la voix habituellement délicate et tout à coup virile. Il était lettré jusqu’à l’érudition, et presque orientaliste. Il était bon par-dessus tout; et, chose toute simple pour qui sait combien la bonté confine à la grandeur, en fait de poésie il préférait l’immense. Il savait l’italien, le latin, le grec et l’hébreu; et cela lui servait à ne lire que quatre poètes: Dante, Juvénal, Eschyle et Isaïe. En français, il préférait Corneille à Racine et Agrippa d’Aubigné à Corneille. Il flânait volontiers dans les champs de folle avoine et de bleuets, et s’occupait des nuages presque autant que des événements. Son esprit avait deux attitudes, l’une du côté de l’homme, l’autre du côté de Dieu; il étudiait, ou il contemplait. Toute la journée il approfondissait les questions sociales; le salaire, le capital, le crédit, le mariage, la religion, la liberté de penser, la liberté d’aimer, l’éducation, la pénalité, la misère, l’association, la propriété, la production et la répartition, l’énigme d’en bas qui couvre d’ombre la fourmilière humaine; et le soir, il regardait les astres, ces êtres énormes. Comme Enjolras, il était riche et fils unique. Il parlait doucement, penchait la tête, baissait les yeux, souriait avec embarras, se mettait mal, avait l’air gauche, rougissait de rien, était fort timide. Du reste, intrépide.

Feuilly était un ouvrier éventailliste, orphelin de père et de mère, qui gagnait péniblement trois francs par jour, et qui n’avait qu’une pensée, délivrer le monde. Il avait une autre préoccupation encore: s’instruire; ce qu’il appelait aussi se délivrer. Il s’était enseigné à lui-même à lire et à écrire; tout ce qu’il savait, il l’avait appris seul. Feuilly était un généreux cœur. Il avait l’embrassement immense. Cet orphelin avait adopté les peuples. Sa mère lui manquant, il avait médité sur la patrie. Il ne voulait pas qu’il y eût sur la terre un homme qui fût sans patrie. Il couvait en lui-même, avec la divination profonde de l’homme du peuple, ce que nous appelons aujourd’hui l’idée des nationalités. Il avait appris l’histoire exprès pour s’indigner en connaissance de cause. Dans ce jeune cénacle d’utopistes, surtout occupés de la France, il représentait le dehors. Il avait pour spécialité la Grèce, la Pologne, la Hongrie, la Roumanie, l’Italie. Il prononçait ces noms-là sans cesse, à propos et hors de propos, avec la ténacité du droit. La Turquie sur la Grèce et la Thessalie, la Russie sur Varsovie, l’Autriche sur Venise, ces viols l’exaspéraient. Entre toutes, la grande voie de fait de 1772 le soulevait. Le vrai dans l’indignation, il n’y a pas de plus souveraine éloquence, il était éloquent de cette éloquence-là. Il ne tarissait pas sur cette date infâme, 1772, sur ce noble et vaillant peuple supprimé par trahison, sur ce Crime à trois, sur ce guet-apens monstre, prototype et patron de toutes ces effrayantes suppressions d’états qui, depuis, ont frappé plusieurs nobles nations, et leur ont, pour ainsi dire, raturé leur acte de naissance. Tous les attentats sociaux contemporains dérivent du partage de la Pologne. Le partage de la Pologne est un théorème dont tous les forfaits politiques actuels sont les corollaires. Pas un despote, pas un traître, depuis tout à l'heure un siècle, qui n'ait visé, homologué, contre-signé et paraphé, ne varietur, le partage de la Pologne. Quand on compulse le dossier des trahisons modernes, celle-là apparaît la première. Le congrès de Vienne a consulté ce crime avant de consommer le sien. 1772 sonne l'hallali, 1815 est la curée. Tel était le texte habituel de Feuilly. Ce pauvre ouvrier s'était fait le tuteur de la justice, et elle le récompensait en le faisant grand. C'est qu'en effet il y a de l'éternité dans le droit. Varsovie ne peut pas plus être tartare que Venise ne peut être tudesque. Les rois y perdent leur peine, et leur honneur. Tôt ou tard, la patrie submergée flotte à la surface et reparaît. La Grèce redevient la Grèce; l'Italie redevient l'Italie. La protestation du droit contre le fait persiste à jamais. Le vol d'un peuple ne se prescrit pas. Ces hautes escroqueries n'ont point d'avenir. On ne démarque pas une nation comme un mouchoir.

Courfeyrac avait un père qu'on nommait M. de Courfeyrac. Une des idées fausses de la bourgeoisie de la Restauration en fait d'aristocratie et de noblesse, c'était de croire à la particule. La particule, on le sait, n'a aucune signification. Mais les bourgeois du temps de la Minerve estimaient si haut ce pauvre de qu'on se croyait obligé de l'abdiquer. M. de Chauvelin se faisait appeler M. Chauvelin, M. de Caumartin, M. Caumartin, M. de Constant de Rebecque, Benjamin Constant, M. de Lafayette, M. Lafayette. Courfeyrac n'avait pas voulu rester en arrière, et s'appelait Courfeyrac tout court.

Nous pourrions presque, en ce qui concerne Courfeyrac, nous en tenir là, et nous borner à dire quant au reste: Courfeyrac, voyez Tholomyès.

Courfeyrac en effet avait cette verve de jeunesse qu'on pourrait appeler la beauté du diable de l'esprit. Plus tard, cela s'éteint comme la gentillesse du petit chat, et toute cette grâce aboutit, sur deux pieds, au bourgeois, et, sur quatre pattes, au matou.

Ce genre d'esprit, les générations qui traversent les écoles, les levées successives de la jeunesse, se le transmettent, et se le passent de main en main, quasi cursores, à peu près toujours le même; de sorte que, ainsi que nous venons de l'indiquer, le premier venu qui eût écouté Courfeyrac en 1828 eût cru entendre Tholomyès en 1817. Seulement Courfeyrac était un brave garçon. Sous les apparentes similitudes de l'esprit extérieur, la différence entre Tholomyès et lui était grande. L’homme latent qui existait en eux était chez le premier tout autre que chez le second. Il y avait dans Tholomyès un procureur et dans Courfeyrac un paladin.

Enjolras était le chef. Combeferre était le guide, Courfeyrac était le centre. Les autres donnaient plus de lumière, lui il donnait plus de calorique; le fait est qu’il avait toutes les qualités d’un centre, la rondeur et le rayonnement.

Bahorel avait figuré dans le tumulte sanglant de juin 1822, à l’occasion de l’enterrement du jeune Lallemand.

Bahorel était un être de bonne humeur et de mauvaise compagnie, brave, panier percé, prodigue et rencontrant la générosité, bavard et rencontrant l’éloquence, hardi et rencontrant l’effronterie; la meilleure pâte de diable qui fût possible; ayant des gilets téméraires et des opinions écarlates; tapageur en grand, c’est-à-dire n’aimant rien tant qu’une querelle, si ce n’est une émeute, et rien tant qu’une émeute, si ce n’est une révolution; toujours prêt à casser un carreau, puis à dépaver une rue, puis à démolir un gouvernement, pour voir l’effet; étudiant de onzième année. Il flairait le droit, mais il ne le faisait pas. Il avait pris pour devise: avocat jamais, et pour armoiries une table de nuit dans laquelle on entrevoyait un bonnet carré. Chaque fois qu’il passait devant l’école de droit, ce qui lui arrivait rarement, il boutonnait sa redingote, le paletot n’était pas encore inventé, et il prenait des précautions hygiéniques. Il disait du portail de l’école: quel beau vieillard! et du doyen, M. Delvincourt: quel monument! Il voyait dans ses cours des sujets de chansons et dans ses professeurs des occasions de caricatures. Il mangeait à rien faire une assez grosse pension, quelque chose comme trois mille francs. Il avait des parents paysans auxquels il avait su inculquer le respect de leur fils.

Il disait d’eux: Ce sont des paysans, et non des bourgeois; c’est pour cela qu’ils ont de l’intelligence.

Bahorel, homme de caprice, était épars sur plusieurs cafés; les autres avaient des habitudes, lui n’en avait pas. Il flânait. Errer est humain, flâner est parisien. Au fond, esprit pénétrant, et penseur plus qu’il ne semblait.

Il servait de lien entre les Amis de l’A B C et d’autres groupes encore informes, mais qui devaient se dessiner plus tard.

Il y avait dans ce conclave de jeunes têtes un membre chauve.

Le marquis d’Avaray, que Louis XVIII fit duc pour l’avoir aidé à monter dans un cabriolet de place le jour où il émigra, racontait qu’en 1814, à son retour en France, comme le roi débarquait à Calais, un homme lui présenta un placet. — Que demandez-vous? dit le roi. — Sire, un bureau de poste. — Comment vous appelez-vous? — L’Aigle.

Le roi fronça le sourcil, regarda la signature du placet et vit le nom écrit ainsi: Lesgle. Cette orthographe peu bonapartiste toucha le roi et il commença à sourire. Sire, reprit l’homme au placet, j’ai pour ancêtre un valet de chiens, surnommé Lesgueules. Ce surnom a fait mon nom. Je m’appelle Lesgueules, par contraction Lesgle, et par corruption L’Aigle. — Ceci fit que le roi acheva son sourire. Plus tard il donna à l’homme le bureau de poste de Meaux, exprès ou par mégarde.

Le membre chauve du groupe était fils de ce Lesgle, ou Lègle, et signait Lègle (de Meaux). Ses camarades, pour abréger, l’appelaient Bossuet.

Bossuet était un garçon gai qui avait du malheur. Sa spécialité était de ne réussir à rien. Par contre, il riait de tout. À vingt-cinq ans, il était chauve. Son père avait fini par avoir une maison et un champ; mais lui, le fils, n’avait rien eu de plus pressé que de perdre dans une fausse spéculation ce champ et cette maison. Il ne lui était rien resté. Il avait de la science et de l’esprit, mais il avortait. Tout lui manquait, tout le trompait; ce qu’il échafaudait croulait sur lui. S’il fendait du bois, il se coupait un doigt. S’il avait une maîtresse, il découvrait bientôt qu’il avait aussi un ami. À tout moment quelque misère lui advenait; de là sa jovialité. Il disait: J’habite sous le toit des tuiles qui tombent. Peu étonné, car pour lui l’accident était le prévu, il prenait la mauvaise chance en sérénité et souriait des taquineries de la destinée comme quelqu’un qui entend la plaisanterie. Il était pauvre, mais son gousset de bonne humeur était inépuisable. Il arrivait vite à son dernier sou, jamais à son dernier éclat de rire. Quand l’adversité entrait chez lui, il saluait cordialement cette ancienne connaissance, il tapait sur le ventre aux catastrophes; il était familier avec la Fatalité au point de l’appeler par son petit nom. — Bonjour, Guignon, lui disait-il.

Ces persécutions du sort l’avaient fait inventif. Il était plein de ressources. Il n’avait point d’argent, mais il trouvait moyen de faire, quand bon lui semblait, «des dépenses effrénées». Une nuit, il alla jusqu’à manger «cent francs» dans un souper avec une péronnelle, ce qui lui inspira au milieu de l’orgie ce mot mémorable: Fille de cinq louis, tire-moi mes bottes.

Bossuet se dirigeait lentement vers la profession d’avocat; il faisait son droit, à la manière de Bahorel. Bossuet avait peu de domicile; quelquefois pas du tout. Il logeait tantôt chez l'un, tantôt chez l'autre, le plus souvent chez Joly. Joly étudiait la médecine. Il avait deux ans de moins que Bossuet.

Joly était le malade imaginaire jeune. Ce qu'il avait gagné à la médecine, c'était d'être plus malade que médecin. À vingt-trois ans, il se croyait valétudinaire et passait sa vie à regarder sa langue dans son miroir. Il affirmait que l'homme s'aimante comme une aiguille, et dans sa chambre il mettait son lit au midi et les pieds au nord, afin que, la nuit, la circulation de son sang ne fût pas contrariée par le grand courant magnétique du globe. Dans les orages, il se tâtait le pouls. Du reste, le plus gai de tous. Toutes ces incohérences, jeune, maniaque, malingre, joyeux, faisaient bon ménage ensemble, et il en résultait un être excentrique et agréable que ses camarades, prodigues de consonnes ailées, appelaient Jolllly. — Tu peux t'envoler sur quatre L, lui disait Jean Prouvaire.

Joly avait l'habitude de se toucher le nez avec le bout de sa canne, ce qui est l'indice d'un esprit sagace.

Tous ces jeunes gens, si divers, et dont, en somme, il ne faut parler que sérieusement, avaient une même religion: le Progrès.

Tous étaient les fils directs de la révolution française. Les plus légers devenaient solennels en prononçant cette date: 89. Leurs pères selon la chair étaient ou avaient été feuillants, royalistes, doctrinaires; peu importait; ce pêle-mêle antérieur à eux, qui étaient jeunes, ne les regardait point; le pur sang des principes coulait dans leurs veines. Ils se rattachaient sans nuance intermédiaire au droit incorruptible et au devoir absolu.

Affiliés et initiés, ils ébauchaient souterrainement l'idéal.

Parmi tous ces cœurs passionnés et tous ces esprits convaincus, il y avait un sceptique. Comment se trouvait-il là? Par juxtaposition. Ce sceptique s'appelait Grantaire, et signait habituellement de ce rébus: R. Grantaire était un homme qui se gardait bien de croire à quelque chose. C'était du reste un des étudiants qui avaient le plus appris pendant leurs cours à Paris; il savait que le meilleur café était au café Lemblin, et le meilleur billard au café Voltaire, qu'on trouvait de bonnes galettes et de bonnes filles à l'Ermitage sur le boulevard du Maine, des poulets à la crapaudine chez la mère Saguet, d'excellentes matelotes barrière de la Cunette, et un certain petit vin blanc barrière du Combat. Pour tout, il savait les bons endroits; en outre la savate et le chausson, quelques danses, et il était profond bâtonniste. Par-dessus le marché, grand buveur. Il était laid démesurément; la plus jolie piqueuse de bottines de ce temps-là, Irma Boissy, indignée de sa laideur, avait rendu cette sentence: Grantaire est impossible; mais la fatuité de Grantaire ne se déconcertait pas. Il regardait tendrement et fixement toutes les femmes, ayant l'air de dire de toutes: si je voulais! et cherchant à faire croire aux camarades qu'il était généralement demandé.

Tous ces mots: droit du peuple, droits de l'homme, contrat social, révolution française, République, démocratie, humanité, civilisation, religion, progrès, étaient, pour Grantaire, très voisins de ne rien signifier du tout. Il en souriait. Le scepticisme, cette carie de l'intelligence, ne lui avait pas laissé une idée entière dans l'esprit. Il vivait avec ironie. Ceci était son axiome: Il n'y a qu'une certitude, mon verre plein. Il raillait tous les dévouements dans tous les partis, aussi bien le frère que le père, aussi bien Robespierre jeune que Loizerolles. — Ils sont bien avancés d'être morts, s'écriait-il. Il disait du crucifix: Voilà une potence qui a réussi. Coureur, joueur, libertin, souvent ivre, il faisait à ces jeunes songeurs le déplaisir de chantonner sans cesse: J'aimons les filles et j'aimons le bon vin. Air: Vive Henri IV.

Du reste ce sceptique avait un fanatisme. Ce fanatisme n'était ni une idée ni un dogme, ni un art, ni une science; c'était un homme: Enjolras. Grantaire admirait, aimait et vénérait Enjolras. À qui se ralliait ce douteur anarchique dans cette phalange d'esprits absolus? Au plus absolu. De quelle façon Enjolras le subjuguait-il? Par les idées? Non. Par le caractère. Phénomène souvent observé. Un sceptique qui adhère à un croyant, cela est simple comme la loi des couleurs complémentaires. Ce qui nous manque nous attire. Personne n'aime le jour comme l'aveugle. La naine adore le tambour-major. Le crapaud a toujours les yeux au ciel; pourquoi? pour voir voler l'oiseau. Grantaire, en qui rampait le doute, aimait à voir dans Enjolras la foi planer. Il avait besoin d'Enjolras. Sans qu'il s'en rendît clairement compte et sans qu'il songeât à se l'expliquer à lui-même, cette nature chaste, saine, ferme, droite, dure, candide, le charmait. Il admirait, d'instinct, son contraire. Ses idées molles, fléchissantes, disloquées, malades, difformes, se rattachaient à Enjolras comme à une épine dorsale. Son rachis moral s'appuyait à cette fermeté. Grantaire, près d'Enjolras, redevenait quelqu'un. Il était lui-même d'ailleurs composé de deux éléments en apparence incompatibles. Il était ironique et cordial. Son indifférence aimait. Son esprit se passait de croyance et son cœur ne pouvait se passer d'amitié. Contradiction profonde; car une affection est une conviction. Sa nature était ainsi. Il y a des hommes qui semblent nés pour être le verso, l’envers, le revers. Ils sont Pollux, Patrocle, Nisus, Eudamidas, Éphestion, Pechméja. Ils ne vivent qu’à la condition d’être adossés à un autre; leur nom est une suite, et ne s’écrit que précédé de la conjonction et; leur existence ne leur est pas propre; elle est l’autre côté d’une destinée qui n’est pas la leur. Grantaire était un de ces hommes. Il était l’envers d’Enjolras.

On pourrait presque dire que les affinités commencent aux lettres de l’alphabet. Dans la série, O et P sont inséparables. Vous pouvez, à votre gré, prononcer O et P, ou Oreste et Pylade.

Grantaire, vrai satellite d’Enjolras, habitait ce cercle de jeunes gens; il y vivait; il ne se plaisait que là; il les suivait partout. Sa joie était de voir aller et venir ces silhouettes dans les fumées du vin. On le tolérait pour sa bonne humeur.

Enjolras, croyant, dédaignait ce sceptique, et, sobre, cet ivrogne. Il lui accordait un peu de pitié hautaine. Grantaire était un Pylade point accepté. Toujours rudoyé par Enjolras, repoussé durement, rejeté et revenant, il disait d’Enjolras: Quel beau marbre!

Chapitre II

Oraison funèbre de Blondeau, par Bossuet

Une certaine après-midi, qui avait, comme on va le voir, quelque coïncidence avec les événements racontés plus haut, Laigle de Meaux était mensuellement adossé au chambranle de la porte du café Musain. Il avait l'air d'une cariatide en vacances; il ne portait rien que sa rêverie. Il regardait la place Saint-Michel. S'adosser, c'est une manière d'être couché debout qui n'est point haïe des songeurs. Laigle de Meaux pensait, sans mélancolie, à une petite mésaventure qui lui était échue l'avant-veille à l'école de droit, et qui modifiait ses plans personnels d'avenir, plans d'ailleurs assez indistincts.

La rêverie n'empêche pas un cabriolet de passer, et le songeur de remarquer le cabriolet. Laigle de Meaux, dont les yeux erraient dans une sorte de flânerie diffuse, aperçut, à travers ce somnambulisme, un véhicule à deux roues cheminant dans la place, lequel allait au pas, et comme indécis. À qui en voulait ce cabriolet? pourquoi allait-il au pas? Laigle y regarda. Il y avait dedans, à côté du cocher, un jeune homme, et devant ce jeune homme un assez gros sac de nuit. Le sac montrait aux passants ce nom écrit en grosses lettres noires sur une carte cousue à l'étoffe: Marius Pontmercy.

Ce nom fit changer d'attitude à Laigle. Il se dressa et jeta cette apostrophe au jeune homme du cabriolet:

— Monsieur Marius Pontmercy!

Le cabriolet interpellé s'arrêta.

Le jeune homme qui, lui aussi, semblait songer profondément, leva les yeux.

— Hein? dit-il.

— Vous êtes monsieur Marius Pontmercy?

— Sans doute.

— Je vous cherchais, reprit Laigle de Meaux.

— Comment cela? demanda Marius; car c'était lui, en effet, qui sortait de chez son grand-père, et il avait devant lui une figure qu'il voyait pour la première fois. Je ne vous connais pas.

— Moi non plus, je ne vous connais point, répondit Laigle.

Marius crut à une rencontre de loustic, à un commencement de mystification en pleine rue. Il n’était pas d’humeur facile en ce moment-là. Il fronça le sourcil. Laigle de Meaux, imperturbable, poursuivit:

— Vous n’étiez pas avant-hier à l’école?

— Cela est possible.

— Cela est certain.

— Vous êtes étudiant? demanda Marius.

— Oui, monsieur. Comme vous. Avant-hier je suis entré à l’école par hasard. Vous savez, on a quelquefois de ces idées-là. Le professeur était en train de faire l’appel. Vous n’ignorez pas qu’ils sont très ridicules dans ce moment-ci. Au troisième appel manqué, on vous raye l’inscription. Soixante francs dans le gouffre.

Marius commençait à écouter. Laigle continua:

— C’était Blondeau qui faisait l’appel. Vous connaissez Blondeau, il a le nez fort pointu et fort malicieux, et il flaire avec délices les absents. Il a sournoisement commencé par la lettre P. Je n’écoutais pas, n’étant point compromis dans cette lettre-là. L’appel n’allait pas mal. Aucune radiation. L’univers était présent. Blondeau était triste. Je disais à part moi: Blondeau, mon amour, tu ne feras pas la plus petite exécution aujourd’hui. Tout à coup Blondeau appelle Marius Pontmercy. Personne ne répond. Blondeau, plein d’espoir, répète plus fort: Marius Pontmercy. Et il prend sa plume. Monsieur, j’ai des entrailles. Je me suis dit rapidement: Voilà un brave garçon qu’on va rayer. Attention. Ceci est un véritable vivant qui n’est pas exact. Ceci n’est pas un bon élève. Ce n’est point là un cul-de-plomb, un étudiant qui étudie, un blanc-bec pédant, fort en sciences, lettres, théologie et sapience, un de ces esprits bêtas tirés à quatre épingles; une épingle par faculté. C’est un honorable paresseux qui flâne, qui pratique la villégiature, qui cultive la grisette, qui fait la cour aux belles, qui est peut-être en cet instant-ci chez ma maîtresse. Sauvons-le. Mort à Blondeau! En ce moment, Blondeau a trempé dans l’encre sa plume noire de ratures, a promené sa prunelle fauve sur l’auditoire, et a répété pour la troisième fois: Marius Pontmercy! J’ai répondu: Présent! Cela fait que vous n’avez pas été rayé.

— Monsieur!... dit Marius.

— Et que, moi, je l’ai été, ajouta Laigle de Meaux.

— Je ne vous comprends pas, fit Marius.

Laigle reprit:

— Rien de plus simple. J’étais près de la chaire pour répondre et près de la porte pour m’enfuir. Le professeur me contemplait avec une certaine fixité. Brusquement, Blondeau, qui doit être le nez malin dont parle Boileau, saute à la lettre L. L, c’est ma lettre. Je suis de Meaux, et je m’appelle Lesgle.

— L’Aigle! interrompit Marius, quel beau nom!

— Monsieur, le Blondeau arrive à ce beau nom, et crie: Laigle! Je réponds: Présent! Alors Blondeau me regarde avec la douceur du tigre, sourit, et me dit: Si vous êtes Pontmercy, vous n’êtes pas Laigle. Phrase qui a l’air désobligeante pour vous, mais qui n’était lugubre que pour moi. Cela dit, il me raye.

Marius s’exclama.

— Monsieur, je suis mortifié...

— Avant tout, interrompit Laigle, je demande à embaumer Blondeau dans quelques phrases d’éloge senti. Je le suppose mort. Il n’y aurait pas grand’chose à changer à sa maigreur, à sa pâleur, à sa froideur, à sa roideur, et à son odeur. Et je dis: Erudimini qui judicatis terram. Ci-gît Blondeau, Blondeau le Nez, Blondeau Nasica, le bœuf de la discipline, bos disciplinæ, le molosse de la consigne, l’ange de l’appel, qui fut droit, carré, exact, rigide, honnête et hideux. Dieu le raya comme il m’a rayé.

Marius reprit:

— Je suis désolé...

— Jeune homme, dit Laigle de Meaux, que ceci vous serve de leçon. À l’avenir, soyez exact.

— Je vous fais vraiment mille excuses.

— Ne vous exposez plus à faire rayer votre prochain.

— Je suis désespéré...

Laigle éclata de rire.

— Et moi, ravi. J’étais sur la pente d’être avocat. Cette rature me sauve. Je renonce aux triomphes du barreau. Je ne défendrai point la veuve et je n’attaquerai point l’orphelin. Plus de toge, plus de stage. Voilà ma radiation obtenue. C’est à vous que je la dois, monsieur Pontmercy. J’entends vous faire solennellement une visite de remercîments. Où demeurez-vous?

— Dans ce cabriolet, dit Marius.

— Signe d’opulence, repartit Laigle avec calme. Je vous félicite. Vous avez là un loyer de neuf mille francs par an.

En ce moment Courfeyrac sortait du café.

Marius sourit tristement:

— Je suis dans ce loyer depuis deux heures et j’aspire à en sortir; mais c’est une histoire comme cela, je ne sais où aller.

— Monsieur, dit Courfeyrac, venez chez moi.

— J’aurais la priorité, observa Laigle, mais je n’ai pas de chez moi.

— Tais-toi, Bossuet, reprit Courfeyrac.

— Bossuet, fit Marius, mais il me semblait que vous vous appeliez Laigle.

— De Meaux, répondit Laigle; par métaphore, Bossuet.

Courfeyrac monta dans le cabriolet.

— Cocher, dit-il, hôtel de la Porte-Saint-Jacques.

Et le soir même, Marius était installé dans une chambre de l’hôtel de la Porte-Saint-Jacques, côte à côte avec Courfeyrac.

Chapitre III

Les étonnements de Marius

En quelques jours, Marius fut l'ami de Courfeyrac. La jeunesse est la saison des promptes soudures et des cicatrisations rapides. Marius près de Courfeyrac respirait librement, chose assez nouvelle pour lui. Courfeyrac ne lui fit pas de questions. Il n'y songea même pas. À cet âge, les visages disent tout de suite tout. La parole est inutile. Il y a tel jeune homme dont on pourrait dire que sa physionomie bavarde. On se regarde, on se connaît.

Un matin pourtant, Courfeyrac lui jeta brusquement cette interrogation:

— À propos, avez-vous une opinion politique?

— Tiens! dit Marius, presque offensé de la question.

— Qu'est-ce que vous êtes?

— Démocrate-bonapartiste.

— Nuance gris de souris rassurée, dit Courfeyrac.

Le lendemain, Courfeyrac introduisit Marius au café Musain. Puis il lui chuchota à l'oreille avec un sourire: Il faut que je vous donne vos entrées dans la révolution. Et il le mena dans la salle des Amis de l'A B C. Il le présenta aux autres camarades en disant à demi-voix ce simple moi que Marius ne comprit pas: Un élève.

Marius était tombé dans un guêpier d'esprits. Du reste, quoique silencieux et grave, il n'était ni le moins ailé ni le moins armé.

Marius, jusque-là solitaire et inclinant au monologue et à l'aparté par habitude et par goût, fut un peu effarouché de cette volée de jeunes gens autour de lui. Toutes ces initiatives diverses le sollicitaient à la fois, et le tiraillaient. Le va-et-vient tumultueux de tous ces esprits en liberté et en travail faisait tourbillonner ses idées. Quelquefois, dans le trouble, elles s'en allaient si loin de lui qu'il avait de la peine à les retrouver. Il entendait parler de philosophie, de littérature, d'art, d'histoire, de religion, d'une façon inattendue. Il entrevoyait des aspects étranges; et comme il ne les mettait point en perspective, il n'était pas sûr de ne pas voir le chaos. En quittant les opinions de son grand-père pour les opinions de son père, il s'était cru fixé; il soupçonnait maintenant, avec inquiétude et sans oser se l'avouer, qu'il ne l'était pas. L'angle sous lequel il voyait toute chose commençait de nouveau à se déplacer. Une certaine oscillation mettait en branle tous les horizons de son cerveau. Bizarre remue-ménage intérieur. Il en souffrait presque.

Il semblait qu’il n’y eût pas pour ces jeunes gens de «choses consacrées». Marius entendait, sur toute matière, des langages singuliers, gênants pour son esprit encore timide.

Une affiche de théâtre se présentait, ornée d’un titre de tragédie du vieux répertoire, dit classique. — À bas la tragédie chère aux bourgeois! criait Bahorel. Et Marius entendait Combeferre répliquer:

— Tu as tort, Bahorel. La bourgeoisie aime la tragédie, et il faut laisser sur ce point la bourgeoisie tranquille. La tragédie à perruque a sa raison d’être, et je ne suis pas de ceux qui, de par Eschyle, lui contestent le droit d’exister. Il y a des ébauches dans la nature; il y a, dans la création, des parodies toutes faites; un bec qui n’est pas un bec, des ailes qui ne sont pas des ailes, des nageoires qui ne sont pas des nageoires, des pattes qui ne sont pas des pattes, un cri douloureux qui donne envie de rire, voilà le canard. Or, puisque la volaille existe à côté de l’oiseau, je ne vois pas pourquoi la tragédie classique n’existerait point en face de la tragédie antique.

Ou bien le hasard faisait que Marius passait rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau entre Enjolras et Courfeyrac.

Courfeyrac lui prenait le bras.

— Faites attention. Ceci est la rue Plâtrière, nommée aujourd’hui rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, à cause d’un ménage singulier qui l’habitait il y a une soixantaine d’années. C’étaient Jean-Jacques et Thérèse. De temps en temps, il naissait là de petits êtres. Thérèse les enfantait, Jean-Jacques les enfantrouvait.

Et Enjolras rudoyait Courfeyrac.

— Silence devant Jean-Jacques! Cet homme, je l’admire. Il a renié ses enfants, soit; mais il a adopté le peuple.

Aucun de ces jeunes gens n’articulait ce mot: l’empereur. Jean Prouvaire seul disait quelquefois Napoléon; tous les autres disaient Bonaparte. Enjolras prononçait Buonaparte. Marius s’étonnait vaguement. Initium sapientiæ.

Chapitre IV

L’arrière-salle du café Musain

Une des conversations entre ces jeunes gens, auxquelles Marius assistait et dans lesquelles il intervenait quelquefois, fut une véritable secousse pour son esprit.

Cela se passait dans l’arrière-salle du café Musain. À peu près tous les Amis de l’A B C étaient réunis ce soir-là. Le quinquet était solennellement allumé. On parlait de choses et d’autres, sans passion et avec bruit. Excepté Enjolras et Marius, qui se taisaient, chacun haranguait un peu au hasard. Les causeries entre camarades ont parfois de ces tumultes paisibles. C’était un jeu et un pêle-mêle autant qu’une conversation. On se jetait des mots qu’on rattrapait. On causait aux quatre coins.

Aucune femme n’était admise dans cette arrière-salle, excepté Louison, la laveuse de vaisselle du café, qui la traversait de temps en temps pour aller de la laverie au «laboratoire».

Grantaire, parfaitement gris, assourdissait le coin dont il s’était emparé. Il raisonnait et déraisonnait à tue-tête, il criait:

— J’ai soif. Mortels, je fais un rêve: que la tonne de Heidelberg ait une attaque d’apoplexie, et être de la douzaine de sangsues qu’on lui appliquera. Je voudrais boire. Je désire oublier la vie. La vie est une invention hideuse de je ne sais qui. Cela ne dure rien et cela ne vaut rien. On se casse le cou à vivre. La vie est un décor où il y a peu de praticables. Le bonheur est un vieux châssis peint d’un seul côté. L’Ecclésiaste dit: tout est vanité; je pense comme ce bonhomme qui n’a peut-être jamais existé. Zéro, ne voulant pas aller tout nu, s’est vêtu de vanité. Ô vanité! rhabillage de tout avec de grands mots! une cuisine est un laboratoire, un danseur est un professeur, un saltimbanque est un gymnaste, un boxeur est un pugiliste, un apothicaire est un chimiste, un perruquier est un artiste, un gâcheux est un architecte, un jockey est un sportsman, un cloporte est un ptérygibranche. La vanité a un envers et un endroit; l’endroit est bête, c’est le nègre avec ses verroteries; l’envers est sot, c’est le philosophe avec ses guenilles. Je pleure sur l’un et je ris de l’autre. Ce qu’on appelle honneurs et dignités, et même honneur et dignité, est généralement en chrysocale. Les rois font joujou avec l’orgueil humain. Caligula faisait consul un cheval; Charles II faisait chevalier un aloyau. Drapez-vous donc maintenant entre le consul Incitatus et le baronnet Roastbeef. Quant à la valeur intrinsèque des gens, elle n'est guère plus respectable. Écoutez le panégyrique que le voisin fait du voisin. Blanc sur blanc est féroce; si le lys parlait, comme il arrangerait la colombe! une bigote qui jase d'une dévote est plus venimeuse que l'aspic et le bongare bleu. C'est dommage que je sois un ignorant, car je vous citerais une foule de choses; mais je ne sais rien. Par exemple, j'ai toujours eu de l'esprit; quand j'étais élève chez Gros, au lieu de barbouiller des tableautins, je passais mon temps à chiper des pommes; rapin est le mâle de rapine. Voilà pour moi; quant à vous autres, vous me valez. Je me fiche de vos perfections, excellences et qualités. Toute qualité verse dans un défaut; l'économe touche à l'avare, le généreux confine au prodigue, le brave côtoie le bravache; qui dit très pieux dit un peu cagot; il y a juste autant de vices dans la vertu qu'il y a de trous au manteau de Diogène. Qui admirez-vous, le tué ou le tueur, César ou Brutus? Généralement on est pour le tueur. Vive Brutus! il a tué. C'est ça qui est la vertu. Vertu, soit, mais folie aussi. Il y a des taches bizarres à ces grands hommes-là. Le Brutus qui tua César était amoureux d'une statue de petit garçon. Cette statue était du statuaire grec Strongylion, lequel avait aussi sculpté cette figure d'amazone appelée Belle-Jambe, Eucnemos, que Néron emportait avec lui dans ses voyages. Ce Strongylion n'a laissé que deux statues qui ont mis d'accord Brutus et Néron; Brutus fut amoureux de l'une et Néron de l'autre. Toute l'histoire n'est qu'un long rabâchage. Un siècle est le plagiaire de l'autre. La bataille de Marengo copie la bataille de Pydna; le Tolbiac de Clovis et l'Austerlitz de Napoléon se ressemblent comme deux gouttes de sang. Je fais peu de cas de la victoire. Rien n'est stupide comme vaincre; la vraie gloire est convaincre. Mais tâchez donc de prouver quelque chose! Vous vous contentez de réussir, quelle médiocrité! et de conquérir, quelle misère! Hélas, vanité et lâcheté partout. Tout obéit au succès, même la grammaire. Si volet usus, dit Horace. Donc, je dédaigne le genre humain. Descendrons-nous du tout à la partie? Voulez-vous que je me mette à admirer les peuples? Quel peuple, s'il vous plaît? Est-ce la Grèce? Les Athéniens, ces Parisiens de jadis, tuaient Phocion, comme qui dirait Coligny, et flagornaient les tyrans au point qu'Anacéphore disait de Pisistrate: Son urine attire les abeilles. L'homme le plus considérable de la Grèce pendant cinquante ans a été ce grammairien Philetas, lequel était si petit et si menu qu'il était obligé de plomber ses souliers pour n'être pas emporté par le vent. Il y avait sur la plus grande place de Corinthe une statue sculptée par Silanion et cataloguée par Pline; cette statue représentait Épisthate. Qu'a fait Épisthate? il a inventé le croc-en-jambe. Ceci résume la Grèce et la gloire. Passons à d'autres. Admirerai-je l'Angleterre? Admirerai-je la France? La France? pourquoi? À cause de Paris? je viens de vous dire mon opinion sur Athènes. L'Angleterre? pourquoi? À cause de Londres? je hais Carthage. Et puis, Londres, métropole du luxe, est le chef-lieu de la misère. Sur la seule paroisse de Charing-Cross, il y a par an cent morts de faim. Telle est Albion. J'ajoute, pour comble, que j'ai vu une Anglaise danser avec une couronne de roses et des lunettes bleues. Donc un groing pour l'Angleterre! Si je n'admire pas John Bull, j'admirerai donc frère Jonathan? Je goûte peu ce frère à esclaves. Ôtez time is money, que reste-t-il de l'Angleterre? Ôtez cotton is king, que reste-t-il de l'Amérique? L'Allemagne, c'est la lymphe; l'Italie, c'est la bile. Nous extasierons-nous sur la Russie? Voltaire l'admirait. Il admirait aussi la Chine. Je conviens que la Russie a ses beautés, entre autres un fort despotisme; mais je plains les despotes. Ils ont une santé délicate. Un Alexis décapité, un Pierre poignardé, un Paul étranglé, un autre Paul aplati à coups de talon de botte, divers Ivans égorgés, plusieurs Nicolas et Basiles empoisonnés, tout cela indique que le palais des empereurs de Russie est dans une condition flagrante d'insalubrité. Tous les peuples civilisés offrent à l'admiration du penseur ce détail: la guerre; or la guerre, la guerre civilisée, épuise et totalise toutes les formes du banditisme, depuis le brigandage des trabucaires aux gorges du mont Jaxa jusqu'à la maraude des Indiens Comanches dans la Passe-Douteuse. Bah! me direz-vous, l'Europe vaut pourtant mieux que l'Asie? Je conviens que l'Asie est farce; mais je ne vois pas trop ce que vous avez à rire du grand lama, vous peuples d'occident qui avez mêlé à vos modes et à vos élégances toutes les ordures compliquées de majesté, depuis la chemise sale de la reine Isabelle jusqu'à la chaise percée du dauphin. Messieurs les humains, je vous dis bernique! C'est à Bruxelles que l'on consomme le plus de bière, à Stockholm le plus d'eau-de-vie, à Madrid le plus de chocolat, à Amsterdam le plus de genièvre, à Londres le plus de vin, à Constantinople le plus de café, à Paris le plus d'absinthe; voilà toutes les notions utiles. Paris l'emporte, en somme. À Paris, les chiffonniers mêmes sont des sybarites; Diogène eût autant aimé être chiffonnier place Maubert que philosophe au Pirée. Apprenez encore ceci: les cabarets des chiffonniers s'appellent bibines; les plus célèbres sont la

Casserole et l’Abattoir. Donc, ô guinguettes, goguettes, bouchons, caboulots, bouibouis, mastroquets, bastringues, manezingues, bibines des chiffonniers, caravansérails des califes, je vous atteste, je suis un voluptueux, je mange chez Richard à quarante sous par tête, il me faut des tapis de Perse à y rouler Cléopâtre nue! Où est Cléopâtre? Ah! c’est toi, Louison. Bonjour.

Ainsi se répandait en paroles, accrochant la laveuse de vaisselle au passage, dans son coin de l’arrière-salle Musain, Grantaire plus qu’ivre.

Bossuet, étendant la main vers lui, essayait de lui imposer silence, et Grantaire repartait de plus belle:

— Aigle de Meaux, à bas les pattes. Tu ne me fais aucun effet avec ton geste d’Hippocrate refusant le bric-à-brac d’Artaxerce. Je te dispense de me calmer. D’ailleurs je suis triste. Que voulez-vous que je vous dise? L’homme est mauvais, l’homme est difforme. Le papillon est réussi, l’homme est raté. Dieu a manqué cet animal-là. Une foule est un choix de laideurs. Le premier venu est un misérable. Femme rime à infâme. Oui, j’ai le spleen, compliqué de la mélancolie, avec la nostalgie, plus l’hypocondrie, et je bisque, et je rage, et je bâille, et je m’ennuie, et je m’assomme, et je m’embête! Que Dieu aille au diable!

— Silence donc, R majuscule! reprit Bossuet qui discutait un point de droit avec la cantonade, et qui était engagé plus qu’à mi-corps dans une phrase d’argot judiciaire dont voici la fin:

— ...Et quant à moi, quoique je sois à peine légiste et tout au plus procureur amateur, je soutiens ceci: qu’aux termes de la coutume de Normandie, à la Saint-Michel, et pour chaque année, un Équivalent devait être payé au profit du seigneur, sauf autrui droit, par tous et un chacun, tant les propriétaires que les saisis d’héritage, et ce, pour toutes emphytéoses, baux, alleux, contrats domaniaires et domaniaux, hypothécaires et hypothécaux....

— Échos, nymphes plaintives, fredonna Grantaire.

Tout près de Grantaire, sur une table presque silencieuse, une feuille de papier, un encrier et une plume entre deux petits verres annonçaient qu’un vaudeville s’ébauchait. Cette grosse affaire se traitait à voix basse, et les deux têtes en travail se touchaient:

— Commençons par trouver les noms. Quand on a les noms, on trouve le sujet.

— C’est juste. Dicte. J’écris.

— Monsieur Dorimon?

— Rentier?

— Sans doute.

— Sa fille, Célestine.

— ... tine. Après?

— Le colonel Sainval.

— Sainval est usé. Je dirais Valsin.

À côté des aspirants vaudevillistes, un autre groupe, qui, lui aussi, profitait du brouhaha pour parler bas, discutait un duel. Un vieux, trente ans, conseillait un jeune, dix-huit ans, et lui expliquait à quel adversaire il avait affaire:

— Diable! méfiez-vous. C’est une belle épée. Son jeu est net. Il a de l’attaque, pas de feintes perdues, du poignet, du pétillement, de l’éclair, la parade juste, et des ripostes mathématiques, bigre! et il est gaucher.

Dans l’angle opposé à Grantaire, Joly et Bahorel jouaient aux dominos et parlaient d’amour.

— Tu es heureux, toi, disait Joly. Tu as une maîtresse qui rit toujours.

— C’est une faute qu’elle fait, répondait Bahorel. La maîtresse qu’on a tort de rire. Ça encourage à la tromper. La voir gaie, cela vous ôte le remords; si on la voit triste, on se fait conscience.

— Ingrat! c’est si bon une femme qui rit! Et jamais vous ne vous querellez!

— Cela tient au traité que nous avons fait. En faisant notre petite sainte-alliance, nous nous sommes assigné à chacun notre frontière que nous ne dépassons jamais. Ce qui est situé du côté de bise appartient à Vaud, du côté de vent à Gex. De là la paix.

— La paix, c’est le bonheur digérant.

— Et toi, Jolllly, où en es-tu avec ta brouillerie avec mamselle... tu sais qui je veux dire?

— Elle me boude avec une patience cruelle.

— Tu es pourtant un amoureux attendrissant de maigreur.

— Hélas!

— À ta place, je la planterais là.

— C’est facile à dire.

— Et à faire. N’est-ce pas Musichetta qu’elle s’appelle?

— Oui. Ah! mon pauvre Bahorel, c’est une fille superbe, très littéraire, de petits pieds, de petites mains, se mettant bien, blanche, potelée, avec des yeux de tireuse de cartes. J’en suis fou.

— Mon cher, alors il faut lui plaire, être élégant, et faire des effets de rotule. Achète-moi chez Staub un bon pantalon de cuir de laine. Cela prête.

— À combien? cria Grantaire.

Le troisième coin était en proie à une discussion poétique. La mythologie païenne se gourmait avec la mythologie chrétienne. Il s’agissait de l’Olympe dont Jean Prouvaire, par romantisme même, prenait le parti. Jean Prouvaire n’était timide qu’au repos. Une fois excité, il éclatait, une sorte de gaîté accentuait son enthousiasme, et il était à la fois riant et lyrique:

— N’insultons pas les dieux, disait-il. Les dieux ne s’en sont peut-être pas allés. Jupiter ne me fait point l’effet d’un mort. Les dieux sont des songes, dites-vous. Eh bien, même dans la nature, telle qu’elle est aujourd’hui, après la fuite de ces songes, on retrouve tous les grands vieux mythes païens. Telle montagne à profil de citadelle, comme le Vignemale, par exemple, est encore pour moi la coiffure de Cybèle; il ne m’est pas prouvé que Pan ne vienne pas la nuit souffler dans le tronc creux des saules, en bouchant tour à tour les trous avec ses doigts; et j’ai toujours cru qu’Io était pour quelque chose dans la cascade de Pissevache.

Dans le dernier coin, on parlait politique. On malmenait la charte octroyée. Combeferre la soutenait mollement, Courfeyrac la battait en brèche énergiquement. Il y avait sur la table un malencontreux exemplaire de la fameuse Charte-Touquet. Courfeyrac l’avait saisie et la secouait, mêlant à ses arguments le frémissement de cette feuille de papier.

— Premièrement, je ne veux pas de rois. Ne fût-ce qu’au point de vue économique, je n’en veux pas; un roi est un parasite. On n’a pas de roi gratis. Écoutez ceci: Cherté des rois. À la mort de François Ier, la dette publique en France était de trente mille livres de rente; à la mort de Louis XIV, elle était de deux milliards six cents millions à vingt-huit livres le marc, ce qui équivalait en 1760, au dire de Desmarets, à quatre milliards cinq cents millions, et ce qui équivaudrait aujourd’hui à douze milliards. Deuxièmement, n’en déplaise à Combeferre, une charte octroyée est un mauvais expédient de civilisation. Sauver la transition, adoucir le passage, amortir la secousse, faire passer insensiblement la nation de la monarchie à la démocratie par la pratique des fictions constitutionnelles, détestables raisons que tout cela! Non! non! n’éclairons jamais le peuple à faux jour. Les principes s’étiolent et pâlissent dans votre cave constitutionnelle. Pas d’abâtardissement. Pas de compromis. Pas d’octroi du roi au peuple. Dans tous ces octrois-là, il y a un article 14. À côté de la main qui donne, il y a la griffe qui reprend. Je refuse net votre charte. Une charte est un masque; le mensonge est dessous. Un peuple qui accepte une charte abdique. Le droit n'est le droit qu'entier. Non! pas de charte!

On était en hiver; deux bûches pétillaient dans la cheminée. Cela était tentant, et Courfeyrac n'y résista pas. Il froissa dans son poing la pauvre Charte-Touquet, et la jeta au feu. Le papier flamba. Combeferre regarda philosophiquement brûler le chef-d'œuvre de Louis XVIII, et se contenta de dire:

— La charte métamorphosée en flamme.

Et les sarcasmes, les saillies, les quolibets, cette chose française qu'on appelle l'entrain, cette chose anglaise qu'on appelle l'humour, le bon et le mauvais goût, les bonnes et les mauvaises raisons, toutes les folles fusées du dialogue, montant à la fois et se croisant de tous les points de la salle, faisaient au-dessus des têtes une sorte de bombardement joyeux.

Chapitre V

Élargissement de l’horizon

Les chocs des jeunes esprits entre eux ont cela d’admirable qu’on ne peut jamais prévoir l’étincelle ni deviner l’éclair. Que va-t-il jaillir tout à l’heure? on l’ignore. L’éclat de rire part de l’attendrissement. Au moment bouffon, le sérieux fait son entrée. Les impulsions dépendent du premier mot venu. La verve de chacun est souveraine. Un lazzi suffit pour ouvrir le champ à l’inattendu. Ce sont des entretiens à brusques tournants où la perspective change tout à coup. Le hasard est le machiniste de ces conversations-là.

Une pensée sévère, bizarrement sortie d’un cliquetis de mots, traversa tout à coup la mêlée de paroles où ferraillaient confusément Grantaire, Bahorel, Prouvaire, Bossuet, Combeferre et Courfeyrac.

Comment une phrase survient-elle dans le dialogue? d’où vient qu’elle se souligne tout à coup d’elle-même dans l’attention de ceux qui l’entendent? Nous venons de le dire, nul n’en sait rien. Au milieu du brouhaha, Bossuet termina tout à coup une apostrophe quelconque à Combeferre par cette date.

— 18 juin 1815: Waterloo.

À ce nom, Waterloo, Marius, accoudé près d’un verre d’eau sur une table, ôta son poignet de dessous son menton, et commença à regarder fixement l’auditoire.

— Pardieu, s’écria Courfeyrac (Parbleu, à cette époque, tombait en désuétude), ce chiffre 18 est étrange, et me frappe. C’est le nombre fatal de Bonaparte. Mettez Louis devant et Brumaire derrière, vous avez toute la destinée de l’homme, avec cette particularité expressive que le commencement y est talonné par la fin.

Enjolras, jusque-là muet, rompit le silence, et adressa à Courfeyrac cette parole:

— Tu veux dire le crime par l’expiation.

Ce mot, crime, dépassait la mesure de ce que pouvait accepter Marius, déjà très ému par la brusque évocation de Waterloo.

Il se leva, il marcha lentement vers la carte de France étalée sur le mur et au bas de laquelle on voyait une île dans un compartiment séparé, il posa son doigt sur ce compartiment, et dit:

— La Corse. Une petite île qui a fait la France bien grande.

Ce fut le souffle d’air glacé. Tous s’interrompirent. On sentit que quelque chose allait commencer.

Bahorel, ripostant à Bossuet, était en train de prendre une pose de torse à laquelle il tenait. Il y renonça pour écouter.

Enjolras, dont l’œil bleu n’était attaché sur personne et semblait considérer le vide, répondit sans regarder Marius:

— La France n’a besoin d’aucune Corse pour être grande. La France est grande parce qu’elle est la France. Quia nominor leo.

Marius n’éprouva nulle velléité de reculer; il se tourna vers Enjolras, et sa voix éclata avec une vibration qui venait du tressaillement des entrailles:

— À Dieu ne plaise que je diminue la France! mais ce n’est point la diminuer que de lui amalgamer Napoléon. Ah çà, parlons donc. Je suis nouveau venu parmi vous, mais je vous avoue que vous m’étonnez. Où en sommes-nous? qui sommes-nous? qui êtes-vous? qui suis-je? Expliquons-nous sur l’empereur. Je vous entends dire Buonaparte en accentuant l’u comme des royalistes. Je vous préviens que mon grand-père fait mieux encore; il dit Buonaparté. Je vous croyais des jeunes gens. Où mettez-vous donc votre enthousiasme? et qu’est-ce que vous en faites? qui admirez-vous si vous n’admirez pas l’empereur? et que vous faut-il de plus?

Si vous ne voulez pas de ce grand homme-là, de quels grands hommes voudrez-vous? Il avait tout. Il était complet. Il avait dans son cerveau le cube des facultés humaines. Il faisait des codes comme Justinien, il dictait comme César, sa causerie mêlait l’éclair de Pascal au coup de foudre de Tacite, il faisait l’histoire et il l’écrivait, ses bulletins sont des Iliades, il combinait le chiffre de Newton avec la métaphore de Mahomet, il laissait derrière lui dans l’orient des paroles grandes comme les pyramides; à Tilsitt il enseignait la majesté aux empereurs, à l’académie des sciences il donnait la réplique à Laplace, au conseil d’état il tenait tête à Merlin, il donnait une âme à la géométrie des uns et à la chicane des autres, il était légiste avec les procureurs et sidéral avec les astronomes; comme Cromwell soufflant une chandelle sur deux, il s’en allait au Temple marchander un gland de rideau; il voyait tout, il savait tout; ce qui ne l’empêchait pas de rire d’un rire bonhomme au berceau de son petit enfant; et tout à coup, l’Europe effarée écoutait, des armées se mettaient en marche, des parcs d’artillerie roulaient, des ponts de bateaux s’allongeaient sur les fleuves, les nuées de la cavalerie galopaient dans l'ouragan, cris, trompettes, tremblement de trônes partout, les frontières des royaumes oscillaient sur la carte, on entendait le bruit d'un glaive surhumain qui sortait du fourreau, on le voyait, lui, se dresser debout sur l'horizon avec un flamboiement dans la main et un resplendissement dans les yeux, déployant dans le tonnerre ses deux ailes, la grande Armée et la vieille garde, et c'était l'archange de la guerre!

Tous se taisaient, et Enjolras baissait la tête. Le silence fait toujours un peu l'effet de l'acquiescement ou d'une sorte de mise au pied du mur. Marius, presque sans reprendre haleine, continua avec un surcroît d'enthousiasme:

— Soyons justes, mes amis! être l'empire d'un tel empereur, quelle splendide destinée pour un peuple, lorsque ce peuple est la France et qu'il ajoute son génie au génie de cet homme! Apparaître et régner, marcher et triompher, avoir pour étapes toutes les capitales, prendre ses grenadiers et en faire des rois, décréter des chutes de dynastie, transfigurer l'Europe au pas de charge, qu'on sente, quand vous menacez, que vous mettez la main sur le pommeau de l'épée de Dieu, suivre dans un seul homme Annibal, César et Charlemagne, être le peuple de quelqu'un qui mêle à toutes vos aubes l'annonce éclatante d'une bataille gagnée, avoir pour réveille-matin le canon des Invalides, jeter dans des abîmes de lumière des mots prodigieux qui flamboient à jamais, Marengo, Arcole, Austerlitz, Iéna, Wagram! faire à chaque instant éclore au zénith des siècles des constellations de victoires, donner l'empire français pour pendant à l'empire romain, être la grande nation et enfanter la grande Armée, faire envoler par toute la terre ses légions comme une montagne envoie de tous côtés ses aigles, vaincre, dominer, foudroyer, être en Europe une sorte de peuple doré à force de gloire, sonner à travers l'histoire une fanfare de titans, conquérir le monde deux fois, par la conquête et par l'éblouissement, cela est sublime; et qu'y a-t-il de plus grand?

— Être libre, dit Combeferre.

Marius à son tour baissa la tête. Ce mot simple et froid avait traversé comme une lame d'acier son effusion épique, et il la sentait s'évanouir en lui. Lorsqu'il leva les yeux, Combeferre n'était plus là. Satisfait probablement de sa réplique à l'apothéose, il venait de partir, et tous, excepté Enjolras, l'avaient suivi. La salle s'était vidée. Enjolras, resté seul avec Marius, le regardait gravement. Marius cependant, ayant un peu rallié ses idées, ne se tenait pas pour battu; il y avait en lui un reste de bouillonnement qui allait sans doute se traduire en syllogismes déployés contre Enjolras, quand tout à coup on entendit quelqu'un qui chantait dans l'escalier en s'en allant. C'était Combeferre, et voici ce qu'il chantait:

Si César m'avait donné
La gloire et la guerre,
Et qu'il me fallût quitter
L'amour de ma mère
Je dirais au grand César:
Reprends ton sceptre et ton char,
J'aime mieux ma mère, ô gué!
J'aime mieux ma mère.

L'accent tendre et farouche dont Combeferre le chantait donnait à ce couplet une sorte de grandeur étrange. Marius, pensif et l'œil au plafond, répéta presque machinalement: Ma mère?...

En ce moment, il sentit sur son épaule la main d'Enjolras.

— Citoyen, lui dit Enjolras, ma mère, c'est la République.

Chapitre VI

Res angusta

Cette soirée laissa à Marius un ébranlement profond, et une obscurité triste dans l’âme. Il éprouva ce qu’éprouve peut-être la terre au moment où on l’ouvre avec le fer pour y déposer le grain de blé; elle ne sent que la blessure; le tressaillement du germe et la joie du fruit n’arrivent que plus tard.

Marius fut sombre. Il venait à peine de se faire une foi; fallait-il donc déjà la rejeter? il s’affirma à lui-même que non. Il se déclara qu’il ne voulait pas douter, et il commença à douter malgré lui. Être entre deux religions, l’une dont on n’est pas encore sorti, l’autre où l’on n’est pas encore entré, cela est insupportable; et ces crépuscules ne plaisent qu’aux âmes chauves-souris. Marius était une prunelle franche, et il lui fallait de la vraie lumière. Les demi-jours du doute lui faisaient mal. Quel que fût son désir de rester où il était et de s’en tenir là, il était invinciblement contraint de continuer, d’avancer, d’examiner, de penser, de marcher plus loin. Où cela allait-il le conduire? il craignait, après avoir fait tant de pas qui l’avaient rapproché de son père, de faire maintenant des pas qui l’en éloigneraient. Son malaise croissait de toutes les réflexions qui lui venaient. L’escarpement se dessinait autour de lui. Il n’était d’accord ni avec son grand-père, ni avec ses amis; téméraire pour l’un, arriéré pour les autres; et il se reconnut doublement isolé, du côté de la vieillesse, et du côté de la jeunesse. Il cessa d’aller au café Musain.

Dans ce trouble où était sa conscience, il ne songeait plus guère à de certains côtés sérieux de l’existence. Les réalités de la vie ne se laissent pas oublier. Elles vinrent brusquement lui donner leur coup de coude.

Un matin, le maître de l’hôtel entra dans la chambre de Marius et lui dit:

— Monsieur Courfeyrac a répondu pour vous.

— Oui.

— Mais il me faudrait de l’argent.

— Priez Courfeyrac de venir me parler, dit Marius.

Courfeyrac venu, l’hôte les quitta. Marius lui conta ce qu’il n’avait pas songé à lui dire encore, qu’il était comme seul au monde et n’ayant pas de parents.

— Qu’allez-vous devenir? dit Courfeyrac.

— Je n’en sais rien, répondit Marius.

— Qu’allez-vous faire?

— Je n’en sais rien.

— Avez-vous de l’argent?

— Quinze francs.

— Voulez-vous que je vous en prête?

— Jamais.

— Avez-vous des habits?

— Voilà.

— Avez-vous des bijoux?

— Une montre.

— D’argent?

— D’or. La voici.

— Je sais un marchand d’habits qui vous prendra votre redingote et un pantalon.

— C’est bien.

— Vous n’aurez plus qu’un pantalon, un gilet, un chapeau et un habit.

— Et mes bottes.

— Quoi! vous n’irez pas pieds nus? quelle opulence!

— Ce sera assez.

— Je sais un horloger qui vous achètera votre montre.

— C’est bon.

— Non, ce n’est pas bon. Que ferez-vous après?

— Tout ce qu’il faudra. Tout l’honnête du moins.

— Savez-vous l’anglais?

— Non.

— Savez-vous l’allemand?

— Non.

— Tant pis.

— Pourquoi?

— C’est qu’un de mes amis, libraire, fait une façon d’encyclopédie pour laquelle vous auriez pu traduire des articles allemands ou anglais. C’est mal payé, mais on vit.

— J’apprendrai l’anglais et l’allemand.

— Et en attendant?

— En attendant je mangerai mes habits et ma montre.

On fit venir le marchand d’habits. Il acheta la défroque vingt francs. On alla chez l’horloger. Il acheta la montre quarante-cinq francs.

— Ce n’est pas mal, disait Marius à Courfeyrac en rentrant à l’hôtel, avec mes quinze francs, cela fait quatre-vingts francs.

— Et la note de l’hôtel? observa Courfeyrac.

— Tiens, j’oubliais, dit Marius.

L’hôte présenta sa note qu’il fallut payer sur-le-champ. Elle se montait à soixante-dix francs.

— Il me reste dix francs, dit Marius.

— Diable, fit Courfeyrac, vous mangerez cinq francs pendant que vous apprendrez l’anglais, et cinq francs pendant que vous apprendrez l’allemand. Ce sera avaler une langue bien vite ou une pièce de cent sous bien lentement.

Cependant la tante Gillenormand, assez bonne personne au fond dans les occasions tristes, avait fini par déterrer le logis de Marius. Un matin, comme Marius revenait de l’école, il trouva une lettre de sa tante et les soixante pistoles, c’est-à-dire six cents francs en or dans une boîte cachetée.

Marius renvoya les trente louis à sa tante avec une lettre respectueuse où il déclarait avoir des moyens d’existence et pouvoir suffire désormais à tous ses besoins. En ce moment-là il lui restait trois francs.

La tante n’informa point le grand-père de ce refus de peur d’achever de l’exaspérer. D’ailleurs n’avait-il pas dit: Qu’on ne me parle jamais de ce buveur de sang!

Marius sortit de l’hôtel de la porte Saint-Jacques, ne voulant pas s’y endetter.

Livre cinquième — Excellence du malheur

Chapitre I

Marius indigent

La vie devint sévère pour Marius. Manger ses habits et sa montre, ce n'était rien. Il mangea de cette chose inexprimable qu'on appelle de la vache enragée. Chose horrible, qui contient les jours sans pain, les nuits sans sommeil, les soirs sans chandelle, l'âtre sans feu, les semaines sans travail, l'avenir sans espérance, l'habit percé au coude, le vieux chapeau qui fait rire les jeunes filles, la porte qu'on trouve fermée le soir parce qu'on ne paye pas son loyer, l'insolence du portier et du gargotier, les ricanements des voisins, les humiliations, la dignité refoulée, les besognes quelconques acceptées, les dégoûts, l'amertume, l'accablement. Marius apprit comment on dévore tout cela, et comment ce sont souvent les seules choses qu'on ait à dévorer. À ce moment de l'existence où l'homme a besoin d'orgueil parce qu'il a besoin d'amour, il se sentit moqué parce qu'il était mal vêtu, et ridicule parce qu'il était pauvre. À l'âge où la jeunesse vous gonfle le cœur d'une fierté impériale, il abaissa plus d'une fois ses yeux sur ses bottes trouées, et il connut les hontes injustes et les rougeurs poignantes de la misère. Admirable et terrible épreuve dont les faibles sortent infâmes, dont les forts sortent sublimes. Creuset où la destinée jette un homme, toutes les fois qu'elle veut avoir un gredin ou un demi-dieu.

Car il se fait beaucoup de grandes actions dans les petites luttes. Il y a des bravoures opiniâtres et ignorées qui se défendent pied à pied dans l'ombre contre l'envahissement fatal des nécessités et des turpitudes. Nobles et mystérieux triomphes qu'aucun regard ne voit, qu'aucune renommée ne paye, qu'aucune fanfare ne salue. La vie, le malheur, l'isolement, l'abandon, la pauvreté, sont des champs de bataille qui ont leurs héros; héros obscurs plus grands parfois que les héros illustres.

De fermes et rares natures sont ainsi créées; la misère, presque toujours marâtre, est quelquefois mère; le dénûment enfante la puissance d'âme et d'esprit; la détresse est nourrice de la fierté; le malheur est un bon lait pour les magnanimes.

Il y eut un moment dans la vie de Marius où il balayait son palier, où il achetait un sou de fromage de Brie chez la fruitière, où il attendait que la brune tombât pour s'introduire chez le boulanger, et y acheter un pain qu'il emportait furtivement dans son grenier, comme s'il l'eût volé. Quelquefois on voyait se glisser dans la boucherie du coin, au milieu des cuisinières goguenardes qui le coudoyaient, un jeune homme gauche portant des livres sous son bras, qui avait l'air timide et furieux, qui en entrant ôtait son chapeau de son front où perlait la sueur, faisait un profond salut à la bouchère étonnée, un autre salut au garçon boucher, demandait une côtelette de mouton, la payait six ou sept sous, l'enveloppait de papier, la mettait sous son bras entre deux livres, et s'en allait. C'était Marius. Avec cette côtelette, qu'il faisait cuire lui-même, il vivait trois jours.

Le premier jour il mangeait la viande, le second jour il mangeait la graisse, le troisième jour il rongeait l'os.

À plusieurs reprises la tante Gillenormand fit des tentatives, et lui adressa les soixante pistoles. Marius les renvoya constamment, en disant qu'il n'avait besoin de rien.

Il était encore en deuil de son père quand la révolution que nous avons racontée s'était faite en lui. Depuis lors, il n'avait plus quitté les vêtements noirs. Cependant ses vêtements le quittèrent. Un jour vint où il n'eut plus d'habit. Le pantalon allait encore. Que faire? Courfeyrac, auquel il avait de son côté rendu quelques bons offices, lui donna un vieil habit. Pour trente sous, Marius le fit retourner par un portier quelconque, et ce fut un habit neuf. Mais cet habit était vert. Alors Marius ne sortit plus qu'après la chute du jour. Cela faisait que son habit était noir. Voulant toujours être en deuil, il se vêtissait de la nuit.

À travers tout cela, il se fit recevoir avocat. Il était censé habiter la chambre de Courfeyrac, qui était décente et où un certain nombre de bouquins de droit soutenus et complétés par des volumes de romans dépareillés figuraient la bibliothèque voulue par les règlements. Il se faisait adresser ses lettres chez Courfeyrac.

Quand Marius fut avocat, il en informa son grand-père par une lettre froide, mais pleine de soumission et de respect. M. Gillenormand prit la lettre avec un tremblement, la lut, et la jeta, déchirée en quatre, au panier. Deux ou trois jours après, mademoiselle Gillenormand entendit son père qui était seul dans sa chambre et qui parlait tout haut. Cela lui arrivait chaque fois qu'il était très agité. Elle prêta l'oreille; le vieillard disait: — Si tu n'étais pas un imbécile, tu saurais qu'on ne peut pas être à la fois baron et avocat.

Chapitre II

Marius pauvre

Il en est de la misère comme de tout. Elle arrive à devenir possible. Elle finit par prendre une forme et se composer. On végète, c'est-à-dire on se développe d'une certaine façon chétive, mais suffisante à la vie. Voici de quelle manière l'existence de Marius Pontmercy s'était arrangée:

Il était sorti du plus étroit, le défilé s'élargissait un peu devant lui. À force de labeur, de courage, de persévérance et de volonté, il était parvenu à tirer de son travail environ sept cents francs par an. Il avait appris l'allemand et l'anglais. Grâce à Courfeyrac qui l'avait mis en rapport avec son ami le libraire, Marius remplissait dans la littérature-librairie le modeste rôle d'utilité. Il faisait des prospectus, traduisait des journaux, annotait des éditions, compilait des biographies, etc. Produit net, bon an mal an, sept cents francs. Il en vivait. Pas mal. Comment? Nous l'allons dire.

Marius occupait dans la masure Gorbeau, moyennant le prix annuel de trente francs, un taudis sans cheminée qualifié cabinet où il n'y avait, en fait de meubles, que l'indispensable. Ces meubles étaient à lui. Il donnait trois francs par mois à la vieille principale locataire pour qu'elle vînt balayer le taudis et lui apporter chaque matin un peu d'eau chaude, un œuf frais et un pain d'un sou. De ce pain et de cet œuf, il déjeunait. Son déjeuner variait de deux à quatre sous selon que les œufs étaient chers ou bon marché. À six heures du soir, il descendait rue Saint-Jacques, dîner chez Rousseau, vis-à-vis Basset le marchand d'estampes du coin de la rue des Mathurins. Il ne mangeait pas de soupe. Il prenait un plat de viande de six sous, un demi-plat de légumes de trois sous, et un dessert de trois sous. Pour trois sous, du pain à discrétion. Quant au vin, il buvait de l'eau. En payant au comptoir, où siégeait majestueusement madame Rousseau, à cette époque toujours grasse et encore fraîche, il donnait un sou au garçon, et madame Rousseau lui donnait un sourire. Puis il s'en allait. Pour seize sous, il avait eu un sourire et un dîner.

Ce restaurant Rousseau, où l'on vidait si peu de bouteilles et tant de carafes, était un calmant plus encore qu'un restaurant. Il n'existe plus aujourd'hui. Le maître avait un beau surnom; on l'appelait Rousseau l'aquatique.

Ainsi, déjeuner quatre sous, dîner seize sous; sa nourriture lui coûtait vingt sous par jour; ce qui faisait trois cent soixante-cinq francs par an. Ajoutez les trente francs de loyer et les trente-six francs à la vieille, plus quelques menus frais; pour quatre cent cinquante francs, Marius était nourri, logé et servi. Son habillement lui coûtait cent francs, son linge cinquante francs, son blanchissage cinquante francs, le tout ne dépassait pas six cent cinquante francs. Il lui restait cinquante francs. Il était riche. Il prêtait dans l'occasion dix francs à un ami; Courfeyrac avait pu lui emprunter une fois soixante francs. Quant au chauffage, n'ayant pas de cheminée, Marius l'avait «simplifié».

Marius avait toujours deux habillements complets; l'un vieux, «pour tous les jours», l'autre tout neuf, pour les occasions. Les deux étaient noirs. Il n'avait que trois chemises, l'une sur lui, l'autre dans sa commode, la troisième chez la blanchisseuse. Il les renouvelait à mesure qu'elles s'usaient. Elles étaient habituellement déchirées, ce qui lui faisait boutonner son habit jusqu'au menton.

Pour que Marius en vînt à cette situation florissante, il avait fallu des années. Années rudes; difficiles, les unes à traverser, les autres à gravir. Marius n'avait point failli un seul jour. Il avait tout subi, en fait de dénûment; il avait tout fait, excepté des dettes. Il se rendait ce témoignage que jamais il n'avait dû un sou à personne. Pour lui, une dette, c'était le commencement de l'esclavage. Il se disait même qu'un créancier est pire qu'un maître; car un maître ne possède que votre personne, un créancier possède votre dignité et peut la souffleter. Plutôt que d'emprunter il ne mangeait pas. Il avait eu beaucoup de jours de jeûne. Sentant que toutes les extrémités se touchent et que, si l'on n'y prend garde, l'abaissement de fortune peut mener à la bassesse d'âme, il veillait jalousement sur sa fierté. Telle formule ou telle démarche qui, dans toute autre situation, lui eût paru déférence, lui semblait platitude, et il se redressait. Il ne hasardait rien, ne voulant pas reculer. Il avait sur le visage une sorte de rougeur sévère. Il était timide jusqu'à l'âpreté.

Dans toutes ses épreuves il se sentait encouragé et quelquefois même porté par une force secrète qu'il avait en lui. L'âme aide le corps, et à de certains moments le soulève. C'est le seul oiseau qui soutienne sa cage.

À côté du nom de son père, un autre nom était gravé dans le cœur de Marius, le nom de Thénardier. Marius, dans sa nature enthousiaste et grave, environnait d'une sorte d'auréole l'homme auquel, dans sa pensée, il devait la vie de son père, cet intrépide sergent qui avait sauvé le colonel au milieu des boulets et des balles de Waterloo. Il ne séparait jamais le souvenir de cet homme du souvenir de son père, et il les associait dans sa vénération. C’était une sorte de culte à deux degrés, le grand autel pour le colonel, le petit pour Thénardier. Ce qui redoublait l’attendrissement de sa reconnaissance, c’est l’idée de l’infortune où il savait Thénardier tombé et englouti. Marius avait appris à Montfermeil la ruine et la faillite du malheureux aubergiste. Depuis il avait fait des efforts inouïs pour saisir sa trace et tâcher d’arriver à lui dans ce ténébreux abîme de la misère où Thénardier avait disparu. Marius avait battu tout le pays; il était allé à Chelles, à Bondy, à Gournay, à Nogent, à Lagny. Pendant trois années il s’y était acharné, dépensant à ces explorations le peu d’argent qu’il épargnait. Personne n’avait pu lui donner de nouvelles de Thénardier; on le croyait passé en pays étranger. Ses créanciers l’avaient cherché aussi, avec moins d’amour que Marius, mais avec autant d’acharnement, et n’avaient pu mettre la main sur lui. Marius s’accusait et s’en voulait presque de ne pas réussir dans ses recherches. C’était la seule dette que lui eût laissée le Colonel, et Marius tenait à honneur de la payer. — Comment! pensait-il, quand mon père gisait mourant sur le champ de bataille, Thénardier, lui, a bien su le trouver à travers la fumée et la mitraille et l’emporter sur ses épaules, et il ne lui devait rien cependant, et moi qui dois tant à Thénardier, je ne saurais pas le rejoindre dans cette ombre où il agonise et le rapporter à mon tour de la mort à la vie! Oh! je le retrouverai! — Pour retrouver Thénardier en effet, Marius eût donné un de ses bras, et, pour le tirer de la misère, tout son sang. Revoir Thénardier, rendre un service quelconque à Thénardier, lui dire: Vous ne me connaissez pas, eh bien, moi, je vous connais! je suis là! disposez de moi! — c’était le plus doux et le plus magnifique rêve de Marius.

Chapitre III

Marius grandi

À cette époque, Marius avait vingt ans. Il y avait trois ans qu’il avait quitté son grand-père. On était resté dans les mêmes termes de part et d’autre, sans tenter de rapprochement et sans chercher à se revoir. D’ailleurs, se revoir, à quoi bon? pour se heurter? Lequel eût eu raison de l’autre? Marius était le vase d’airain, mais le père Gillenormand était le pot de fer.

Disons-le, Marius s’était mépris sur le cœur de son grand-père. Il s’était figuré que M. Gillenormand ne l’avait jamais aimé, et que ce bonhomme bref, dur et riant, qui jurait, criait, tempêtait et levait la canne, n’avait pour lui tout au plus que cette affection à la fois légère et sévère des Gérontes de comédie. Marius se trompait. Il y a des pères qui n’aiment pas leurs enfants; il n’existe point d’aïeul qui n’adore son petit-fils. Au fond, nous l’avons dit, M. Gillenormand idolâtrait Marius. Il l’idolâtrait à sa façon, avec accompagnement de bourrades et même de gifles; mais, cet enfant disparu, il se sentit un vide noir dans le cœur. Il exigea qu’on ne lui en parlât plus, en regrettant tout bas d’être si bien obéi. Dans les premiers temps il espéra que ce buonapartiste, ce jacobin, ce terroriste, ce septembriseur reviendrait. Mais les semaines se passèrent, les mois se passèrent, les années se passèrent; au grand désespoir de M. Gillenormand, le buveur de sang ne reparut pas. — Je ne pouvais pourtant pas faire autrement que de le chasser, se disait le grand-père, et il se demandait: si c’était à refaire, le referais-je? Son orgueil sur-le-champ répondait oui, mais sa vieille tête qu’il hochait en silence répondait tristement non. Il avait ses heures d’abattement. Marius lui manquait. Les vieillards ont besoin d’affections comme de soleil. C’est de la chaleur. Quelle que fût sa forte nature, l’absence de Marius avait changé quelque chose en lui. Pour rien au monde, il n’eût voulu faire un pas vers ce «petit drôle» mais il souffrait. Il ne s’informait jamais de lui, mais il y pensait toujours. Il vivait, de plus en plus retiré, au Marais. Il était encore, comme autrefois, gai et violent, mais sa gaîté avait une dureté convulsive comme si elle contenait de la douleur et de la colère, et ses violences se terminaient toujours par une sorte d’accablement doux et sombre. Il disait quelquefois: — Oh! s’il revenait, quel bon soufflet je lui donnerais!

Quant à la tante, elle pensait trop peu pour aimer beaucoup; Marius n’était plus pour elle qu’une espèce de silhouette noire et vague; et elle avait fini par s’en occuper beaucoup moins que du chat ou du perroquet qu’il est probable qu’elle avait.

Ce qui accroissait la souffrance secrète du père Gillenormand, c’est qu’il la renfermait tout entière et n’en laissait rien deviner. Son chagrin était comme ces fournaises nouvellement inventées qui brûlent leur fumée. Quelquefois, il arrivait que des officieux malencontreux lui parlaient de Marius, et lui demandaient: — Que fait, ou que devient monsieur votre petit-fils? — Le vieux bourgeois répondait, en soupirant, s’il était trop triste, ou en donnant une chiquenaude à sa manchette, s’il voulait paraître gai: — Monsieur le baron Pontmercy plaidaille dans quelque coin.

Pendant que le vieillard regrettait, Marius s’applaudissait. Comme à tous les bons cœurs, le malheur lui avait ôté l’amertume. Il ne pensait à M. Gillenormand qu’avec douceur, mais il avait tenu à ne plus rien recevoir de l’homme qui avait été mal pour son père. — C’était maintenant la traduction mitigée de ses premières indignations. En outre, il était heureux d’avoir souffert, et de souffrir encore. C’était pour son père. La dureté de sa vie le satisfaisait et lui plaisait. Il se disait avec une sorte de joie que — c’était bien le moins; que c’était — une expiation; — que, — sans cela, il eût été puni, autrement et plus tard, de son indifférence impie pour son père et pour un tel père; qu’il n’aurait pas été juste que son père eût eu toute la souffrance, et lui rien; — qu’était-ce d’ailleurs que ses travaux et son dénûment comparés à la vie héroïque du colonel? qu’enfin sa seule manière de se rapprocher de son père et de lui ressembler, c’était d’être vaillant contre l’indigence comme lui avait été brave contre l’ennemi; et que c’était là sans doute ce que le colonel avait voulu dire par ce mot: il en sera digne. — Paroles que Marius continuait de porter, non sur sa poitrine, l’écrit du colonel ayant disparu, mais dans son cœur.

Et puis, le jour où son grand-père l’avait chassé, il n’était encore qu’un enfant, maintenant il était un homme. Il le sentait. La misère, insistons-y, lui avait été bonne. La pauvreté dans la jeunesse, quand elle réussit, a cela de magnifique qu’elle tourne toute la volonté vers l’effort et toute l’âme vers l’aspiration. La pauvreté met tout de suite la vie matérielle à nu et la fait hideuse; de là d’inexprimables élans vers la vie idéale. Le jeune homme riche a cent distractions brillantes et grossières, les courses de chevaux, la chasse, les chiens, le tabac, le jeu, les bons repas, et le reste; occupations des bas côtés de l’âme aux dépens des côtés hauts et délicats. Le jeune homme pauvre se donne de la peine pour avoir son pain; il mange; quand il a mangé, il n’a plus que la rêverie. Il va aux spectacles gratis que Dieu donne; il regarde le ciel, l’espace, les astres, les fleurs, les enfants, l’humanité dans laquelle il souffre, la création dans laquelle il rayonne. Il regarde tant l’humanité qu’il voit l’âme, il regarde tant la création qu’il voit Dieu. Il rêve, et il se sent grand; il rêve encore, et il se sent tendre. De l’égoïsme de l’homme qui souffre, il passe à la compassion de l’homme qui médite. Un admirable sentiment éclate en lui, l’oubli de soi et la pitié pour tous. En songeant aux jouissances sans nombre que la nature offre, donne et prodigue aux âmes ouvertes et refuse aux âmes fermées, il en vient à plaindre, lui millionnaire de l’intelligence, les millionnaires de l’argent. Toute haine s’en va de son cœur à mesure que toute clarté entre dans son esprit. D’ailleurs est-il malheureux? Non. La misère d’un jeune homme n’est jamais misérable. Le premier jeune garçon venu, si pauvre qu’il soit, avec sa santé, sa force, sa marche vive, ses yeux brillants, son sang qui circule chaudement, ses cheveux noirs, ses joues fraîches, ses lèvres roses, ses dents blanches, son souffle pur, fera toujours envie à un vieil empereur. Et puis chaque matin il se remet à gagner son pain; et tandis que ses mains gagnent du pain, son épine dorsale gagne de la fierté, son cerveau gagne des idées. Sa besogne finie, il revient aux extases ineffables, aux contemplations, aux joies; il vit les pieds dans les afflictions, dans les obstacles, sur le pavé, dans les ronces, quelquefois dans la boue; la tête dans la lumière. Il est ferme, serein, doux, paisible, attentif, sérieux, content de peu, bienveillant; et il bénit Dieu de lui avoir donné ces deux richesses qui manquent à bien des riches, le travail qui le fait libre et la pensée qui le fait digne.

C’était là ce qui s’était passé en Marius. Il avait même, pour tout dire, un peu trop versé du côté de la contemplation. Du jour où il était arrivé à gagner sa vie à peu près sûrement, il s’était arrêté là, trouvant bon d’être pauvre, et retranchant au travail pour donner à la pensée. C’est-à-dire qu’il passait quelquefois des journées entières à songer, plongé et englouti comme un visionnaire dans les voluptés muettes de l’extase et du rayonnement intérieur. Il avait ainsi posé le problème de sa vie: travailler le moins possible du travail matériel pour travailler le plus possible du travail impalpable; en d’autres termes, donner quelques heures à la vie réelle, et jeter le reste dans l’infini. Il ne s’apercevait pas, croyant ne manquer de rien, que la contemplation ainsi comprise finit par être une des formes de la paresse; qu’il s’était contenté de dompter les premières nécessités de la vie, et qu’il se reposait trop tôt.

Il était évident que, pour cette nature énergique et généreuse, ce ne pouvait être là qu’un état transitoire, et qu’au premier choc contre les inévitables complications de la destinée, Marius se réveillerait.

En attendant, bien qu’il fût avocat et quoi qu’en pensât le père Gillenormand, il ne plaidait pas, il ne plaidaillait même pas. La rêverie l’avait détourné de la plaidoirie. Hanter les avoués, suivre le palais, chercher des causes, ennui. Pourquoi faire? Il ne voyait aucune raison pour changer de gagne-pain. Cette librairie marchande et obscure avait fini par lui faire un travail sûr, un travail de peu de labeur, qui, comme nous venons de l’expliquer, lui suffisait.

Un des libraires pour lesquels il travaillait, M. Magimel, je crois, lui avait offert de le prendre chez lui, de le bien loger, de lui fournir un travail régulier, et de lui donner quinze cents francs par an. Être bien logé! quinze cents francs! Sans doute. Mais renoncer à sa liberté! être un gagiste! une espèce d’homme de lettres commis! Dans la pensée de Marius, en acceptant, sa position devenait meilleure et pire en même temps, il gagnait du bien-être et perdait de la dignité; c’était un malheur complet et beau qui se changeait en une gêne laide et ridicule; quelque chose comme un aveugle qui deviendrait borgne. Il refusa.

Marius vivait solitaire. Par ce goût qu’il avait de rester en dehors de tout, et aussi pour avoir été par trop effarouché, il n’était décidément pas entré dans le groupe présidé par Enjolras. On était resté bons camarades; on était prêt à s’entr’aider dans l’occasion de toutes les façons possibles; mais rien de plus. Marius avait deux amis, un jeune, Courfeyrac, et un vieux, M. Mabeuf. Il penchait vers le vieux. D’abord il lui devait la révolution qui s’était faite en lui; il lui devait d’avoir connu et aimé son père. Il m’a opéré de la cataracte, disait-il.

Certes, ce marguillier avait été décisif.

Ce n’est pas pourtant que M. Mabeuf eût été dans cette occasion autre chose que l’agent calme et impassible de la providence. Il avait éclairé Marius par hasard et sans le savoir, comme fait une chandelle que quelqu’un apporte; il avait été la chandelle et non le quelqu’un.

Quant à la révolution politique intérieure de Marius, M. Mabeuf était tout à fait incapable de la comprendre, de la vouloir et de la diriger.

Comme on retrouvera plus tard M. Mabeuf, quelques mots ne sont pas inutiles.

Chapitre IV

M. Mabeuf

Le jour où M. Mabeuf disait à Marius: Certainement, j'approuve les opinions politiques, il exprimait le véritable état de son esprit. Toutes les opinions politiques lui étaient indifférentes, et il les approuvait toutes sans distinguer, pour qu'elles le laissassent tranquille, comme les Grecs appelaient les Furies «les belles, les bonnes, les charmantes», les Euménides. M. Mabeuf avait pour opinion politique d'aimer passionnément les plantes, et surtout les livres. Il possédait comme tout le monde sa terminaison en iste, sans laquelle personne n'aurait pu vivre en ce temps-là, mais il n'était ni royaliste, ni bonapartiste, ni chartiste, ni orléaniste, ni anarchiste; il était bouquiniste.

Il ne comprenait pas que les hommes s'occupassent à se haïr à propos de billevesées comme la charte, la démocratie, la légitimité, la monarchie, la République, etc., lorsqu'il y avait dans ce monde toutes sortes de mousses, d'herbes et d'arbustes qu'ils pouvaient regarder, et des tas d'in-folio et même d'in-trente-deux qu'ils pouvaient feuilleter. Il se gardait fort d'être inutile; avoir des livres ne l'empêchait pas de lire, être botaniste ne l'empêchait pas d'être jardinier. Quand il avait connu Pontmercy, il y avait eu cette sympathie entre le colonel et lui, que ce que le colonel faisait pour les fleurs, il le faisait pour les fruits. M. Mabeuf était parvenu à produire des poires de semis aussi savoureuses que les poires de Saint-Germain; c'est d'une de ses combinaisons qu'est née, à ce qu'il paraît, la mirabelle d'octobre, célèbre aujourd'hui, et non moins parfumée que la mirabelle d'été. Il allait à la messe plutôt par douceur que par dévotion, et puis parce qu'aimant le visage des hommes, mais haïssant leur bruit, il ne les trouvait qu'à l'église réunis et silencieux. Sentant qu'il fallait être quelque chose dans l'état, il avait choisi la carrière de marguillier. Du reste, il n'avait jamais réussi à aimer aucune femme autant qu'un oignon de tulipe ou aucun homme autant qu'un elzevir. Il avait depuis longtemps passé soixante ans lorsqu'un jour quelqu'un lui demanda: — Est-ce que vous ne vous êtes jamais marié? — J'ai oublié, dit-il. Quand il lui arrivait parfois — à qui cela n'arrive-t-il pas? — de dire: — Oh! si j'étais riche! — ce n'était pas en lorgnant une jolie fille, comme le père Gillenormand, c'était en contemplant un bouquin. Il vivait seul, avec une vieille gouvernante. Il était un peu chiragre, et quand il dormait ses vieux doigts ankylosés par le rhumatisme s’arc-boutaient dans les plis de ses draps. Il avait fait et publié une Flore des environs de Cauteretz avec planches coloriées, ouvrage assez estimé dont il possédait les cuivres et qu’il vendait lui-même. On venait deux ou trois fois par jour sonner chez lui, rue Mézières, pour cela. Il en tirait bien deux mille francs par an; c’était à peu près là toute sa fortune. Quoique pauvre, il avait eu le talent de se faire, à force de patience, de privations et de temps, une collection précieuse d’exemplaires rares en tous genres. Il ne sortait jamais qu’avec un livre sous le bras et il revenait souvent avec deux. L’unique décoration des quatre chambres au rez-de-chaussée qui, avec un petit jardin, composaient son logis, c’étaient des herbiers encadrés et des gravures de vieux maîtres. La vue d’un sabre ou d’un fusil le glaçait. De sa vie, il n’avait approché d’un canon, même aux Invalides. Il avait un estomac passable, un frère curé, les cheveux tout blancs, plus de dents ni dans la bouche ni dans l’esprit, un tremblement de tout le corps, l’accent picard, un rire enfantin, l’effroi facile, et l’air d’un vieux mouton. Avec cela point d’autre amitié ou d’autre habitude parmi les vivants qu’un vieux libraire de la porte Saint-Jacques appelé Royol. Il avait pour rêve de naturaliser l’indigo en France.

Sa servante était, elle aussi, une variété de l’innocence. La pauvre bonne vieille femme était vierge. Sultan, son matou, qui eût pu miauler le Miserere d’Allegri à la chapelle Sixtine, avait rempli son cœur et suffisait à la quantité de passion qui était en elle. Aucun de ses rêves n’était allé jusqu’à l’homme. Elle n’avait jamais pu franchir son chat. Elle avait, comme lui, des moustaches. Sa gloire était dans ses bonnets, toujours blancs. Elle passait son temps le dimanche après la messe à compter son linge dans sa malle et à étaler sur son lit des robes en pièce qu’elle achetait et qu’elle ne faisait jamais faire. Elle savait lire. M. Mabeuf l’avait surnommée la mère Plutarque.

M. Mabeuf avait pris Marius en gré, parce que Marius, étant jeune et doux, réchauffait sa vieillesse sans effaroucher sa timidité. La jeunesse avec la douceur fait aux vieillards l’effet du soleil sans le vent. Quand Marius était saturé de gloire militaire, de poudre à canon, de marches et de contre-marches, et de toutes ces prodigieuses batailles où son père avait donné et reçu de si grands coups de sabre, il allait voir M. Mabeuf, et M. Mabeuf lui parlait du héros au point de vue des fleurs.

Vers 1830, son frère le curé était mort, et presque tout de suite, comme lorsque la nuit vient, tout l’horizon s’était assombri pour M. Mabeuf. Une faillite — de notaire — lui enleva une somme de dix mille francs, qui était tout ce qu’il possédait du chef de son frère et du sien. La révolution de Juillet amena une crise dans la librairie. En temps de gêne, la première chose qui ne se vend pas, c’est une Flore. La Flore des environs de Cauteretz s’arrêta court. Des semaines s’écoulaient sans un acheteur. Quelquefois M. Mabeuf tressaillait à un coup de sonnette. — Monsieur, lui disait tristement la mère Plutarque, c’est le porteur d’eau. — Bref, un jour M. Mabeuf quitta la rue Mézières, abdiqua les fonctions de marguillier, renonça à Saint-Sulpice, vendit une partie, non de ses livres, mais de ses estampes, — ce à quoi il tenait le moins, — et s’alla installer dans une petite maison du boulevard Montparnasse, où du reste il ne demeura qu’un trimestre, pour deux raisons: premièrement, le rez-de-chaussée et le jardin coûtaient trois cents francs et il n’osait pas mettre plus de deux cents francs à son loyer; deuxièmement, étant voisin du tir Fatou, il entendait toute la journée des coups de pistolet, ce qui lui était insupportable.

Il emporta sa Flore, ses cuivres, ses herbiers, ses portefeuilles et ses livres, et s’établit près de la Salpêtrière dans une espèce de chaumière du village d’Austerlitz, où il avait pour cinquante écus par an trois chambres et un jardin clos d’une haie avec puits. Il profita de ce déménagement pour vendre presque tous ses meubles. Le jour de son entrée dans ce nouveau logis, il fut très gai et cloua lui-même les clous pour accrocher les gravures et les herbiers, il piocha son jardin le reste de la journée, et, le soir, voyant que la mère Plutarque avait l’air morne et songeait, il lui frappa sur l’épaule et lui dit en souriant: — Bah! nous avons l’indigo!

Deux seuls visiteurs, le libraire de la porte Saint-Jacques et Marius, étaient admis à le voir dans sa chaumière d’Austerlitz, nom tapageur qui lui était, pour tout dire, assez désagréable.

Du reste, comme nous venons de l’indiquer, les cerveaux absorbés dans une sagesse, ou dans une folie, ou, ce qui arrive souvent, dans les deux à la fois, ne sont que très lentement perméables aux choses de la vie. Leur propre destin leur est lointain. Il résulte de ces concentrations-là une passivité qui, si elle était raisonnée, ressemblerait à la philosophie. On décline, on descend, on s’écoule, on s’écroule même, sans trop s’en apercevoir. Cela finit toujours, il est vrai, par un réveil, mais tardif. En attendant, il semble qu’on soit neutre dans le jeu qui se joue entre notre bonheur et notre malheur. On est l’enjeu, et l’on regarde la partie avec indifférence.

C’est ainsi qu’à travers cet obscurcissement qui se faisait autour de lui, toutes ses espérances s’éteignant l’une après l’autre, M. Mabeuf était resté serein, un peu puérilement, mais très profondément. Ses habitudes d’esprit avaient le va-et-vient d’un pendule. Une fois monté par une illusion, il allait très longtemps, même quand l’illusion avait disparu. Une horloge ne s’arrête pas court au moment précis où l’on en perd la clef.

M. Mabeuf avait des plaisirs innocents. Ces plaisirs étaient peu coûteux et inattendus; le moindre hasard les lui fournissait. Un jour la mère Plutarque lisait un roman dans un coin de la chambre. Elle lisait haut, trouvant qu’elle comprenait mieux ainsi. Lire haut, c’est s’affirmer à soi-même sa lecture. Il y a des gens qui lisent très haut et qui ont l’air de se donner leur parole d’honneur de ce qu’ils lisent.

La mère Plutarque lisait avec cette énergie-là le roman qu’elle tenait à la main. M. Mabeuf entendait sans écouter.

Tout en lisant, la mère Plutarque arriva à cette phrase. Il était question d’un officier de dragons et d’une belle:

«...La belle bouda, et le dragon...»

Ici elle s’interrompit pour essuyer ses lunettes.

— Bouddha et le Dragon, reprit à mi-voix M. Mabeuf. Oui, c’est vrai, il y avait un dragon qui, du fond de sa caverne, jetait des flammes par la gueule et brûlait le ciel. Plusieurs étoiles avaient déjà été incendiées par ce monstre qui, en outre, avait des griffes de tigre. Bouddha alla dans son antre et réussit à convertir le dragon. C’est un bon livre que vous lisez là, mère Plutarque. Il n’y a pas de plus belle légende.

Et M. Mabeuf tomba dans une rêverie délicieuse.

Chapitre V

Pauvreté, bonne voisine de misère

Marius avait du goût pour ce vieillard candide qui se voyait lentement saisi par l'indigence, et qui arrivait à s'étonner peu à peu, sans pourtant s'attrister encore. Marius rencontrait Courfeyrac et cherchait M. Mabeuf. Fort rarement pourtant, une ou deux fois par mois, tout au plus.

Le plaisir de Marius était de faire de longues promenades seul sur les boulevards extérieurs, ou au Champ de Mars ou dans les allées les moins fréquentées du Luxembourg. Il passait quelquefois une demi-journée à regarder le jardin d'un maraîcher, les carrés de salade, les poules dans le fumier et le cheval tournant la roue de la noria. Les passants le considéraient avec surprise, et quelques-uns lui trouvaient une mise suspecte et une mine sinistre. Ce n'était qu'un jeune homme pauvre, rêvant sans objet.

C'est dans une de ses promenades qu'il avait découvert la masure Gorbeau, et, l'isolement et le bon marché le tentant, il s'y était logé. On ne l'y connaissait que sous le nom de monsieur Marius.

Quelques-uns des anciens généraux ou des anciens camarades de son père l'avaient invité, quand ils le connurent, à les venir voir. Marius n'avait point refusé. C'étaient des occasions de parler de son père. Il allait ainsi de temps en temps chez le comte Pajol, chez le général Bellavesne, chez le général Fririon, aux Invalides. On y faisait de la musique, on y dansait. Ces soirs-là Marius mettait son habit neuf. Mais il n'allait jamais à ces soirées ni à ces bals que les jours où il gelait à pierre fendre, car il ne pouvait payer une voiture et il ne voulait arriver qu'avec des bottes comme des miroirs.

Il disait quelquefois, mais sans amertume: — Les hommes sont ainsi faits que, dans un salon, vous pouvez être crotté partout, excepté sur les souliers. On ne vous demande là, pour vous bien accueillir, qu'une chose irréprochable; la conscience? non, les bottes.

Toutes les passions, autres que celles du cœur, se dissipent dans la rêverie. Les fièvres politiques de Marius s'y étaient évanouies. La révolution de 1830, en le satisfaisant, et en le calmant, y avait aidé. Il était resté le même, aux colères près. Il avait toujours les mêmes opinions, seulement elles s'étaient attendries. À proprement parler, il n'avait plus d’opinions, il avait des sympathies. De quel parti était-il? du parti de l’humanité. Dans l’humanité il choisissait la France; dans la nation il choisissait le peuple; dans le peuple il choisissait la femme. C’était là surtout que sa pitié allait. Maintenant il préférait une idée à un fait, un poète à un héros, et il admirait plus encore un livre comme Job qu’un événement comme Marengo. Et puis quand, après une journée de méditation, il s’en revenait le soir par les boulevards et qu’à travers les branches des arbres il apercevait l’espace sans fond, les lueurs sans nom, l’abîme, l’ombre, le mystère, tout ce qui n’est qu’humain lui semblait bien petit.

Il croyait être et il était peut-être en effet arrivé au vrai de la vie et de la philosophie humaine, et il avait fini par ne plus guère regarder que le ciel, seule chose que la vérité puisse voir du fond de son puits.

Cela ne l’empêchait pas de multiplier les plans, les combinaisons, les échafaudages, les projets d’avenir. Dans cet état de rêverie, un œil qui eût regardé au dedans de Marius, eût été ébloui de la pureté de cette âme. En effet, s’il était donné à nos yeux de chair de voir dans la conscience d’autrui, on jugerait bien plus sûrement un homme d’après ce qu’il rêve que d’après ce qu’il pense. Il y a de la volonté dans la pensée, il n’y en a pas dans le rêve. Le rêve, qui est tout spontané, prend et garde, même dans le gigantesque et l’idéal, la figure de notre esprit. Rien ne sort plus directement et plus sincèrement du fond même de notre âme que nos aspirations irréfléchies et démesurées vers les splendeurs de la destinée. Dans ces aspirations, bien plus que dans les idées composées, raisonnées et coordonnées, on peut retrouver le vrai caractère de chaque homme. Nos chimères sont ce qui nous ressemble le mieux. Chacun rêve l’inconnu et l’impossible selon sa nature.

Vers le milieu de cette année 1831, la vieille qui servait Marius lui conta qu’on allait mettre à la porte ses voisins, le misérable ménage Jondrette. Marius, qui passait presque toutes ses journées dehors, savait à peine qu’il eût des voisins.

— Pourquoi les renvoie-t-on? dit-il.

— Parce qu’ils ne payent pas leur loyer. Ils doivent deux termes.

— Combien est-ce?

— Vingt francs, dit la vieille.

Marius avait trente francs en réserve dans un tiroir.

— Tenez, dit-il à la vieille, voilà vingt-cinq francs. Payez pour ces pauvres gens, donnez-leur cinq francs, et ne dites pas que c’est moi.

Chapitre VI

Le remplaçant

Le hasard fit que le régiment dont était le lieutenant Théodule vint tenir garnison à Paris. Ceci fut l'occasion d'une deuxième idée pour la tante Gillenormand. Elle avait, une première fois, imaginé de faire surveiller Marius par Théodule; elle complota de faire succéder Théodule à Marius.

À toute aventure, et pour le cas où le grand-père aurait le vague besoin d'un jeune visage dans la maison, ces rayons d'aurore sont quelquefois doux aux ruines, il était expédient de trouver un autre Marius. Soit, pensa-t-elle, c'est un simple erratum comme j'en vois dans les livres; Marius, lisez Théodule.

Un petit-neveu est l'à peu près d'un petit-fils; à défaut d'un avocat, on prend un lancier.

Un matin, que M. Gillenormand était en train de lire quelque chose comme la Quotidienne, sa fille entra, et lui dit de sa voix la plus douce, car il s'agissait de son favori:

— Mon père, Théodule va venir ce matin vous présenter ses respects.

— Qui ça, Théodule?

— Votre petit-neveu.

— Ah! fit le grand-père.

Puis il se remit à lire, ne songea plus au petit-neveu qui n'était qu'un Théodule quelconque, et ne tarda pas à avoir beaucoup d'humeur, ce qui lui arrivait presque toujours quand il lisait. La «feuille», qu'il tenait, royaliste d'ailleurs, cela va de soi, annonçait pour le lendemain, sans aménité aucune, un des petits événements quotidiens du Paris d'alors:

— Que les élèves des écoles de droit et de médecine devaient se réunir sur la place du Panthéon à midi; — pour délibérer. — Il s'agissait d'une des questions du moment, de l'artillerie de la garde nationale, et d'un conflit entre le ministre de la guerre et «la milice citoyenne» au sujet des canons parqués dans la cour du Louvre. Les étudiants devaient «délibérer» là-dessus. Il n'en fallait pas beaucoup plus pour gonfler M. Gillenormand.

Il songea à Marius, qui était étudiant, et qui, probablement, irait, comme les autres, «délibérer, à midi, sur la place du Panthéon».

Comme il faisait ce songe pénible, le lieutenant Théodule entra, vêtu en bourgeois, ce qui était habile, et discrètement introduit par mademoiselle Gillenormand. Le lancier avait fait ce raisonnement: — Le vieux druide n'a pas tout placé en viager. Cela vaut bien qu'on se déguise en pékin de temps en temps.

Mademoiselle Gillenormand dit, haut, à son père:

— Théodule, votre petit-neveu.

Et, bas, au lieutenant:

— Approuve tout.

Et se retira.

Le lieutenant, peu accoutumé à des rencontres si vénérables, balbutia avec quelque timidité: Bonjour, mon oncle, et fit un salut mixte composé de l'ébauche involontaire et machinale du salut militaire achevée en salut bourgeois.

— Ah! c'est vous; c'est bien, asseyez-vous, dit l'aïeul.

Cela dit, il oublia parfaitement le lancier.

Théodule s'assit, et M. Gillenormand se leva.

M. Gillenormand se mit à marcher de long en large, les mains dans ses poches, parlant tout haut et tourmentant avec ses vieux doigts irrités les deux montres qu'il avait dans ses deux goussets.

— Ce tas de morveux! ça se convoque sur la place du Panthéon! Vertu de ma mie! Des galopins qui étaient hier en nourrice! Si on leur pressait le nez, il en sortirait du lait! Et ça délibère demain à midi! Où va-t-on? où va-t-on? Il est clair qu'on va à l'abîme. C'est là que nous ont conduits les descamisados! L'artillerie citoyenne! Délibérer sur l'artillerie citoyenne! S'en aller jaboter en plein air sur les pétarades de la garde nationale! Et avec qui vont-ils se trouver là? Voyez un peu où mène le jacobinisme. Je parie tout ce qu'on voudra, un million contre un fichtre, qu'il n'y aura là que des repris de justice et des forçats libérés. Les républicains et les galériens, ça ne fait qu'un nez et qu'un mouchoir. Carnot disait: Où veux-tu que j'aille, traître? Fouché répondait: Où tu voudras, imbécile! Voilà ce que c'est que les républicains.

— C'est juste, dit Théodule.

M. Gillenormand tourna la tête à demi, vit Théodule, et continua:

— Quand on pense que ce drôle a eu la scélératesse de se faire carbonaro! Pourquoi as-tu quitté ma maison? Pour t'aller faire républicain. Pssst! d'abord le peuple n'en veut pas de ta République, il n'en veut pas, il a du bon sens, il sait bien qu'il y a toujours eu des rois et qu'il y en aura toujours, il sait bien que le peuple, après tout, ce n'est que le peuple, il s'en hurle, de ta République, entends-tu, crétin! Est-ce assez horrible, ce caprice-là! S'amouracher du père Duchêne, faire les yeux doux à la guillotine, chanter des romances et jouer de la guitare sous le balcon de 93, c'est à cracher sur tous ces jeunes gens-là, tant ils sont bêtes! Ils en sont tous là. Pas un n'échappe. Il suffit de respirer l'air qui passe dans la rue pour être insensé. Le dix-neuvième siècle est du poison. Le premier polisson venu laisse pousser sa barbe de bouc, se croit un drôle pour de vrai, et vous plante là les vieux parents. C'est républicain, c'est romantique. Qu'est-ce que c'est que ça, romantique? faites-moi l'amitié de me dire ce que c'est que ça? Toutes les folies possibles. Il y a un an, ça vous allait à Hernani. Je vous demande un peu, Hernani! des antithèses! des abominations qui ne sont pas même écrites en français! Et puis on a des canons dans la cour du Louvre. Tels sont les brigandages de ce temps-ci.

— Vous avez raison, mon oncle, dit Théodule.

M. Gillenormand reprit:

— Des canons dans la cour du Muséum! pourquoi faire? Canon, que me veux-tu? Vous voulez donc mitrailler l'Apollon du Belvédère? Qu'est-ce que les gargousses ont à faire avec la Vénus de Médicis? Oh! ces jeunes gens d'à présent, tous des chenapans! Quel pas grand'chose que leur Benjamin Constant! Et ceux qui ne sont pas des scélérats sont des dadais! Ils font tout ce qu'ils peuvent pour être laids, ils sont mal habillés, ils ont peur des femmes, ils ont autour des cotillons un air de mendier qui fait éclater de rire les jeannetons; ma parole d'honneur, on dirait les pauvres honteux de l'amour. Ils sont difformes, et ils se complètent en étant stupides; ils répètent les calembours de Tiercelin et de Potier, ils ont des habits-sacs, des gilets de palefrenier, des chemises de grosse toile, des pantalons de gros drap, des bottes de gros cuir, et le ramage ressemble au plumage. On pourrait se servir de leur jargon pour ressemeler leurs savates. Et toute cette inepte marmaille vous a des opinions politiques. Il devrait être sévèrement défendu d'avoir des opinions politiques. Ils fabriquent des systèmes, ils refont la société, ils démolissent la monarchie, ils flanquent par terre toutes les lois, ils mettent le grenier à la place de la cave et mon portier à la place du roi, ils bousculent l'Europe de fond en comble, ils rebâtissent le monde, et ils ont pour bonne fortune de regarder sournoisement les jambes des blanchisseuses qui remontent dans leurs charrettes! Ah! Marius! ah! gueusard! aller vociférer en place publique! discuter, débattre, prendre des mesures! ils appellent cela des mesures, justes dieux! le désordre se rapetisse et devient niais. J'ai vu le chaos, je vois le gâchis. Des écoliers délibérer sur la garde nationale, cela ne se verrait pas chez les Ogibbewas et chez les Cadodaches! Les sauvages qui vont tout nus, la caboche coiffée comme un volant de raquette, avec une massue à la patte, sont moins brutes que ces bacheliers-là! Des marmousets de quatre sous! ça fait les entendus et les jordonnes! ça délibère et ratiocine! C'est la fin du monde. C'est évidemment la fin de ce misérable globe terraqué. Il fallait un hoquet final, la France le pousse. Délibérez, mes drôles! Ces choses-là arriveront tant qu'ils iront lire les journaux sous les arcades de l'Odéon. Cela leur coûte un sou, et leur bon sens, et leur intelligence, et leur cœur, et leur âme, et leur esprit. On sort de là, et l'on fiche le camp de chez sa famille. Tous les journaux sont de la peste; tous, même le Drapeau blanc! au fond Martainville était un jacobin! Ah! juste ciel! tu pourras te vanter d'avoir désespéré ton grand-père, toi!

— C'est évident, dit Théodule.

Et, profitant de ce que M. Gillenormand reprenait haleine, le lancier ajouta magistralement:

— Il ne devrait pas y avoir d'autre journal que le Moniteur et d'autre livre que l'Annuaire militaire.

M. Gillenormand poursuivit:

— C'est comme leur Sieyès! un régicide aboutissant à un sénateur! car c'est toujours par là qu'ils finissent. On se balafre avec le tutoiement citoyen pour arriver à se faire dire monsieur le comte. Monsieur le comte gros comme le bras, des assommeurs de septembre! Le philosophe Sieyès! Je me rends cette justice que je n'ai jamais fait plus de cas des philosophies de tous ces philosophes-là que des lunettes du grimacier de Tivoli! J'ai vu un jour les sénateurs passer sur le quai Malaquais en manteaux de velours violet semés d'abeilles avec des chapeaux à la Henri IV. Ils étaient hideux. On eût dit les singes de la cour du tigre. Citoyens, je vous déclare que votre progrès est une folie, que votre humanité est un rêve, que votre révolution est un crime, que votre République est un monstre, que votre jeune France pucelle sort du lupanar, et je vous le soutiens à tous, qui que vous soyez, fussiez-vous publicistes, fussiez-vous économistes, fussiez-vous légistes, fussiez-vous plus connaisseurs en liberté, en égalité et en fraternité que le couperet de la guillotine! Je vous signifie cela, mes bonshommes!

— Parbleu, cria le lieutenant, voilà qui est admirablement vrai.

M. Gillenormand interrompit un geste qu’il avait commencé, se retourna, regarda fixement le lancier Théodule entre les deux yeux, et lui dit:

— Vous êtes un imbécile.

Livre sixième — La conjonction de deux étoiles

Chapitre I

Le sobriquet: mode de formation des noms de familles

Marius à cette époque était un beau jeune homme de moyenne taille, avec d'épais cheveux très noirs, un front haut et intelligent, les narines ouvertes et passionnées, l'air sincère et calme, et sur tout son visage je ne sais quoi qui était hautain, pensif et innocent. Son profil, dont toutes les lignes étaient arrondies sans cesser d'être fermes, avait cette douceur germanique qui a pénétré dans la physionomie française par l'Alsace et la Lorraine, et cette absence complète d'angles qui rendait les Sicambres si reconnaissables parmi les romains et qui distingue la race léonine de la race aquiline. Il était à cette saison de la vie où l'esprit des hommes qui pensent se compose, presque à proportions égales, de profondeur et de naïveté. Une situation grave étant donnée, il avait tout ce qu'il fallait pour être stupide; un tour de clef de plus, il pouvait être sublime. Ses façons étaient réservées, froides, polies, peu ouvertes. Comme sa bouche était charmante, ses lèvres les plus vermeilles et ses dents les plus blanches du monde, son sourire corrigeait ce que toute sa physionomie avait de sévère. À de certains moments, c'était un singulier contraste que ce front chaste et ce sourire voluptueux. Il avait l'œil petit et le regard grand.

Au temps de sa pire misère, il remarquait que les jeunes filles se retournaient quand il passait, et il se sauvait ou se cachait, la mort dans l'âme. Il pensait qu'elles le regardaient pour ses vieux habits et qu'elles en riaient; le fait est qu'elles le regardaient pour sa grâce et qu'elles en rêvaient.

Ce muet malentendu entre lui et les jolies passantes l'avait rendu farouche. Il n'en choisit aucune, par l'excellente raison qu'il s'enfuyait devant toutes. Il vécut ainsi indéfiniment, — bêtement, disait Courfeyrac.

Courfeyrac lui disait encore: — N'aspire pas à être vénérable (car ils se tutoyaient; glisser au tutoiement est la pente des amitiés jeunes). Mon cher, un conseil. Ne lis pas tant dans les livres et regarde un peu plus les margotons. Les coquines ont du bon, ô Marius! À force de t'enfuir et de rougir, tu t'abrutiras.

D'autres fois Courfeyrac le rencontrait et lui disait:

— Bonjour, monsieur l'abbé.

Quand Courfeyrac lui avait tenu quelque propos de ce genre, Marius était huit jours à éviter plus que jamais les femmes, jeunes et vieilles, et il évitait par-dessus le marché Courfeyrac.

Il y avait pourtant dans toute l'immense création deux femmes que Marius ne fuyait pas et auxquelles il ne prenait point garde. À la vérité on l'eût fort étonné si on lui eût dit que c'étaient des femmes. L'une était la vieille barbue qui balayait sa chambre et qui faisait dire à Courfeyrac: Voyant que sa servante porte sa barbe, Marius ne porte point la sienne. L'autre était une espèce de petite fille qu'il voyait très souvent et qu'il ne regardait jamais.

Depuis plus d'un an, Marius remarquait dans une allée déserte du Luxembourg, l'allée qui longe le parapet de la Pépinière, un homme et une toute jeune fille presque toujours assis côte à côte sur le même banc, à l'extrémité la plus solitaire de l'allée, du côté de la rue de l'Ouest. Chaque fois que ce hasard qui se mêle aux promenades des gens dont l'œil est retourné en dedans amenait Marius dans cette allée, et c'était presque tous les jours, il y retrouvait ce couple. L'homme pouvait avoir une soixantaine d'années, il paraissait triste et sérieux; toute sa personne offrait cet aspect robuste et fatigué des gens de guerre retirés du service. S'il avait eu une décoration, Marius eût dit: c'est un ancien officier. Il avait l'air bon, mais inabordable, et il n'arrêtait jamais son regard sur le regard de personne. Il portait un pantalon bleu, une redingote bleue et un chapeau à bords larges, qui paraissaient toujours neufs, une cravate noire et une chemise de quaker, c'est-à-dire, éclatante de blancheur, mais de grosse toile. Une grisette passant un jour près de lui, dit: Voilà un veuf fort propre. Il avait les cheveux très blancs.

La première fois que la jeune fille qui l'accompagnait vint s'asseoir avec lui sur le banc qu'ils semblaient avoir adopté, c'était une façon de fille de treize ou quatorze ans, maigre, au point d'en être presque laide, gauche, insignifiante, et qui promettait peut-être d'avoir d'assez beaux yeux. Seulement ils étaient toujours levés avec une sorte d'assurance déplaisante. Elle avait cette mise à la fois vieille et enfantine des pensionnaires de couvent; une robe mal coupée de gros mérinos noir. Ils avaient l'air du père et de la fille.

Marius examina pendant deux ou trois jours cet homme vieux qui n'était pas encore un vieillard et cette petite fille qui n'était pas encore une personne, puis il n'y fit plus aucune attention. Eux de leur côté semblaient ne pas même le voir. Ils causaient entre eux d’un air paisible et indifférent. La fille jasait sans cesse, et gaîment. Le vieux homme parlait peu, et, par instants, il attachait sur elle des yeux remplis d’une ineffable paternité.

Marius avait pris l’habitude machinale de se promener dans cette allée. Il les y retrouvait invariablement.

Voici comment la chose se passait:

Marius arrivait le plus volontiers par le bout de l’allée opposé à leur banc. Il marchait toute la longueur de l’allée, passait devant eux, puis s’en retournait jusqu’à l’extrémité par où il était venu, et recommençait. Il faisait ce va-et-vient cinq ou six fois dans sa promenade, et cette promenade cinq ou six fois par semaine sans qu’ils en fussent arrivés, ces gens et lui, à échanger un salut. Ce personnage et cette jeune fille, quoiqu’ils parussent et peut-être parce qu’ils paraissaient éviter les regards, avaient naturellement quelque peu éveillé l’attention des cinq ou six étudiants qui se promenaient de temps en temps le long de la Pépinière, les studieux après leur cours, les autres après leur partie de billard. Courfeyrac, qui était un des derniers, les avait observés quelque temps, mais trouvant la fille laide, il s’en était bien vite et soigneusement écarté. Il s’était enfui comme un Parthe en leur décochant un sobriquet. Frappé uniquement de la robe de la petite et des cheveux du vieux, il avait appelé la fille mademoiselle Lanoire et le père monsieur Leblanc, si bien que, personne ne les connaissant d’ailleurs, en l’absence du nom, le surnom avait fait loi. Les étudiants disaient: — Ah! monsieur Leblanc est à son banc! et Marius, comme les autres, avait trouvé commode d’appeler ce monsieur inconnu M. Leblanc.

Nous ferons comme eux, et nous dirons M. Leblanc pour la facilité de ce récit.

Marius les vit ainsi presque tous les jours à la même heure pendant la première année. Il trouvait l’homme à son gré, mais la fille assez maussade.

Chapitre II

Lux facta est

La seconde année, précisément au point de cette histoire où le lecteur est parvenu, il arriva que cette habitude du Luxembourg s'interrompit, sans que Marius sût trop pourquoi lui-même, et qu'il fut près de six mois sans mettre les pieds dans son allée. Un jour enfin il y retourna. C'était par une sereine matinée d'été, Marius était joyeux comme on l'est quand il fait beau. Il lui semblait qu'il avait dans le cœur tous les chants d'oiseaux qu'il entendait et tous les morceaux du ciel bleu qu'il voyait à travers les feuilles des arbres.

Il alla droit à «son allée», et, quand il fut au bout, il aperçut, toujours sur le même banc, ce couple connu. Seulement, quand il approcha, c'était bien le même homme; mais il lui parut que ce n'était plus la même fille. La personne qu'il voyait maintenant était une grande et belle créature ayant toutes les formes les plus charmantes de la femme à ce moment précis où elles se combinent encore avec toutes les grâces les plus naïves de l'enfant; moment fugitif et pur que peuvent seuls traduire ces deux mots: quinze ans. C'étaient d'admirables cheveux châtains nuancés de veines dorées, un front qui semblait fait de marbre, des joues qui semblaient faites d'une feuille de rose, un incarnat pâle, une blancheur émue, une bouche exquise d'où le sourire sortait comme une clarté et la parole comme une musique, une tête que Raphaël eût donnée à Marie posée sur un cou que Jean Goujon eût donné à Vénus. Et, afin que rien ne manquât à cette ravissante figure, le nez n'était pas beau, il était joli; ni droit ni courbé, ni italien ni grec; c'était le nez parisien; c'est-à-dire quelque chose de spirituel, de fin, d'irrégulier et de pur, qui désespère les peintres et qui charme les poètes.

Quand Marius passa près d'elle, il ne put voir ses yeux qui étaient constamment baissés. Il ne vit que ses longs cils châtains pénétrés d'ombre et de pudeur.

Cela n'empêchait pas la belle enfant de sourire tout en écoutant l'homme à cheveux blancs qui lui parlait, et rien n'était ravissant comme ce frais sourire avec des yeux baissés.

Dans le premier moment, Marius pensa que c'était une autre fille du même homme, une sœur sans doute de la première. Mais, quand l'invariable habitude de la promenade le ramena pour la seconde fois près du banc, et qu’il l’eut examinée avec attention, il reconnut que c’était la même. En six mois la petite fille était devenue jeune fille; voilà tout. Rien n’est plus fréquent que ce phénomène. Il y a un instant où les filles s’épanouissent en un clin d’œil et deviennent des roses tout à coup. Hier on les a laissées enfants, aujourd’hui on les retrouve inquiétantes.

Celle-ci n’avait pas seulement grandi, elle s’était idéalisée. Comme trois jours en avril suffisent à de certains arbres pour se couvrir de fleurs, six mois lui avaient suffi pour se vêtir de beauté. Son avril à elle était venu.

On voit quelquefois des gens qui, pauvres et mesquins, semblent se réveiller, passent subitement de l’indigence au faste, font des dépenses de toutes sortes, et deviennent tout à coup éclatants, prodigues et magnifiques. Cela tient à une rente empochée; il y a eu échéance hier. La jeune fille avait touché son semestre.

Et puis ce n’était plus la pensionnaire avec son chapeau de peluche, sa robe de mérinos, ses souliers d’écolier et ses mains rouges; le goût lui était venu avec la beauté; c’était une personne bien mise avec une sorte d’élégance simple et riche et sans manière. Elle avait une robe de damas noir, un camail de même étoffe et un chapeau de crêpe blanc. Ses gants blancs montraient la finesse de sa main qui jouait avec le manche d’une ombrelle en ivoire chinois, et son brodequin de soie dessinait la petitesse de son pied. Quand on passait près d’elle, toute sa toilette exhalait un parfum jeune et pénétrant.

Quant à l’homme, il était toujours le même.

La seconde fois que Marius arriva près d’elle, la jeune fille leva les paupières. Ses yeux étaient d’un bleu céleste et profond, mais dans cet azur voilé il n’y avait encore que le regard d’un enfant. Elle regarda Marius avec indifférence, comme elle eût regardé le marmot qui courait sous les sycomores, ou le vase de marbre qui faisait de l’ombre sur le banc; et Marius de son côté continua sa promenade en pensant à autre chose.

Il passa encore quatre ou cinq fois près du banc où était la jeune fille, mais sans même tourner les yeux vers elle.

Les jours suivants, il revint comme à l’ordinaire au Luxembourg, comme à l’ordinaire, il y trouva «le père et la fille», mais il n’y fit plus attention. Il ne songea pas plus à cette fille quand elle fut belle qu’il n’y songeait lorsqu’elle était laide. Il passait fort près du banc où elle était, parce que c’était son habitude.

Chapitre III

Effet de printemps

Un jour, l’air était tiède, le Luxembourg était inondé d’ombre et de soleil, le ciel était pur comme si les anges l’eussent lavé le matin, les passereaux poussaient de petits cris dans les profondeurs des marronniers, Marius avait ouvert toute son âme à la nature, il ne pensait à rien, il vivait et il respirait, il passa près de ce banc, la jeune fille leva les yeux sur lui, leurs deux regards se rencontrèrent.

Qu’y avait-il cette fois dans le regard de la jeune fille? Marius n’eût pu le dire. Il n’y avait rien et il y avait tout. Ce fut un étrange éclair.

Elle baissa les yeux, et il continua son chemin.

Ce qu’il venait de voir, ce n’était pas l’œil ingénu et simple d’un enfant, c’était un gouffre mystérieux qui s’était entr’ouvert, puis brusquement refermé.

Il y a un jour où toute jeune fille regarde ainsi. Malheur à qui se trouve là!

Ce premier regard d’une âme qui ne se connaît pas encore est comme l’aube dans le ciel. C’est l’éveil de quelque chose de rayonnant et d’inconnu. Rien ne saurait rendre le charme dangereux de cette lueur inattendue qui éclaire vaguement tout-à-coup d’adorables ténèbres et qui se compose de toute l’innocence du présent et de toute la passion de l’avenir. C’est une sorte de tendresse indécise qui se révèle au hasard et qui attend. C’est un piège que l’innocence tend à son insu et où elle prend des cœurs sans le vouloir et sans le savoir. C’est une vierge qui regarde comme une femme.

Il est rare qu’une rêverie profonde ne naisse pas de ce regard là où il tombe. Toutes les puretés et toutes les candeurs se concentrent dans ce rayon céleste et fatal qui, plus que les œillades les mieux travaillées des coquettes, a le pouvoir magique de faire subitement éclore au fond d’une âme cette fleur sombre, pleine de parfums et de poisons, qu’on appelle l’amour.

Le soir, en rentrant dans son galetas, Marius jeta les yeux sur son vêtement, et s’aperçut pour la première fois qu’il avait la malpropreté, l’inconvenance et la stupidité inouïe d’aller se promener au Luxembourg avec ses habits «de tous les jours», c’est-à-dire avec un chapeau cassé près de la ganse, de grosses bottes de roulier, un pantalon noir blanc aux genoux et un habit noir pâle aux coudes.

Chapitre IV

Commencement d’une grande maladie

Le lendemain, à l’heure accoutumée, Marius tira de son armoire son habit neuf, son pantalon neuf, son chapeau neuf et ses bottes neuves; il se revêtit de cette panoplie complète, mit des gants, luxe prodigieux, et s’en alla au Luxembourg.

Chemin faisant, il rencontra Courfeyrac, et feignit de ne pas le voir. Courfeyrac en rentrant chez lui dit à ses amis. Je viens de rencontrer le chapeau neuf et l’habit neuf de Marius et Marius dedans. Il allait sans doute passer un examen. Il avait l’air tout bête.

Arrivé au Luxembourg, Marius fit le tour du bassin et considéra les cygnes, puis il demeura longtemps en contemplation devant une statue qui avait la tête toute noire de moisissure et à laquelle une hanche manquait. Il y avait près du bassin un bourgeois quadragénaire et ventru qui tenait par la main un petit garçon de cinq ans et lui disait: — Évite les excès. Mon fils, tiens-toi à égale distance du despotisme et de l’anarchie. — Marius écouta ce bourgeois. Puis il fit encore une fois le tour du bassin. Enfin il se dirigea vers «son allée», lentement et comme s’il y allait à regret. On eût dit qu’il était à la fois forcé et empêché d’y aller. Il ne se rendait aucun compte de tout cela, et croyait faire comme tous les jours.

En débouchant dans l’allée, il aperçut à l’autre bout «sur leur banc» M. Leblanc et la jeune fille. Il boutonna son habit jusqu’en haut, le tendit sur son torse pour qu’il ne fît pas de plis, examina avec une certaine complaisance les reflets lustrés de son pantalon, et marcha sur le banc. Il y avait de l’attaque dans cette marche et certainement une velléité de conquête. Je dis donc: il marcha sur le banc, comme je dirais: Annibal marcha sur Rome.

Du reste il n’y avait rien que de machinal dans tous ses mouvements, et il n’avait aucunement interrompu les préoccupations habituelles de son esprit et de ses travaux. Il pensait en ce moment-là que le Manuel du Baccalauréat était un livre stupide et qu’il fallait qu’il eût été rédigé par de rares crétins pour qu’on y analysât comme chef-d’œuvre de l’esprit humain trois tragédies de Racine et seulement une comédie de Molière. Il avait un sifflement aigu dans l’oreille. Tout en approchant du banc, il tendait les plis de son habit, et ses yeux se fixaient sur la jeune fille. Il lui semblait qu'elle emplissait toute l'extrémité de l'allée d'une vague lueur bleue.

À mesure qu'il approchait, son pas se ralentissait de plus en plus. Parvenu à une certaine distance du banc, bien avant d'être à la fin de l'allée, il s'arrêta, et il ne put savoir lui-même comment il se fit qu'il rebroussa chemin. Il ne se dit même point qu'il n'allait pas jusqu'au bout. Ce fut à peine si la jeune fille put l'apercevoir de loin et voir le bel air qu'il avait dans ses habits neufs. Cependant il se tenait très droit, pour avoir bonne mine dans le cas où quelqu'un qui serait derrière lui le regarderait.

Il atteignit le bout opposé, puis revint, et cette fois il s'approcha un peu plus près du banc. Il parvint même jusqu'à une distance de trois intervalles d'arbres, mais là il sentit je ne sais quelle impossibilité d'aller plus loin, et il hésita. Il avait cru voir le visage de la jeune fille se pencher vers lui. Cependant il fit un effort viril et violent, dompta l'hésitation, et continua d'aller en avant. Quelques secondes après, il passait devant le banc, droit et ferme, rouge jusqu'aux oreilles, sans oser jeter un regard à droite, ni à gauche, la main dans son habit comme un homme d'état. Au moment où il passa — sous le canon de la place — il éprouva un affreux battement de cœur. Elle avait comme la veille sa robe de damas et son chapeau de crêpe. Il entendit une voix ineffable qui devait être «sa voix». Elle causait tranquillement. Elle était bien jolie. Il le sentait, quoiqu'il n'essayât pas de la voir. — Elle ne pourrait cependant, pensait-il, s'empêcher d'avoir de l'estime et de la considération pour moi si elle savait que c'est moi qui suis le véritable auteur de la dissertation sur Marcos Obregon de la Ronda que monsieur François de Neufchâteau a mise, comme étant de lui, en tête de son édition de Gil Blas!

Il dépassa le banc, alla jusqu'à l'extrémité de l'allée qui était tout proche, puis revint sur ses pas et passa encore devant la belle fille. Cette fois il était très pâle. Du reste il n'éprouvait rien que de fort désagréable. Il s'éloigna du banc et de la jeune fille, et, tout en lui tournant le dos, il se figurait qu'elle le regardait, et cela le faisait trébucher.

Il n'essaya plus de s'approcher du banc, il s'arrêta vers la moitié de l'allée, et là, chose qu'il ne faisait jamais, il s'assit, jetant des regards de côté, et songeant, dans les profondeurs les plus indistinctes de son esprit, qu'après tout il était difficile que les personnes dont il admirait le chapeau blanc et la robe noire fussent absolument insensibles à son pantalon lustré et à son habit neuf.

Au bout d’un quart d’heure il se leva, comme s’il allait recommencer à marcher vers ce banc qu’une auréole entourait. Cependant il restait debout et immobile. Pour la première fois depuis quinze mois il se dit que ce monsieur qui s’asseyait là tous les jours avec sa fille l’avait sans doute remarqué de son côté et trouvait probablement son assiduité étrange.

Pour la première fois aussi il sentit quelque irrévérence à désigner cet inconnu, même dans le secret de sa pensée, par le sobriquet de M. Leblanc.

Il demeura ainsi quelques minutes la tête baissée, et faisant des dessins sur le sable avec une baguette qu’il avait à la main.

Puis il se tourna brusquement du côté opposé au banc, à M. Leblanc et à sa fille, et s’en revint chez lui.

Ce jour-là il oublia d’aller dîner. À huit heures du soir il s’en aperçut, et comme il était trop tard pour descendre rue Saint-Jacques, tiens dit-il, et il mangea un morceau de pain.

Il ne se coucha qu’après avoir brossé son habit et l’avoir plié avec soin.

Chapitre V

Divers coups de foudre tombent sur mame Bougon

Le lendemain, mame Bougon, — c'est ainsi que Courfeyrac nommait la vieille portière-principale-locataire-femme-de-ménage de la masure Gorbeau, elle s'appelait en réalité madame Burgon, nous l'avons constaté, mais ce brise-fer de Courfeyrac ne respectait rien, — mame Bougon, stupéfaite, remarqua que monsieur Marius sortait encore avec son habit neuf.

Il retourna au Luxembourg, mais il ne dépassa point son banc de la moitié de l'allée. Il s'y assit comme la veille, considérant de loin et voyant distinctement le chapeau blanc, la robe noire et surtout la lueur bleue. Il n'en bougea pas, et ne rentra chez lui que lorsqu'on ferma les portes du Luxembourg. Il ne vit pas M. Leblanc et sa fille se retirer. Il en conclut qu'ils étaient sortis du jardin par la grille de la rue de l'Ouest. Plus tard, quelques semaines après, quand il y songea, il ne put jamais se rappeler où il avait dîné ce soir-là.

Le lendemain, c'était le troisième jour, mame Bougon fut refoudroyée. Marius sortit avec son habit neuf.

— Trois jours de suite! s'écria-t-elle.

Elle essaya de le suivre, mais Marius marchait lestement et avec d'immenses enjambées; c'était un hippopotame entreprenant la poursuite d'un chamois. Elle le perdit de vue en deux minutes et rentra essoufflée, aux trois quarts étouffée par son asthme, furieuse. — Si cela a du bon sens, grommela-t-elle, de mettre ses beaux habits tous les jours et de faire courir les personnes comme cela!

Marius s'était rendu au Luxembourg.

La jeune fille y était avec M. Leblanc. Marius approcha le plus près qu'il put en faisant semblant de lire dans un livre, mais il resta encore fort loin, puis revint s'asseoir sur son banc où il passa quatre heures à regarder sauter dans l'allée les moineaux francs qui lui faisaient l'effet de se moquer de lui.

Une quinzaine s'écoula ainsi. Marius allait au Luxembourg non plus pour se promener, mais pour s'y asseoir toujours à la même place et sans savoir pourquoi. Arrivé là, il ne remuait plus. Il mettait chaque matin son habit neuf pour ne pas se montrer, et il recommençait le lendemain.

Elle était décidément d’une beauté merveilleuse. La seule remarque qu’on pût faire qui ressemblât à une critique, c’est que la contradiction entre son regard qui était triste et son sourire qui était joyeux donnait à son visage quelque chose d’un peu égaré, ce qui fait qu’à de certains moments ce doux visage devenait étrange sans cesser d’être charmant.

Chapitre VI

Fait prisonnier

Un des derniers jours de la seconde semaine, Marius était comme à son ordinaire assis sur son banc, tenant à la main un livre ouvert dont depuis deux heures il n’avait pas tourné une page. Tout à coup il tressaillit. Un événement se passait à l’extrémité de l’allée. M. Leblanc et sa fille venaient de quitter leur banc, la fille avait pris le bras du père, et tous deux se dirigeaient lentement vers le milieu de l’allée où était Marius. Marius ferma son livre, puis il le rouvrit, puis il s’efforça de lire. Il tremblait. L’auréole venait droit à lui. — Ah! Mon dieu! pensait-il, je n’aurai jamais le temps de prendre une attitude. — Cependant, l’homme à cheveux blancs et la jeune fille s’avançaient. Il lui paraissait que cela durait un siècle et que cela n’était qu’une seconde. — Qu’est-ce qu’ils viennent faire par ici? se demandait-il. Comment! elle va passer là! Ses pieds vont marcher sur ce sable, dans cette allée, à deux pas de moi! — Il était bouleversé, il eût voulu être très beau, il eût voulu avoir la croix! Il entendait s’approcher le bruit doux et mesuré de leurs pas. Il s’imaginait que M. Leblanc lui jetait des regards irrités. Est-ce que ce monsieur va me parler? pensait-il. Il baissa la tête; quand il la releva, ils étaient tout près de lui. La jeune fille passa, et en passant elle le regarda. Elle le regarda fixement, avec une douceur pensive qui fit frissonner Marius de la tête aux pieds. Il lui sembla qu’elle lui reprochait d’avoir été si longtemps sans venir jusqu’à elle et qu’elle lui disait: C’est moi qui viens. Marius resta ébloui devant ces prunelles pleines de rayons et d’abîmes.

Il se sentait un brasier dans le cerveau. Elle était venue à lui, quelle joie! Et puis, comme elle l’avait regardé! Elle lui parut plus belle qu’il ne l’avait encore vue. Belle d’une beauté tout ensemble féminine et angélique, d’une beauté complète qui eût fait chanter Pétrarque et agenouiller Dante. Il lui semblait qu’il nageait en plein ciel bleu. En même temps il était horriblement contrarié, parce qu’il avait de la poussière sur ses bottes.

Il croyait être sûr qu’elle avait regardé aussi ses bottes.

Il la suivit des yeux jusqu’à ce qu’elle eût disparu. Puis il se mit à marcher dans le Luxembourg comme un fou. Il est probable que par moments il riait tout seul et parlait haut. Il était si rêveur près des bonnes d’enfants que chacune le croyait amoureux d’elle.

Il sortit du Luxembourg, espérant la retrouver dans une rue.

Il se croisa avec Courfeyrac sous les arcades de l’Odéon et lui dit: Viens dîner avec moi. Ils s’en allèrent chez Rousseau, et dépensèrent six francs. Marius mangea comme un ogre. Il donna six sous au garçon. Au dessert il dit à Courfeyrac: As-tu lu le journal? Quel beau discours a fait Audry de Puyraveau!

Il était éperdument amoureux.

Après le dîner, il dit à Courfeyrac: Je te paye le spectacle. Ils allèrent à la Porte-Saint-Martin voir Frédérick dans l’Auberge des Adrets. Marius s’amusa énormément.

En même temps il eut un redoublement de sauvagerie. En sortant du théâtre, il refusa de regarder la jarretière d’une modiste qui enjambait un ruisseau, et Courfeyrac ayant dit: Je mettrais volontiers cette femme dans ma collection, lui fit presque horreur.

Courfeyrac l’avait invité à déjeuner au café Voltaire le lendemain. Marius y alla, et mangea encore plus que la veille. Il était tout pensif et très gai. On eût dit qu’il saisissait toutes les occasions de rire aux éclats. Il embrassa tendrement un provincial quelconque qu’on lui présenta. Un cercle d’étudiants s’était fait autour de la table et l’on avait parlé des niaiseries payées par l’état qui se débitent en chaire à la Sorbonne, puis la conversation était tombée sur les fautes et les lacunes des dictionnaires et des prosodies-Quicherat. Marius interrompit la discussion pour s’écrier: — C’est cependant bien agréable d’avoir la croix!

— Voilà qui est drôle! dit Courfeyrac bas à Jean Prouvaire.

— Non, répondit Jean Prouvaire, voilà qui est sérieux.

Cela était sérieux en effet. Marius en était à cette première heure violente et charmante qui commence les grandes passions.

Un regard avait fait tout cela.

Quand la mine est chargée, quand l’incendie est prêt, rien n’est plus simple. Un regard est une étincelle.

C’en était fait. Marius aimait une femme. Sa destinée entrait dans l’inconnu.

Le regard des femmes ressemble à de certains rouages tranquilles en apparence et formidables. On passe à côté tous les jours paisiblement et impunément et sans se douter de rien. Il vient un moment où l’on oublie même que cette chose est là. On va, on vient, on rêve, on parle, on rit. Tout à coup on se sent saisi. C’est fini. Le rouage vous tient, le regard vous a pris. Il vous a pris, n’importe par où ni comment, par une partie quelconque de votre pensée qui traînait, par une distraction que vous avez eue. Vous êtes perdu. Vous y passerez tout entier. Un enchaînement de forces mystérieuses s’empare de vous. Vous vous débattez en vain. Plus de secours humain possible. Vous allez tomber d’engrenage en engrenage, d’angoisse en angoisse, de torture en torture, vous, votre esprit, votre fortune, votre avenir, votre âme; et, selon que vous serez au pouvoir d’une créature méchante ou d’un noble cœur, vous ne sortirez de cette effrayante machine que défiguré par la honte ou transfiguré par la passion.

Chapitre VII

Aventures de la lettre U livrée aux conjectures

L’isolement, le détachement de tout, la fierté, l’indépendance, le goût de la nature, l’absence d’activité quotidienne et matérielle, la vie en soi, les luttes secrètes de la chasteté, l’extase bienveillante devant toute la création, avaient préparé Marius à cette possession qu’on nomme la passion. Son culte pour son père était devenu peu à peu une religion, et, comme toute religion, s’était retiré au fond de l’âme. Il fallait quelque chose sur le premier plan. L’amour vint.

Tout un grand mois s’écoula, pendant lequel Marius alla tous les jours au Luxembourg. L’heure venue, rien ne pouvait le retenir. — Il est de service, disait Courfeyrac. Marius vivait dans les ravissements. Il est certain que la jeune fille le regardait.

Il avait fini par s’enhardir, et il s’approchait du banc. Cependant il ne passait plus devant, obéissant à la fois à l’instinct de timidité et à l’instinct de prudence des amoureux. Il jugeait utile de ne point attirer «l’attention du père». Il combinait ses stations derrière les arbres et les piédestaux des statues avec un machiavélisme profond, de façon à se faire voir le plus possible à la jeune fille et à se laisser voir le moins possible du vieux monsieur. Quelquefois pendant des demi-heures entières, il restait immobile à l’ombre d’un Léonidas ou d’un Spartacus quelconque, tenant à la main un livre au-dessus duquel ses yeux, doucement levés, allaient chercher la belle fille, et elle, de son côté, détournait avec un vague sourire son charmant profil vers lui. Tout en causant le plus naturellement et le plus tranquillement du monde avec l’homme à cheveux blancs, elle appuyait sur Marius toutes les rêveries d’un œil virginal et passionné. Antique et immémorial manège qu’Ève savait dès le premier jour du monde et que toute femme sait dès le premier jour de la vie! Sa bouche donnait la réplique à l’un et son regard donnait la réplique à l’autre.

Il faut croire pourtant que M. Leblanc finissait par s’apercevoir de quelque chose, car souvent, lorsque Marius arrivait, il se levait et se mettait à marcher. Il avait quitté leur place accoutumée et avait adopté, à l’autre extrémité de l’allée, le banc voisin du Gladiateur, comme pour voir si Marius les y suivrait. Marius ne comprit point, et fit cette faute. Le «père» commença à devenir inexact, et n'amena plus «sa fille» tous les jours. Quelquefois il venait seul. Alors Marius ne restait pas. Autre faute.

Marius ne prenait point garde à ces symptômes. De la phase de timidité il avait passé, progrès naturel et fatal, à la phase d'aveuglement. Son amour croissait. Il en rêvait toutes les nuits. Et puis il lui était arrivé un bonheur inespéré, huile sur le feu, redoublement de ténèbres sur ses yeux. Un soir, à la brune, il avait trouvé sur le banc que «M. Leblanc et sa fille» venaient de quitter, un mouchoir. Un mouchoir tout simple et sans broderie, mais blanc, fin, et qui lui parut exhaler des senteurs ineffables. Il s'en empara avec transport. Ce mouchoir était marqué des lettres U. F.; Marius ne savait rien de cette belle enfant, ni sa famille, ni son nom, ni sa demeure; ces deux lettres étaient la première chose d'elle qu'il saisissait, adorables initiales sur lesquelles il commença tout de suite à construire son échafaudage. U était évidemment le prénom. Ursule! pensa-t-il, quel délicieux nom! Il baisa le mouchoir, l'aspira, le mit sur son cœur, sur sa chair, pendant le jour, et la nuit sous ses lèvres pour s'endormir.

— J'y sens toute son âme! s'écriait-il.

Ce mouchoir était au vieux monsieur qui l'avait tout bonnement laissé tomber de sa poche.

Les jours qui suivirent la trouvaille, il ne se montra plus au Luxembourg que baisant le mouchoir et l'appuyant sur son cœur. La belle enfant n'y comprenait rien et le lui marquait par des signes imperceptibles.

— Ô pudeur! disait Marius.

Chapitre VIII

Les invalides eux-mêmes peuvent être heureux

Puisque nous avons prononcé le mot pudeur, et puisque nous ne cachons rien, nous devons dire qu'une fois pourtant, à travers ses extases, «son Ursule» lui donna un grief très sérieux. C'était un de ces jours où elle déterminait M. Leblanc à quitter le banc et à se promener dans l'allée. Il faisait une vive brise de prairial qui remuait le haut des platanes. Le père et la fille, se donnant le bras, venaient de passer devant le banc de Marius. Marius s'était levé derrière eux et les suivait du regard, comme il convient dans cette situation d'âme éperdue.

Tout à coup un souffle de vent, plus en gaîté que les autres, et probablement chargé de faire les affaires du printemps, s'envola de la pépinière, s'abattit sur l'allée, enveloppa la jeune fille dans un ravissant frisson digne des nymphes de Virgile et des faunes de Théocrite, et souleva sa robe, cette robe plus sacrée que celle d'Isis, presque jusqu'à la hauteur de la jarretière. Une jambe d'une forme exquise apparut. Marius la vit. Il fut exaspéré et furieux.

La jeune fille avait rapidement baissé sa robe d'un mouvement divinement effarouché, mais il n'en fut pas moins indigné. — Il était seul dans l'allée, c'est vrai. Mais il pouvait y avoir eu quelqu'un. Et s'il y avait eu quelqu'un! Comprend-on une chose pareille! C'est horrible ce qu'elle vient de faire là! — Hélas! la pauvre enfant n'avait rien fait; il n'y avait qu'un coupable, le vent; mais Marius, en qui frémissait confusément le Bartholo qu'il y a dans Chérubin, était déterminé à être mécontent, et était jaloux de son ombre. C'est ainsi en effet que s'éveille dans le cœur humain, et que s'impose, même sans droit, l'âcre et bizarre jalousie de la chair. Du reste, en dehors même de cette jalousie, la vue de cette jambe charmante n'avait eu pour lui rien d'agréable; le bas blanc de la première femme venue lui eût fait plus de plaisir.

Quand «son Ursule», après avoir atteint l'extrémité de l'allée, revint sur ses pas avec M. Leblanc et passa devant le banc où Marius s'était rassis, Marius lui jeta un regard bourru et féroce. La jeune fille eut ce petit redressement en arrière accompagné d'un haussement de paupières qui signifie: Eh bien, qu'est-ce qu'il a donc?

Ce fut là leur «première querelle».

Marius achevait à peine de lui faire cette scène avec les yeux que quelqu’un traversa l’allée. C’était un invalide tout courbé, tout ridé et tout blanc, en uniforme Louis XV, ayant sur le torse la petite plaque ovale de drap rouge aux épées croisées, croix de Saint-Louis du soldat, et orné en outre d’une manche d’habit sans bras dedans, d’un menton d’argent et d’une jambe de bois. Marius crut distinguer que cet être avait l’air extrêmement satisfait. Il lui sembla même que le vieux cynique, tout en clopinant près de lui, lui avait adressé un clignement d’œil très fraternel et très joyeux, comme si un hasard quelconque avait fait qu’ils pussent être d’intelligence et qu’ils eussent savouré en commun quelque bonne aubaine. Qu’avait-il donc à être si content, ce débris de Mars? Que s’était-il donc passé entre cette jambe de bois et l’autre? Marius arriva au paroxysme de la jalousie. — Il était peut-être là! se dit-il; il a peut-être vu! — Et il eut envie d’exterminer l’invalide.

Le temps aidant, toute pointe s’émousse. Cette colère de Marius contre «Ursule», si juste et si légitime qu’elle fût, passa. Il finit par pardonner; mais ce fut un grand effort; il la bouda trois jours.

Cependant, à travers tout cela et à cause de tout cela, la passion grandissait et devenait folle.

Chapitre IX

Éclipse

On vient de voir comment Marius avait découvert ou cru découvrir qu'Elle s'appelait Ursule.

L'appétit vient en aimant. Savoir qu'elle se nommait Ursule, c'était déjà beaucoup; c'était peu. Marius en trois ou quatre semaines eut dévoré ce bonheur. Il en voulut un autre. Il voulut savoir où elle demeurait.

Il avait fait une première faute: tomber dans l'embûche du banc du Gladiateur. Il en avait fait une seconde: ne pas rester au Luxembourg quand M. Leblanc y venait seul. Il en fit une troisième. Immense. Il suivit «Ursule».

Elle demeurait rue de l'Ouest, à l'endroit de la rue le moins fréquenté, dans une maison neuve à trois étages d'apparence modeste.

À partir de ce moment, Marius ajouta à son bonheur de la voir au Luxembourg le bonheur de la suivre jusque chez elle.

Sa faim augmentait. Il savait comment elle s'appelait, son petit nom du moins, le nom charmant, le vrai nom d'une femme; il savait où elle demeurait; il voulut savoir qui elle était.

Un soir, après qu'il les eut suivis jusque chez eux et qu'il les eut vus disparaître sous la porte cochère, il entra à leur suite et dit vaillamment au portier:

— C'est le monsieur du premier qui vient de rentrer?

— Non, répondit le portier. C'est le monsieur du troisième.

Encore un pas de fait. Ce succès enhardit Marius.

— Sur le devant? demanda-t-il.

— Parbleu! fit le portier, la maison n'est bâtie que sur la rue.

— Et quel est l'état de ce monsieur? repartit Marius.

— C'est un rentier, monsieur. Un homme bien bon, et qui fait du bien aux malheureux, quoique pas riche.

— Comment s'appelle-t-il? reprit Marius.

Le portier leva la tête, et dit:

— Est-ce que monsieur est mouchard?

Marius s'en alla assez penaud, mais fort ravi. Il avançait.

— Bon, pensa-t-il. Je sais qu’elle s’appelle Ursule, qu’elle est fille d’un rentier, et qu’elle demeure là, au troisième, rue de l’Ouest.

Le lendemain M. Leblanc et sa fille ne firent au Luxembourg qu’une courte apparition; ils s’en allèrent qu’il faisait grand jour. Marius les suivit rue de l’Ouest comme il en avait pris l’habitude. En arrivant à la porte cochère, M. Leblanc fit passer sa fille devant puis s’arrêta avant de franchir le seuil, se retourna et regarda Marius fixement.

Le jour d’après, ils ne vinrent pas au Luxembourg. Marius attendit en vain toute la journée.

À la nuit tombée, il alla rue de l’Ouest, et vit de la lumière aux fenêtres du troisième. Il se promena sous ces fenêtres jusqu’à ce que cette lumière fût éteinte.

Le jour suivant, personne au Luxembourg. Marius attendit tout le jour, puis alla faire sa faction de nuit sous les croisées. Cela le conduisait jusqu’à dix heures du soir. Son dîner devenait ce qu’il pouvait. La fièvre nourrit le malade et l’amour l’amoureux.

Il se passa huit jours de la sorte. M. Leblanc et sa fille ne paraissaient plus au Luxembourg. Marius faisait des conjectures tristes; il n’osait guetter la porte cochère pendant le jour. Il se contentait d’aller à la nuit contempler la clarté rougeâtre des vitres. Il y voyait par moments passer des ombres, et le cœur lui battait.

Le huitième jour, quand il arriva sous les fenêtres, il n’y avait pas de lumière. — Tiens! dit-il, la lampe n’est pas encore allumée. Il fait nuit pourtant. Est-ce qu’ils seraient sortis? Il attendit. Jusqu’à dix heures. Jusqu’à minuit. Jusqu’à une heure du matin. Aucune lumière ne s’alluma aux fenêtres du troisième étage et personne ne rentra dans la maison. Il s’en alla très sombre.

Le lendemain, — car il ne vivait que de lendemains en lendemains, il n’y avait, pour ainsi dire, plus d’aujourd’hui pour lui, — le lendemain il ne trouva personne au Luxembourg, il s’y attendait; à la brune, il alla à la maison. Aucune lueur aux fenêtres; les persiennes étaient fermées; le troisième était tout noir.

Marius frappa à la porte cochère, entra et dit au portier:

— Le monsieur du troisième?

— Déménagé, répondit le portier.

Marius chancela et dit faiblement:

— Depuis quand donc?

— D’hier.

— Où demeure-t-il maintenant?

— Je n’en sais rien.

— Il n’a donc point laissé sa nouvelle adresse?

— Non.

Et le portier levant le nez reconnut Marius.

— Tiens! c’est vous! dit-il, mais vous êtes donc décidément quart-d’œil?

Livre septième — Patron-minette

Chapitre I

Les mines et les mineurs

Les sociétés humaines ont toutes ce qu'on appelle dans les théâtres un troisième dessous. Le sol social est partout miné, tantôt pour le bien, tantôt pour le mal. Ces travaux se superposent. Il y a les mines supérieures et les mines inférieures. Il y a un haut et un bas dans cet obscur sous-sol qui s'effondre parfois sous la civilisation, et que notre indifférence et notre insouciance foulent aux pieds. L'Encyclopédie, au siècle dernier, était une mine, presque à ciel ouvert. Les ténèbres, ces sombres couveuses du christianisme primitif, n'attendaient qu'une occasion pour faire explosion sous les Césars et pour inonder le genre humain de lumière. Car dans les ténèbres sacrées il y a de la lumière latente. Les volcans sont pleins d'une ombre capable de flamboiement. Toute lave commence par être nuit. Les catacombes, où s'est dite la première messe, n'étaient pas seulement la cave de Rome, elles étaient le souterrain du monde.

Il y a sous la construction sociale, cette merveille compliquée d'une masure, des excavations de toutes sortes. Il y a la mine religieuse, la mine philosophique, la mine politique, la mine économique, la mine révolutionnaire. Tel pioche avec l'idée, tel pioche avec le chiffre, tel pioche avec la colère. On s'appelle et on se répond d'une catacombe à l'autre. Les utopies cheminent sous terre dans ces conduits. Elles s'y ramifient en tous sens. Elles s'y rencontrent parfois, et y fraternisent. Jean-Jacques prête son pic à Diogène qui lui prête sa lanterne. Quelquefois elles s'y combattent. Calvin prend Socin aux cheveux. Mais rien n'arrête ni n'interrompt la tension de toutes ces énergies vers le but, et la vaste activité simultanée, qui va et vient, monte, descend et remonte dans ces obscurités, et qui transforme lentement le dessus par le dessous et le dehors par le dedans; immense fourmillement inconnu. La société se doute à peine de ce creusement qui lui laisse sa surface et lui change les entrailles. Autant d'étages souterrains, autant de travaux différents, autant d'extractions diverses. Que sort-il de toutes ces fouilles profondes? L'avenir.

Plus on s'enfonce, plus les travailleurs sont mystérieux. Jusqu'à un degré que le philosophe social sait reconnaître, le travail est bon; au delà de ce degré, il est douteux et mixte; plus bas, il devient terrible. À une certaine profondeur, les excavations ne sont plus pénétrables à l’esprit de civilisation, la limite respirable à l’homme est dépassée; un commencement de monstres est possible.

L’échelle descendante est étrange; et chacun de ces échelons correspond à un étage où la philosophie peut prendre pied, et où l’on rencontre un de ces ouvriers, quelquefois divins, quelquefois difformes. Au-dessous de Jean Huss, il y a Luther; au-dessous de Luther, il y a Descartes; au-dessous de Descartes, il y a Voltaire; au-dessous de Voltaire, il y a Condorcet; au-dessous de Condorcet, il y a Robespierre; au-dessous de Robespierre, il y a Marat; au-dessous de Marat, il y a Babeuf. Et cela continue. Plus bas, confusément, à la limite qui sépare l’indistinct de l’invisible, on aperçoit d’autres hommes sombres, qui peut-être n’existent pas encore. Ceux d’hier sont des spectres; ceux de demain sont des larves. L’œil de l’esprit les distingue obscurément. Le travail embryonnaire de l’avenir est une des visions du philosophe.

Un monde dans les limbes à l’état de foetus, quelle silhouette inouïe!

Saint-Simon, Owen, Fourier, sont là aussi, dans des sapes latérales.

Certes, quoiqu’une divine chaîne invisible lie entre eux à leur insu tous ces pionniers souterrains, qui, presque toujours, se croient isolés, et qui ne le sont pas, leurs travaux sont bien divers, et la lumière des uns contraste avec le flamboiement des autres. Les uns sont paradisiaques, les autres sont tragiques. Pourtant, quel que soit le contraste, tous ces travailleurs, depuis le plus haut jusqu’au plus nocturne, depuis le plus sage jusqu’au plus fou, ont une similitude, et la voici: le désintéressement. Marat s’oublie comme Jésus. Ils se laissent de côté, ils s’omettent, ils ne songent point à eux. Ils voient autre chose qu’eux-mêmes. Ils ont un regard, et ce regard cherche l’absolu. Le premier a tout le ciel dans les yeux; le dernier, si énigmatique qu’il soit, a encore sous le sourcil la pâle clarté de l’infini. Vénérez, quoi qu’il fasse, quiconque a ce signe: la prunelle étoile.

La prunelle ombre est l’autre signe.

À elle commence le mal. Devant qui n’a pas de regard songez et tremblez. L’ordre social a ses mineurs noirs.

Il y a un point où l’approfondissement est de l’ensevelissement, et où la lumière s’éteint.

Au-dessous de toutes ces mines que nous venons d’indiquer, au-dessous de toutes ces galeries, au-dessous de tout cet immense système veineux souterrain du progrès et de l’utopie, bien plus avant dans la terre, plus bas que Marat, plus bas que Babeuf, plus bas, beaucoup plus bas, et sans relation aucune avec les étages supérieurs, il y a la dernière sape. Lieu formidable. C’est ce que nous avons nommé le troisième dessous. C’est la fosse des ténèbres. C’est la cave des aveugles. Inferi.

Ceci communique aux abîmes.

Chapitre II

Le bas-fond

Là le désintéressement s'évanouit. Le démon s'ébauche vaguement; chacun pour soi. Le moi sans yeux hurle, cherche, tâtonne et ronge. L'Ugolin social est dans ce gouffre.

Les silhouettes farouches qui rôdent dans cette fosse, presque bêtes, presque fantômes, ne s'occupent pas du progrès universel, elles ignorent l'idée et le mot, elles n'ont souci que de l'assouvissement individuel. Elles sont presque inconscientes, et il y a au dedans d'elles une sorte d'effacement effrayant. Elles ont deux mères, toutes deux marâtres, l'ignorance et la misère. Elles ont un guide, le besoin; et, pour toutes les formes de la satisfaction, l'appétit. Elles sont brutalement voraces, c'est-à-dire féroces, non à la façon du tyran, mais à la façon du tigre. De la souffrance ces larves passent au crime; filiation fatale, engendrement vertigineux, logique de l'ombre. Ce qui rampe dans le troisième dessous social, ce n'est plus la réclamation étouffée de l'absolu; c'est la protestation de la matière. L'homme y devient dragon. Avoir faim, avoir soif, c'est le point de départ; être Satan, c'est le point d'arrivée. De cette cave sort Lacenaire.

On vient de voir tout à l'heure, au livre quatrième, un des compartiments de la mine supérieure, de la grande sape politique, révolutionnaire et philosophique. Là, nous venons de le dire, tout est noble, pur, digne, honnête. Là, certes, on peut se tromper, et l'on se trompe; mais l'erreur y est vénérable tant elle implique d'héroïsme. L'ensemble du travail qui se fait là a un nom: le Progrès.

Le moment est venu d'entrevoir d'autres profondeurs, les profondeurs hideuses.

Il y a sous la société, insistons-y, et, jusqu'au jour où l'ignorance sera dissipée, il y aura la grande caverne du mal.

Cette cave est au-dessous de toutes et est l'ennemie de toutes. C'est la haine sans exception. Cette cave ne connaît pas de philosophes. Son poignard n'a jamais taillé de plume. Sa noirceur n'a aucun rapport avec la noirceur sublime de l'écritoire. Jamais les doigts de la nuit qui se crispent sous ce plafond asphyxiant n'ont feuilleté un livre ni déplié un journal.

Babeuf est un exploiteur pour Cartouche! Marat est un aristocrate pour Schinderhannes. Cette cave a pour but l’effondrement de tout.

De tout. Y compris les sapes supérieures, qu’elle exècre. Elle ne mine pas seulement, dans son fourmillement hideux, l’ordre social actuel; elle mine la philosophie, elle mine la science, elle mine le droit, elle mine la pensée humaine, elle mine la civilisation, elle mine la révolution, elle mine le progrès. Elle s’appelle tout simplement vol, prostitution, meurtre et assassinat. Elle est ténèbres, et elle veut le chaos. Sa voûte est faite d’ignorance.

Toutes les autres, celles d’en haut, n’ont qu’un but, la supprimer. C’est là que tendent, par tous leurs organes à la fois, par l’amélioration du réel comme par la contemplation de l’absolu, la philosophie et le progrès. Détruisez la cave Ignorance, vous détruisez la taupe Crime.

Condensons en quelques mots une partie de ce que nous venons d’écrire. L’unique péril social, c’est l’Ombre.

Humanité, c’est identité. Tous les hommes sont la même argile. Nulle différence, ici-bas du moins, dans la prédestination. Même ombre avant, même chair pendant, même cendre après. Mais l’ignorance mêlée à la pâte humaine la noircit. Cette incurable noirceur gagne le dedans de l’homme et y devient le Mal.

Chapitre III

Babet, Gueulemer, Claquesous et Montparnasse

Un quatuor de bandits, Claquesous, Gueulemer, Babet et Montparnasse, gouvernait de 1830 à 1835 le troisième dessous de Paris.

Gueulemer était un Hercule déclassé. Il avait pour antre l'égout de l'Arche-Marion. Il avait six pieds de haut, des pectoraux de marbre, des biceps d'airain, une respiration de caverne, le torse d'un colosse, un crâne d'oiseau. On croyait voir l'Hercule Farnèse vêtu d'un pantalon de coutil et d'une veste de velours de coton. Gueulemer, bâti de cette façon sculpturale, aurait pu dompter les monstres; il avait trouvé plus court d'en être un. Front bas, tempes larges, moins de quarante ans et la patte d'oie, le poil rude et court, la joue en brosse, une barbe sanglière; on voit d'ici l'homme. Ses muscles sollicitaient le travail, sa stupidité n'en voulait pas. C'était une grosse force paresseuse. Il était assassin par nonchalance. On le croyait créole. Il avait probablement un peu touché au maréchal Brune, ayant été portefaix à Avignon en 1815. Après ce stage, il était passé bandit.

La diaphanéité de Babet contrastait avec la viande de Gueulemer. Babet était maigre et savant. Il était transparent, mais impénétrable. On voyait le jour à travers les os, mais rien à travers la prunelle. Il se déclarait chimiste. Il avait été pitre chez Bobèche et paillasse chez Bobino. Il avait joué le vaudeville à Saint-Mihiel. C'était un homme à intentions, beau parleur, qui soulignait ses sourires et guillemetait ses gestes. Son industrie était de vendre en plein vent des bustes de plâtre et des portraits du «chef de l'État». De plus, il arrachait les dents. Il avait montré des phénomènes dans les foires, et possédé une baraque avec trompette, et cette affiche: — Babet, artiste dentiste, membre des académies, fait des expériences physiques sur métaux et métalloïdes, extirpe les dents, entreprend les chicots abandonnés par ses confrères. Prix: une dent, un franc cinquante centimes; deux dents, deux francs; trois dents, deux francs cinquante. Profitez de l'occasion. — (Ce «profitez de l'occasion» signifiait: faites-vous-en arracher le plus possible.) Il avait été marié et avait eu des enfants. Il ne savait pas ce que sa femme et ses enfants étaient devenus. Il les avait perdus comme on perd son mouchoir. Haute exception dans le monde obscur dont il était, Babet lisait les journaux. Un jour, du temps qu'il avait sa famille avec lui dans sa baraque roulante, il avait lu dans le Messager qu'une femme venait d'accoucher d'un enfant suffisamment viable, ayant un mufle de veau, et il s'était écrié: Voilà une fortune! ce n'est pas ma femme qui aurait l'esprit de me faire un enfant comme cela!

Depuis, il avait tout quitté pour «entreprendre Paris». Expression de lui.

Qu'était-ce que Claquesous? C'était la nuit. Il attendait pour se montrer que le ciel se fût barbouillé de noir. Le soir il sortait d'un trou où il rentrait avant le jour. Où était ce trou? Personne ne le savait. Dans la plus complète obscurité, à ses complices, il ne parlait qu'en tournant le dos. S'appelait-il Claquesous? non. Il disait: Je m'appelle Pas-du-tout. Si une chandelle survenait, il mettait un masque. Il était ventriloque. Babet disait: Claquesous est un nocturne à deux voix. Claquesous était vague, errant, terrible. On n'était pas sûr qu'il eût un nom, Claquesous étant un sobriquet; on n'était pas sûr qu'il eût une voix, son ventre parlant plus souvent que sa bouche; on n'était pas sûr qu'il eût un visage, personne n'ayant jamais vu que son masque. Il disparaissait comme un évanouissement; ses apparitions étaient des sorties de terre.

Un être lugubre, c'était Montparnasse. Montparnasse était un enfant; moins de vingt ans, un joli visage, des lèvres qui ressemblaient à des cerises, de charmants cheveux noirs, la clarté du printemps dans les yeux; il avait tous les vices et aspirait à tous les crimes. La digestion du mal le mettait en appétit du pire. C'était le gamin tourné voyou, et le voyou devenu escarpe. Il était gentil, efféminé, gracieux, robuste, mou, féroce. Il avait le bord du chapeau relevé à gauche pour faire place à la touffe de cheveux, selon le style de 1829. Il vivait de voler violemment. Sa redingote était de la meilleure coupe, mais râpée. Montparnasse, c'était une gravure de modes ayant de la misère et commettant des meurtres. La cause de tous les attentats de cet adolescent était l'envie d'être bien mis. La première grisette qui lui avait dit: Tu es beau, lui avait jeté la tache des ténèbres dans le cœur, et avait fait un Caïn de cet Abel. Se trouvant joli, il avait voulu être élégant; or la première élégance, c'est l'oisiveté; l'oisiveté d'un pauvre, c'est le crime. Peu de rôdeurs étaient aussi redoutés que Montparnasse. À dix-huit ans, il avait déjà plusieurs cadavres derrière lui. Plus d'un passant les bras étendus gisait dans l'ombre de ce misérable, la face dans une mare de sang. Frisé, pommadé, pincé à la taille, des hanches de femme, un buste d'officier prussien, le murmure d'admiration des filles du boulevard autour de lui, la cravate savamment nouée, un casse-tête dans sa poche, une fleur à sa boutonnière; tel était ce mirliflore du sépulcre.

Chapitre IV

Composition de la troupe

À eux quatre, ces bandits formaient une sorte de Protée, serpentant à travers la police et s’efforçant d’échapper aux regards indiscrets de Vidocq «sous diverse figure, arbre, flamme, fontaine», s’entre-prêtant leurs noms et leurs trucs, se dérobant dans leur propre ombre, boîtes à secrets et asiles les uns pour les autres, défaisant leurs personnalités comme on ôte son faux nez au bal masqué, parfois se simplifiant au point de ne plus être qu’un, parfois se multipliant au point que Coco-Lacour lui-même les prenait pour une foule.

Ces quatre hommes n’étaient point quatre hommes; c’était une sorte de mystérieux voleur à quatre têtes travaillant en grand sur Paris; c’était le polype monstrueux du mal habitant la crypte de la société.

Grâce à leurs ramifications, et au réseau sous-jacent de leurs relations, Babet, Gueulemer, Claquesous et Montparnasse avaient l’entreprise générale des guets-apens du département de la Seine. Ils faisaient sur le passant le coup d’état d’en bas. Les trouveurs d’idées en ce genre, les hommes à imagination nocturne, s’adressaient à eux pour l’exécution. On fournissait aux quatre coquins le canevas, ils se chargeaient de la mise en scène. Ils travaillaient sur scénario. Ils étaient toujours en situation de prêter un personnel proportionné et convenable à tous les attentats ayant besoin d’un coup d’épaule et suffisamment lucratifs. Un crime étant en quête de bras, ils lui sous-louaient des complices. Ils avaient une troupe d’acteurs de ténèbres à la disposition de toutes les tragédies de cavernes.

Ils se réunissaient habituellement à la nuit tombante, heure de leur réveil, dans les steppes qui avoisinent la Salpêtrière. Là, ils conféraient. Ils avaient les douze heures noires devant eux; ils en réglaient l’emploi.

Patron-Minette, tel était le nom qu’on donnait dans la circulation souterraine à l’association de ces quatre hommes. Dans la vieille langue populaire fantasque qui va s’effaçant tous les jours, Patron-Minette signifie le matin, de même que Entre chien et loup signifie le soir. Cette appellation, Patron-Minette, venait probablement de l’heure à laquelle leur besogne finissait, l’aube étant l’instant de l’évanouissement des fantômes et de la séparation des bandits. Ces quatre hommes étaient connus sous cette rubrique. Quand le président des assises visita Lacenaire dans sa prison, il le questionna sur un méfait que Lacenaire niait. — Qui a fait cela? demanda le président. Lacenaire fit cette réponse, énigmatique pour le magistrat, mais claire pour la police: — C'est peut-être Patron-Minette.

On devine parfois une pièce sur l'énoncé des personnages; on peut de même presque apprécier une bande sur la liste des bandits. Voici, car ces noms-là surnagent dans les mémoires spéciales, à quelles appellations répondaient les principaux affiliés de Patron-Minette:

Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille.
Brujon. (Il y avait une dynastie de Brujon; nous ne renonçons pas à en dire un mot.)
Boulatruelle, le cantonnier déjà entrevu.
Laveuve.
Finistère.
Homère Hogu, nègre.
Mardisoir.
Dépêche.
Fauntleroy, dit Bouquetière.
Glorieux, forçat libéré.
Barrecarrosse, dit monsieur Dupont.
Lesplanade-du-Sud.
Poussagrive.
Carmagnolet.
Kruideniers, dit Bizarro.
Mangedentelle.
Les-pieds-en-l'air.
Demi-liards, dit Deux-milliards.
Etc., etc.

Nous en passons, et non des pires. Ces noms ont des figures. Ils n'expriment pas seulement des êtres, mais des espèces. Chacun de ces noms répond à une variété de ces difformes champignons du dessous de la civilisation. Ces êtres, peu prodigues de leurs visages, n'étaient pas de ceux qu'on voit passer dans les rues. Le jour, fatigués des nuits farouches qu'ils avaient, ils s'en allaient dormir, tantôt dans les fours à plâtre, tantôt dans les carrières abandonnées de Montmartre ou de Montrouge, parfois dans les égouts. Ils se terraient.

Que sont devenus ces hommes? Ils existent toujours. Ils ont toujours existé. Horace en parle: Ambubaiarum collegia, phannacopolae, mendici, mimae; et, tant que la société sera ce qu’elle est, ils seront ce qu’ils sont. Sous l’obscur plafond de leur cave, ils renaissent à jamais du suintement social. Ils reviennent, spectres, toujours identiques; seulement ils ne portent plus les mêmes noms et ils ne sont plus dans les mêmes peaux.

Les individus extirpés, la tribu subsiste.

Ils ont toujours les mêmes facultés. Du truand au rôdeur, la race se maintient pure. Ils devinent les bourses dans les poches, ils flairent les montres dans les goussets. L’or et l’argent ont pour eux une odeur. Il y a des bourgeois naïfs dont on pourrait dire qu’ils ont l’air volables. Ces hommes suivent patiemment ces bourgeois. Au passage d’un étranger ou d’un provincial, ils ont des tressaillements d’araignée.

Ces hommes-là, quand, vers minuit, sur un boulevard désert, on les rencontre ou on les entrevoit, sont effrayants. Ils ne semblent pas des hommes, mais des formes faites de brume vivante; on dirait qu’ils font habituellement bloc avec les ténèbres, qu’ils n’en sont pas distincts, qu’ils n’ont pas d’autre âme que l’ombre, et que c’est momentanément, et pour vivre pendant quelques minutes d’une vie monstrueuse, qu’ils se sont désagrégés de la nuit.

Que faut-il pour faire évanouir ces larves? De la lumière. De la lumière à flots. Pas une chauve-souris ne résiste à l’aube. Éclairez la société en dessous.

Livre huitième — Le mauvais pauvre

Chapitre I

Marius, cherchant une fille en chapeau, rencontre un homme en casquette

L’été passa, puis l’automne; l’hiver vint. Ni M. Leblanc ni la jeune fille n’avaient remis les pieds au Luxembourg. Marius n’avait plus qu’une pensée, revoir ce doux et adorable visage. Il cherchait toujours, il cherchait partout; il ne trouvait rien. Ce n’était plus Marius le rêveur enthousiaste, l’homme résolu, ardent et ferme, le hardi provocateur de la destinée, le cerveau qui échafaudait avenir sur avenir, le jeune esprit encombré de plans, de projets, de fiertés, d’idées et de volontés; c’était un chien perdu. Il tomba dans une tristesse noire. C’était fini. Le travail le rebutait, la promenade le fatiguait, la solitude l’ennuyait; la vaste nature, si remplie autrefois de formes, de clartés, de voix, de conseils, de perspectives, d’horizons, d’enseignements, était maintenant vide devant lui. Il lui semblait que tout avait disparu.

Il pensait toujours, car il ne pouvait faire autrement; mais il ne se plaisait plus dans ses pensées. À tout ce qu’elles lui proposaient tout bas sans cesse, il répondait dans l’ombre: À quoi bon?

Il se faisait cent reproches. Pourquoi l’ai-je suivie? J’étais si heureux rien que de la voir! Elle me regardait, est-ce que ce n’était pas immense? Elle avait l’air de m’aimer. Est-ce que ce n’était pas tout? J’ai voulu avoir quoi? Il n’y a rien après cela. J’ai été absurde. C’est ma faute, etc., etc. Courfeyrac, auquel il ne confiait rien, c’était sa nature, mais qui devinait un peu tout, c’était sa nature aussi, avait commencé par le féliciter d’être amoureux, en s’en ébahissant d’ailleurs; puis, voyant Marius tombé dans cette mélancolie, il avait fini par lui dire: — Je vois que tu as été simplement un animal. Tiens, viens à la Chaumière!

Une fois, ayant confiance dans un beau soleil de septembre, Marius s’était laissé mener au bal de Sceaux par Courfeyrac, Bossuet et Grantaire, espérant, quel rêve! qu’il la retrouverait peut-être là. Bien entendu, il n’y vit pas celle qu’il cherchait. — C’est pourtant ici qu’on retrouve toutes les femmes perdues, grommelait Grantaire en aparté. Marius laissa ses amis au bal, et s’en retourna à pied, seul, las, fiévreux, les yeux troubles et tristes dans la nuit, ahuri de bruit et de poussière par les joyeux coucous pleins d’êtres chantants qui revenaient de la fête et passaient à côté de lui, découragé, aspirant pour se rafraîchir la tête l’âcre senteur des noyers de la route.

Il se remit à vivre de plus en plus seul, égaré, accablé, tout à son angoisse intérieure, allant et venant dans sa douleur comme le loup dans le piège, quêtant partout l’absente, abruti d’amour.

Une autre fois, il avait fait une rencontre qui lui avait produit un effet singulier. Il avait croisé dans les petites rues qui avoisinent le boulevard des Invalides un homme vêtu comme un ouvrier et coiffé d’une casquette à longue visière qui laissait passer des mèches de cheveux très blancs. Marius fut frappé de la beauté de ces cheveux blancs et considéra cet homme qui marchait à pas lents et comme absorbé dans une méditation douloureuse. Chose étrange, il lui parut reconnaître M. Leblanc. C’étaient les mêmes cheveux, le même profil, autant que la casquette le laissait voir, la même allure, seulement plus triste. Mais pourquoi ces habits d’ouvrier? qu’est-ce que cela voulait dire? que signifiait ce déguisement? Marius fut très étonné. Quand il revint à lui, son premier mouvement fut de se mettre à suivre cet homme; qui sait s’il ne tenait point enfin la trace qu’il cherchait? En tout cas, il fallait revoir l’homme de près et éclaircir l’énigme. Mais il s’avisa de cette idée trop tard, l’homme n’était déjà plus là. Il avait pris quelque petite rue latérale, et Marius ne put le retrouver. Cette rencontre le préoccupa quelques jours, puis s’effaça. — Après tout, se dit-il, ce n’est probablement qu’une ressemblance.

Chapitre II

Trouvaille

Marius n’avait pas cessé d’habiter la masure Gorbeau. Il n’y faisait attention à personne.

À cette époque, à la vérité, il n’y avait plus dans cette masure d’autres habitants que lui et ces Jondrette dont il avait une fois acquitté le loyer, sans avoir du reste jamais parlé ni au père, ni aux filles. Les autres locataires étaient déménagés ou morts, ou avaient été expulsés faute de payement.

Un jour de cet hiver-là, le soleil s’était un peu montré dans l’après-midi, mais c’était le 2 février, cet antique jour de la Chandeleur dont le Soleil traître, précurseur d’un froid de six semaines, a inspiré à Mathieu Laensberg ces deux vers restés justement classiques:

Qu’il luise ou qu’il luiserne,
L’ours rentre en sa caverne.

Marius venait de sortir de la sienne. La nuit tombait. C’était l’heure d’aller dîner; car il avait bien fallu se remettre à dîner, hélas! ô infirmités des passions idéales!

Il venait de franchir le seuil de sa porte que mame Bougon balayait en ce moment-là même tout en prononçant ce mémorable monologue:

— Qu’est-ce qui est bon marché à présent? tout est cher. Il n’y a que la peine du monde qui est bon marché; elle est pour rien, la peine du monde!

Marius montait à pas lents le boulevard vers la barrière afin de gagner la rue Saint-Jacques. Il marchait pensif, la tête baissée.

Tout à coup il se sentit coudoyé dans la brume; il se retourna, et vit deux jeunes filles en haillons, l’une longue et mince, l’autre un peu moins grande, qui passaient rapidement, essoufflées, effarouchées, et comme ayant l’air de s’enfuir; elles venaient à sa rencontre, ne l’avaient pas vu, et l’avaient heurté en passant. Marius distinguait dans le crépuscule leurs figures livides, leurs têtes décoiffées, leurs cheveux épars, leurs affreux bonnets, leurs jupes en guenilles et leurs pieds nus. Tout en courant, elles se parlaient. La plus grande disait d’une voix très basse:

— Les cognes sont venus. Ils ont manqué me pincer au demi-cercle.

L’autre répondait: — Je les ai vus. J’ai cavalé, cavalé, cavalé!

Marius comprit, à travers cet argot sinistre, que les gendarmes ou les sergents de ville avaient failli saisir ces deux enfants, et que ces enfants s’étaient échappées.

Elles s’enfoncèrent sous les arbres du boulevard derrière lui, et y firent pendant quelques instants dans l’obscurité une espèce de blancheur vague qui s’effaça.

Marius s’était arrêté un moment.

Il allait continuer son chemin, lorsqu’il aperçut un petit paquet grisâtre à terre à ses pieds. Il se baissa et le ramassa. C’était une façon d’enveloppe qui paraissait contenir des papiers.

— Bon, dit-il, ces malheureuses auront laissé tomber cela!

Il revint sur ses pas, il appela, il ne les retrouva plus; il pensa qu’elles étaient déjà loin, mit le paquet dans sa poche, et s’en alla dîner.

Chemin faisant, il vit dans une allée de la rue Mouffetard une bière d’enfant couverte d’un drap noir, posée sur trois chaises et éclairée par une chandelle. Les deux filles du crépuscule lui revinrent à l’esprit.

— Pauvres mères! pensa-t-il. Il y a une chose plus triste que de voir ses enfants mourir; c’est de les voir mal vivre.

Puis ces ombres qui variaient sa tristesse lui sortirent de la pensée, et il retomba dans ses préoccupations habituelles. Il se remit à songer à ses six mois d’amour et de bonheur en plein air et en pleine lumière sous les beaux arbres du Luxembourg.

— Comme ma vie est devenue sombre! se disait-il. Les jeunes filles m’apparaissent toujours. Seulement autrefois c’étaient les anges; maintenant ce sont les goules.

Chapitre III

Quadrifrons

Le soir, comme il se déshabillait pour se coucher, sa main rencontra dans la poche de son habit le paquet qu'il avait ramassé sur le boulevard. Il l'avait oublié. Il songea qu'il serait utile de l'ouvrir, et que ce paquet contenait peut-être l'adresse de ces jeunes filles, si, en réalité, il leur appartenait, et dans tous les cas les renseignements nécessaires pour le restituer à la personne qui l'avait perdu.

Il défit l'enveloppe.

Elle n'était pas cachetée et contenait quatre lettres, non cachetées également.

Les adresses y étaient mises.

Toutes quatre exhalaient une odeur d'affreux tabac.

La première lettre était adressée: à Madame, madame la marquise de Grucheray, place vis-à-vis la chambre des députés, nº...

Marius se dit qu'il trouverait probablement là les indications qu'il cherchait, et que d'ailleurs la lettre n'étant pas fermée, il était vraisemblable qu'elle pouvait être lue sans inconvénient.

Elle était ainsi conçue:

«Madame la marquise,

«La vertu de la clémence et pitié est celle qui unit plus étroitement la société. Promenez votre sentiment chrétien, et faites un regard de compassion sur cette infortuné español victime de la loyauté et d'attachement à la cause sacrée de la légitimé, qu'il a payé de son sang, consacrée sa fortune, toute, pour défendre cette cause, et aujourd'hui se trouve dans la plus grande misère. Il ne doute point que votre honorable personne l'accordera un secours pour conserver une existence extrêmement pénible pour un militaire d'éducation et d'honneur plein de blessures. Compte d'avance sur l'humanité qui vous animé et sur l'intérêt que Madame la marquise porte à une nation aussi malheureuse. Leur prière ne sera pas en vaine, et leur reconnaissance conservera sont charmant souvenir.

«De mes sentiments respectueux avec lesquelles j'ai l'honneur d'être,

«Madame,

«Don Alvarez, capitaine español de caballerie, royaliste refugié en France que se trouve en voyagé pour sa patrie et le manquent les réssources pour continuer son voyagé.»

Aucune adresse n’était jointe à la signature. Marius espéra trouver l’adresse dans la deuxième lettre dont la suscription portait: à Madame, madame la contesse de Montvernet, rue Cassette, nº 9.

Voici ce que Marius y lut:

«Madame la comtesse,

«C’est une malheureuse meré de famille de six enfants dont le dernier n’a que huit mois. Moi malade depuis ma dernière couche, abandonnée de mon mari depuis cinq mois n’aiyant aucune réssource au monde dans la plus affreuse indigance.

«Dans l’espoir de Madame la contesse, elle a l’honneur d’être, madame, avec un profond respect,

«Femme Balizard.»

Marius passa à la troisième lettre, qui était comme les précédentes une supplique; on y lisait:

«Monsieur Pabourgeot, électeur, négociant-bonnetier en gros, rue Saint-Denis au coin de la rue aux Fers.

«Je me permets de vous adresser cette lettre pour vous prier de m’accorder la faveur prétieuse de vos simpaties et de vous intéresser à un homme de lettres qui vient d’envoyer un drame au théâtre-français. Le sujet en est historique, et l’action se passe en Auvergne du temps de l’empire. Le style, je crois, en est naturel, laconique, et peut avoir quelque mérite. Il y a des couplets a chanter a quatre endroits. Le comique, le sérieux, l’imprévu, s’y mêlent à la variété des caractères et a une teinte de romantisme répandue légèrement dans toute l’intrigue qui marche mistérieusement, et va, par des péripessies frappantes, se denouer au milieu de plusieurs coups de scènes éclatants.

«Mon but principal est de satisfère le desir qui anime progresivement l’homme de notre siècle, c’est à dire, la mode, cette caprisieuse et bizarre girouette qui change presque à chaque nouveau vent.

«Malgré ces qualités j’ai lieu de craindre que la jalousie, l’égoïsme des auteurs privilégiés, obtienne mon exclusion du théâtre, car je n’ignore pas les déboires dont on abreuve les nouveaux venus.

«Monsieur Pabourgeot, votre juste réputation de protecteur éclairé des gants de lettres m’enhardit à vous envoyer ma fille qui vous exposera notre situation indigante, manquant de pain et de feu dans cette saison d’hyver. Vous dire que je vous prie d’agreer l’hommage que je désire vous faire de mon drame et de tous ceux que je ferai, c’est vous prouver combien j’ambicionne l’honneur de m’abriter sous votre égide, et de parer mes écrits de votre nom. Si vous daignez m’honorer de la plus modeste offrande, je m’occuperai aussitôt à faire une pièsse de vers pour vous payer mon tribu de reconnaissance. Cette pièsse, que je tacherai de rendre aussi parfaite que possible, vous sera envoyée avant d’être insérée au commencement du drame et débitée sur la scène.

«À Monsieur,

«Et Madame Pabourgeot,

«Mes hommages les plus respectueux.

«Genflot, homme de lettres.

«P. S. Ne serait-ce que quarante sous.

«Excusez-moi d’envoyer ma fille et de ne pas me présenter moi-même, mais de tristes motifs de toilette ne me permettent pas, hélas! de sortir...»

Marius ouvrit enfin la quatrième lettre. Il y avait sur l’adresse: Au monsieur bienfaisant de l’église Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas. Elle contenait ces quelques lignes:

«Homme bienfaisant,

«Si vous daignez accompagner ma fille, vous verrez une calamité missérable, et je vous montrerai mes certificats.

«À l’aspect de ces écrits votre âme généreuse sera mue d’un sentiment de sensible bienveillance, car les vrais philosophes éprouvent toujours de vives émotions.

«Convenez, homme compatissant, qu’il faut éprouver le plus cruel besoin, et qu’il est bien douloureux, pour obtenir quelque soulagement, de le faire attester par l’autorité comme si l’on n’était pas libre de souffrir et de mourir d’inanition en attendant que l’on soulage notre misère. Les destins sont bien fatals pour d’aucuns et trop prodigue ou trop protecteur pour d’autres.

«J’attends votre présence ou votre offrande, si vous daignez la faire, et je vous prie de vouloir bien agréer les sentiments respectueux avec lesquels je m’honore d’être,

«homme vraiment magnanime,

«votre très humble

«et très obéissant serviteur,

«P. Fabantou, artiste dramatique.»

Après avoir lu ces quatre lettres, Marius ne se trouva pas beaucoup plus avancé qu’auparavant.

D’abord aucun des signataires ne donnait son adresse.

Ensuite elles semblaient venir de quatre individus différents, don Alvarès, la femme Balizard, le poète Genflot et l’artiste dramatique Fabantou, mais ces lettres offraient ceci d’étrange qu’elles étaient écrites toutes quatre de la même écriture.

Que conclure de là, sinon qu’elles venaient de la même personne?

En outre, et cela rendait la conjecture plus vraisemblable, le papier, grossier et jauni, était le même pour les quatre, l’odeur de tabac était la même, et, quoiqu’on eût évidemment cherché à varier le style, les mêmes fautes d’orthographe s’y reproduisaient avec une tranquillité profonde, et l’homme de lettres Genflot n’en était pas plus exempt que le capitaine español.

S’évertuer à deviner ce petit mystère était peine inutile. Si ce n’eût pas été une trouvaille, cela eût eu l’air d’une mystification. Marius était trop triste pour bien prendre même une plaisanterie du hasard et pour se prêter au jeu que paraissait vouloir jouer avec lui le pavé de la rue. Il lui semblait qu’il était à colin-maillard entre ces quatre lettres qui se moquaient de lui.

Rien n’indiquait d’ailleurs que ces lettres appartinssent aux jeunes filles que Marius avait rencontrées sur le boulevard. Après tout, c’étaient des paperasses évidemment sans aucune valeur.

Marius les remit dans l’enveloppe, jeta le tout dans un coin, et se coucha.

Vers sept heures du matin, il venait de se lever et de déjeuner, et il essayait de se mettre au travail lorsqu’on frappa doucement à sa porte.

Comme il ne possédait rien, il n’ôtait jamais sa clef, si ce n’est quelquefois, fort rarement, lorsqu’il travaillait à quelque travail pressé. Du reste, même absent, il laissait sa clef à sa serrure. — On vous volera, disait mame Bougon. — Quoi? disait Marius. — Le fait est pourtant qu’un jour on lui avait volé une vieille paire de bottes, au grand triomphe de mame Bougon.

On frappa un second coup, très doux comme le premier.

— Entrez, dit Marius.

La porte s’ouvrit.

— Qu’est-ce que vous voulez, mame Bougon? reprit Marius sans quitter des yeux les livres et les manuscrits qu’il avait sur sa table.

Une voix, qui n’était pas celle de mame Bougon, répondit:

— Pardon, monsieur....

C’était une voix sourde, cassée, étranglée, éraillée, une voix de vieux homme enroué d’eau-de-vie et de rogome.

Marius se tourna vivement, et vit une jeune fille.

Chapitre IV

Une rose dans la misère

Une toute jeune fille était debout dans la porte entrebâillée. La lucarne du galetas où le jour paraissait était précisément en face de la porte et éclairait cette figure d'une lumière blafarde. C'était une créature hâve, chétive, décharnée; rien qu'une chemise et une jupe sur une nudité frissonnante et glacée. Pour ceinture une ficelle, pour coiffure une ficelle, des épaules pointues sortant de la chemise, une pâleur blonde et lymphatique, des clavicules terreuses, des mains rouges, la bouche entr'ouverte et dégradée, des dents de moins, l'œil terne, hardi et bas, les formes d'une jeune fille avortée et le regard d'une vieille femme corrompue; cinquante ans mêlés à quinze ans; un de ces êtres qui sont tout ensemble faibles et horribles et qui font frémir ceux qu'ils ne font pas pleurer.

Marius s'était levé et considérait avec une sorte de stupeur cet être presque pareil aux formes de l'ombre qui traversent les rêves.

Ce qui était poignant surtout, c'est que cette fille n'était pas venue au monde pour être laide. Dans sa première enfance, elle avait dû même être jolie. La grâce de l'âge luttait encore contre la hideuse vieillesse anticipée de la débauche et de la pauvreté. Un reste de beauté se mourait sur ce visage de seize ans, comme ce pâle soleil qui s'éteint sous d'affreuses nuées à l'aube d'une journée d'hiver.

Ce visage n'était pas absolument inconnu à Marius. Il croyait se rappeler l'avoir vu quelque part.

— Que voulez-vous, mademoiselle? demanda-t-il.

La jeune fille répondit avec sa voix de galérien ivre:

— C'est une lettre pour vous, monsieur Marius.

Elle appelait Marius par son nom; il ne pouvait douter que ce ne fût à lui qu'elle eût affaire; mais qu'était-ce que cette fille? comment savait-elle son nom?

Sans attendre qu'il lui dît d'avancer, elle entra. Elle entra résolûment, regardant avec une sorte d'assurance qui serrait le cœur toute la chambre et le lit défait. Elle avait les pieds nus. De larges trous à son jupon laissaient voir ses longues jambes et ses genoux maigres. Elle grelottait.

Elle tenait en effet une lettre à la main qu'elle présenta à Marius.

Marius en ouvrant cette lettre remarqua que le pain à cacheter large et énorme était encore mouillé. Le message ne pouvait venir de bien loin. Il lut:

«Mon aimable voisin, jeune homme!

«J’ai apris vos bontés pour moi, que vous avez payé mon terme il y a six mois. Je vous bénis, jeune homme. Ma fille aînée vous dira que nous sommes sans un morceau de pain depuis deux jours, quatre personnes, et mon épouse malade. Si je ne suis point dessu dans ma pensée, je crois devoir espérer que votre cœur généreux s’humanisera à cet exposé et vous subjuguera le désir de m’être propice en daignant me prodiguer un léger bienfait.

«Je suis avec la considération distinguée qu’on doit aux bienfaiteurs de l’humanité, «Jondrette.

«P. S. — Ma fille attendra vos ordres, cher monsieur Marius.»

Cette lettre, au milieu de l’aventure obscure qui occupait Marius depuis la veille au soir, c’était une chandelle dans une cave. Tout fut brusquement éclairé.

Cette lettre venait d’où venaient les quatre autres. C’était la même écriture, le même style, la même orthographe, le même papier, la même odeur de tabac.

Il y avait cinq missives, cinq histoires, cinq noms, cinq signatures, et un seul signataire. Le capitaine español don Alvarès, la malheureuse mère Balizard, le poëte dramatique Genflot, le vieux comédien Fabantou se nommaient tous les quatre Jondrette, si toutefois Jondrette lui-même s’appelait Jondrette.

Depuis assez longtemps déjà que Marius habitait la masure, il n’avait eu, nous l’avons dit, que de bien rares occasions de voir, d’entrevoir même son très infime voisinage. Il avait l’esprit ailleurs, et où est l’esprit est le regard. Il avait dû plus d’une fois croiser les Jondrette dans le corridor ou dans l’escalier; mais ce n’était pour lui que des silhouettes; il y avait pris si peu garde que la veille au soir il avait heurté sur le boulevard sans les reconnaître les filles Jondrette, car c’était évidemment elles, et que c’était à grand’peine que celle-ci, qui venait d’entrer dans sa chambre, avait éveillé en lui, à travers le dégoût et la pitié, un vague souvenir de l’avoir rencontrée ailleurs.

Maintenant il voyait clairement tout. Il comprenait que son voisin Jondrette avait pour industrie dans sa détresse d’exploiter la charité des personnes bienfaisantes, qu’il se procurait des adresses, et qu’il écrivait sous des noms supposés à des gens qu’il jugeait riches et pitoyables des lettres que ses filles portaient, à leurs risques et périls, car ce père en était là qu’il risquait ses filles; il jouait une partie avec la destinée et il les mettait au jeu. Marius comprenait que probablement, à en juger par leur fuite de la veille, par leur essoufflement, par leur terreur, et par ces mots d’argot qu’il avait entendus, ces infortunées faisaient encore on ne sait quels métiers sombres, et que de tout cela, il était résulté, au milieu de la société humaine telle qu’elle est faite, deux misérables êtres qui n’étaient ni des enfants, ni des filles, ni des femmes, espèces de monstres impurs et innocents produits par la misère.

Tristes créatures sans nom, sans âge, sans sexe, auxquelles ni le bien, ni le mal ne sont plus possibles, et qui, en sortant de l’enfance, n’ont déjà plus rien dans ce monde, ni la liberté, ni la vertu, ni la responsabilité. Âmes écloses hier, fanées aujourd’hui, pareilles à ces fleurs tombées dans la rue que toutes les boues flétrissent en attendant qu’une roue les écrase.

Cependant, tandis que Marius attachait sur elle un regard étonné et douloureux, la jeune fille allait et venait dans la mansarde avec une audace de spectre. Elle se démenait sans se préoccuper de sa nudité. Par instants, sa chemise défaite et déchirée lui tombait presque à la ceinture. Elle remuait les chaises, elle dérangeait les objets de toilette posés sur la commode, elle touchait aux vêtements de Marius, elle furetait ce qu’il y avait dans les coins.

— Tiens, dit-elle, vous avez un miroir!

Et elle fredonnait, comme si elle eût été seule, des bribes de vaudeville, des refrains folâtres que sa voix gutturale et rauque faisait lugubres. Sous cette hardiesse perçait je ne sais quoi de contraint, d’inquiet et d’humilié. L’effronterie est une honte.

Rien n’était plus morne que de la voir s’ébattre et pour ainsi dire voleter dans la chambre avec des mouvements d’oiseau que le jour effare, ou qui a l’aile cassée. On sentait qu’avec d’autres conditions d’éducation et de destinée, l’allure gaie et libre de cette jeune fille eût pu être quelque chose de doux et de charmant. Jamais parmi les animaux la créature née pour être une colombe ne se change en une orfraie. Cela ne se voit que parmi les hommes.

Marius songeait, et la laissait faire.

Elle s’approcha de la table.

— Ah! dit-elle, des livres!

Une lueur traversa son œil vitreux. Elle reprit, et son accent exprimait ce bonheur de se vanter de quelque chose, auquel nulle créature humaine n’est insensible:

— Je sais lire, moi.

Elle saisit vivement le livre ouvert sur la table, et lut assez couramment:

«...Le général Bauduin reçut l’ordre d’enlever avec les cinq bataillons de sa brigade le château de Hougomont qui est au milieu de la plaine de Waterloo...»

Elle s’interrompit:

— Ah! Waterloo! Je connais ça. C’est une bataille dans les temps. Mon père y était. Mon père a servi dans les armées. Nous sommes joliment bonapartistes chez nous, allez! C’est contre les Anglais Waterloo.

Elle posa le livre, prit une plume, et s’écria:

— Et je sais écrire aussi!

Elle trempa la plume dans l’encre, et se tournant vers Marius:

— Voulez-vous voir? Tenez, je vais écrire un mot pour voir.

Et avant qu’il eût eu le temps de répondre, elle écrivit sur une feuille de papier blanc qui était au milieu de la table: Les cognes sont là.

Puis, jetant la plume:

— Il n’y a pas de fautes d’orthographe. Vous pouvez regarder. Nous avons reçu de l’éducation, ma sœur et moi. Nous n’avons pas toujours été comme nous sommes. Nous n’étions pas faites....

Ici elle s’arrêta, fixa sa prunelle éteinte sur Marius, et éclata de rire en disant avec une intonation qui contenait toutes les angoisses étouffées par tous les cynismes:

— Bah!

Et elle se mit à fredonner ces paroles sur un air gai:

J’ai faim, mon père.
Pas de fricot.
J’ai froid, ma mère.
Pas de tricot.
Grelotte,
Lolotte!
Sanglote,

Jacquot!

À peine eut-elle achevé ce couplet qu'elle s'écria:

— Allez-vous quelquefois au spectacle, monsieur Marius? Moi, j'y vais. J'ai un petit frère qui est ami avec des artistes et qui me donne des fois des billets. Par exemple, je n'aime pas les banquettes de galeries. On y est gêné, on y est mal. Il y a quelquefois du gros monde; il y a aussi du monde qui sent mauvais.

Puis elle considéra Marius, prit un air étrange, et lui dit:

— Savez-vous, monsieur Marius, que vous êtes très joli garçon?

Et en même temps il leur vint à tous les deux la même pensée, qui la fit sourire et qui le fit rougir.

Elle s'approcha de lui, et lui posa une main sur l'épaule.

— Vous ne faites pas attention à moi, mais je vous connais, monsieur Marius. Je vous rencontre ici dans l'escalier, et puis je vous vois entrer chez un appelé le père Mabeuf qui demeure du côté d'Austerlitz, des fois, quand je me promène par là. Cela vous va très bien, vos cheveux ébouriffés.

Sa voix cherchait à être très douce et ne parvenait qu'à être basse. Une partie des mots se perdait dans le trajet du larynx aux lèvres comme sur un clavier où il manque des notes.

Marius s'était reculé doucement.

— Mademoiselle, dit-il avec sa gravité froide, j'ai là un paquet qui est, je crois, à vous. Permettez-moi de vous le remettre.

Et il lui tendit l'enveloppe qui renfermait les quatre lettres.

Elle frappa dans ses deux mains, et s'écria:

— Nous avons cherché partout!

Puis elle saisit vivement le paquet, et défit l'enveloppe, tout en disant:

— Dieu de Dieu! avons-nous cherché, ma sœur et moi! Et c'est vous qui l'aviez trouvé! Sur le boulevard, n'est-ce pas? ce doit être sur le boulevard? Voyez-vous, ça a tombé quand nous avons couru. C'est ma mioche de sœur qui a fait la bêtise. En rentrant nous ne l'avons plus trouvé. Comme nous ne voulions pas être battues, que cela est inutile, que cela est entièrement inutile, que cela est absolument inutile, nous avons dit chez nous que nous avions porté les lettres chez les personnes et qu'on nous avait dit nix! Les voilà, ces pauvres lettres! Et à quoi avez-vous vu qu'elles étaient à moi? Ah! oui, à l'écriture! C'est donc vous que nous avons cogné en passant hier au soir. On n'y voyait pas, quoi! J'ai dit à ma sœur: Est-ce que c'est un monsieur? Ma sœur m'a dit: Je crois que c'est un monsieur!

Cependant, elle avait déplié la supplique adressée «au monsieur bienfaisant de l’église Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas».

— Tiens! dit-elle, c’est celle pour ce vieux qui va à la messe. Au fait, c’est l’heure. Je vas lui porter. Il nous donnera peut-être de quoi déjeuner.

Puis elle se remit à rire, et ajouta:

— Savez-vous ce que cela fera si nous déjeunons aujourd’hui? Cela fera que nous aurons eu notre déjeuner d’avant-hier, notre dîner d’avant-hier, notre déjeuner d’hier, notre dîner d’hier, tout ça en une fois, ce matin. Tiens! parbleu! si vous n’êtes pas contents, crevez, chiens!

Ceci fit souvenir Marius de ce que la malheureuse venait chercher chez lui.

Il fouilla dans son gilet, il n’y trouva rien.

La jeune fille continuait, et semblait parler comme si elle n’avait plus conscience que Marius fût là.

— Des fois je m’en vais le soir. Des fois je ne rentre pas. Avant d’être ici, l’autre hiver nous demeurions sous les arches des ponts. On se serrait pour ne pas geler. Ma petite sœur pleurait. L’eau, comme c’est triste! Quand je pensais à me noyer, je disais: Non, c’est trop froid. Je vais toute seule quand je veux, je dors des fois dans les fossés. Savez-vous, la nuit, quand je marche sur le boulevard, je vois les arbres comme des fourches, je vois des maisons toutes noires grosses comme les tours de Notre-Dame, je me figure que les murs blancs sont la rivière, je me dis: Tiens, il y a de l’eau là! Les étoiles sont comme des lampions d’illuminations, on dirait qu’elles fument et que le vent les éteint, je suis ahurie, comme si j’avais des chevaux qui me soufflent dans l’oreille; quoique ce soit la nuit, j’entends des orgues de Barbarie et les mécaniques des filatures, est-ce que je sais, moi? Je crois qu’on me jette des pierres, je me sauve sans savoir, tout tourne, tout tourne. Quand on n’a pas mangé, c’est très drôle.

Et elle le regarda d’un air égaré.

À force de creuser et d’approfondir ses poches, Marius avait fini par réunir cinq francs seize sous. C’était en ce moment tout ce qu’il possédait au monde. — Voilà toujours mon dîner d’aujourd’hui, pensa-t-il, demain nous verrons. — Il prit les seize sous et donna les cinq francs à la fille.

Elle saisit la pièce.

— Bon, dit-elle, il y a du soleil!

Et comme si ce soleil eût eu la propriété de faire fondre dans son cerveau des avalanches d’argot, elle poursuivit:

— Cinque francs! du luisant! un monarque! dans cette piolle! c’est chenâtre! Vous êtes un bon mion. Je vous fonce mon palpitant. Bravo les fanandels! deux jours de pivois! et de la viandemuche! et du fricotmar! on pitancera chenument! et de la bonne mouise!

Elle ramena sa chemise sur ses épaules, fit un profond salut à Marius, puis un signe familier de la main, et se dirigea vers la porte en disant:

— Bonjour, monsieur. C’est égal. Je vas trouver mon vieux.

En passant, elle aperçut sur la commode une croûte de pain desséchée qui y moisissait dans la poussière; elle se jeta dessus et y mordit en grommelant:

— C’est bon! c’est dur! ça me casse les dents!

Puis elle sortit.

Chapitre V

Le judas de la providence

Marius depuis cinq ans avait vécu dans la pauvreté, dans le dénûment, dans la détresse même, mais il s’aperçut qu’il n’avait point connu la vraie misère. La vraie misère, il venait de la voir. C’était cette larve qui venait de passer sous ses yeux. C’est qu’en effet qui n’a vu que la misère de l’homme n’a rien vu, il faut voir la misère de la femme; qui n’a vu que la misère de la femme n’a rien vu, il faut voir la misère de l’enfant.

Quand l’homme est arrivé aux dernières extrémités, il arrive en même temps aux dernières ressources. Malheur aux êtres sans défense qui l’entourent! Le travail, le salaire, le pain, le feu, le courage, la bonne volonté, tout lui manque à la fois. La clarté du jour semble s’éteindre au dehors, la lumière morale s’éteint au dedans; dans ces ombres, l’homme rencontre la faiblesse de la femme et de l’enfant, et les ploie violemment aux ignominies.

Alors toutes les horreurs sont possibles. Le désespoir est entouré de cloisons fragiles qui donnent toutes sur le vice ou sur le crime.

La santé, la jeunesse, l’honneur, les saintes et farouches délicatesses de la chair encore neuve, le cœur, la virginité, la pudeur, cet épiderme de l’âme, sont sinistrement maniés par ce tâtonnement qui cherche des ressources, qui rencontre l’opprobre, et qui s’en accommode. Pères, mères, enfants, frères, sœurs, hommes, femmes, filles, adhèrent, et s’agrègent presque comme une formation minérale, dans cette brumeuse promiscuité de sexes, de parentés, d’âges, d’infamies, d’innocences. Ils s’accroupissent, adossés les uns aux autres, dans une espèce de destin taudis. Ils s’entreregardent lamentablement. Ô les infortunés! comme ils sont pâles! comme ils ont froid! Il semble qu’ils soient dans une planète bien plus loin du soleil que nous.

Cette jeune fille fut pour Marius une sorte d’envoyée des ténèbres.

Elle lui révéla tout un côté hideux de la nuit.

Marius se reprocha presque les préoccupations de rêverie et de passion qui l’avaient empêché jusqu’à ce jour de jeter un coup d’œil sur ses voisins. Avoir payé leur loyer, c’était un mouvement machinal, tout le monde eût eu ce mouvement; mais lui Marius eût dû faire mieux. Quoi! un mur seulement le séparait de ces êtres abandonnés, qui vivaient à tâtons dans la nuit, en dehors du reste des vivants, il les coudoyait, il était en quelque sorte, lui, le dernier chaînon du genre humain qu'ils touchassent, il les entendait vivre ou plutôt râler à côté de lui, et il n'y prenait point garde! tous les jours à chaque instant, à travers la muraille, il les entendait marcher, aller, venir, parler, et il ne prêtait pas l'oreille! et dans ces paroles il y avait des gémissements, et il ne les écoutait même pas! sa pensée était ailleurs, à des songes, à des rayonnements impossibles, à des amours en l'air, à des folies; et cependant des créatures humaines, ses frères en Jésus-Christ, ses frères dans le peuple, agonisaient à côté de lui! agonisaient inutilement! Il faisait même partie de leur malheur, et il l'aggravait. Car s'ils avaient eu un autre voisin, un voisin moins chimérique et plus attentif, un homme ordinaire et charitable, évidemment leur indigence eût été remarquée, leurs signaux de détresse eussent été aperçus, et depuis longtemps déjà peut-être ils eussent été recueillis et sauvés! Sans doute ils paraissaient bien dépravés, bien corrompus, bien avilis, bien odieux même, mais ils sont rares, ceux qui sont tombés sans être dégradés; d'ailleurs il y a un point où les infortunés et les infâmes se mêlent et se confondent dans un seul mot, mot fatal, les misérables; de qui est-ce la faute? Et puis, est-ce que ce n'est pas quand la chute est plus profonde que la charité doit être plus grande?

Tout en se faisant cette morale, car il y avait des occasions où Marius, comme tous les cœurs vraiment honnêtes, était à lui-même son propre pédagogue, et se grondait plus qu'il ne le méritait, il considérait le mur qui le séparait des Jondrette, comme s'il eût pu faire passer à travers cette cloison son regard plein de pitié et en aller réchauffer ces malheureux. Le mur était une mince lame de plâtre soutenue par des lattes et des solives, et qui, comme on vient de le lire, laissait parfaitement distinguer le bruit des paroles et des voix. Il fallait être le songeur Marius pour ne pas s'en être encore aperçu. Aucun papier n'était collé sur ce mur ni du côté des Jondrette, ni du côté de Marius; on en voyait à nu la grossière construction. Sans presque en avoir conscience, Marius examinait cette cloison; quelquefois la rêverie examine, observe et scrute comme ferait la pensée. Tout à coup il se leva, il venait de remarquer vers le haut, près du plafond, un trou triangulaire résultant de trois lattes qui laissaient un vide entre elles. Le plâtras qui avait dû boucher ce vide était absent, et en montant sur la commode on pouvait voir par cette ouverture dans le galetas des Jondrette. La commisération a et doit avoir sa curiosité. Ce trou faisait une espèce de judas. Il est permis de regarder l’infortune en traître pour la secourir. — Voyons un peu ce que c’est que ces gens-là, pensa Marius, et où ils en sont.

Il escalada la commode, approcha sa prunelle de la crevasse et regarda.

Chapitre VI

L’homme fauve au gîte

Les villes, comme les forêts, ont leurs antres où se cachent tout ce qu’elles ont de plus méchant et de plus redoutable. Seulement, dans les villes, ce qui se cache ainsi est féroce, immonde et petit, c’est-à-dire laid; dans les forêts, ce qui se cache est féroce, sauvage et grand, c’est-à-dire beau. Repaires pour repaires, ceux des bêtes sont préférables à ceux des hommes. Les cavernes valent mieux que les bouges.

Ce que Marius voyait était un bouge.

Marius était pauvre et sa chambre était indigente; mais, de même que sa pauvreté était noble, son grenier était propre. Le taudis où son regard plongeait en ce moment était abject, sale, fétide, infect, ténébreux, sordide. Pour tous meubles, une chaise de paille, une table infirme, quelques vieux tessons, et dans deux coins deux grabats indescriptibles; pour toute clarté, une fenêtre-mansarde à quatre carreaux, drapée de toiles d’araignée. Il venait par cette lucarne juste assez de jour pour qu’une face d’homme parût une face de fantôme. Les murs avaient un aspect lépreux, et étaient couverts de coutures et de cicatrices comme un visage défiguré par quelque horrible maladie. Une humidité chassieuse y suintait. On y distinguait des dessins obscènes grossièrement charbonnés.

La chambre que Marius occupait avait un pavage de briques délabré; celle-ci n’était ni carrelée, ni planchéiée; on y marchait à cru sur l’antique plâtre de la masure devenu noir sous les pieds. Sur ce sol inégal, où la poussière était comme incrustée, et qui n’avait qu’une virginité, celle du balai, se groupaient capricieusement des constellations de vieux chaussons, de savates et de chiffons affreux; du reste cette chambre avait une cheminée; aussi la louait-on quarante francs par an. Il y avait de tout dans cette cheminée, un réchaud, une marmite, des planches cassées, des loques pendues à des clous, une cage d’oiseau, de la cendre, et même un peu de feu. Deux tisons y fumaient tristement.

Une chose qui ajoutait encore à l’horreur de ce galetas, c’est que c’était grand. Cela avait des saillies, des angles, des trous noirs, des dessous de toits, des baies et des promontoires. De là d’affreux coins insondables où il semblait que devaient se blottir des araignées grosses comme le poing, des cloportes larges comme le pied, et peut-être même on ne sait quels êtres humains monstrueux.

L’un des grabats était près de la porte, l’autre près de la fenêtre. Tous deux touchaient par une extrémité à la cheminée et faisaient face à Marius.

Dans un angle voisin de l’ouverture par où Marius regardait, était accrochée au mur dans un cadre de bois noir une gravure coloriée au bas de laquelle était écrit en grosses lettres: LE SONGE. Cela représentait une femme endormie et un enfant endormi, l’enfant sur les genoux de la femme, un aigle dans un nuage avec une couronne dans le bas, et la femme écartant la couronne de la tête de l’enfant, sans se réveiller d’ailleurs; au fond Napoléon dans une gloire s’appuyait sur une colonne gros bleu à chapiteau jaune ornée de cette inscription:

MARINGO. AUSTERLITS. IÉNA. WAGRAMME. ELOT.

Au-dessus de ce cadre, une espèce de panneau de bois plus long que large était posé à terre et appuyé en plan incliné contre le mur. Cela avait l’air d’un tableau retourné, d’un châssis probablement barbouillé de l’autre côté, de quelque trumeau détaché d’une muraille et oublié là en attendant qu’on le raccroche.

Près de la table, sur laquelle Marius apercevait une plume, de l’encre et du papier, était assis un homme d’environ soixante ans, petit, maigre, livide, hagard, l’air fin, cruel et inquiet; un gredin hideux.

Lavater, s’il eût considéré ce visage, y eût trouvé le vautour mêlé au procureur; l’oiseau de proie et l’homme de chicane s’enlaidissant et se complétant l’un par l’autre, l’homme de chicane faisant l’oiseau de proie ignoble, l’oiseau de proie faisant l’homme de chicane horrible.

Cet homme avait une longue barbe grise. Il était vêtu d’une chemise de femme qui laissait voir sa poitrine velue et ses bras nus hérissés de poils gris. Sous cette chemise, on voyait passer un pantalon boueux et des bottes dont sortaient les doigts de ses pieds.

Il avait une pipe à la bouche et il fumait. Il n’y avait plus de pain dans le taudis, mais il y avait encore du tabac.

Il écrivait, probablement quelque lettre comme celles que Marius avait lues.

Sur le coin de la table on apercevait un vieux volume rougeâtre dépareillé, et le format, qui était l’ancien in-12 des cabinets de lecture, révélait un roman. Sur la couverture, s’étalait ce titre imprimé en grosses majuscules: DIEU, LE ROI, L’HONNEUR ET LES DAMES, PAR DUCRAY-DUMINIL. 1814.

Tout en écrivant, l’homme parlait haut, et Marius entendait ses paroles:

— Dire qu’il n’y a pas d’égalité, même quand on est mort! Voyez un peu le Père-Lachaise! Les grands, ceux qui sont riches, sont en haut, dans l’allée des acacias, qui est pavée. Ils peuvent y arriver en voiture. Les petits, les pauvres gens, les malheureux, quoi! on les met dans le bas, où il y a de la boue jusqu’aux genoux, dans les trous, dans l’humidité. On les met là pour qu’ils soient plus vite gâtés! On ne peut pas aller les voir sans enfoncer dans la terre.

Ici il s’arrêta, frappa du poing sur la table, et ajouta en grinçant des dents:

— Oh! je mangerais le monde!

Une grosse femme qui pouvait avoir quarante ans ou cent ans était accroupie près de la cheminée sur ses talons nus.

Elle n’était vêtue, elle aussi, que d’une chemise et d’un jupon de tricot rapiécé avec des morceaux de vieux drap. Un tablier de grosse toile cachait la moitié du jupon. Quoique cette femme fût pliée et ramassée sur elle-même, on voyait qu’elle était de très haute taille. C’était une espèce de géante à côté de son mari. Elle avait d’affreux cheveux d’un blond roux grisonnants qu’elle remuait de temps en temps avec ses énormes mains luisantes à ongles plats.

À côté d’elle était posé à terre, tout grand ouvert, un volume du même format que l’autre, et probablement du même roman.

Sur un des grabats, Marius entrevoyait une espèce de longue petite fille blême assise, presque nue et les pieds pendants, n’ayant l’air ni d’écouter, ni de voir, ni de vivre.

La sœur cadette sans doute de celle qui était venue chez lui.

Elle paraissait onze ou douze ans. En l’examinant avec attention, on reconnaissait qu’elle en avait bien quatorze. C’était l’enfant qui disait la veille au soir sur le boulevard: J’ai cavalé! cavalé! cavalé!

Elle était de cette espèce malingre qui reste longtemps en retard, puis pousse vite et tout à coup. C’est l’indigence qui fait ces tristes plantes humaines. Ces créatures n’ont ni enfance ni adolescence. À quinze ans, elles en paraissent douze, à seize ans, elles en paraissent vingt. Aujourd’hui petites filles, demain femmes. On dirait qu’elles enjambent la vie, pour avoir fini plus vite.

En ce moment, cet être avait l'air d'un enfant.

Du reste, il ne se révélait dans ce logis la présence d'aucun travail; pas un métier, pas un rouet, pas un outil. Dans un coin quelques ferrailles d'un aspect douteux. C'était cette morne paresse qui suit le désespoir et qui précède l'agonie.

Marius considéra quelque temps cet intérieur funèbre plus effrayant que l'intérieur d'une tombe, car on y sentait remuer l'âme humaine et palpiter la vie.

Le galetas, la cave, la basse-fosse où de certains indigents rampent au plus bas de l'édifice social, n'est pas tout à fait le sépulcre, c'en est l'antichambre; mais, comme ces riches qui étalent leurs plus grandes magnificences à l'entrée de leur palais, il semble que la mort, qui est tout à côté, mette ses plus grandes misères dans ce vestibule.

L'homme s'était tu, la femme ne parlait pas, la jeune fille ne semblait pas respirer. On entendait crier la plume sur le papier.

L'homme grommela, sans cesser d'écrire:

— Canaille! canaille! tout est canaille!

Cette variante à l'épiphonème de Salomon arracha un soupir à la femme.

— Petit ami, calme-toi, dit-elle. Ne te fais pas de mal, chéri. Tu es trop bon d'écrire à tous ces gens-là, mon homme.

Dans la misère, les corps se serrent les uns contre les autres, comme dans le froid, mais les cœurs s'éloignent. Cette femme, selon toute apparence, avait dû aimer cet homme de la quantité d'amour qui était en elle; mais probablement, dans les reproches quotidiens et réciproques d'une affreuse détresse pesant sur tout le groupe, cela s'était éteint. Il n'y avait plus en elle pour son mari que de la cendre d'affection. Pourtant les appellations caressantes, comme cela arrive souvent, avaient survécu. Elle lui disait: Chéri, petit ami, mon homme, etc., de bouche, le cœur se taisant.

L'homme s'était remis à écrire.

Chapitre VII

Stratégie et tactique

Marius, la poitrine oppressée, allait redescendre de l'espèce d'observatoire qu'il s'était improvisé, quand un bruit attira son attention et le fit rester à sa place.

La porte du galetas venait de s'ouvrir brusquement.

La fille aînée parut sur le seuil.

Elle avait aux pieds de gros souliers d'homme tachés de boue qui avait jailli jusque sur ses chevilles rouges, et elle était couverte d'une vieille mante en lambeaux que Marius ne lui avait pas vue une heure auparavant, mais qu'elle avait probablement déposée à sa porte afin d'inspirer plus de pitié, et qu'elle avait dû reprendre en sortant. Elle entra, repoussa la porte derrière elle, s'arrêta pour reprendre haleine, car elle était tout essoufflée, puis cria avec une expression de triomphe et de joie:

— Il vient!

Le père tourna les yeux, la femme tourna la tête, la petite sœur ne bougea pas.

— Qui? demanda le père.

— Le monsieur!

— Le philanthrope?

— Oui.

— De l'église Saint-Jacques?

— Oui.

— Ce vieux?

— Oui.

— Et il va venir?

— Il me suit.

— Tu es sûre?

— Je suis sûre.

— Là, vrai, il vient?

— Il vient en fiacre.

— En fiacre. C'est Rothschild!

Le père se leva.

— Comment es-tu sûre? s’il vient en fiacre, comment se fait-il que tu arrives avant lui? Lui as-tu bien donné l’adresse au moins? lui as-tu bien dit la dernière porte au fond du corridor à droite? Pourvu qu’il ne se trompe pas! Tu l’as donc trouvé à l’église? a-t-il lu ma lettre? qu’est-ce qu’il t’a dit?

— Ta, ta, ta! dit la fille, comme tu galopes, bonhomme! Voici: je suis entrée dans l’église, il était à sa place d’habitude, je lui ai fait la révérence, et je lui ai remis la lettre, il a lu, et il m’a dit: Où demeurez-vous, mon enfant? J’ai dit: Monsieur, je vas vous mener. Il m’a dit: Non, donnez-moi votre adresse, ma fille a des emplettes à faire, je vais prendre une voiture, et j’arriverai chez vous en même temps que vous. Je lui ai donné l’adresse. Quand je lui ait dit la maison, il a paru surpris et qu’il hésitait un instant, puis il a dit: C’est égal, j’irai. La messe finie, je l’ai vu sortir de l’église avec sa fille, je les ai vus monter en fiacre. Et je lui ai bien dit la dernière porte au fond du corridor à droite.

— Et qu’est-ce qui te dit qu’il viendra?

— Je viens de voir le fiacre qui arrivait rue du Petit-Banquier. C’est ce qui fait que j’ai couru.

— Comment sais-tu que c’est le même fiacre?

— Parce que j’en avais remarqué le numéro donc!

— Quel est ce numéro?

— 440.

— Bien, tu es une fille d’esprit.

La fille regarda hardiment son père, et, montrant les chaussures qu’elle avait aux pieds: — Une fille d’esprit, c’est possible. Mais je dis que je ne mettrai plus ces souliers-là, et que je n’en veux plus, pour la santé d’abord, et pour la propreté ensuite. Je ne connais rien de plus agaçant que des semelles qui jutent et qui font ghi, ghi, ghi, tout le long du chemin. J’aime mieux aller nu-pieds.

— Tu as raison, répondit le père d’un ton de douceur qui contrastait avec la rudesse de la jeune fille, mais c’est qu’on ne te laisserait pas entrer dans les églises. Il faut que les pauvres aient des souliers. On ne va pas pieds nus chez le bon Dieu, ajouta-t-il amèrement. Puis revenant à l’objet qui le préoccupait: — Et tu es sûre, là, sûre, qu’il vient?

— Il est derrière mes talons, dit-elle.

L’homme se dressa. Il y avait une sorte d’illumination sur son visage.

— Ma femme! cria-t-il, tu entends. Voilà le philanthrope. Éteins le feu.

La mère stupéfaite ne bougea pas.

Le père, avec l’agilité d’un saltimbanque, saisit un pot égueulé qui était sur la cheminée et jeta de l’eau sur les tisons.

Puis s’adressant à sa fille aînée:

— Toi! dépaille la chaise!

Sa fille ne comprenait point.

Il empoigna la chaise et d’un coup de talon il en fit une chaise dépaillée. Sa jambe passa au travers.

Tout en retirant sa jambe, il demanda à sa fille:

— Fait-il froid?

— Très froid. Il neige.

Le père se tourna vers la cadette qui était sur le grabat près de la fenêtre et lui cria d’une voix tonnante:

— Vite! à bas du lit, fainéante! tu ne feras donc jamais rien! Casse un carreau!

La petite se jeta à bas du lit en frissonnant.

— Casse un carreau! reprit-il.

L’enfant demeura interdite.

— M’entends-tu? répéta le père, je te dis de casser un carreau!

L’enfant, avec une sorte d’obéissance terrifiée, se dressa sur la pointe du pied, et donna un coup de poing dans un carreau. La vitre se brisa et tomba à grand bruit.

— Bien, dit le père.

Il était grave et brusque. Son regard parcourait rapidement tous les recoins du galetas.

On eût dit un général qui fait les derniers préparatifs au moment où la bataille va commencer.

La mère, qui n’avait pas encore dit un mot, se souleva et demanda d’une voix lente et sourde et dont les paroles semblaient sortir comme figées:

— Chéri, qu’est-ce que tu veux faire?

— Mets-toi au lit répondit l’homme.

L’intonation n’admettait pas de délibération. La mère obéit et se jeta lourdement sur un des grabats.

Cependant on entendait un sanglot dans un coin.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est? cria le père.

La fille cadette, sans sortir de l’ombre où elle s’était blottie, montra son poing ensanglanté. En brisant la vitre elle s’était blessée; elle s’en était allée près du grabat de sa mère, et elle pleurait silencieusement.

Ce fut le tour de la mère de se redresser et de crier:

— Tu vois bien! les bêtises que tu fais! en cassant ton carreau, elle s’est coupée!

— Tant mieux! dit l’homme, c’était prévu.

— Comment? tant mieux? reprit la femme.

— Paix! répliqua le père, je supprime la liberté de la presse.

Puis, déchirant la chemise de femme qu’il avait sur le corps, il fit un lambeau de toile dont il enveloppa vivement le poignet sanglant de la petite.

Cela fait, son œil s’abaissa sur la chemise déchirée avec satisfaction.

— Et la chemise aussi, dit-il. Tout cela a bon air.

Une bise glacée sifflait à la vitre et entrait dans la chambre. La brume du dehors y pénétrait et s’y dilatait comme une ouate blanchâtre vaguement démêlée par des doigts invisibles. À travers le carreau cassé, on voyait tomber la neige. Le froid promis la veille par le soleil de la Chandeleur était en effet venu.

Le père promena un coup d’œil autour de lui comme pour s’assurer qu’il n’avait rien oublié. Il prit une vieille pelle et répandit de la cendre sur les tisons mouillés de façon à les cacher complètement.

Puis se relevant et s’adossant à la cheminée:

— Maintenant, dit-il, nous pouvons recevoir le philanthrope.

Chapitre VIII

Le rayon dans le bouge

La grande fille s’approcha et posa sa main sur celle de son père.

— Tâte comme j’ai froid, dit-elle.

— Bah! répondit le père, j’ai bien plus froid que cela.

La mère cria impétueusement:

— Tu as toujours tout mieux que les autres, toi! même le mal.

— À bas! dit l’homme.

La mère, regardée d’une certaine façon, se tut.

Il y eut dans le bouge un moment de silence. La fille aînée décrottait d’un air insouciant le bas de sa mante, la jeune sœur continuait de sangloter; la mère lui avait pris la tête dans ses deux mains et la couvrait de baisers en lui disant tout bas:

— Mon trésor, je t’en prie, ce ne sera rien, ne pleure pas, tu vas fâcher ton père.

— Non! cria le père, au contraire! sanglote! sanglote! cela fait bien.

Puis, revenant à l’aînée:

— Ah çà, mais! il n’arrive pas! S’il allait ne pas venir! j’aurais éteint mon feu, défoncé ma chaise, déchiré ma chemise et cassé mon carreau pour rien!

— Et blessé la petite! murmura la mère.

— Savez-vous, reprit le père, qu’il fait un froid de chien dans ce galetas du diable? Si cet homme ne venait pas! Oh! voilà! il se fait attendre! il se dit: Eh bien! ils m’attendront! ils sont là pour cela! — Oh! je les hais, et comme je les étranglerais avec jubilation, joie, enthousiasme et satisfaction, ces riches! tous ces riches! ces prétendus hommes charitables, qui font les conflits, qui vont à la messe, qui donnent dans la prêtraille, prêchi, prêcha, dans les calottes, et qui se croient au-dessus de nous, et qui viennent nous humilier, et nous apporter des vêtements! comme ils disent! des nippes qui ne valent pas quatre sous, et du pain! Ce n’est pas cela que je veux, tas de canailles! c’est de l’argent! Ah! de l’argent! jamais! parce qu’ils disent que nous l’irions boire, et que nous sommes des ivrognes et des fainéants! et eux! qu’est-ce qu’ils sont donc, et qu’est-ce qu’ils ont été dans leur temps? des voleurs! ils ne se seraient pas enrichis sans cela! Oh! l’on devrait prendre la société par les quatre coins de la nappe et tout jeter en l’air! tout se casserait, c’est possible, mais au moins personne n’aurait rien, ce serait cela de gagné! — Mais qu’est-ce qu’il fait donc, ton mufle de monsieur bienfaisant? viendra-t-il! L’animal a peut-être oublié l’adresse! Gageons que cette vieille bête....

En ce moment on frappa un léger coup à la porte; l’homme s’y précipita et l’ouvrit en s’écriant avec des salutations profondes et des sourires d’adoration:

— Entrez, monsieur! daignez entrer, mon respectable bienfaiteur, ainsi que votre charmante demoiselle.

Un homme d’un âge mûr et une jeune fille parurent sur le seuil du galetas.

Marius n’avait pas quitté sa place. Ce qu’il éprouva en ce moment échappe à la langue humaine.

C’était Elle.

Quiconque a aimé sait tous les sens rayonnants que contiennent les quatre lettres de ce mot: Elle.

C’était bien elle. C’est à peine si Marius la distinguait à travers la vapeur lumineuse qui s’était subitement répandue sur ses yeux. C’était ce doux être absent, cet astre qui lui avait lui pendant six mois, c’était cette prunelle, ce front, cette bouche, ce beau visage évanoui qui avait fait la nuit en s’en allant. La vision s’était éclipsée, elle reparaissait!

Elle reparaissait dans cette ombre, dans ce galetas, dans ce bouge difforme, dans cette horreur!

Marius frémissait éperdument. Quoi! c’était elle! les palpitations de son cœur lui troublaient la vue. Il se sentait prêt à fondre en larmes. Quoi! il la revoyait enfin après l’avoir cherchée si longtemps! il lui semblait qu’il avait perdu son âme et qu’il venait de la retrouver.

Elle était toujours la même, un peu pâle seulement; sa délicate figure s’encadrait dans un chapeau de velours violet, sa taille se dérobait sous une pelisse de satin noir. On entrevoyait sous sa longue robe son petit pied serré dans un brodequin de soie.

Elle était toujours accompagnée de M. Leblanc.

Elle avait fait quelques pas dans la chambre et avait déposé un assez gros paquet sur la table.

La Jondrette aînée s’était retirée derrière la porte et regardait d’un œil sombre ce chapeau de velours, cette mante de soie, et ce charmant visage heureux.

Chapitre IX

Jondrette pleure presque

Le taudis était tellement obscur que les gens qui venaient du dehors éprouvaient en y pénétrant un effet d’entrée de cave. Les deux nouveaux venus avancèrent donc avec une certaine hésitation, distinguant à peine des formes vagues autour d’eux, tandis qu’ils étaient parfaitement vus et examinés par les yeux des habitants du galetas, accoutumés à ce crépuscule.

M. Leblanc s’approcha avec son regard bon et triste, et dit au père Jondrette:

— Monsieur, vous trouverez dans ce paquet des hardes neuves, des bas et des couvertures de laine.

— Notre angélique bienfaiteur nous comble, dit Jondrette en s’inclinant jusqu’à terre. — Puis, se penchant à l’oreille de sa fille aînée, pendant que les deux visiteurs examinaient cet intérieur lamentable, il ajouta bas et rapidement:

— Hein? qu’est-ce que je disais? des nippes! pas d’argent. Ils sont tous les mêmes! À propos, comment la lettre à cette vieille ganache était-elle signée?

— Fabantou, répondit la fille.

— L’artiste dramatique, bon!

Bien en prit à Jondrette, car en ce moment-là même M. Leblanc se retournait vers lui, et lui disait de cet air de quelqu’un qui cherche le nom:

— Je vois que vous êtes bien à plaindre, monsieur....

— Fabantou, répondit vivement Jondrette.

— Monsieur Fabantou, oui, c’est cela, je me rappelle.

— Artiste dramatique, monsieur, et qui a eu des succès.

Ici Jondrette crut évidemment le moment venu de s’emparer du «philanthrope». Il s’écria avec un son de voix qui tenait tout à la fois de la gloriole du bateleur dans les foires et de l’humilité du mendiant sur les grandes routes:

— Élève de Talma, monsieur! je suis élève de Talma! La fortune m’a souri jadis. Hélas! maintenant c’est le tour du malheur. Voyez, mon bienfaiteur, pas de pain, pas de feu. Mes pauvres mômes n’ont pas de feu!

Mon unique chaise dépaillée! Un carreau cassé! par le temps qu'il fait! Mon épouse au lit! malade!

— Pauvre femme! dit M. Leblanc.

— Mon enfant blessée! ajouta Jondrette.

L'enfant, distraite par l'arrivée des étrangers, s'était mise à contempler «la demoiselle», et avait cessé de sangloter.

— Pleure donc! braille donc! lui dit Jondrette bas.

En même temps il lui pinça sa main malade. Tout cela avec un talent d'escamoteur.

La petite jeta les hauts cris.

L'adorable jeune fille que Marius nommait dans son cœur «son Ursule» s'approcha vivement:

— Pauvre chère enfant! dit-elle.

— Voyez, ma belle demoiselle, poursuivit Jondrette, son poignet ensanglanté! C'est un accident qui est arrivé en travaillant sous une mécanique pour gagner six sous par jour. On sera peut-être obligé de lui couper le bras!

— Vraiment? dit le vieux monsieur alarmé.

La petite fille, prenant cette parole au sérieux, se remit à sangloter de plus belle.

— Hélas, oui, mon bienfaiteur! répondit le père.

Depuis quelques instants, Jondrette considérait, «le philanthrope» d'une manière bizarre. Tout en parlant, il semblait le scruter avec attention comme s'il cherchait à recueillir des souvenirs. Tout à coup, profitant d'un moment où les nouveaux venus questionnaient avec intérêt la petite sur sa main blessée, il passa près de sa femme qui était dans son lit avec un air accablé et stupide, et lui dit vivement et très bas:

— Regarde donc cet homme-là!

Puis se retournant vers M. Leblanc, et continuant sa lamentation:

— Voyez, monsieur! je n'ai, moi, pour tout vêtement qu'une chemise de ma femme! et toute déchirée! au cœur de l'hiver. Je ne puis sortir faute d'un habit. Si j'avais le moindre habit, j'irais voir mademoiselle Mars qui me connaît et qui m'aime beaucoup. Ne demeure-t-elle pas toujours rue de la Tour-des-Dames? Savez-vous, monsieur? nous avons joué ensemble en province. J'ai partagé ses lauriers. Célimène viendrait à mon secours, monsieur! Elmire ferait l'aumône à Bélisaire! Mais non, rien! Et pas un sou dans la maison! Ma femme malade, pas un sou! Ma fille dangereusement blessée, pas un sou! Mon épouse a des étouffements. C’est son âge, et puis le système nerveux s’en est mêlé. Il lui faudrait des secours, et à ma fille aussi! Mais le médecin! mais le pharmacien! comment payer? pas un liard! Je m’agenouillerais devant un décime, monsieur! Voilà où les arts en sont réduits! Et savez-vous, ma charmante demoiselle, et vous, mon généreux protecteur, savez-vous, vous qui respirez la vertu et la bonté, et qui parfumez cette église où ma pauvre fille en venant faire sa prière vous aperçoit tous les jours?... Car j’élève mes filles dans la religion, monsieur. Je n’ai pas voulu qu’elles prissent le théâtre. Ah! les drôlesses; que je les voie broncher! Je ne badine pas, moi! Je leur flanque des bouzins sur l’honneur, sur la morale, sur la vertu! Demandez-leur. Il faut que ça marche droit. Elles ont un père. Ce ne sont pas de ces malheureuses qui commencent par n’avoir pas de famille et qui finissent par épouser le public. On est mamselle Personne, on devient madame Tout-le-Monde. Crebleur! pas de ça dans la famille Fabantou! J’entends les éduquer vertueusement, et que ça soit honnête, et que ça soit gentil, et que ça croie en Dieu! sacré nom! — Eh bien, monsieur, mon digne monsieur, savez-vous ce qui va se passer demain? Demain, c’est le 4 février, le jour fatal, le dernier délai que m’a donné mon propriétaire; si ce soir je ne l’ai pas payé, demain ma fille aînée, moi, mon épouse avec sa fièvre, mon enfant avec sa blessure, nous serons tous quatre chassés d’ici, et jetés dehors, dans la rue, sur le boulevard, sans abri, sous la pluie, sur la neige. Voilà, monsieur. Je dois quatre termes, une année! c’est-à-dire une soixantaine de francs.

Jondrette mentait. Quatre termes n’eussent fait que quarante francs, et il n’en pouvait devoir quatre, puisqu’il n’y avait pas six mois que Marius en avait payé deux.

M. Leblanc tira cinq francs de sa poche et les posa sur la table.

Jondrette eut le temps de grommeler à l’oreille de sa grande fille:

— Gredin! que veut-il que je fasse avec ses cinq francs? Cela ne me paye pas ma chaise et mon carreau! Faites donc des frais!

Cependant, M. Leblanc avait quitté une grande redingote brune qu’il portait par-dessus sa redingote bleue et l’avait jetée sur le dos de la chaise.

— Monsieur Fabantou, dit-il, je n’ai plus que ces cinq francs sur moi, mais je vais reconduire ma fille à la maison et je reviendrai ce soir; n’est-ce pas ce soir que vous devez payer?...

Le visage de Jondrette s’éclaira d’une expression étrange.

Il répondit vivement:

— Oui, mon respectable monsieur. À huit heures je dois être chez mon propriétaire.

— Je serai ici à six heures, et je vous apporterai les soixante francs.

— Mon bienfaiteur! cria Jondrette éperdu.

Et il ajouta tout bas:

— Regarde-le bien, ma femme!

M. Leblanc avait repris le bras de la belle jeune fille et se tournait vers la porte:

— À ce soir, mes amis, dit-il.

— Six heures? fit Jondrette.

— Six heures précises.

En ce moment le par-dessus resté sur la chaise frappa les yeux de la Jondrette aînée.

— Monsieur, dit-elle, vous oubliez votre redingote.

Jondrette dirigea vers sa fille un regard foudroyant accompagné d’un haussement d’épaules formidable.

M. Leblanc se retourna et répondit avec un sourire:

— Je ne l’oublie pas, je la laisse.

— Ô mon protecteur, dit Jondrette, mon auguste bienfaiteur, je fonds en larmes! Souffrez que je vous reconduise jusqu’à votre fiacre.

— Si vous sortez, repartit M. Leblanc, mettez ce par-dessus. Il fait vraiment très froid.

Jondrette ne se le fit pas dire deux fois. Il endossa vivement la redingote brune.

Et ils sortirent tous les trois, Jondrette précédant les deux étrangers.

Chapitre X

Tarif des cabriolets de régie: deux francs l’heure

Marius n’avait rien perdu de toute cette scène, et pourtant en réalité il n’en avait rien vu. Ses yeux étaient restés fixés sur la jeune fille, son cœur l’avait pour ainsi dire saisie et enveloppée tout entière dès son premier pas dans le galetas. Pendant tout le temps qu’elle avait été là, il avait vécu de cette vie de l’extase qui suspend les perceptions matérielles et précipite toute l’âme sur un seul point. Il contemplait, non pas cette fille, mais cette lumière qui avait une pelisse de satin et un chapeau de velours. L’étoile Sirius fût entrée dans la chambre qu’il n’eût pas été plus ébloui.

Tandis que la jeune fille ouvrait le paquet, dépliait les hardes et les couvertures, questionnait la mère malade avec bonté et la petite blessée avec attendrissement, il épiait tous ses mouvements, il tâchait d’écouter ses paroles. Il connaissait ses yeux, son front, sa beauté, sa taille, sa démarche, il ne connaissait pas le son de sa voix. Il avait cru en saisir quelques mots une fois au Luxembourg, mais il n’en était pas absolument sûr. Il eût donné dix ans de sa vie pour l’entendre, pour pouvoir emporter dans son âme un peu de cette musique. Mais tout se perdait dans les étalages lamentables et les éclats de trompette de Jondrette. Cela mêlait une vraie colère au ravissement de Marius. Il la couvait des yeux. Il ne pouvait s’imaginer que ce fût vraiment cette créature divine qu’il apercevait au milieu de ces êtres immondes dans ce taudis monstrueux. Il lui semblait voir un colibri parmi des crapauds.

Quand elle sortit, il n’eut qu’une pensée, la suivre, s’attacher à sa trace, ne la quitter que sachant où elle demeurait, ne pas la reperdre au moins après l’avoir si miraculeusement retrouvée! Il sauta à bas de la commode et prit son chapeau. Comme il mettait la main au pêne de la serrure et allait sortir, une réflexion l’arrêta. Le corridor était long, l’escalier roide, le Jondrette bavard, M. Leblanc n’était sans doute pas encore remonté en voiture; si, en se retournant dans le corridor, ou dans l’escalier, ou sur le seuil, il l’apercevait lui, Marius, dans cette maison, évidemment il s’alarmerait et trouverait moyen de lui échapper de nouveau, et ce serait encore une fois fini. Que faire? Attendre un peu? mais pendant cette attente, la voiture pouvait partir. Marius était perplexe. Enfin il se risqua, et sortit de sa chambre.

Il n'y avait plus personne dans le corridor. Il courut à l'escalier. Il n'y avait personne dans l'escalier. Il descendit en hâte, et il arriva sur le boulevard à temps pour voir un fiacre tourner le coin de la rue du Petit-Banquier et rentrer dans Paris.

Marius se précipita dans cette direction. Parvenu à l'angle du boulevard, il revit le fiacre qui descendait rapidement la rue Mouffetard; le fiacre était déjà très loin, aucun moyen de le rejoindre; quoi? courir après? impossible; et d'ailleurs de la voiture on remarquerait certainement un individu courant à toutes jambes à la poursuite du fiacre, et le père le reconnaîtrait. En ce moment, hasard inouï et merveilleux, Marius aperçut un cabriolet de régie qui passait à vide sur le boulevard. Il n'y avait qu'un parti à prendre, monter dans ce cabriolet, et suivre le fiacre. Cela était sûr, efficace et sans danger.

Marius fit signe au cocher d'arrêter, et lui cria:

— À l'heure!

Marius était sans cravate, il avait son vieil habit de travail auquel des boutons manquaient, sa chemise était déchirée à l'un des plis de la poitrine.

Le cocher s'arrêta, cligna de l'œil et étendit vers Marius sa main gauche en frottant doucement son index avec son pouce.

— Quoi? dit Marius.

— Payez d'avance, dit le cocher.

Marius se souvint qu'il n'avait sur lui que seize sous.

— Combien? demanda-t-il.

— Quarante sous.

— Je payerai en revenant.

Le cocher, pour toute réponse, siffla l'air de La Palisse et fouetta son cheval.

Marius regarda le cabriolet s'éloigner d'un air égaré. Pour vingt-quatre sous qui lui manquaient, il perdait sa joie, son bonheur, son amour! il retombait dans la nuit! il avait vu et il redevenait aveugle! il songea amèrement et, il faut bien le dire, avec un regret profond, aux cinq francs qu'il avait donnés le matin même à cette misérable fille. S'il avait eu ces cinq francs, il était sauvé, il renaissait, il sortait des limbes et des ténèbres, il sortait de l'isolement, du spleen, du veuvage; il renouait le fil noir de sa destinée à ce beau fil d'or qui venait de flotter devant ses yeux et de se casser encore une fois. Il rentra dans la masure désespéré.

Il aurait pu se dire que M. Leblanc avait promis de revenir le soir, et qu'il n'y aurait qu'à s'y mieux prendre cette fois pour le suivre; mais dans sa contemplation, c'est à peine s'il avait entendu.

Au moment de monter l'escalier, il aperçut de l'autre côté du boulevard, le long du mur désert de la rue de la Barrière des Gobelins, Jondrette enveloppé du par-dessus du «philanthrope», qui parlait à un de ces hommes de mine inquiétante qu'on est convenu d'appeler rôdeurs de barrières; gens à figures équivoques, à monologues suspects, qui ont un air de mauvaise pensée, et qui dorment assez habituellement de jour, ce qui fait supposer qu'ils travaillent la nuit.

Ces deux hommes, causant immobiles sous la neige qui tombait par tourbillons, faisaient un groupe qu'un sergent de ville eût à coup sûr observé, mais que Marius remarqua à peine.

Cependant, quelle que fût sa préoccupation douloureuse, il ne put s'empêcher de se dire que ce rôdeur de barrières à qui Jondrette parlait ressemblait à un certain Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille, que Courfeyrac lui avait montré une fois et qui passait dans le quartier pour un promeneur nocturne assez dangereux. On a vu, dans le livre précédent, le nom de cet homme. Ce Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille, a figuré plus tard dans plusieurs procès criminels et est devenu depuis un coquin célèbre. Il n'était encore alors qu'un fameux coquin. Aujourd'hui il est à l'état de tradition parmi les bandits et les escarpes. Il faisait école vers la fin du dernier règne. Et le soir, à la nuit tombante, à l'heure où les groupes se forment et se parlent bas, on en causait à la Force dans la fosse-aux-lions. On pouvait même, dans cette prison, précisément à l'endroit où passait sous le chemin de ronde ce canal des latrines qui servit à la fuite inouïe en plein jour de trente détenus en 1843, on pouvait, au-dessus de la date de ces latrines, lire son nom, PANCHAUD, audacieusement gravé par lui sur le mur de ronde dans une de ses tentatives d'évasion. En 1832, la police le surveillait déjà, mais il n'avait pas encore sérieusement débuté.

Chapitre XI

Offres de service de la misère à la douleur

Marius monta l’escalier de la masure à pas lents; à l’instant où il allait rentrer dans sa cellule, il aperçut derrière lui dans le corridor la Jondrette aînée qui le suivait. Cette fille lui fut odieuse à voir, c’était elle qui avait ses cinq francs, il était trop tard pour les lui redemander, le cabriolet n’était plus là, le fiacre était bien loin. D’ailleurs elle ne les lui rendrait pas. Quant à la questionner sur la demeure des gens qui étaient venus tout à l’heure, cela était inutile, il était évident qu’elle ne la savait point, puisque la lettre signée Fabantou était adressée au monsieur bienfaisant de l’église Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas.

Marius entra dans sa chambre et poussa sa porte derrière lui.

Elle ne se ferma pas; il se retourna et vit une main qui retenait la porte entr’ouverte.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est? demanda-t-il, qui est là?

C’était la fille Jondrette.

— C’est vous? reprit Marius presque durement, toujours vous donc! Que me voulez-vous?

Elle semblait pensive et ne regardait pas. Elle n’avait plus son assurance du matin. Elle n’était pas entrée et se tenait dans l’ombre du corridor, où Marius l’apercevait par la porte entre-bâillée.

— Ah çà, répondrez-vous? fit Marius. Qu’est-ce que vous me voulez?

Elle leva sur lui son œil morne où une espèce de clarté semblait s’allumer vaguement, et lui dit:

— Monsieur Marius, vous avez l’air triste. Qu’est-ce que vous avez?

— Moi! dit Marius.

— Oui, vous.

— Je n’ai rien.

— Si!

— Non.

— Je vous dis que si!

— Laissez-moi tranquille!

Marius poussa de nouveau la porte, elle continua de la retenir.

— Tenez, dit-elle, vous avez tort. Quoique vous ne soyez pas riche, vous avez été bon ce matin. Soyez-le encore à présent. Vous m’avez donné de quoi manger, dites-moi maintenant ce que vous avez. Vous avez du chagrin, cela se voit. Je ne voudrais pas que vous eussiez du chagrin. Qu’est-ce qu’il faut faire pour cela? Puis-je servir à quelque chose? Employez-moi. Je ne vous demande pas vos secrets, vous n’aurez pas besoin de me dire, mais enfin je peux être utile. Je peux bien vous aider, puisque j’aide mon père. Quand il faut porter des lettres, aller dans les maisons, demander de porte en porte, trouver une adresse, suivre quelqu’un, moi je sers à ça. Eh bien, vous pouvez bien me dire ce que vous avez, j’irai parler aux personnes. Quelquefois quelqu’un qui parle aux personnes, ça suffit pour qu’on sache les choses, et tout s’arrange. Servez-vous de moi.

Une idée traversa l’esprit de Marius. Quelle branche dédaigne-t-on quand on se sent tomber?

Il s’approcha de la Jondrette.

— Écoute... lui dit-il.

Elle l’interrompit avec un éclair de joie dans les yeux.

— Oh! oui, tutoyez-moi! j’aime mieux cela.

— Eh bien, reprit-il, tu as amené ici ce vieux monsieur avec sa fille....

— Oui.

— Sais-tu leur adresse?

— Non.

— Trouve-la-moi.

L’œil de la Jondrette, de morne, était devenu joyeux, de joyeux il devint sombre.

— C’est là ce que vous voulez? demanda-t-elle.

— Oui.

— Est-ce que vous les connaissez?

— Non.

— C’est-à-dire, reprit-elle vivement, vous ne la connaissez pas, mais vous voulez la connaître.

Ce les qui était devenu la avait je ne sais quoi de significatif et d’amer.

— Enfin, peux-tu? dit Marius.

— Vous avoir l’adresse de la belle demoiselle?

Il y avait encore dans ces mots «la belle demoiselle» une nuance qui importuna Marius. Il reprit:

— Enfin n’importe! l’adresse du père et de la fille. Leur adresse, quoi!

Elle le regarda fixement.

— Qu’est-ce que vous me donnerez?

— Tout ce que tu voudras!

— Tout ce que je voudrai?

— Oui.

— Vous aurez l’adresse.

Elle baissa la tête, puis d’un mouvement brusque elle tira la porte qui se referma.

Marius se retrouva seul.

Il se laissa tomber sur une chaise, la tête et les deux coudes sur son lit, abîmé dans des pensées qu’il ne pouvait saisir et comme en proie à un vertige. Tout ce qui s’était passé depuis le matin, l’apparition de l’ange, sa disparition, ce que cette créature venait de lui dire, une lueur d’espérance flottant dans un désespoir immense, voilà ce qui emplissait confusément son cerveau.

Tout à coup il fut violemment arraché à sa rêverie.

Il entendit la voix haute et dure de Jondrette prononcer ces paroles pleines du plus étrange intérêt pour lui:

— Je te dis que j’en suis sûr et que je l’ai reconnu.

De qui parlait Jondrette? il avait reconnu qui? M. Leblanc? le père de «son Ursule»? quoi! est-ce que Jondrette le connaissait? Marius allait-il avoir de cette façon brusque et inattendue tous les renseignements sans lesquels sa vie était obscure pour lui-même? allait-il savoir enfin qui il aimait, qui était cette jeune fille? qui était son père? l’ombre si épaisse qui les couvrait était-elle au moment de s’éclaircir? Le voile allait-il se déchirer? Ah! ciel!

Il bondit, plutôt qu’il ne monta, sur la commode, et reprit sa place près de la petite lucarne de la cloison.

Il revoyait l’intérieur du bouge Jondrette.

Chapitre XII

Emploi de la pièce de cinq francs de M. Leblanc

Rien n’était changé dans l’aspect de la famille, sinon que la femme et les filles avaient puisé dans le paquet, et mis des bas et des camisoles de laine. Deux couvertures neuves étaient jetées sur les deux lits.

Le Jondrette venait évidemment de rentrer. Il avait encore l’essoufflement du dehors. Ses filles étaient près de la cheminée, assises à terre, l’aînée pansant la main de la cadette. Sa femme était comme affaissée sur le grabat voisin de la cheminée avec un visage étonné. Jondrette marchait dans le galetas de long en large à grands pas. Il avait les yeux extraordinaires.

La femme, qui semblait timide et frappée de stupeur devant son mari, se hasarda à lui dire:

— Quoi, vraiment? tu es sûr?

— Sûr! Il y a huit ans! mais je le reconnais! Ah! je le reconnais! je l’ai reconnu tout de suite! Quoi, cela ne t’a pas sauté aux yeux?

— Non.

— Mais je t’ai dit pourtant: fais attention! mais c’est la taille, c’est le visage, à peine plus vieux, il y a des gens qui ne vieillissent pas, je ne sais pas comment ils font; c’est le son de voix. Il est mieux mis, voilà tout! Ah! vieux mystérieux du diable, je te tiens, va!

Il s’arrêta et dit à ses filles:

— Allez-vous-en, vous autres! — C’est drôle que cela ne t’ait pas sauté aux yeux.

Elles se levèrent pour obéir.

La mère balbutia:

— Avec sa main malade?

— L’air lui fera du bien, dit Jondrette. Allez.

Il était visible que cet homme était de ceux auxquels on ne réplique pas. Les deux filles sortirent.

Au moment où elles allaient passer la porte, le père retint l’aînée par le bras et dit avec un accent particulier:

— Vous serez ici à cinq heures précises. Toutes les deux. J’aurai besoin de vous.

Marius redoubla d’attention.

Demeuré seul avec sa femme, Jondrette se remit à marcher dans la chambre et en fit deux ou trois fois le tour en silence. Puis il passa quelques minutes à faire rentrer et à enfoncer dans la ceinture de son pantalon le bas de la chemise de femme qu’il portait.

Tout à coup il se tourna vers la Jondrette, croisa les bras, et s’écria:

— Et veux-tu que je te dise une chose? La demoiselle....

— Eh bien quoi! repartit la femme, la demoiselle?

Marius n’en pouvait douter, c’était bien d’elle qu’on parlait. Il écoutait avec une anxiété ardente. Toute sa vie était dans ses oreilles.

Mais le Jondrette s’était penché, et avait parlé bas à sa femme. Puis il se releva et termina tout haut:

— C’est elle!

— Ça? dit la femme.

— Ça! dit le mari.

Aucune expression ne saurait rendre ce qu’il y avait dans le ça de la mère. C’était la surprise, la rage, la haine, la colère, mêlées et combinées dans une intonation monstrueuse. Il avait suffi de quelques mots prononcés, du nom sans doute, que son mari lui avait dit à l’oreille, pour que cette grosse femme assoupie se réveillât, et de repoussante devînt effroyable.

— Pas possible! s’écria-t-elle. Quand je pense que mes filles vont nu-pieds et n’ont pas une robe à mettre! Comment! une pelisse de satin, un chapeau de velours, des brodequins, et tout! pour plus de deux cents francs d’effets! qu’on croirait que c’est une dame! Non, tu te trompes! Mais d’abord l’autre était affreuse, celle-ci n’est pas mal! elle n’est vraiment pas mal! ce ne peut pas être elle!

— Je te dis que c’est elle. Tu verras.

À cette affirmation si absolue, la Jondrette leva sa large face rouge et blonde et regarda le plafond avec une expression difforme. En ce moment elle parut à Marius plus redoutable encore que son mari. C’était une truie avec le regard d’une tigresse.

— Quoi! reprit-elle, cette horrible belle demoiselle qui regardait mes filles d’un air de pitié, ce serait cette gueuse! Oh! je voudrais lui crever le ventre à coups de sabot!

Elle sauta à bas du lit, et resta un moment debout, décoiffée, les narines gonflées, la bouche entr’ouverte, les poings crispés et rejetés en arrière.

Puis elle se laissa retomber sur le grabat. L’homme allait et venait sans faire attention à sa femelle.

Après quelques instants de ce silence, il s’approcha de la Jondrette et s’arrêta devant elle, les bras croisés, comme le moment d’auparavant.

— Et veux-tu que je te dise encore une chose?

— Quoi? demanda-t-elle.

Il répondit d’une voix brève et basse:

— C’est que ma fortune est faite.

La Jondrette le considéra de ce regard qui veut dire: Est-ce que celui qui me parle deviendrait fou?

Lui continua:

— Tonnerre! voilà pas mal longtemps déjà que je suis paroissien de la paroisse-meurs-de-faim-si-tu-as-du-feu-meurs-de-froid-si-tu-as-du-pain! j’en ai assez eu de la misère! ma charge et la charge des autres! Je ne plaisante plus, je ne trouve plus ça comique, assez de calembours, bon Dieu! plus de farces, père éternel! Je veux manger à ma faim, je veux boire à ma soif! bâfrer! dormir! ne rien faire! je veux avoir mon tour, moi, tiens! avant de crever! je veux être un peu millionnaire.

Il fit le tour du bouge et ajouta:

— Comme les autres.

— Qu’est-ce que tu veux dire? demanda la femme.

Il secoua la tête, cligna de l’œil et haussa la voix comme un physicien de carrefour qui va faire une démonstration:

— Ce que je veux dire? écoute!

— Chut! grommela la Jondrette, pas si haut! si ce sont des affaires qu’il ne faut pas qu’on entende.

— Bah! qui ça? le voisin? je l’ai vu sortir tout à l’heure. D’ailleurs est-ce qu’il entend, ce grand bêta? Et puis je te dis que je l’ai vu sortir.

Cependant, par une sorte d’instinct, Jondrette baissa la voix, pas assez pourtant pour que ses paroles échappassent à Marius. Une circonstance favorable, et qui avait permis à Marius de ne rien perdre de cette conversation, c’est que la neige tombée assourdissait le bruit des voitures sur le boulevard.

Voici ce que Marius entendit:

— Écoute bien. Il est pris, le crésus! C’est tout comme. C’est déjà fait. Tout est arrangé. J’ai vu des gens. Il viendra ce soir à six heures. Apporter ses soixante francs, canaille! As-tu vu comme je vous ai débagoulé ça, mes soixante francs, mon propriétaire, mon 4 février! ce n'est seulement pas un terme! était-ce bête! Il viendra donc à six heures! c'est l'heure où le voisin est allé dîner. La mère Burgon lave la vaisselle en ville. Il n'y a personne dans la maison. Le voisin ne rentre jamais avant onze heures. Les petites feront le guet. Tu nous aideras. Il s'exécutera.

— Et s'il ne s'exécute pas? demanda la femme.

Jondrette fit un geste sinistre et dit:

— Nous l'exécuterons.

Et il éclata de rire.

C'était la première fois que Marius le voyait rire. Ce rire était froid et doux, et faisait frissonner.

Jondrette ouvrit un placard près de la cheminée et en tira une vieille casquette qu'il mit sur sa tête après l'avoir brossée avec sa manche.

— Maintenant, fit-il, je sors. J'ai encore des gens à voir. Des bons. Tu verras comme ça va marcher. Je serai dehors le moins longtemps possible. C'est un beau coup à jouer. Garde la maison.

Et, les deux poings dans les deux goussets de son pantalon, il resta un moment pensif, puis s'écria:

— Sais-tu qu'il est tout de même bien heureux qu'il ne m'ait pas reconnu, lui! S'il m'avait reconnu de son côté, il ne serait pas revenu. Il nous échappait! C'est ma barbe qui m'a sauvé! ma barbiche romantique! ma jolie petite barbiche romantique!

Et il se remit à rire.

Il alla à la fenêtre. La neige tombait toujours et rayait le gris du ciel.

— Quel chien de temps! dit-il.

Puis croisant la redingote:

— La pelure est trop large. — C'est égal, ajouta-t-il, il a diablement bien fait de me la laisser, le vieux coquin! Sans cela je n'aurais pas pu sortir et tout aurait encore manqué! À quoi les choses tiennent pourtant!

Et, enfonçant la casquette sur ses yeux, il sortit.

À peine avait-il eu le temps de faire quelques pas dehors que la porte se rouvrit et que son profil fauve et intelligent reparut par l'ouverture.

— J'oubliais, dit-il. Tu auras un réchaud de charbon.

Et il jeta dans le tablier de sa femme la pièce de cinq francs que lui avait laissée le «philanthrope».

— Un réchaud de charbon? demanda la femme.

— Oui.

— Combien de boisseaux?

— Deux bons.

— Cela fera trente sous. Avec le reste j’achèterai de quoi dîner.

— Diable, non.

— Pourquoi?

— Ne va pas dépenser la pièce-cent-sous.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce que j’aurai quelque chose à acheter de mon côté.

— Quoi?

— Quelque chose.

— Combien te faudra-t-il?

— Où y a-t-il un quincaillier par ici?

— Rue Mouffetard.

— Ah oui, au coin d’une rue, je vois la boutique.

— Mais dis-moi donc combien il te faudra pour ce que tu as à acheter?

— Cinquante sous-trois francs.

— Il ne restera pas gras pour le dîner.

— Aujourd’hui il ne s’agit pas de manger. Il y a mieux à faire.

— Ça suffit, mon bijou.

Sur ce mot de sa femme, Jondrette referma la porte, et cette fois Marius entendit son pas s’éloigner dans le corridor de la masure et descendre rapidement l’escalier.

Une heure sonnait en cet instant à Saint-Médard.

Chapitre XIII

Solus cum solo, in loco remoto, non cogitabuntur orare pater noster

Marius, tout songeur qu'il était, était, nous l'avons dit, une nature ferme et énergique. Les habitudes de recueillement solitaire, en développant en lui la sympathie et la compassion, avaient diminué peut-être la faculté de s'irriter, mais laissé intacte la faculté de s'indigner; il avait la bienveillance d'un brahme et la sévérité d'un juge; il avait pitié d'un crapaud, mais il écrasait une vipère. Or, c'était dans un trou de vipères que son regard venait de plonger; c'était un nid de monstres qu'il avait sous les yeux.

— Il faut mettre le pied sur ces misérables, dit-il.

Aucune des énigmes qu'il espérait voir dissiper ne s'était éclaircie; au contraire, toutes s'étaient épaissies peut-être; il ne savait rien de plus sur la belle enfant du Luxembourg et sur l'homme qu'il appelait M. Leblanc, sinon que Jondrette les connaissait. À travers les paroles ténébreuses qui avaient été dites, il n'entrevoyait distinctement qu'une chose, c'est qu'un guet-apens se préparait, un guet-apens obscur, mais terrible; c'est qu'ils couraient tous les deux un grand danger, elle probablement, son père à coup sûr; c'est qu'il fallait les sauver; c'est qu'il fallait déjouer les combinaisons hideuses des Jondrette et rompre la toile de ces araignées.

Il observa un moment la Jondrette. Elle avait tiré d'un coin un vieux fourneau de tôle et elle fouillait dans des ferrailles.

Il descendit de la commode le plus doucement qu'il put et en ayant soin de ne faire aucun bruit.

Dans son effroi de ce qui s'apprêtait et dans l'horreur dont les Jondrette l'avaient pénétré, il sentait une sorte de joie à l'idée qu'il lui serait peut-être donné de rendre un tel service à celle qu'il aimait.

Mais comment faire? Avertir les personnes menacées? où les trouver? Il ne savait pas leur adresse. Elles avaient reparu un instant à ses yeux, puis elles s'étaient replongées dans les immenses profondeurs de Paris. Attendre M. Leblanc à la porte le soir à six heures, au moment où il arriverait, et le prévenir du piège? Mais Jondrette et ses gens le verraient guetter, le lieu était désert, ils seraient plus forts que lui, ils trouveraient moyen de le saisir ou de l'éloigner, et celui que Marius voulait sauver serait perdu. Une heure venait de sonner, le guet-apens devait s'accomplir à six heures. Marius avait cinq heures devant lui.

Il n'y avait qu'une chose à faire.

Il mit son habit passable, se noua un foulard au cou, prit son chapeau, et sortit, sans faire plus de bruit que s'il eût marché sur de la mousse avec des pieds nus.

D'ailleurs la Jondrette continuait de fourgonner dans ses ferrailles.

Une fois hors de la maison, il gagna la rue du Petit-Banquier.

Il était vers le milieu de cette rue près d'un mur très bas qu'on peut enjamber à de certains endroits et qui donne dans un terrain vague, il marchait lentement, préoccupé qu'il était, la neige assourdissait ses pas; tout à coup il entendit des voix qui parlaient tout près de lui. Il tourna la tête, la rue était déserte, il n'y avait personne, c'était en plein jour, et cependant il entendait distinctement des voix.

Il eut l'idée de regarder par-dessus le mur qu'il côtoyait.

Il y avait là en effet deux hommes adossés à la muraille, assis dans la neige et se parlant bas.

Ces deux figures lui étaient inconnues. L'un était un homme barbu en blouse et l'autre un homme chevelu en guenilles. Le barbu avait une calotte grecque, l'autre la tête nue et de la neige dans les cheveux.

En avançant la tête au-dessus d'eux, Marius pouvait entendre.

Le chevelu poussait l'autre du coude et disait:

— Avec Patron-Minette, ça ne peut pas manquer.

— Crois-tu? dit le barbu; et le chevelu repartit:

— Ce sera pour chacun un fafiot de cinq cents balles, et le pire qui puisse arriver: cinq ans, six ans, dix ans au plus!

L'autre répondit avec quelque hésitation et en grelottant sous son bonnet grec:

— Ça, c'est une chose réelle. On ne peut pas aller à l'encontre de ces choses-là.

— Je te dis que l'affaire ne peut pas manquer, reprit le chevelu. La maringotte du père Chose sera attelée.

Puis ils se mirent à parler d'un mélodrame qu'ils avaient vu la veille à la Gaîté.

Marius continua son chemin.

Il lui semblait que les paroles obscures de ces hommes, si étrangement cachés derrière ce mur et accroupis dans la neige, n'étaient pas peut-être sans quelque rapport avec les abominables projets de Jondrette. Ce devait être là l’affaire.

Il se dirigea vers le faubourg Saint-Marceau et demanda à la première boutique qu’il rencontra où il y avait un commissaire de police.

On lui indiqua la rue de Pontoise et le numéro 14.

Marius s’y rendit.

Et passant devant un boulanger, il acheta un pain de deux sous et le mangea, prévoyant qu’il ne dînerait pas.

Chemin faisant, il rendit justice à la providence. Il songea que, s’il n’avait pas donné ses cinq francs le matin à la fille Jondrette, il aurait suivi le fiacre de M. Leblanc, et par conséquent tout ignoré, que rien n’aurait fait obstacle au guet-apens des Jondrette, et que M. Leblanc était perdu, et sans doute sa fille avec lui.

Chapitre XIV

Où un agent de police donne deux coups de poing à un avocat

Arrivé au numéro 14 de la rue de Pontoise, il monta au premier et demanda le commissaire de police.

— Monsieur le commissaire de police n'y est pas, dit un garçon de bureau quelconque; mais il y a un inspecteur qui le remplace. Voulez-vous lui parler? est-ce pressé?

— Oui, dit Marius.

Le garçon de bureau l'introduisit dans le cabinet du commissaire. Un homme de haute taille s'y tenait debout, derrière une grille, appuyé à un poêle, et relevant de ses deux mains les pans d'un vaste carrick à trois collets. C'était une figure carrée, une bouche mince et ferme, d'épais favoris grisonnants très farouches, un regard à retourner vos poches. On eût pu dire de ce regard, non qu'il pénétrait, mais qu'il fouillait.

Cet homme n'avait pas l'air beaucoup moins féroce ni beaucoup moins redoutable que Jondrette; le dogue quelquefois n'est pas moins inquiétant à rencontrer que le loup.

— Que voulez-vous? dit-il à Marius, sans ajouter monsieur.

— Monsieur le commissaire de police?

— Il est absent. Je le remplace.

— C'est pour une affaire très secrète.

— Alors parlez.

— Et très pressée.

— Alors, parlez vite.

Cet homme, calme et brusque, était tout à la fois effrayant et rassurant. Il inspirait la crainte et la confiance. Marius lui conta l'aventure. — Qu'une personne qu'il ne connaissait que de vue devait être attirée le soir même dans un guet-apens; — qu'habitant la chambre voisine du repaire il avait, lui Marius Pontmercy, avocat, entendu tout le complot à travers la cloison; — que le scélérat qui avait imaginé le piège était un nommé Jondrette; — qu'il aurait des complices, probablement des rôdeurs de barrières, entre autres un certain Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille; — que les filles de Jondrette feraient le guet; — qu'il n'existait aucun moyen de prévenir l'homme menacé, attendu qu'on ne savait même pas son nom; — et qu’enfin tout cela devait s’exécuter à six heures du soir au point le plus désert du boulevard de l’Hôpital, dans la maison du numéro 50-52.

À ce numéro, l’inspecteur leva la tête, et dit froidement:

— C’est donc dans la chambre du fond du corridor?

— Précisément, fit Marius, et il ajouta: — Est-ce que vous connaissez cette maison?

L’inspecteur resta un moment silencieux, puis répondit en chauffant le talon de sa botte à la bouche du poêle:

— Apparemment.

Il continua dans ses dents, parlant moins à Marius qu’à sa cravate:

— Il doit y avoir un peu de Patron-Minette là dedans.

Ce mot frappa Marius.

— Patron-Minette, dit-il. J’ai en effet entendu prononcer ce mot-là.

Et il raconta à l’inspecteur le dialogue de l’homme chevelu et de l’homme barbu dans la neige derrière le mur de la rue du Petit-Banquier.

L’inspecteur grommela:

— Le chevelu doit être Brujon, et le barbu doit être Demi-Liard, dit Deux-Milliards.

Il avait de nouveau baissé les paupières, et il méditait.

— Quant au père Chose, je l’entrevois. Voilà que j’ai brûlé mon carrick. Ils font toujours trop de feu dans ces maudits poêles. Le numéro 50-52. Ancienne propriété Gorbeau.

Puis il regarda Marius.

— Vous n’avez vu que ce barbu et ce chevelu?

— Et Panchaud.

— Vous n’avez pas vu rôdailler par là une espèce de petit muscadin du diable?

— Non.

— Ni un grand gros massif matériel qui ressemble à l’éléphant du Jardin des Plantes?

— Non.

— Ni un malin qui a l’air d’une ancienne queue-rouge?

— Non.

— Quant au quatrième, personne ne le voit, pas même ses adjudants, commis et employés. Il est peu surprenant que vous ne l’ayez pas aperçu.

— Non. Qu’est-ce que c’est, demanda Marius, que tous ces êtres-là?

L’inspecteur répondit:

— D’ailleurs ce n’est pas leur heure.

Il retomba dans son silence, puis reprit:

— 50-52. Je connais la baraque. Impossible de nous cacher dans l’intérieur sans que les artistes s’en aperçoivent. Alors ils en seraient quittes pour décommander le vaudeville. Ils sont si modestes! le public les gêne. Pas de ça, pas de ça. Je veux les entendre chanter et les faire danser.

Ce monologue terminé, il se tourna vers Marius et lui demanda en le regardant fixement:

— Aurez-vous peur?

— De quoi? dit Marius.

— De ces hommes?

— Pas plus que de vous! répliqua rudement Marius qui commençait à remarquer que ce mouchard ne lui avait pas encore dit monsieur.

L’inspecteur regarda Marius plus fixement encore et reprit avec une sorte de solennité sentencieuse.

— Vous parlez là comme un homme brave et comme un homme honnête. Le courage ne craint pas le crime, et l’honnêteté ne craint pas l’autorité.

Marius l’interrompit:

— C’est bon; mais que comptez-vous faire?

L’inspecteur se borna à lui répondre:

— Les locataires de cette maison-là ont des passe-partout pour rentrer la nuit chez eux. Vous devez en avoir un?

— Oui, dit Marius.

— L’avez-vous sur vous?

— Oui.

— Donnez-le-moi, dit l’inspecteur.

Marius prit sa clef dans son gilet, la remit à l’inspecteur, et ajouta:

— Si vous m’en croyez, vous viendrez en force.

L’inspecteur jeta sur Marius le coup d’œil de Voltaire à un académicien de province qui lui eût proposé une rime; il plongea d’un seul mouvement ses deux mains, qui étaient énormes, dans les deux poches de son carrick, et en tira deux petits pistolets d’acier, de ces pistolets qu’on appelle coups de poing. Il les présenta à Marius en disant vivement et d’un ton bref:

— Prenez ceci. Rentrez chez vous. Cachez-vous dans votre chambre. Qu’on vous croie sorti. Ils sont chargés. Chacun de deux balles. Vous observerez, il y a un trou au mur, comme vous me l’avez dit. Les gens viendront. Laissez-les aller un peu. Quand vous jugerez la chose à point, et qu'il sera temps de l'arrêter, vous tirerez un coup de pistolet. Pas trop tôt. Le reste me regarde. Un coup de pistolet en l'air, au plafond, n'importe où. Surtout pas trop tôt. Attendez qu'il y ait commencement d'exécution, vous êtes avocat, vous savez ce que c'est.

Marius prit les pistolets et les mit dans la poche de côté de son habit.

— Cela fait une bosse comme cela, cela se voit, dit l'inspecteur. Mettez-les plutôt dans vos goussets.

Marius cacha les pistolets dans ses goussets.

— Maintenant, poursuivit l'inspecteur, il n'y a plus une minute à perdre pour personne. Quelle heure est-il? Deux heures et demie. C'est pour sept heures?

— Six heures, dit Marius.

— J'ai le temps, reprit l'inspecteur, mais je n'ai que le temps. N'oubliez rien de ce que je vous ai dit. Pan. Un coup de pistolet.

— Soyez tranquille, répondit Marius.

Et comme Marius mettait la main au loquet de la porte pour sortir l'inspecteur lui cria:

— À propos, si vous aviez besoin de moi d'ici-là, venez ou envoyez ici. Vous feriez demander l'inspecteur Javert.

Chapitre XV

Jondrette fait son emplette

Quelques instants après, vers trois heures, Courfeyrac passait par aventure rue Mouffetard en compagnie de Bossuet. La neige redoublait et emplissait l’espace. Bossuet était en train de dire à Courfeyrac:

— À voir tomber tous ces flocons de neige, on dirait qu’il y a au ciel une peste de papillons blancs. — Tout à coup, Bossuet aperçut Marius qui remontait la rue vers la barrière et avait un air particulier.

— Tiens! s’exclama Bossuet. Marius!

— Je l’ai vu, dit Courfeyrac. Ne lui parlons pas.

— Pourquoi?

— Il est occupé.

— À quoi?

— Tu ne vois donc pas la mine qu’il a?

— Quelle mine?

— Il a l’air de quelqu’un qui suit quelqu’un.

— C’est vrai, dit Bossuet.

— Vois donc les yeux qu’il fait! reprit Courfeyrac.

— Mais qui diable suit-il?

— Quelque mimi-goton-bonnet-fleuri! il est amoureux.

— Mais, observa Bossuet, c’est que je ne vois pas de mimi, ni de goton, ni de bonnet-fleuri dans la rue. Il n’y a pas une femme.

Courfeyrac regarda, et s’écria:

— Il suit un homme!

Un homme en effet, coiffé d’une casquette, et dont on distinguait la barbe grise quoiqu’on ne le vît que de dos, marchait à une vingtaine de pas en avant de Marius.

Cet homme était vêtu d’une redingote toute neuve trop grande pour lui et d’un épouvantable pantalon en loques tout noirci par la boue.

Bossuet éclata de rire.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que cet homme-là?

— Ça? reprit Courfeyrac, c’est un poète. Les poètes portent assez volontiers des pantalons de marchands de peaux de lapin et des redingotes de pairs de France.

— Voyons où va Marius, fit Bossuet, voyons où va cet homme, suivons-les, hein?

— Bossuet! s'écria Courfeyrac, aigle de Meaux! vous êtes une prodigieuse brute. Suivre un homme qui suit un homme!

Ils rebroussèrent chemin.

Marius en effet avait vu passer Jondrette rue Mouffetard, et l'épiait.

Jondrette allait devant lui sans se douter qu'il y eût déjà un regard qui le tenait.

Il quitta la rue Mouffetard, et Marius le vit entrer dans une des plus affreuses bicoques de la rue Gracieuse, il y resta un quart d'heure environ, puis revint rue Mouffetard. Il s'arrêta chez un quincaillier qu'il y avait à cette époque au coin de la rue Pierre-Lombard, et, quelques minutes après, Marius le vit sortir de la boutique, tenant à la main un grand ciseau à froid emmanché de bois blanc qu'il cacha sous sa redingote. À la hauteur de la rue du Petit-Gentilly, il tourna à gauche et gagna rapidement la rue du Petit-Banquier. Le jour tombait, la neige qui avait cessé un moment venait de recommencer. Marius s'embusqua au coin même de la rue du Petit-Banquier qui était déserte comme toujours, et il n'y suivit pas Jondrette. Bien lui en prit, car, parvenu près du mur bas où Marius avait entendu parler l'homme chevelu et l'homme barbu, Jondrette se retourna, s'assura que personne ne le suivait et ne le voyait, puis enjamba le mur, et disparut.

Le terrain vague que ce mur bordait communiquait avec l'arrière-cour d'un ancien loueur de voitures mal famé qui avait fait faillite et qui avait encore quelques vieux berlingots sous des hangars.

Marius pensa qu'il était sage de profiter de l'absence de Jondrette pour rentrer; d'ailleurs l'heure avançait; tous les soirs mame Burgon, en partant pour aller laver la vaisselle en ville, avait coutume de fermer la porte de la maison qui était toujours close à la brune; Marius avait donné sa clef à l'inspecteur de police; il était donc important qu'il se hâtât.

Le soir était venu; la nuit était à peu près fermée; il n'y avait plus, sur l'horizon et dans l'immensité, qu'un point éclairé par le soleil, c'était la lune.

Elle se levait rouge derrière le dôme bas de la Salpêtrière.

Marius regagna à grands pas le nº 50-52. La porte était encore ouverte quand il arriva. Il monta l'escalier sur la pointe du pied et se glissa le long du mur du corridor jusqu'à sa chambre. Ce corridor, on s'en souvient, était bordé des deux côtés de galetas en ce moment tous à louer et vides. Mame

Burgon en laissait habituellement les portes ouvertes. En passant devant une de ces portes, Marius crut apercevoir dans la cellule inhabitée quatre têtes d'hommes immobiles que blanchissait vaguement un reste de jour tombant par une lucarne. Marius ne chercha pas à voir, ne voulant pas être vu. Il parvint à rentrer dans sa chambre sans être aperçu et sans bruit. Il était temps. Un moment après, il entendit mame Burgon qui s'en allait et la porte de la maison qui se fermait.

Chapitre XVI

Où l'on retrouvera la chanson sur un air anglais à la mode en 1832

Marius s'assit sur son lit. Il pouvait être cinq heures et demie. Une demi-heure seulement le séparait de ce qui allait arriver. Il entendait battre ses artères comme on entend le battement d'une montre dans l'obscurité. Il songeait à cette double marche qui se faisait en ce moment dans les ténèbres, le crime s'avançant d'un côté, la justice venant de l'autre. Il n'avait pas peur, mais il ne pouvait penser sans un certain tressaillement aux choses qui allaient se passer. Comme à tous ceux que vient assaillir soudainement une aventure surprenante, cette journée entière lui faisait l'effet d'un rêve, et, pour ne point se croire en proie à un cauchemar, il avait besoin de sentir dans ses goussets le froid des deux pistolets d'acier.

Il ne neigeait plus; la lune, de plus en plus claire, se dégageait des brumes, et sa lueur mêlée au reflet blanc de la neige tombée donnait à la chambre un aspect crépusculaire.

Il y avait de la lumière dans le taudis Jondrette. Marius voyait le trou de la cloison briller d'une clarté rouge qui lui paraissait sanglante.

Il était réel que cette clarté ne pouvait guère être produite par une chandelle. Du reste, aucun mouvement chez les Jondrette, personne n'y bougeait, personne n'y parlait, pas un souffle, le silence y était glacial et profond, et sans cette lumière on se fût cru à côté d'un sépulcre.

Marius ôta doucement ses bottes et les poussa sous son lit.

Quelques minutes s'écoulèrent. Marius entendit la porte d'en bas tourner sur ses gonds, un pas lourd et rapide monta l'escalier et parcourut le corridor, le loquet du bouge se souleva avec bruit; c'était Jondrette qui rentrait.

Tout de suite plusieurs voix s'élevèrent. Toute la famille était dans le galetas. Seulement elle se taisait en l'absence du maître comme les louveteaux en l'absence du loup.

— C'est moi, dit-il.

— Bonsoir, pèremuche! glapirent les filles.

— Eh bien? dit la mère.

— Tout va à la papa, répondit Jondrette, mais j'ai un froid de chien aux pieds. Bon, c'est cela, tu t'es habillée. Il faudra que tu puisses inspirer de la confiance.

— Toute prête à sortir.

— Tu n'oublieras rien de ce que je t'ai dit? Tu feras bien tout?

— Sois tranquille.

— C'est que... dit Jondrette. Et il n'acheva pas sa phrase.

Marius l'entendit poser quelque chose de lourd sur la table, probablement le ciseau qu'il avait acheté.

— Ah çà, reprit Jondrette, a-t-on mangé ici?

— Oui, dit la mère, j'ai eu trois grosses pommes de terre et du sel. J'ai profité du feu pour les faire cuire.

— Bon, repartit Jondrette. Demain je vous mène dîner avec moi. Il y aura un canard et des accessoires. Vous dînerez comme des Charles-Dix. Tout va bien!

Puis il ajouta en baissant la voix.

— La souricière est ouverte. Les chats sont là.

Il baissa encore la voix et dit:

— Mets ça dans le feu.

Marius entendit un cliquetis de charbon qu'on heurtait avec une pincette ou un outil en fer, et Jondrette continua:

— As-tu suifé les gonds de la porte pour qu'ils ne fassent pas de bruit?

— Oui, répondit la mère.

— Quelle heure est-il?

— Six heures bientôt. La demie vient de sonner à Saint-Médard.

— Diable! fit Jondrette. Il faut que les petites aillent faire le guet. Venez, vous autres, écoutez ici.

Il y eut un chuchotement.

La voix de Jondrette s'éleva encore:

— La Burgon est-elle partie?

— Oui, dit la mère.

— Es-tu sûre qu'il n'y a personne chez le voisin?

— Il n'est pas rentré de la journée, et tu sais bien que c'est l'heure de son dîner.

— Tu es sûre?

— Sûre.

— C'est égal, reprit Jondrette, il n'y a pas de mal à aller voir chez lui s'il y est. Ma fille, prends la chandelle et vas-y.

Marius se laissa tomber sur ses mains et ses genoux et rampa silencieusement sous son lit.

À peine y était-il blotti qu'il aperçut une lumière à travers les fentes de sa porte.

— P'pa, cria une voix, il est sorti.

Il reconnut la voix de la fille aînée.

— Es-tu entrée? demanda le père.

— Non, répondit la fille, mais puisque sa clef est à sa porte, il est sorti.

Le père cria:

— Entre tout de même.

La porte s'ouvrit, et Marius vit entrer la grande Jondrette, une chandelle à la main. Elle était comme le matin, seulement plus effrayante encore à cette clarté.

Elle marcha droit au lit, Marius eut un inexprimable moment d'anxiété, mais il y avait près du lit un miroir cloué au mur, c'était là qu'elle allait. Elle se haussa sur la pointe des pieds et s'y regarda. On entendait un bruit de ferrailles remuées dans la pièce voisine.

Elle lissa ses cheveux avec la paume de sa main et fit des sourires au miroir tout en chantonnant de sa voix cassée et sépulcrale:

Nos amours ont duré toute une semaine,
Ah! que du bonheur les instants sont courts!
S'adorer huit jours, c'était bien la peine!
Le temps des amours devrait durer toujours!
Devrait durer toujours! devrait durer toujours!

Cependant Marius tremblait. Il lui semblait impossible qu'elle n'entendît pas sa respiration.

Elle se dirigea vers la fenêtre et regarda dehors en parlant haut avec cet air à demi fou qu'elle avait.

— Comme Paris est laid quand il a mis une chemise blanche! dit-elle.

Elle revint au miroir et se fit de nouveau des mines, se contemplant successivement de face et de trois quarts.

— Eh bien! cria le père, qu'est-ce que tu fais donc?

— Je regarde sous le lit et sous les meubles, répondit-elle en continuant d'arranger ses cheveux, il n'y a personne.

— Cruche! hurla le père. Ici tout de suite! et ne perdons pas le temps.

— J'y vas! j'y vas! dit-elle. On n'a le temps de rien dans leur baraque!

Elle fredonna:

Vous me quittez pour aller à la gloire,
Mon triste cœur suivra partout vos pas.

Elle jeta un dernier coup d'œil au miroir et sortit en refermant la porte sur elle.

Un moment après, Marius entendit le bruit des pieds nus des deux jeunes filles dans le corridor et la voix de Jondrette qui leur criait:

— Faites bien attention! l'une du côté de la barrière, l'autre au coin de la rue du Petit-Banquier. Ne perdez pas de vue une minute la porte de la maison, et pour peu que vous voyiez quelque chose, tout de suite ici! quatre à quatre! Vous avez une clef pour rentrer.

La fille aînée grommela:

— Faire faction nu-pieds dans la neige!

— Demain vous aurez des bottines de soie couleur scarabée! dit le père.

Elles descendirent l'escalier, et, quelques secondes après, le choc de la porte d'en bas qui se refermait annonça qu'elles étaient dehors.

Il n'y avait plus dans la maison que Marius et les Jondrette; et probablement aussi les êtres mystérieux entrevus par Marius dans le crépuscule derrière la porte du galetas inhabité.

Chapitre XVII

Emploi de la pièce de cinq francs de Marius

Marius jugea que le moment était venu de reprendre sa place à son observatoire. En un clin d’œil, et avec la souplesse de son âge, il fut près du trou de la cloison.

Il regarda.

L’intérieur du logis Jondrette offrait un aspect singulier, et Marius s’expliqua la clarté étrange qu’il y avait remarquée. Une chandelle y brûlait dans un chandelier vert-de-grisé, mais ce n’était pas elle qui éclairait réellement la chambre. Le taudis tout entier était comme illuminé par la réverbération d’un assez grand réchaud de tôle placé dans la cheminée et rempli de charbon allumé; le réchaud que la Jondrette avait préparé le matin. Le charbon était ardent et le réchaud était rouge, une flamme bleue y dansait et aidait à distinguer la forme du ciseau acheté par Jondrette rue Pierre-Lombard, qui rougissait enfoncé dans la braise. On voyait dans un coin près de la porte, et comme disposés pour un usage prévu, deux tas qui paraissaient être l’un un tas de ferrailles, l’autre un tas de cordes. Tout cela, pour quelqu’un qui n’eût rien su de ce qui s’apprêtait, eût fait flotter l’esprit entre une idée très sinistre et une idée très simple. Le bouge ainsi éclairé ressemblait plutôt à une forge qu’à une bouche de l’enfer, mais Jondrette, à cette lueur, avait plutôt l’air d’un démon que d’un forgeron.

La chaleur du brasier était telle que la chandelle sur la table fondait du côté du réchaud et se consumait en biseau. Une vieille lanterne sourde en cuivre, digne de Diogène devenu Cartouche, était posée sur la cheminée.

Le réchaud, placé dans le foyer même, à côté des tisons à peu près éteints, envoyait sa vapeur dans le tuyau de la cheminée et ne répandait pas d’odeur.

La lune, entrant par les quatre carreaux de la fenêtre, jetait sa blancheur dans le galetas pourpre et flamboyant, et pour le poétique esprit de Marius, songeur même au moment de l’action, c’était comme une pensée du ciel mêlée aux rêves difformes de la terre.

Un souffle d’air, pénétrant par le carreau cassé, contribuait à dissiper l’odeur du charbon et à dissimuler le réchaud.

Le repaire Jondrette était, si l'on se rappelle ce que nous avons dit de la masure Gorbeau, admirablement choisi pour servir de théâtre à un fait violent et sombre et d'enveloppe à un crime. C'était la chambre la plus reculée de la maison la plus isolée du boulevard le plus désert de Paris. Si le guet-apens n'existait pas, on l'y eût inventé.

Toute l'épaisseur d'une maison et une foule de chambres inhabitées séparaient ce bouge du boulevard, et la seule fenêtre qu'il eût donnait sur de vastes terrains vagues enclos de murailles et de palissades.

Jondrette avait allumé sa pipe, s'était assis sur la chaise dépaillée, et fumait. Sa femme lui parlait bas.

Si Marius eût été Courfeyrac, c'est-à-dire un de ces hommes qui rient dans toutes les occasions de la vie, il eût éclaté de rire quand son regard tomba sur la Jondrette. Elle avait un chapeau noir avec des plumes assez semblable aux chapeaux des hérauts d'armes du sacre de Charles X, un immense châle tartan sur son jupon de tricot, et les souliers d'homme que sa fille avait dédaignés le matin. C'était cette toilette qui avait arraché à Jondrette l'exclamation: Bon! tu t'es habillée! tu as bien fait. Il faut que tu puisses inspirer la confiance!

Quant à Jondrette, il n'avait pas quitté le surtout neuf et trop large pour lui que M. Leblanc lui avait donné, et son costume continuait d'offrir ce contraste de la redingote et du pantalon qui constituait aux yeux de Courfeyrac l'idéal du poète.

Tout à coup Jondrette haussa la voix:

— À propos! j'y songe. Par le temps qu'il fait, il va venir en fiacre. Allume la lanterne, prend-là, et descends. Tu te tiendras derrière la porte en bas. Au moment où tu entendras la voiture s'arrêter, tu ouvriras tout de suite, il montera, tu l'éclaireras dans l'escalier et dans le corridor, et pendant qu'il entrera ici, tu redescendras bien vite, tu payeras le cocher, et tu renverras le fiacre.

— Et de l'argent? demanda la femme.

Jondrette fouilla dans son pantalon, et lui remit cinq francs.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que ça? s'écria-t-elle.

Jondrette répondit avec dignité:

— C'est le monarque que le voisin a donné ce matin.

Et il ajouta:

— Sais-tu? il faudrait ici deux chaises.

— Pourquoi?

— Pour s’asseoir.

Marius sentit un frisson lui courir dans les reins en entendant la Jondrette faire cette réponse paisible:

— Pardieu! je vais t’aller chercher celles du voisin.

Et d’un mouvement rapide elle ouvrit la porte du bouge et sortit dans le corridor.

Marius n’avait pas matériellement le temps de descendre de la commode, d’aller jusqu’à son lit et de s’y cacher.

— Prends la chandelle, cria Jondrette.

— Non, dit-elle, cela m’embarrasserait, j’ai les deux chaises à porter. Il fait clair de lune.

Marius entendit la lourde main de la mère Jondrette chercher en tâtonnant sa clef dans l’obscurité. La porte s’ouvrit. Il resta cloué à sa place par le saisissement et la stupeur.

La Jondrette entra.

La lucarne mansardée laissait passer un rayon de lune entre deux grands pans d’ombre. Un de ces pans d’ombre couvrait entièrement le mur auquel était adossé Marius, de sorte qu’il y disparaissait.

La mère Jondrette leva les yeux, ne vit pas Marius, prit les deux chaises, les seules que Marius possédât, et s’en alla, en laissant la porte retomber bruyamment derrière elle.

Elle rentra dans le bouge:

— Voici les deux chaises.

— Et voilà la lanterne, dit le mari. Descends bien vite.

Elle obéit en hâte, et Jondrette resta seul.

Il disposa les deux chaises des deux côtés de la table, retourna le ciseau dans le brasier, mit devant la cheminée un vieux paravent, qui masquait le réchaud, puis alla au coin où était le tas de cordes et se baissa comme pour y examiner quelque chose. Marius reconnut alors que ce qu’il avait pris pour un tas informe était une échelle de corde très bien faite avec des échelons de bois et deux crampons pour l’accrocher.

Cette échelle et quelques gros outils, véritables masses de fer, qui étaient mêlés au monceau de ferrailles entassé derrière la porte, n’étaient point le matin dans le bouge Jondrette et y avaient été évidemment apportés dans l’après-midi, pendant l’absence de Marius.

— Ce sont des outils de taillandier, pensa Marius.

Si Marius eût été un peu plus lettré en ce genre, il eût reconnu, dans ce qu’il prenait pour des engins de taillandier, de certains instruments pouvant forcer une serrure ou crocheter une porte, et d’autres pouvant couper ou trancher, les deux familles d’outils sinistres que les voleurs appellent les cadets et les fauchants.

La cheminée et la table avec les deux chaises étaient précisément en face de Marius. Le réchaud étant caché, la chambre n’était plus éclairée que par la chandelle; le moindre tesson sur la table ou sur la cheminée faisait une grande ombre. Un pot à l’eau égueulé masquait la moitié d’un mur. Il y avait dans cette chambre je ne sais quel calme hideux et menaçant. On y sentait l’attente de quelque chose d’épouvantable.

Jondrette avait laissé sa pipe s’éteindre, grave signe de préoccupation, et était venu se rasseoir. La chandelle faisait saillir les angles farouches et fins de son visage. Il avait des froncements de sourcils et de brusques épanouissements de la main droite comme s’il répondait aux derniers conseils d’un sombre monologue intérieur. Dans une de ces obscures répliques qu’il se faisait à lui-même, il amena vivement à lui le tiroir de la table, y prit un long couteau de cuisine qui y était caché et en essaya le tranchant sur son ongle. Cela fait, il remit le couteau dans le tiroir, qu’il repoussa.

Marius de son côté saisit le pistolet qui était dans son gousset droit, l’en retira et l’arma.

Le pistolet en s’armant fit un petit bruit clair et sec.

Jondrette tressaillit et se souleva à demi sur sa chaise:

— Qui est là? cria-t-il.

Marius suspendit son haleine, Jondrette écouta un instant, puis se mit à rire en disant:

— Suis-je bête! C’est la cloison qui craque.

Marius garda le pistolet à sa main.

Chapitre XVIII

Les deux chaises de Marius se font vis-à-vis

Tout à coup la vibration lointaine et mélancolique d’une cloche ébranla les vitres. Six heures sonnaient à Saint-Médard.

Jondrette marqua chaque coup d’un hochement de tête. Le sixième sonné, il moucha la chandelle avec ses doigts.

Puis il se mit à marcher dans la chambre, écouta dans le corridor, marcha, écouta encore: — Pourvu qu’il vienne! grommela-t-il; puis il revint à sa chaise.

Il se rasseyait à peine que la porte s’ouvrit.

La mère Jondrette l’avait ouverte et restait dans le corridor faisant une horrible grimace aimable qu’un des trous de la lanterne sourde éclairait d’en bas.

— Entrez, monsieur, dit-elle.

— Entrez, mon bienfaiteur, répéta Jondrette se levant précipitamment.

M. Leblanc parut.

Il avait un air de sérénité qui le faisait singulièrement vénérable.

Il posa sur la table quatre louis.

— Monsieur Fabantou, dit-il, voici pour votre loyer et vos premiers besoins. Nous verrons ensuite.

— Dieu vous le rende, mon généreux bienfaiteur! dit Jondrette; et, s’approchant rapidement de sa femme:

— Renvoie le fiacre!

Elle s’esquiva pendant que son mari prodiguait les saluts et offrait une chaise à M. Leblanc. Un instant après elle revint et lui dit bas à l’oreille:

— C’est fait.

La neige qui n’avait cessé de tomber depuis le matin était tellement épaisse qu’on n’avait point entendu le fiacre arriver, et qu’on ne l’entendit pas s’en aller.

Cependant M. Leblanc s’était assis.

Jondrette avait pris possession de l’autre chaise en face de M. Leblanc.

Maintenant, pour se faire une idée de la scène qui va suivre, que le lecteur se figure dans son esprit la nuit glacée, les solitudes de la Salpêtrière couvertes de neige, et blanches au clair de lune comme d’immenses linceuls, la clarté de veilleuse des réverbères rougissant çà et là ces boulevards tragiques et les longues rangées des ormes noirs, pas un passant peut-être à un quart de lieue à la ronde, la masure Gorbeau à son plus haut point de silence, d’horreur et de nuit, dans cette masure, au milieu de ces solitudes, au milieu de cette ombre, le vaste galetas Jondrette éclairé d’une chandelle, et dans ce bouge deux hommes assis à une table, M. Leblanc tranquille, Jondrette souriant et effroyable, la Jondrette, la mère louve, dans un coin, et, derrière la cloison, Marius invisible, debout, ne perdant pas une parole, ne perdant pas un mouvement, l’œil au guet, le pistolet au poing.

Marius du reste n’éprouvait qu’une émotion d’horreur, mais aucune crainte. Il étreignait la crosse du pistolet et se sentait rassuré. — J’arrêterai ce misérable quand je voudrai, pensait-il.

Il sentait la police quelque part là en embuscade, attendant le signal convenu et toute prête à étendre le bras.

Il espérait du reste que de cette violente rencontre de Jondrette et de M. Leblanc quelque lumière jaillirait sur tout ce qu’il avait intérêt à connaître.

Chapitre XIX

Se préoccuper des fonds obscurs

À peine assis, M. Leblanc tourna les yeux vers les grabats qui étaient vides.

— Comment va la pauvre petite blessée? demanda-t-il.

— Mal, répondit Jondrette avec un sourire navré et reconnaissant, très mal, mon digne monsieur. Sa sœur aînée l’a menée à la Bourbe se faire panser. Vous allez les voir, elles vont rentrer tout à l’heure.

— Madame Fabantou me paraît mieux portante? reprit M. Leblanc en jetant les yeux sur le bizarre accoutrement de la Jondrette, qui, debout entre lui et la porte, comme si elle gardait déjà l’issue, le considérait dans une posture de menace et presque de combat.

— Elle est mourante, dit Jondrette. Mais que voulez-vous, monsieur? elle a tant de courage, cette femme-là! Ce n’est pas une femme, c’est un bœuf.

La Jondrette, touchée du compliment, se récria avec une minauderie de monstre flatté:

— Tu es toujours trop bon pour moi, monsieur Jondrette!

— Jondrette, dit M. Leblanc, je croyais que vous vous appeliez Fabantou?

— Fabantou dit Jondrette! reprit vivement le mari. Sobriquet d’artiste!

Et, jetant à sa femme un haussement d’épaules que M. Leblanc ne vit pas, il poursuivit avec une inflexion de voix emphatique et caressante:

— Ah! c’est que nous avons toujours fait bon ménage, cette pauvre chérie et moi! Qu’est-ce qu’il nous resterait, si nous n’avions pas cela! Nous sommes si malheureux, mon respectable monsieur! On a des bras, pas de travail! On a du cœur, pas d’ouvrage! Je ne sais pas comment le gouvernement arrange cela, mais, ma parole d’honneur, monsieur, je ne suis pas jacobin, monsieur, je ne suis pas bousingot, je ne lui veux pas de mal, mais si j’étais les ministres, ma parole la plus sacrée, cela irait autrement. Tenez, exemple, j’ai voulu faire apprendre le métier du cartonnage à mes filles. Vous me direz: Quoi! un métier? Oui! un métier! un simple métier! un gagne-pain! Quelle chute, mon bienfaiteur! Quelle dégradation quand on a été ce que nous étions! Hélas! il ne nous reste rien de notre temps de prospérité! Rien qu’une seule chose, un tableau auquel je tiens, mais dont je me déferais pourtant, car il faut vivre! item, il faut vivre!

Pendant que Jondrette parlait, avec une sorte de désordre apparent qui n'ôtait rien à l'expression réfléchie et sagace de sa physionomie, Marius leva les yeux et aperçut au fond de la chambre quelqu'un qu'il n'avait pas encore vu. Un homme venait d'entrer, si doucement qu'on n'avait pas entendu tourner les gonds de la porte. Cet homme avait un gilet de tricot violet, vieux, usé, taché, coupé et faisant des bouches ouvertes à tous ses plis, un large pantalon de velours de coton, des chaussons à sabots aux pieds, pas de chemise, le cou nu, les bras nus et tatoués, et le visage barbouillé de noir. Il s'était assis en silence et les bras croisés sur le lit le plus voisin, et, comme il se tenait derrière la Jondrette, on ne le distinguait que confusément.

Cette espèce d'instinct magnétique qui avertit le regard fit que M. Leblanc se tourna presque en même temps que Marius. Il ne put se défendre d'un mouvement de surprise qui n'échappa point à Jondrette.

— Ah! je vois! s'écria Jondrette en se boutonnant d'un air de complaisance, vous regardez votre redingote? Elle me va! ma foi, elle me va!

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que cet homme? dit M. Leblanc.

— Ça! fit Jondrette, c'est un voisin. Ne faites pas attention.

Le voisin était d'un aspect singulier. Cependant les fabriques de produits chimiques abondent dans le faubourg Saint-Marceau. Beaucoup d'ouvriers d'usines peuvent avoir le visage noir. Toute la personne de M. Leblanc respirait d'ailleurs une confiance candide et intrépide. Il reprit:

— Pardon, que me disiez-vous donc, monsieur Fabantou?

— Je vous disais, monsieur et cher protecteur, repartit Jondrette, en s'accoudant sur la table et en contemplant M. Leblanc avec des yeux fixes et tendres assez semblables aux yeux d'un serpent boa, je vous disais que j'avais un tableau à vendre.

Un léger bruit se fit à la porte. Un second homme venait d'entrer et de s'asseoir sur le lit, derrière la Jondrette. Il avait, comme le premier, les bras nus et un masque d'encre ou de suie.

Quoique cet homme se fût, à la lettre, glissé dans la chambre, il ne put faire que M. Leblanc ne l'aperçût.

— Ne prenez pas garde, dit Jondrette. Ce sont des gens de la maison. Je disais donc qu'il me restait un tableau, un tableau précieux.... — Tenez, monsieur, voyez.

Il se leva, alla à la muraille au bas de laquelle était posé le panneau dont nous avons parlé, et le retourna, tout en le laissant appuyé au mur. C’était quelque chose en effet qui ressemblait à un tableau et que la chandelle éclairait à peu près. Marius n’en pouvait rien distinguer, Jondrette étant placé entre le tableau et lui; seulement il entrevoyait un barbouillage grossier, et une espèce de personnage principal enluminé avec la crudité criarde des toiles foraines et des peintures de paravent.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que cela? demanda M. Leblanc.

Jondrette s’exclama:

— Une peinture de maître, un tableau d’un grand prix, mon bienfaiteur! J’y tiens comme à mes deux filles, il me rappelle des souvenirs! mais, je vous l’ai dit et je ne m’en dédis pas, je suis si malheureux que je m’en déferais.

Soit hasard, soit qu’il eût quelque commencement d’inquiétude, tout en examinant le tableau, le regard de M. Leblanc revint vers le fond de la chambre. Il y avait maintenant quatre hommes, trois assis sur le lit, un debout près du chambranle de la porte, tous quatre bras nus, immobiles, le visage barbouillé de noir. Un de ceux qui étaient sur le lit s’appuyait au mur, les yeux fermés, et l’on eût dit qu’il dormait. Celui-là était vieux; ses cheveux blancs sur son visage noir étaient horribles. Les deux autres semblaient jeunes. L’un était barbu, l’autre chevelu. Aucun n’avait de souliers; ceux qui n’avaient pas de chaussons étaient pieds nus.

Jondrette remarqua que l’œil de M. Leblanc s’attachait à ces hommes.

— C’est des amis. Ça voisine, dit-il. C’est barbouillé parce que ça travaille dans le charbon. Ce sont des fumistes. Ne vous en occupez pas, mon bienfaiteur, mais achetez-moi mon tableau. Ayez pitié de ma misère. Je ne vous le vendrai pas cher. Combien l’estimez-vous?

— Mais, dit M. Leblanc en regardant Jondrette entre les deux yeux et comme un homme qui se met sur ses gardes, c’est quelque enseigne de cabaret. Cela vaut bien trois francs.

Jondrette répondit avec douceur:

— Avez-vous votre portefeuille là? je me contenterais de mille écus.

M. Leblanc se leva debout, s’adossa à la muraille et promena rapidement son regard dans la chambre. Il avait Jondrette à sa gauche du côté de la fenêtre et la Jondrette et les quatre hommes à sa droite du côté de la porte. Les quatre hommes ne bougeaient pas et n’avaient pas même l’air de le voir; Jondrette s’était remis à parler d’un accent plaintif, avec la prunelle si vague et l'intonation si lamentable que M. Leblanc pouvait croire que c'était tout simplement un homme devenu fou de misère qu'il avait devant les yeux.

— Si vous ne m'achetez pas mon tableau, cher bienfaiteur, disait Jondrette, je suis sans ressource, je n'ai plus qu'à me jeter à même la rivière. Quand je pense que j'ai voulu faire apprendre à mes deux filles le cartonnage demi-fin, le cartonnage des boîtes d'étrennes. Eh bien! il faut une table avec une planche au fond pour que les verres ne tombent pas par terre, il faut un fourneau fait exprès, un pot à trois compartiments pour les différents degrés de force que doit avoir la colle selon qu'on l'emploie pour le bois, pour le papier ou pour les étoffes, un tranchet pour couper le carton, un moule pour l'ajuster, un marteau pour clouer les aciers, des pinceaux, le diable, est-ce que je sais, moi? et tout cela pour gagner quatre sous par jour! et on travaille quatorze heures! et chaque boîte passe treize fois dans les mains de l'ouvrière! et mouiller le papier! et ne rien tacher! et tenir la colle chaude! le diable, je vous dis! quatre sous par jour! comment voulez-vous qu'on vive?

Tout en parlant, Jondrette ne regardait pas M. Leblanc qui l'observait. L'œil de M. Leblanc était fixé sur Jondrette et l'œil de Jondrette sur la porte. L'attention haletante de Marius allait de l'un à l'autre. M. Leblanc paraissait se demander: Est-ce un idiot? Jondrette répéta deux ou trois fois avec toutes sortes d'inflexions variées dans le genre traînant et suppliant: Je n'ai plus qu'à me jeter à la rivière! j'ai descendu l'autre jour trois marches pour cela du côté du pont d'Austerlitz!

Tout à coup sa prunelle éteinte s'illumina d'un flamboiement hideux, ce petit homme se dressa et devint effrayant, il fit un pas vers M. Leblanc et lui cria d'une voix tonnante:

— Il ne s'agit pas de tout cela! me reconnaissez-vous?

Chapitre XX

Le guet-apens

La porte du galetas venait de s’ouvrir brusquement, et laissait voir trois hommes en blouse de toile bleue, masqués de masques de papier noir. Le premier était maigre et avait une longue trique ferrée, le second, qui était une espèce de colosse, portait, par le milieu du manche et la cognée en bas, un merlin à assommer les bœufs. Le troisième, homme aux épaules trapues, moins maigre que le premier, moins massif que le second, tenait à plein poing une énorme clef volée à quelque porte de prison.

Il paraît que c’était l’arrivée de ces hommes que Jondrette attendait. Un dialogue rapide s’engagea entre lui et l’homme à la trique, le maigre.

— Tout est-il prêt? dit Jondrette.

— Oui, répondit l’homme maigre.

— Où donc est Montparnasse?

— Le jeune premier s’est arrêté pour causer avec ta fille.

— Laquelle?

— L’aînée.

— Il y a un fiacre en bas?

— Oui.

— La maringotte est attelée?

— Attelée.

— De deux bons chevaux?

— Excellents.

— Elle attend où j’ai dit qu’elle attendît?

— Oui.

— Bien, dit Jondrette.

M. Leblanc était très pâle. Il considérait tout dans le bouge autour de lui comme un homme qui comprend où il est tombé, et sa tête, tour à tour dirigée vers toutes les têtes qui l’entouraient, se mouvait sur son cou avec une lenteur attentive et étonnée, mais il n’y avait dans son air rien qui ressemblât à la peur. Il s’était fait de la table un retranchement improvisé; et cet homme qui, le moment d’auparavant, n’avait l’air que d’un bon vieux homme, était devenu subitement une sorte d’athlète, et posait son poing robuste sur le dossier de sa chaise avec un geste redoutable et surprenant.

Ce vieillard, si ferme et si brave devant un tel danger, semblait être de ces natures qui sont courageuses comme elles sont bonnes, aisément et simplement. Le père d’une femme qu’on aime n’est jamais un étranger pour nous. Marius se sentit fier de cet inconnu.

Trois des hommes aux bras nus dont Jondrette avait dit: ce sont des fumistes, avaient pris dans le tas de ferrailles, l’un une grande cisaille, l’autre une pince à faire des pesées, le troisième un marteau, et s’étaient mis en travers de la porte sans prononcer une parole. Le vieux était resté sur le lit, et avait seulement ouvert les yeux. La Jondrette s’était assise à côté de lui. Marius pensa qu’avant quelques secondes le moment d’intervenir serait arrivé, et il éleva sa main droite vers le plafond, dans la direction du corridor, prêt à lâcher son coup de pistolet.

Jondrette, son colloque avec l’homme à la trique terminé, se tourna de nouveau vers M. Leblanc et répéta sa question en l’accompagnant de ce rire bas, contenu et terrible qu’il avait:

— Vous ne me reconnaissez donc pas?

M. Leblanc le regarda en face et répondit:

— Non.

Alors Jondrette vint jusqu’à la table. Il se pencha par-dessus la chandelle, croisant les bras, approchant sa mâchoire anguleuse et féroce du visage calme de M. Leblanc, et avançant le plus qu’il pouvait sans que M. Leblanc reculât, et, dans cette posture de bête fauve qui va mordre, il cria:

— Je ne m’appelle pas Fabantou, je ne m’appelle pas Jondrette, je me nomme Thénardier! je suis l’aubergiste de Montfermeil! entendez-vous bien? Thénardier! Maintenant me reconnaissez-vous?

Une imperceptible rougeur passa sur le front de M. Leblanc, et il répondit sans que sa voix tremblât, ni s’élevât, avec sa placidité ordinaire:

— Pas davantage.

Marius n’entendit pas cette réponse. Qui l’eût vu en ce moment dans cette obscurité l’eût vu hagard, stupide et foudroyé. Au moment où Jondrette avait dit: Je me nomme Thénardier, Marius avait tremblé de tous ses membres et s’était appuyé au mur comme s’il eût senti le froid d’une lame d’épée à travers son cœur. Puis son bras droit, prêt à lâcher le coup de signal, s’était abaissé lentement, et au moment où Jondrette avait répété Entendez-vous bien, Thénardier? les doigts défaillants de Marius avaient laissé tomber le pistolet. Jondrette, en dévoilant qui il était, n’avait pas ému M. Leblanc, mais il avait bouleversé Marius. Ce nom de Thénardier, que M.

Leblanc ne semblait pas connaître, Marius le connaissait. Qu’on se rappelle ce que ce nom était pour lui! Ce nom, il l’avait porté sur son cœur, écrit dans le testament de son père! il le portait au fond de sa pensée, au fond de sa mémoire, dans cette recommandation sacrée: «Un nommé Thénardier m’a sauvé la vie. Si mon fils le rencontre, il lui fera tout le bien qu’il pourra.» Ce nom, on s’en souvient, était une des piétés de son âme; il le mêlait au nom de son père dans son culte. Quoi! c’était là ce Thénardier, c’était là cet aubergiste de Montfermeil qu’il avait vainement et si longtemps cherché! Il le trouvait enfin, et comment! ce sauveur de son père était un bandit! cet homme, auquel lui Marius brûlait de se dévouer, était un monstre! ce libérateur du colonel Pontmercy était en train de commettre un attentat dont Marius ne voyait pas encore bien distinctement la forme, mais qui ressemblait à un assassinat! et sur qui, grand Dieu! Quelle fatalité! quelle amère moquerie du sort! Son père lui ordonnait du fond de son cercueil de faire tout le bien possible à Thénardier, depuis quatre ans Marius n’avait pas d’autre idée que d’acquitter cette dette de son père, et, au moment où il allait faire saisir par la justice un brigand au milieu d’un crime, la destinée lui criait: c’est Thénardier! La vie de son père, sauvée dans une grêle de mitraille sur le champ héroïque de Waterloo, il allait enfin la payer à cet homme, et la payer de l’échafaud! Il s’était promis, si jamais il retrouvait ce Thénardier, de ne l’aborder qu’en se jetant à ses pieds, et il le retrouvait en effet, mais pour le livrer au bourreau! Son père lui disait: Secours Thénardier! et il répondait à cette voix adorée et sainte en écrasant Thénardier! Donner pour spectacle à son père dans son tombeau l’homme qui l’avait arraché à la mort au péril de sa vie, exécuté place Saint-Jacques par le fait de son fils, de ce Marius à qui il avait légué cet homme! et quelle dérision que d’avoir si longtemps porté sur sa poitrine les dernières volontés de son père écrites de sa main pour faire affreusement tout le contraire! Mais, d’un autre côté, assister à ce guet-apens et ne pas l’empêcher! quoi! condamner la victime et épargner l’assassin! est-ce qu’on pouvait être tenu à quelque reconnaissance envers un pareil misérable? Toutes les idées que Marius avait depuis quatre ans étaient comme traversées de part en part par ce coup inattendu. Il frémissait. Tout dépendait de lui. Il tenait dans sa main à leur insu ces êtres qui s’agitaient là sous ses yeux. S’il tirait le coup de pistolet, M. Leblanc était sauvé et Thénardier était perdu; s’il ne le tirait pas, M. Leblanc était sacrifié et, qui sait? Thénardier échappait. Précipiter l’un, ou laisser tomber l’autre! remords des deux côtés. Que faire? que choisir? manquer aux souvenirs les plus impérieux, à tant d'engagements profonds pris avec lui-même, au devoir le plus saint, au texte le plus vénéré! manquer au testament de son père, ou laisser s'accomplir un crime! Il lui semblait d'un côté entendre «son Ursule» le supplier pour son père, et de l'autre le colonel lui recommander Thénardier. Il se sentait fou. Ses genoux se dérobaient sous lui. Et il n'avait pas même le temps de délibérer, tant la scène qu'il avait sous les yeux se précipitait avec furie. C'était comme un tourbillon dont il s'était cru maître et qui l'emportait. Il fut au moment de s'évanouir.

Cependant Thénardier, nous ne le nommerons plus autrement désormais, se promenait de long en large devant la table dans une sorte d'égarement et de triomphe frénétique.

Il prit à plein poing la chandelle et la posa sur la cheminée avec un frappement si violent que la mèche faillit s'éteindre et que le suif éclaboussa le mur.

Puis il se tourna vers M. Leblanc, effroyable, et cracha ceci:

— Flambé! fumé! fricassé! à la crapaudine!

Et il se remit à marcher, en pleine explosion.

— Ah! criait-il, je vous retrouve enfin, monsieur le philanthrope! monsieur le millionnaire râpé! monsieur le donneur de poupées! vieux Jocrisse! Ah! vous ne me reconnaissez pas! Non, ce n'est pas vous qui êtes venu à Montfermeil, à mon auberge, il y a huit ans, la nuit de Noël 1823! ce n'est pas vous qui avez emmené de chez moi l'enfant de la Fantine, l'Alouette! ce n'est pas vous qui aviez un carrick jaune! non! et un paquet plein de nippes à la main comme ce matin chez moi! Dis donc, ma femme! c'est sa manie, à ce qu'il paraît, de porter dans les maisons des paquets pleins de bas de laine! vieux charitable, va! Est-ce que vous êtes bonnetier, monsieur le millionnaire? vous donnez aux pauvres votre fonds de boutique, saint homme! quel funambule! Ah! vous ne me reconnaissez pas? Eh bien, je vous reconnais, moi, je vous ai reconnu tout de suite dès que vous avez fourré votre mufle ici. Ah! on va voir enfin que ce n'est pas tout roses d'aller comme cela dans les maisons des gens, sous prétexte que ce sont des auberges, avec des habits minables, avec l'air d'un pauvre, qu'on lui aurait donné un sou, tromper les personnes, faire le généreux, leur prendre leur gagne-pain, et menacer dans les bois, et qu'on n'en est pas quitte pour rapporter après, quand les gens sont ruinés, une redingote trop large et deux méchantes couvertures d'hôpital, vieux gueux, voleur d'enfants!

Il s'arrêta, et parut un moment se parler à lui-même. On eût dit que sa fureur tombait comme le Rhône dans quelque trou; puis, comme s'il achevait tout haut des choses qu'il venait de se dire tout bas, il frappa un coup de poing sur la table et cria:

— Avec son air bonasse!

Et apostrophant M. Leblanc:

— Parbleu! vous vous êtes moqué de moi autrefois. Vous êtes cause de tous mes malheurs! Vous avez eu pour quinze cents francs une fille que j'avais, et qui était certainement à des riches, et qui m'avait déjà rapporté beaucoup d'argent, et dont je devais tirer de quoi vivre toute ma vie! une fille qui m'aurait dédommagé de tout ce que j'ai perdu dans cette abominable gargote où l'on faisait des sabbats sterlings et où j'ai mangé comme un imbécile tout mon saint-frusquin! Oh! je voudrais que tout le vin qu'on a bu chez moi fût du poison à ceux qui l'ont bu! Enfin n'importe! Dites donc! vous avez dû me trouver farce quand vous vous êtes en allé avec l'Alouette! Vous aviez votre gourdin dans la forêt! Vous étiez le plus fort. Revanche. C'est moi qui ai l'atout aujourd'hui! Vous êtes fichu, mon bonhomme! Oh mais, je ris. Vrai, je ris! Est-il tombé dans le panneau! Je lui ai dit que j'étais acteur, que je m'appelais Fabantou, que j'avais joué la comédie avec mamselle Mars, avec mamselle Muche, que mon propriétaire voulait être payé demain 4 février, et il n'a même pas vu que c'est le 8 janvier et non le 4 février qui est un terme! Absurde crétin! Et ces quatre méchants philippes qu'il m'apporte! Canaille! Il n'a même pas eu le cœur d'aller jusqu'à cent francs! Et comme il donnait dans mes platitudes! Ça m'amusait. Je me disais: Ganache! Va, je te tiens. Je te lèche les pattes ce matin! Je te rongerai le cœur ce soir!

Thénardier cessa. Il était essoufflé. Sa petite poitrine étroite haletait comme un soufflet de forge. Son œil était plein de cet ignoble bonheur d'une créature faible, cruelle et lâche, qui peut enfin terrasser ce qu'elle a redouté et insulter ce qu'elle a flatté, joie d'un nain qui mettrait le talon sur la tête de Goliath, joie d'un chacal qui commence à déchirer un taureau malade, assez mort pour ne plus se défendre, assez vivant pour souffrir encore.

M. Leblanc ne l'interrompit pas, mais lui dit lorsqu'il s'interrompit:

— Je ne sais ce que vous voulez dire. Vous vous méprenez. Je suis un homme très pauvre et rien moins qu’un millionnaire. Je ne vous connais pas. Vous me prenez pour un autre.

— Ah! râla Thénardier, la bonne balançoire! Vous tenez à cette plaisanterie! Vous pataugez, mon vieux! Ah! vous ne vous souvenez pas? Vous ne voyez pas qui je suis!

— Pardon, monsieur, répondit M. Leblanc avec un accent de politesse qui avait en un pareil moment quelque chose d’étrange et de puissant, je vois que vous êtes un bandit.

Qui ne l’a remarqué, les êtres odieux ont leur susceptibilité, les monstres sont chatouilleux. À ce mot de bandit, la femme Thénardier se jeta à bas du lit, Thénardier saisit sa chaise comme s’il allait la briser dans ses mains. — Ne bouge pas, toi! cria-t-il à sa femme; et, se tournant vers M. Leblanc:

— Bandit! oui, je sais que vous nous appelez comme cela, messieurs les gens riches! Tiens! c’est vrai, j’ai fait faillite, je me cache, je n’ai pas de pain, je n’ai pas le sou, je suis un bandit! Voilà trois jours que je n’ai pas mangé, je suis un bandit! Ah! vous vous chauffez les pieds, vous autres, vous avez des escarpins de Sakoski, vous avez des redingotes ouatées, comme des archevêques, vous logez au premier dans des maisons à portier, vous mangez des truffes, vous mangez des bottes d’asperges à quarante francs au mois de janvier, des petits pois, vous vous gavez, et, quand vous voulez savoir s’il fait froid, vous regardez dans le journal ce que marque le thermomètre de l’ingénieur Chevalier. Nous! c’est nous qui sommes les thermomètres! nous n’avons pas besoin d’aller voir sur le quai au coin de la tour de l’Horloge combien il y a de degrés de froid, nous sentons le sang se figer dans nos veines et la glace nous arriver au cœur, et nous disons: Il n’y a pas de Dieu! Et vous venez dans nos cavernes, oui, dans nos cavernes, nous appeler bandits! Mais nous vous mangerons! mais nous vous dévorerons, pauvres petits! Monsieur le millionnaire! sachez ceci: J’ai été un homme établi, j’ai été patenté, j’ai été électeur, je suis un bourgeois, moi! et vous n’en êtes peut-être pas un, vous!

Ici Thénardier fit un pas vers les hommes qui étaient près de la porte, et ajouta avec un frémissement:

— Quand je pense qu’il ose venir me parler comme à un savetier!

Puis s’adressant à M. Leblanc avec une recrudescence de frénésie:

— Et sachez encore ceci, monsieur le philanthrope! je ne suis pas un homme louche, moi! je ne suis pas un homme dont on ne sait point le nom et qui vient enlever des enfants dans les maisons! Je suis un ancien soldat français, je devrais être décoré! J'étais à Waterloo, moi! et j'ai sauvé dans la bataille un général appelé le comte de je ne sais quoi! Il m'a dit son nom; mais sa chienne de voix était si faible que je ne l'ai pas entendu. Je n'ai entendu que Merci. J'aurais mieux aimé son nom que son remercîment. Cela m'aurait aidé à le retrouver. Ce tableau que vous voyez, et qui a été peint par David à Bruqueselles, savez-vous qui il représente? il représente moi. David a voulu immortaliser ce fait d'armes. J'ai ce général sur mon dos, et je l'emporte à travers la mitraille. Voilà l'histoire. Il n'a même jamais rien fait pour moi, ce général-là; il ne valait pas mieux que les autres! Je ne lui en ai pas moins sauvé la vie au danger de la mienne, et j'en ai les certificats plein mes poches! Je suis un soldat de Waterloo, mille noms de noms! Et maintenant que j'ai eu la bonté de vous dire tout ça, finissons, il me faut de l'argent, il me faut beaucoup d'argent, il me faut énormément d'argent, ou je vous extermine, tonnerre du bon Dieu!

Marius avait repris quelque empire sur ses angoisses, et écoutait. La dernière possibilité de doute venait de s'évanouir. C'était bien le Thénardier du testament. Marius frissonna à ce reproche d'ingratitude adressé à son père et qu'il était sur le point de justifier si fatalement. Ses perplexités en redoublèrent. Du reste il y avait dans toutes ces paroles de Thénardier, dans l'accent, dans le geste, dans le regard qui faisait jaillir des flammes de chaque mot, il y avait dans cette explosion d'une mauvaise nature montrant tout, dans ce mélange de fanfaronnade et d'abjection, d'orgueil et de petitesse, de rage et de sottise, dans ce chaos de griefs réels et de sentiments faux, dans cette impudeur d'un méchant homme savourant la volupté de la violence, dans cette nudité effrontée d'une âme laide, dans cette conflagration de toutes les souffrances combinées avec toutes les haines, quelque chose qui était hideux comme le mal et poignant comme le vrai.

Le tableau de maître, la peinture de David dont il avait proposé l'achat à M. Leblanc, n'était, le lecteur l'a deviné, autre chose que l'enseigne de sa gargote, peinte, on s'en souvient, par lui-même, seul débris qu'il eût conservé de son naufrage de Montfermeil.

Comme il avait cessé d'intercepter le rayon visuel de Marius, Marius maintenant pouvait considérer cette chose, et dans ce badigeonnage il reconnaissait réellement une bataille, un fond de fumée, et un homme qui en portait un autre. C'était le groupe de Thénardier et de Pontmercy, le sergent sauveur, le colonel sauvé. Marius était comme ivre, ce tableau faisait en quelque sorte son père vivant, ce n'était plus l'enseigne du cabaret de Montfermeil, c'était une résurrection, une tombe s'y entr'ouvrait, un fantôme s'y dressait. Marius entendait son cœur tinter à ses tempes, il avait le canon de Waterloo dans les oreilles, son père sanglant vaguement peint sur ce panneau sinistre l'effarait, et il lui semblait que cette silhouette informe le regardait fixement.

Quand Thénardier eut repris haleine, il attacha sur M. Leblanc ses prunelles sanglantes, et lui dit d'une voix basse et brève:

— Qu'as-tu à dire avant qu'on te mette en brindesingues?

M. Leblanc se taisait. Au milieu de ce silence une voix éraillée lança du corridor ce sarcasme lugubre:

— S'il faut fendre du bois, je suis là, moi!

C'était l'homme au merlin qui s'égayait.

En même temps une énorme face hérissée et terreuse parut à la porte avec un affreux rire qui montrait non des dents, mais des crocs.

C'était la face de l'homme au merlin.

— Pourquoi as-tu ôté ton masque? lui cria Thénardier avec fureur.

— Pour rire, répliqua l'homme.

Depuis quelques instants, M. Leblanc semblait suivre et guetter tous les mouvements de Thénardier, qui, aveuglé et ébloui par sa propre rage, allait et venait dans le repaire avec la confiance de sentir la porte gardée, de tenir, armé, un homme désarmé, et d'être neuf contre un, en supposant que la Thénardier ne comptât que pour un homme. Dans son apostrophe à l'homme au merlin, il tournait le dos à M. Leblanc.

M. Leblanc saisit ce moment, repoussa du pied la chaise, du poing la table, et d'un bond, avec une agilité prodigieuse, avant que Thénardier eût eu le temps de se retourner, il était à la fenêtre. L'ouvrir, escalader l'appui, l'enjamber, ce fut une seconde. Il était à moitié dehors quand six poings robustes le saisirent et le ramenèrent énergiquement dans le bouge. C'étaient les trois «fumistes» qui s'étaient élancés sur lui. En même temps, la Thénardier l'avait empoigné aux cheveux.

Au piétinement qui se fit, les autres bandits accoururent du corridor. Le vieux qui était sur le lit et qui semblait pris de vin, descendit du grabat et arriva en chancelant, un marteau de cantonnier à la main.

Un des «fumistes» dont la chandelle éclairait le visage barbouillé, et dans lequel Marius, malgré ce barbouillage, reconnut Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille, levait au-dessus de la tête de M. Leblanc une espèce d’assommoir fait de deux pommes de plomb aux deux bouts d’une barre de fer.

Marius ne put résister à ce spectacle. — Mon père, pensa-t-il, pardonne-moi! — Et son doigt chercha la détente du pistolet. Le coup allait partir lorsque la voix de Thénardier cria:

— Ne lui faites pas de mal!

Cette tentative désespérée de la victime, loin d’exaspérer Thénardier, l’avait calmé. Il y avait deux hommes en lui, l’homme féroce et l’homme adroit. Jusqu’à cet instant, dans le débordement du triomphe, devant la proie abattue et ne bougeant pas, l’homme féroce avait dominé; quand la victime se débattit et parut vouloir lutter, l’homme adroit reparut et prit le dessus.

— Ne lui faites pas de mal! répéta-t-il. Et, sans s’en douter, pour premier succès, il arrêta le pistolet prêt à partir et paralysa Marius pour lequel l’urgence disparut, et qui, devant cette phase nouvelle, ne vit point d’inconvénient à attendre encore. Qui sait si quelque chance ne surgirait pas qui le délivrerait de l’affreuse alternative de laisser périr le père d’Ursule ou de perdre le sauveur du colonel?

Une lutte herculéenne s’était engagée. D’un coup de poing en plein torse M. Leblanc avait envoyé le vieux rouler au milieu de la chambre, puis de deux revers de main avait terrassé deux autres assaillants, et il en tenait un sous chacun de ses genoux; les misérables râlaient sous cette pression comme sous une meule de granit; mais les quatre autres avaient saisi le redoutable vieillard aux deux bras et à la nuque et le tenaient accroupi sur les deux «fumistes» terrassés. Ainsi, maître des uns et maîtrisé par les autres, écrasant ceux d’en bas et étouffant sous ceux d’en haut, secouant vainement tous les efforts qui s’entassaient sur lui, M. Leblanc disparaissait sous le groupe horrible des bandits comme un sanglier sous un monceau hurlant de dogues et de limiers.

Ils parvinrent à le renverser sur le lit le plus proche de la croisée et l’y tinrent en respect. La Thénardier ne lui avait pas lâché les cheveux.

— Toi, dit Thénardier, ne t’en mêle pas. Tu vas déchirer ton châle.

La Thénardier obéit, comme la louve obéit au loup, avec un grondement.

— Vous autres, reprit Thénardier, fouillez-le.

M. Leblanc semblait avoir renoncé à la résistance. On le fouilla. Il n’avait rien sur lui qu’une bourse de cuir qui contenait six francs, et son mouchoir.

Thénardier mit le mouchoir dans sa poche.

— Quoi! pas de portefeuille? demanda-t-il.

— Ni de montre, répondit un des «fumistes».

— C'est égal, murmura avec une voix de ventriloque l'homme masqué qui tenait la grosse clef, c'est un vieux rude!

Thénardier alla au coin de la porte et y prit un paquet de cordes, qu'il leur jeta.

— Attachez-le au pied du lit, dit-il. Et, apercevant le vieux qui était resté étendu à travers la chambre du coup de poing de M. Leblanc et qui ne bougeait pas:

— Est-ce que Boulatruelle est mort? demanda-t-il.

— Non, répondit Bigrenaille, il est ivre.

— Balayez-le dans un coin, dit Thénardier.

— Deux des «fumistes» poussèrent l'ivrogne avec le pied près du tas de ferrailles.

— Babet, pourquoi en as-tu amené tant? dit Thénardier bas à l'homme à la trique, c'était inutile.

— Que veux-tu? répliqua l'homme à la trique, ils ont tous voulu en être. La saison est mauvaise. Il ne se fait pas d'affaires.

Le grabat où M. Leblanc avait été renversé était une façon de lit d'hôpital porté sur quatre montants grossiers en bois à peine équarri. M. Leblanc se laissa faire. Les brigands le lièrent solidement, debout et les pieds posant à terre, au montant du lit le plus éloigné de la fenêtre et le plus proche de la cheminée.

Quand le dernier nœud fut serré, Thénardier prit une chaise et vint s'asseoir presque en face de M. Leblanc. Thénardier ne se ressemblait plus, en quelques instants sa physionomie avait passé de la violence effrénée à la douceur tranquille et rusée. Marius avait peine à reconnaître dans ce sourire poli d'homme de bureau la bouche presque bestiale qui écumait le moment d'auparavant, il considérait avec stupeur cette métamorphose fantastique et inquiétante, et il éprouvait ce qu'éprouverait un homme qui verrait un tigre se changer en un avoué.

— Monsieur... fit Thénardier.

Et écartant du geste les brigands qui avaient encore la main sur M. Leblanc:

— Éloignez-vous un peu, et laissez-moi causer avec monsieur.

Tous se retirèrent vers la porte. Il reprit:

— Monsieur, vous avez eu tort de vouloir sauter par la fenêtre. Vous auriez pu vous casser une jambe. Maintenant, si vous le permettez, nous allons causer tranquillement. Il faut d'abord que je vous communique une remarque que j'ai faite, c'est que vous n'avez pas encore poussé le moindre cri.

Thénardier avait raison, ce détail était réel, quoiqu'il eût échappé à Marius dans son trouble. M. Leblanc avait à peine prononcé quelques paroles sans hausser la voix, et, même dans sa lutte près de la fenêtre avec les six bandits, il avait gardé le plus profond et le plus singulier silence. Thénardier poursuivit:

— Mon Dieu! vous auriez un peu crié au voleur, que je ne l'aurais pas trouvé inconvenant! À l'assassin! cela se dit dans l'occasion, et, quant à moi, je ne l'aurais point pris en mauvaise part. Il est tout simple qu'on fasse un peu de vacarme quand on se trouve avec des personnes qui ne vous inspirent pas suffisamment de confiance. Vous l'auriez fait qu'on ne vous aurait pas dérangé. On ne vous aurait même pas bâillonné. Et je vais vous dire pourquoi. C'est que cette chambre-ci est très sourde. Elle n'a que cela pour elle, mais elle a cela. C'est une cave. On y tirerait une bombe que cela ferait pour le corps de garde le plus prochain le bruit d'un ronflement d'ivrogne. Ici le canon ferait boum et le tonnerre ferait pouf. C'est un logement commode. Mais enfin vous n'avez pas crié, c'est mieux, je vous en fais mon compliment, et je vais vous dire ce que j'en conclus. Mon cher monsieur, quand on crie, qu'est-ce qui vient? la police. Et après la police? la justice. Eh bien, vous n'avez pas crié; c'est que vous ne vous souciez pas plus que nous de voir arriver la justice et la police. C'est que, — il y a longtemps que je m'en doute, — vous avez un intérêt quelconque à cacher quelque chose. De notre côté nous avons le même intérêt. Donc nous pouvons nous entendre.

Tout en parlant ainsi, il semblait que Thénardier, la prunelle attachée sur M. Leblanc, cherchât à enfoncer les pointes aiguës qui sortaient de ses yeux jusque dans la conscience de son prisonnier. Du reste son langage, empreint d'une sorte d'insolence modérée et sournoise, était réservé et presque choisi, et dans ce misérable qui n'était tout à l'heure qu'un brigand on sentait maintenant «l'homme qui a étudié pour être prêtre».

Le silence qu'avait gardé le prisonnier, cette précaution qui allait jusqu'à l'oubli même du soin de sa vie, cette résistance opposée au premier mouvement de la nature, qui est de jeter un cri, tout cela, il faut le dire, depuis que la remarque en avait été faite, était importun à Marius, et l’étonnait péniblement.

L’observation si fondée de Thénardier obscurcissait encore pour Marius les épaisseurs mystérieuses sous lesquelles se dérobait cette figure grave et étrange à laquelle Courfeyrac avait jeté le sobriquet de monsieur Leblanc. Mais, quel qu’il fût, lié de cordes, entouré de bourreaux, à demi plongé, pour ainsi dire, dans une fosse qui s’enfonçait sous lui d’un degré à chaque instant, devant la fureur comme devant la douceur de Thénardier, cet homme demeurait impassible; et Marius ne pouvait s’empêcher d’admirer en un pareil moment ce visage superbement mélancolique.

C’était évidemment une âme inaccessible à l’épouvante et ne sachant pas ce que c’est que d’être éperdue. C’était un de ces hommes qui dominent l’étonnement des situations désespérées. Si extrême que fût la crise, si inévitable que fût la catastrophe, il n’y avait rien là de l’agonie du noyé ouvrant sous l’eau des yeux horribles.

Thénardier se leva sans affectation, alla à la cheminée, déplaça le paravent qu’il appuya au grabat voisin, et démasqua ainsi le réchaud plein de braise ardente dans laquelle le prisonnier pouvait parfaitement voir le ciseau rougi à blanc et piqué çà et là de petites étoiles écarlates.

Puis Thénardier vint se rasseoir près de M. Leblanc.

— Je continue, dit-il. Nous pouvons nous entendre. Arrangeons ceci à l’amiable. J’ai eu tort de m’emporter tout à l’heure, je ne sais où j’avais l’esprit, j’ai été beaucoup trop loin, j’ai dit des extravagances. Par exemple, parce que vous êtes millionnaire, je vous ai dit que j’exigeais de l’argent, beaucoup d’argent, immensément d’argent. Cela ne serait pas raisonnable. Mon Dieu, vous avez beau être riche, vous avez vos charges, qui n’a pas les siennes? Je ne veux pas vous ruiner, je ne suis pas un happe-chair après tout. Je ne suis pas de ces gens qui, parce qu’ils ont l’avantage de la position, profitent de cela pour être ridicules. Tenez, j’y mets du mien et je fais un sacrifice de mon côté. Il me faut simplement deux cent mille francs.

M. Leblanc ne souffla pas un mot. Thénardier poursuivit:

— Vous voyez que je ne mets pas mal d’eau dans mon vin. Je ne connais pas l’état de votre fortune, mais je sais que vous ne regardez pas à l’argent, et un homme bienfaisant comme vous peut bien donner deux cent mille francs à un père de famille qui n’est pas heureux. Certainement vous êtes raisonnable aussi, vous ne vous êtes pas figuré que je me donnerais de la peine comme aujourd’hui, et que j’organiserais la chose de ce soir, qui est un travail bien fait, de l’aveu de tous ces messieurs, pour aboutir à vous demander de quoi aller boire du rouge à quinze et manger du veau chez Desnoyers. Deux cent mille francs, ça vaut ça. Une fois cette bagatelle sortie de votre poche, je vous réponds que tout est dit et que vous n’avez pas à craindre une pichenette. Vous me direz: Mais je n’ai pas deux cent mille francs sur moi. Oh! je ne suis pas exagéré. Je n’exige pas cela. Je ne vous demande qu’une chose. Ayez la bonté d’écrire ce que je vais vous dicter.

Ici Thénardier s’interrompit, puis il ajouta en appuyant sur les mots et en jetant un sourire du côté du réchaud:

— Je vous préviens que je n’admettrais pas que vous ne sachiez pas écrire.

Un grand inquisiteur eût pu envier ce sourire.

Thénardier poussa la table tout près de M. Leblanc, et prit l’encrier, une plume et une feuille de papier dans le tiroir qu’il laissa entr’ouvert et où luisait la longue lame du couteau.

Il posa la feuille de papier devant M. Leblanc.

— Écrivez, dit-il.

Le prisonnier parla enfin.

— Comment voulez-vous que j’écrive? je suis attaché.

— C’est vrai, pardon! fit Thénardier, vous avez bien raison.

Et se tournant vers Bigrenaille:

— Déliez le bras droit de monsieur.

Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille, exécuta l’ordre de Thénardier. Quand la main droite du prisonnier fut libre, Thénardier trempa la plume dans l’encre et la lui présenta.

— Remarquez bien, monsieur, que vous êtes en notre pouvoir, à notre discrétion, absolument à notre discrétion, qu’aucune puissance humaine ne peut vous tirer d’ici, et que nous serions vraiment désolés d’être contraints d’en venir à des extrémités désagréables. Je ne sais ni votre nom, ni votre adresse; mais je vous préviens que vous resterez attaché jusqu’à ce que la personne chargée de porter la lettre que vous allez écrire soit revenue. Maintenant veuillez écrire.

— Quoi? demanda le prisonnier.

— Je dicte.

M. Leblanc prit la plume. Thénardier commença à dicter:

— «Ma fille...»

Le prisonnier tressaillit et leva les yeux sur Thénardier.

— Mettez «ma chère fille», dit Thénardier. M. Leblanc obéit. Thénardier continua:

— «Viens sur-le-champ...»

Il s'interrompit:

— Vous la tutoyez, n'est-ce pas?

— Qui? demanda M. Leblanc.

— Parbleu! dit Thénardier, la petite, l'Alouette.

M. Leblanc répondit sans la moindre émotion apparente:

— Je ne sais ce que vous voulez dire.

— Allez toujours, fit Thénardier; et il se remit à dicter:

— «Viens sur-le-champ. J'ai absolument besoin de toi. La personne qui te remettra ce billet est chargée de t'amener près de moi. Je t'attends. Viens avec confiance.»

M. Leblanc avait tout écrit. Thénardier reprit:

— Ah! effacez viens avec confiance; cela pourrait faire supposer que la chose n'est pas toute simple et que la défiance est possible.

M. Leblanc ratura les trois mots.

— À présent, poursuivit Thénardier, signez. Comment vous appelez-vous?

Le prisonnier posa la plume et demanda:

— Pour qui est cette lettre?

— Vous le savez bien, répondit Thénardier. Pour la petite. Je viens de vous le dire.

Il était évident que Thénardier évitait de nommer la jeune fille dont il était question. Il disait «l'Alouette», il disait «la petite», mais il ne prononçait pas le nom. Précaution d'habile homme gardant son secret devant ses complices. Dire le nom, c'eût été leur livrer toute «l'affaire», et leur en apprendre plus qu'ils n'avaient besoin d'en savoir.

Il reprit:

— Signez. Quel est votre nom?

— Urbain Fabre, dit le prisonnier.

Thénardier, avec le mouvement d'un chat, précipita sa main dans sa poche et en tira le mouchoir saisi sur M. Leblanc. Il en chercha la marque et l'approcha de la chandelle.

— U.F. C'est cela. Urbain Fabre. Eh bien, signez U.F.

Le prisonnier signa.

— Comme il faut les deux mains pour plier la lettre, donnez, je vais la plier.

Cela fait, Thénardier reprit:

— Mettez l'adresse. Mademoiselle Fabre, chez vous. Je sais que vous demeurez pas très loin d'ici, aux environs de Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas, puisque c'est là que vous allez à la messe tous les jours, mais je ne sais pas dans quelle rue. Je vois que vous comprenez votre situation. Comme vous n'avez pas menti pour votre nom, vous ne mentirez pas pour votre adresse. Mettez-la vous-même.

Le prisonnier resta un moment pensif, puis il reprit la plume et écrivit:

— Mademoiselle Fabre, chez monsieur Urbain Fabre, rue Saint-Dominique-d'Enfer, n° 17.

Thénardier saisit la lettre avec une sorte de convulsion fébrile.

— Ma femme! cria-t-il.

La Thénardier accourut.

— Voici la lettre. Tu sais ce que tu as à faire. Un fiacre est en bas. Pars tout de suite, et reviens idem.

Et s'adressant à l'homme au merlin:

— Toi, puisque tu as ôté ton cache-nez, accompagne la bourgeoise. Tu monteras derrière le fiacre. Tu sais où tu as laissé la maringotte?

— Oui, dit l'homme.

Et, déposant son merlin dans un coin, il suivit la Thénardier.

Comme ils s'en allaient, Thénardier passa sa tête par la porte entrebâillée et cria dans le corridor:

— Surtout ne perds pas la lettre! songe que tu as deux cent mille francs sur toi.

La voix rauque de la Thénardier répondit:

— Sois tranquille. Je l'ai mise dans mon estomac.

Une minute ne s'était pas écoulée qu'on entendit le claquement d'un fouet qui décrut et s'éteignit rapidement.

— Bon! grommela Thénardier. Ils vont bon train. De ce galop-là la bourgeoise sera de retour dans trois quarts d'heure.

Il approcha une chaise de la cheminée et s'assit en croisant les bras et en présentant ses bottes boueuses au réchaud.

— J'ai froid aux pieds, dit-il.

Il ne restait plus dans le bouge avec Thénardier et le prisonnier que cinq bandits. Ces hommes, à travers les masques ou la glu noire qui leur couvrait la face et en faisait, au choix de la peur, des charbonniers, des nègres ou des démons, avaient des airs engourdis et mornes, et l'on sentait qu'ils exécutaient un crime comme une besogne, tranquillement, sans colère et sans pitié, avec une sorte d'ennui. Ils étaient dans un coin entassés comme des brutes et se taisaient. Thénardier se chauffait les pieds. Le prisonnier était retombé dans sa taciturnité. Un calme sombre avait succédé au vacarme farouche qui remplissait le galetas quelques instants auparavant.

La chandelle, où un large champignon s'était formé, éclairait à peine l'immense taudis, le brasier s'était terni, et toutes ces têtes monstrueuses faisaient des ombres difformes sur les murs et au plafond.

On n'entendait d'autre bruit que la respiration paisible du vieillard ivre qui dormait.

Marius attendait, dans une anxiété que tout accroissait. L'énigme était plus impénétrable que jamais. Qu'était-ce que cette «petite» que Thénardier avait aussi nommée l'Alouette? était-ce son «Ursule»? Le prisonnier n'avait pas paru ému à ce mot, l'Alouette, et avait répondu le plus naturellement du monde: Je ne sais ce que vous voulez dire. D'un autre côté, les deux lettres U.F. étaient expliquées, c'était Urbain Fabre, et Ursule ne s'appelait plus Ursule. C'est là ce que Marius voyait le plus clairement. Une sorte de fascination affreuse le retenait cloué à la place d'où il observait et dominait toute cette scène. Il était là, presque incapable de réflexion et de mouvement, comme anéanti par de si abominables choses vues de près. Il attendait, espérant quelque incident, n'importe quoi, ne pouvant rassembler ses idées et ne sachant quel parti prendre.

— Dans tous les cas, disait-il, si l'Alouette, c'est elle, je le verrai bien, car la Thénardier va l'amener ici. Alors tout sera dit, je donnerai ma vie et mon sang s'il le faut, mais je la délivrerai! Rien ne m'arrêtera.

Près d'une demi-heure passa ainsi. Thénardier paraissait absorbé par une méditation ténébreuse. Le prisonnier ne bougeait pas. Cependant Marius croyait par intervalles et depuis quelques instants entendre un petit bruit sourd du côté du prisonnier.

Tout à coup Thénardier apostropha le prisonnier:

— Monsieur Fabre, tenez, autant que je vous dise tout de suite.

Ces quelques mots semblaient commencer un éclaircissement. Marius prêta l'oreille. Thénardier continua:

— Mon épouse va revenir, ne vous impatientez pas. Je pense que l'Alouette est véritablement votre fille, et je trouve tout simple que vous la gardiez. Seulement, écoutez un peu. Avec votre lettre, ma femme ira la trouver. J’ai dit à ma femme de s’habiller, comme vous avez vu, de façon que votre demoiselle la suive sans difficulté. Elles monteront toutes deux dans le fiacre avec mon camarade derrière. Il y a quelque part en dehors d’une barrière une maringotte attelée de deux très bons chevaux. On y conduira votre demoiselle. Elle descendra du fiacre. Mon camarade montera avec elle dans la maringotte, et ma femme reviendra ici nous dire: C’est fait. Quant à votre demoiselle, on ne lui fera pas de mal, la maringotte la mènera dans un endroit où elle sera tranquille, et, dès que vous m’aurez donné les petits deux cent mille francs, on vous la rendra. Si vous me faites arrêter, mon camarade donnera le coup de pouce à l’Alouette. Voilà.

Le prisonnier n’articula pas une parole. Après une pause, Thénardier poursuivit:

— C’est simple, comme vous voyez, Il n’y aura pas de mal si vous ne voulez pas qu’il y ait du mal. Je vous conte la chose. Je vous préviens pour que vous sachiez.

Il s’arrêta, le prisonnier ne rompit pas le silence, et Thénardier reprit:

— Dès que mon épouse sera revenue et qu’elle m’aura dit: L’Alouette est en route, nous vous lâcherons, et vous serez libre d’aller coucher chez vous. Vous voyez que nous n’avions pas de mauvaises intentions.

Des images épouvantables passèrent devant la pensée de Marius. Quoi! cette jeune fille qu’on enlevait, on n’allait pas la ramener? Un de ces monstres allait l’emporter dans l’ombre? où?... Et si c’était elle! Et il était clair que c’était elle! Marius sentait les battements de son cœur s’arrêter. Que faire? Tirer le coup de pistolet? mettre aux mains de la justice tous ces misérables? Mais l’affreux homme au merlin n’en serait pas moins hors de toute atteinte avec la jeune fille, et Marius songeait à ces mots de Thénardier dont il entrevoyait la signification sanglante: Si vous me faites arrêter, mon camarade donnera le coup de pouce à l’Alouette.

Maintenant ce n’était pas seulement par le testament du colonel, c’était par son amour même, par le péril de celle qu’il aimait, qu’il se sentait retenu.

Cette effroyable situation, qui durait déjà depuis plus d’une heure, changeait d’aspect à chaque instant. Marius eut la force de passer successivement en revue toutes les plus poignantes conjectures, cherchant une espérance et ne la trouvant pas. Le tumulte de ses pensées contrastait avec le silence funèbre du repaire.

Au milieu de ce silence on entendit le bruit de la porte de l’escalier qui s’ouvrait, puis se fermait.

Le prisonnier fit un mouvement dans ses liens.

— Voici la bourgeoise, dit Thénardier.

Il achevait à peine qu’en effet la Thénardier se précipita dans la chambre, rouge, essoufflée, haletante, les yeux flambants, et cria en frappant de ses grosses mains sur ses deux cuisses à la fois:

— Fausse adresse!

Le bandit qu’elle avait emmené avec elle, parut derrière elle et vint reprendre son merlin.

— Fausse adresse? répéta Thénardier.

Elle reprit:

— Personne! Rue Saint-Dominique, numéro dix-sept, pas de monsieur Urbain Fabre! On ne sait pas ce que c’est!

Elle s’arrêta suffoquée, puis continua:

— Monsieur Thénardier! ce vieux t’a fait poser! Tu es trop bon, vois-tu! Moi, je te vous lui aurais coupé la margoulette en quatre pour commencer! et s’il avait fait le méchant, je l’aurais fait cuire tout vivant! Il aurait bien fallu qu’il parle, et qu’il dise où est la fille, et qu’il dise où est le magot! Voilà comment j’aurais mené cela, moi! On a bien raison de dire que les hommes sont plus bêtes que les femmes! Personne! numéro dix-sept! C’est une grande porte cochère! Pas de monsieur Fabre, rue Saint-Dominique! et ventre à terre, et pourboire au cocher, et tout! J’ai parlé au portier et à la portière, qui est une belle forte femme, ils ne connaissent pas ça!

Marius respira. Elle, Ursule, ou l’Alouette, celle qu’il ne savait plus comment nommer, était sauvée.

Pendant que sa femme exaspérée vociférait, Thénardier s’était assis sur la table; il resta quelques instants sans prononcer une parole, balançant sa jambe droite qui pendait, et considérant le réchaud d’un air de rêverie sauvage.

Enfin il dit au prisonnier avec une inflexion lente et singulièrement féroce:

— Une fausse adresse? qu’est-ce que tu as donc espéré?

— Gagner du temps! cria le prisonnier d’une voix éclatante.

Et au même instant il secoua ses liens; ils étaient coupés. Le prisonnier n’était plus attaché au lit que par une jambe.

Avant que les sept hommes eussent eu le temps de se reconnaître et de s'élancer, lui s'était penché sous la cheminée, avait étendu la main vers le réchaud, puis s'était redressé, et maintenant Thénardier, la Thénardier et les bandits, refoulés par le saisissement au fond du bouge, le regardaient avec stupeur élevant au-dessus de sa tête le ciseau rouge d'où tombait une lueur sinistre, presque libre et dans une attitude formidable.

L'enquête judiciaire, à laquelle le guet-apens de la masure Gorbeau donna lieu par la suite, a constaté qu'un gros sou, coupé et travaillé d'une façon particulière, fut trouvé dans le galetas, quand la police y fît une descente; ce gros sou était une de ces merveilles d'industrie que la patience du bagne engendre dans les ténèbres et pour les ténèbres, merveilles qui ne sont autre chose que des instruments d'évasion. Ces produits hideux et délicats d'un art prodigieux sont dans la bijouterie ce que les métaphores de l'argot sont dans la poésie. Il y a des Benvenuto Cellini au bagne, de même que dans la langue il y a des Villon. Le malheureux qui aspire à la délivrance trouve moyen, quelquefois sans outils, avec un eustache, avec un vieux couteau, de scier un sou en deux lames minces, de creuser ces deux lames sans toucher aux empreintes monétaires, et de pratiquer un pas de vis sur la tranche du sou de manière à faire adhérer les lames de nouveau. Cela se visse et se dévisse à volonté; c'est une boîte. Dans cette boîte, on cache un ressort de montre, et ce ressort de montre bien manié coupe des manilles de calibre et des barreaux de fer. On croit que ce malheureux forçat ne possède qu'un sou; point, il possède la liberté. C'est un gros sou de ce genre qui, dans des perquisitions de police ultérieures, fut trouvé ouvert et en deux morceaux dans le bouge sous le grabat près de la fenêtre. On découvrit également une petite scie en acier bleu qui pouvait se cacher dans le gros sou. Il est probable qu'au moment où les bandits fouillèrent le prisonnier, il avait sur lui ce gros sou qu'il réussit à cacher dans sa main, et qu'ensuite, ayant la main droite libre, il le dévissa, et se servit de la scie pour couper les cordes qui l'attachaient, ce qui expliquerait le bruit léger et les mouvements imperceptibles que Marius avait remarqués.

N'ayant pu se baisser de peur de se trahir, il n'avait point coupé les liens de sa jambe gauche.

Les bandits étaient revenus de leur première surprise.

— Sois tranquille, dit Bigrenaille à Thénardier. Il tient encore par une jambe, et il ne s'en ira pas. J'en réponds. C'est moi qui lui ai ficelé cette patte-là.

Cependant le prisonnier éleva la voix:

— Vous êtes des malheureux, mais ma vie ne vaut pas la peine d’être tant défendue. Quant à vous imaginer que vous me feriez parler, que vous me feriez écrire ce que je ne veux pas écrire, que vous me feriez dire ce que je ne veux pas dire....

Il releva la manche de son bras gauche et ajouta:

— Tenez.

En même temps il tendit son bras et posa sur la chair nue le ciseau ardent qu’il tenait dans sa main droite par le manche de bois.

On entendit le frémissement de la chair brûlée, l’odeur propre aux chambres de torture se répandit dans le taudis. Marius chancela éperdu d’horreur, les brigands eux-mêmes eurent un frisson, le visage de l’étrange vieillard se contracta à peine, et, tandis que le fer rouge s’enfonçait dans la plaie fumante, impassible et presque auguste, il attachait sur Thénardier son beau regard sans haine où la souffrance s’évanouissait dans une majesté sereine.

Chez les grandes et hautes natures les révoltes de la chair et des sens en proie à la douleur physique font sortir l’âme et la font apparaître sur le front, de même que les rébellions de la soldatesque forcent le capitaine à se montrer.

— Misérables, dit-il, n’ayez pas plus peur de moi que je n’ai peur de vous.

Et arrachant le ciseau de la plaie, il le lança par la fenêtre qui était restée ouverte, l’horrible outil embrasé disparut dans la nuit en tournoyant et alla tomber au loin et s’éteindre dans la neige.

Le prisonnier reprit:

— Faites de moi ce que vous voudrez.

Il était désarmé.

— Empoignez-le! dit Thénardier.

Deux des brigands lui posèrent la main sur l’épaule, et l’homme masqué à voix de ventriloque se tint en face de lui, prêt à lui faire sauter le crâne d’un coup de clef au moindre mouvement.

En même temps Marius entendit au-dessous de lui, au bas de la cloison, mais tellement près qu’il ne pouvait voir ceux qui parlaient, ce colloque échangé à voix basse:

— Il n’y a plus qu’une chose à faire.

— L’escarper!

— C’est cela.

C’étaient le mari et la femme qui tenaient conseil.

Thénardier marcha à pas lents vers la table, ouvrit le tiroir et y prit le couteau.

Marius tourmentait le pommeau du pistolet. Perplexité inouïe. Depuis une heure il y avait deux voix dans sa conscience, l’une lui disait de respecter le testament de son père, l’autre lui criait de secourir le prisonnier. Ces deux voix continuaient sans interruption leur lutte qui le mettait à l’agonie. Il avait vaguement espéré jusqu’à ce moment trouver un moyen de concilier ces deux devoirs, mais rien de possible n’avait surgi. Cependant le péril pressait, la dernière limite de l’attente était dépassée, à quelques pas du prisonnier Thénardier songeait, le couteau à la main.

Marius égaré promenait ses yeux autour de lui, dernière ressource machinale du désespoir.

Tout à coup il tressaillit.

À ses pieds, sur sa table, un vif rayon de pleine lune éclairait et semblait lui montrer une feuille de papier. Sur cette feuille il lut cette ligne écrite en grosses lettres le matin même par l’aînée des filles Thénardier:

— Les cognes sont là.

Une idée, une clarté traversa l’esprit de Marius; c’était le moyen qu’il cherchait, la solution de cet affreux problème qui le torturait, épargner l’assassin et sauver la victime. Il s’agenouilla sur la commode, étendit le bras, saisit la feuille de papier, détacha doucement un morceau de plâtre de la cloison, l’enveloppa dans le papier, et jeta le tout par la crevasse au milieu du bouge.

Il était temps. Thénardier avait vaincu ses dernières craintes ou ses derniers scrupules et se dirigeait vers le prisonnier.

— Quelque chose qui tombe! cria la Thénardier.

— Qu’est-ce? dit le mari.

La femme s’était élancée et avait ramassé le plâtras enveloppé du papier. Elle le remit à son mari.

— Par où cela est-il venu? demanda Thénardier.

— Pardié! fit la femme, par où veux-tu que cela soit entré? C’est venu par la fenêtre.

— Je l’ai vu passer, dit Bigrenaille.

Thénardier déplia rapidement le papier et l’approcha de la chandelle.

— C’est de l’écriture d’Éponine. Diable!

Il fit signe à sa femme, qui s’approcha vivement et il lui montra la ligne écrite sur la feuille de papier, puis il ajouta d’une voix sourde:

— Vite! l’échelle! laissons le lard dans la souricière et fichons le camp!

— Sans couper le cou à l’homme? demanda la Thénardier.

— Nous n’avons pas le temps.

— Par où? reprit Bigrenaille.

— Par la fenêtre, répondit Thénardier. Puisque Ponine a jeté la pierre par la fenêtre, c’est que la maison n’est pas cernée de ce côté-là.

Le masque à voix de ventriloque posa à terre sa grosse clef, éleva ses deux bras en l’air et ferma trois fois rapidement ses mains sans dire un mot. Ce fut comme le signal du branle-bas dans un équipage. Les brigands qui tenaient le prisonnier le lâchèrent; en un clin d’œil l’échelle de corde fut déroulée hors de la fenêtre et attachée solidement au rebord par les deux crampons de fer.

Le prisonnier ne faisait pas attention à ce qui se passait autour de lui. Il semblait rêver ou prier.

Sitôt l’échelle fixée, Thénardier cria.

— Viens! la bourgeoise!

Et il se précipita vers la croisée.

Mais comme il allait enjamber, Bigrenaille le saisit rudement au collet.

— Non pas, dis donc, vieux farceur! après nous!

— Après nous! hurlèrent les bandits.

— Vous êtes des enfants, dit Thénardier, nous perdons le temps. Les railles sont sur nos talons.

— Eh bien, dit un des bandits, tirons au sort à qui passera le premier.

Thénardier s’exclama:

— Êtes-vous fous! êtes-vous toqués! en voilà-t-il un tas de jobards! perdre le temps, n’est-ce pas? tirer au sort, n’est-ce pas? au doigt mouillé! à la courte paille! écrire nos noms! les mettre dans un bonnet!...

— Voulez-vous mon chapeau? cria une voix du seuil de la porte.

Tous se retournèrent. C’était Javert.

Il tenait son chapeau à la main, et le tendait en souriant.

Chapitre XXI

On devrait toujours commencer par arrêter les victimes

Javert, à la nuit tombante, avait aposté des hommes et s'était embusqué lui-même derrière les arbres de la rue de la Barrière des Gobelins qui fait face à la masure Gorbeau de l'autre côté du boulevard. Il avait commencé par ouvrir «sa poche», pour y fourrer les deux jeunes filles chargées de surveiller les abords du bouge. Mais il n'avait «coffré» qu'Azelma. Quant à Éponine, elle n'était pas à son poste, elle avait disparu et il n'avait pu la saisir. Puis Javert s'était mis en arrêt, prêtant l'oreille au signal convenu. Les allées et venues du fiacre l'avaient fort agité. Enfin il s'était impatienté, et, sûr qu'il y avait un nid là, sûr d'être en bonne fortune, ayant reconnu plusieurs des bandits qui étaient entrés, il avait fini par se décider à monter sans attendre le coup de pistolet.

On se souvient qu'il avait le passe-partout de Marius.

Il était arrivé à point.

Les bandits effarés se jetèrent sur les armes qu'ils avaient abandonnées dans tous les coins au moment de s'évader. En moins d'une seconde, ces sept hommes, épouvantables à voir, se groupèrent dans une posture de défense, l'un avec son merlin, l'autre avec sa clef, l'autre avec son assommoir, les autres avec les cisailles, les pinces et les marteaux, Thénardier son couteau au poing. La Thénardier saisit un énorme pavé qui était dans l'angle de la fenêtre et qui servait à ses filles de tabouret.

Javert remit son chapeau sur sa tête, et fit deux pas dans la chambre, les bras croisés, la canne sous le bras, l'épée dans le fourreau.

— Halte-là! dit-il. Vous ne passerez pas par la fenêtre, vous passerez par la porte. C'est moins malsain. Vous êtes sept, nous sommes quinze. Ne nous colletons pas comme des auvergnats. Soyons gentils.

Bigrenaille prit un pistolet qu'il tenait caché sous sa blouse et le mit dans la main de Thénardier en lui disant à l'oreille:

— C'est Javert. Je n'ose pas tirer sur cet homme-là. Oses-tu, toi?

— Parbleu! répondit Thénardier.

— Eh bien, tire.

Thénardier prit le pistolet, et ajusta Javert.

Javert, qui était à trois pas, le regarda fixement et se contenta de dire:

— Ne tire pas, va! ton coup va rater.

Thénardier pressa la détente. Le coup rata.

— Quand je te le disais! fit Javert.

Bigrenaille jeta son casse-tête aux pieds de Javert.

— Tu es l’empereur des diables! je me rends.

— Et vous? demanda Javert aux autres bandits.

Ils répondirent:

— Nous aussi.

Javert repartit avec calme:

— C’est ça, c’est bon, je le disais, on est gentil.

— Je ne demande qu’une chose, reprit le Bigrenaille, c’est qu’on ne me refuse pas du tabac pendant que je serai au secret.

— Accordé, dit Javert.

Et se retournant et appelant derrière lui:

— Entrez maintenant!

Une escouade de sergents de ville l’épée au poing et d’agents armés de casse-tête et de gourdins se rua à l’appel de Javert. On garrotta les bandits. Cette foule d’hommes à peine éclairés d’une chandelle emplissait d’ombre le repaire.

— Les poucettes à tous! cria Javert.

— Approchez donc un peu! cria une voix qui n’était pas une voix d’homme, mais dont personne n’eût pu dire: c’est une voix de femme.

La Thénardier s’était retranchée dans un des angles de la fenêtre, et c’était elle qui venait de pousser ce rugissement.

Les sergents de ville et les agents reculèrent.

Elle avait jeté son châle et gardé son chapeau; son mari, accroupi derrière elle, disparaissait presque sous le châle tombé, et elle le couvrait de son corps, élevant le pavé des deux mains au-dessus de sa tête avec le balancement d’une géante qui va lancer un rocher.

— Gare! cria-t-elle.

Tous se refoulèrent vers le corridor. Un large vide se fit au milieu du galetas.

La Thénardier jeta un regard aux bandits qui s’étaient laissé garrotter et murmura d’un accent guttural et rauque:

— Les lâches!

Javert sourit et s’avança dans l’espace vide que la Thénardier couvait de ses deux prunelles.

— N’approche pas, va-t’en, cria-t-elle, ou je t’écroule!

— Quel grenadier! fit Javert; la mère! tu as de la barbe comme un homme, mais j’ai des griffes comme une femme.

Et il continua de s’avancer.

La Thénardier, échevelée et terrible, écarta les jambes, se cambra en arrière et jeta éperdument le pavé à la tête de Javert. Javert se courba. Le pavé passa au-dessus de lui, heurta la muraille du fond dont il fit tomber un vaste plâtras et revint, en ricochant d’angle en angle à travers le bouge, heureusement presque vide, mourir sur les talons de Javert.

Au même instant Javert arrivait au couple Thénardier. Une de ses larges mains s’abattit sur l’épaule de la femme et l’autre sur la tête du mari.

— Les poucettes! cria-t-il.

Les hommes de police rentrèrent en foule, et en quelques secondes l’ordre de Javert fut exécuté.

La Thénardier, brisée, regarda ses mains garrottées et celles de son mari, se laissa tomber à terre et s’écria en pleurant:

— Mes filles!

— Elles sont à l’ombre, dit Javert.

Cependant les agents avaient avisé l’ivrogne endormi derrière la porte et le secouaient. Il s’éveilla en balbutiant:

— Est-ce fini, Jondrette?

— Oui, répondit Javert.

Les six bandits garrottés étaient debout; du reste, ils avaient encore leurs mines de spectres; trois barbouillés de noir, trois masqués.

— Gardez vos masques, dit Javert.

Et, les passant en revue avec le regard d’un Frédéric II à la parade de Potsdam, il dit aux trois «fumistes»:

— Bonjour, Bigrenaille. Bonjour, Brujon. Bonjour, Deux-Milliards.

Puis, se tournant vers les trois masques, il dit à l’homme au merlin:

— Bonjour, Gueulemer.

Et à l’homme à la trique:

— Bonjour, Babet.

Et au ventriloque:

— Salut, Claquesous.

En ce moment, il aperçut le prisonnier des bandits qui, depuis l’entrée des agents de police, n’avait pas prononcé une parole et se tenait tête baissée.

— Déliez monsieur! dit Javert, et que personne ne sorte!

Cela dit, il s’assit souverainement devant la table, où étaient restées la chandelle et l’écritoire, tira un papier timbré de sa poche et commença son procès-verbal.

Quand il eut écrit les premières lignes qui ne sont que des formules toujours les mêmes, il leva les yeux:

— Faites approcher ce monsieur que ces messieurs avaient attaché.

Les agents regardèrent autour d’eux.

— Eh bien, demanda Javert, où est-il donc?

Le prisonnier des bandits, M. Leblanc, M. Urbain Fabre, le père d’Ursule ou de l’Alouette, avait disparu.

La porte était gardée, mais la croisée ne l’était pas. Sitôt qu’il s’était vu délié, et pendant que Javert verbalisait, il avait profité du trouble, du tumulte, de l’encombrement, de l’obscurité, et d’un moment où l’attention n’était pas fixée sur lui, pour s’élancer par la fenêtre.

Un agent courut à la lucarne, et regarda. On ne voyait personne dehors.

L’échelle de corde tremblait encore.

— Diable! fit Javert entre ses dents, ce devait être le meilleur!

Chapitre XXII

Le petit qui criait au tome deux

Le lendemain du jour où ces événements s’étaient accomplis dans la maison du boulevard de l’Hôpital, un enfant, qui semblait venir du côté du pont d’Austerlitz, montait par la contre-allée de droite dans la direction de la barrière de Fontainebleau. Il était nuit close. Cet enfant était pâle, maigre, vêtu de loques, avec un pantalon de toile au mois de février, et chantait à tue-tête.

Au coin de la rue du Petit-Banquier, une vieille courbée fouillait dans un tas d’ordures à la lueur du réverbère; l’enfant la heurta en passant, puis recula en s’écriant:

— Tiens! moi qui avait pris ça pour un énorme, un énorme chien!

Il prononça le mot énorme pour la seconde fois avec un renflement de voix goguenarde que des majuscules exprimeraient assez bien: un énorme, un ÉNORME chien!

La vieille se redressa furieuse.

— Carcan de moutard! grommela-t-elle. Si je n’avais pas été penchée, je sais bien où je t’aurais flanqué mon pied!

L’enfant était déjà à distance.

— Kisss! kisss! fit-il. Après ça, je ne me suis peut-être pas trompé.

La vieille, suffoquée d’indignation, se dressa tout à fait, et le rougeoiement de la lanterne éclaira en plein sa face livide, toute creusée d’angles et de rides, avec des pattes d’oie rejoignant les coins de la bouche. Le corps se perdait dans l’ombre et l’on ne voyait que la tête. On eût dit le masque de la Décrépitude découpé par une lueur dans la nuit. L’enfant la considéra.

— Madame, dit-il, n’a pas le genre de beauté qui me conviendrait.

Il poursuivit son chemin et se remit à chanter:

Le roi Coupdesabot
S’en allait à la chasse,
À la chasse aux corbeaux...

Au bout de ces trois vers, il s’interrompit. Il était arrivé devant le numéro 50-52, et, trouvant la porte fermée, il avait commencé à la battre à coups de pied, coups de pied retentissants et héroïques, lesquels décelaient plutôt les souliers d’homme qu’il portait que les pieds d’enfant qu’il avait.

Cependant cette même vieille qu’il avait rencontrée au coin de la rue du Petit-Banquier accourait derrière lui poussant des clameurs et prodiguant des gestes démesurés.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est? qu’est-ce que c’est? Dieu Seigneur! on enfonce la porte! on défonce la maison!

Les coups de pied continuaient.

La vieille s’époumonait.

— Est-ce qu’on arrange les bâtiments comme ça à présent!

Tout à coup elle s’arrêta. Elle avait reconnu le gamin.

— Quoi! c’est ce satan!

— Tiens, c’est la vieille, dit l’enfant. Bonjour, la Burgonmuche. Je viens voir mes ancêtres.

La vieille répondit, avec une grimace composite, admirable improvisation de la haine tirant parti de la caducité et de la laideur, qui fut malheureusement perdue dans l’obscurité:

— Il n’y a personne, mufle.

— Bah! reprit l’enfant, où donc est mon père?

— À la Force.

— Tiens! et ma mère?

— À Saint-Lazare.

— Eh bien! et mes sœurs?

— Aux Madelonnettes.

L’enfant se gratta le derrière de l’oreille, regarda mame Burgon, et dit:

— Ah!

Puis il pirouetta sur ses talons, et, un moment après, la vieille restée sur le pas de la porte l’entendit qui chantait de sa voix claire et jeune en s’enfonçant sous les ormes noirs frissonnant au vent d’hiver:

Le roi Coupdesabot
S’en allait à la chasse,
À la chasse aux corbeaux,
Monté sur des échasses.
Quand on passait dessous
On lui payait deux sous.

Tome IV — L’IDYLLE RUE PLUMET ET L’ÉPOPÉE RUE SAINT-DENIS

Livre premier — Quelques pages d’histoire

Chapitre I

Bien coupé

1831 et 1832, les deux années qui se rattachent immédiatement à la Révolution de Juillet, sont un des moments les plus particuliers et les plus frappants de l’histoire. Ces deux années au milieu de celles qui les précèdent et qui les suivent sont comme deux montagnes. Elles ont la grandeur révolutionnaire. On y distingue des précipices. Les masses sociales, les assises mêmes de la civilisation, le groupe solide des intérêts superposés et adhérents, les profils séculaires de l’antique formation française, y apparaissent et y disparaissent à chaque instant à travers les nuages orageux des systèmes, des passions et des théories. Ces apparitions et ces disparitions ont été nommées la résistance et le mouvement. Par intervalles on y voit luire la vérité, ce jour de l’âme humaine.

Cette remarquable époque est assez circonscrite et commence à s’éloigner assez de nous pour qu’on puisse en saisir dès à présent les lignes principales.

Nous allons l’essayer.

La Restauration avait été une de ces phases intermédiaires difficiles à définir, où il y a de la fatigue, du bourdonnement, des murmures, du sommeil, du tumulte, et qui ne sont autre chose que l’arrivée d’une grande nation à une étape. Ces époques sont singulières et trompent les politiques qui veulent les exploiter. Au début, la nation ne demande que le repos; on n’a qu’une soif, la paix; on n’a qu’une ambition, être petit. Ce qui est la traduction de rester tranquille. Les grands événements, les grands hasards, les grandes aventures, les grands hommes, Dieu merci, on en a assez vu, on en a par-dessus la tête. On donnerait César pour Prusias et Napoléon pour le roi d’Yvetot.»Quel bon petit roi c’était là!» On a marché depuis le point du jour, on est au soir d’une longue et rude journée; on a fait le premier relais avec Mirabeau, le second avec Robespierre, le troisième avec Bonaparte, on est éreinté. Chacun demande un lit.

Les dévouements las, les héroïsmes vieillis, les ambitions repues, les fortunes faites cherchent, réclament, implorent, sollicitent, quoi? Un gîte. Ils l’ont. Ils prennent possession de la paix, de la tranquillité, du loisir; les voilà contents. Cependant en même temps de certains faits surgissent, se font reconnaître et frappent à la porte de leur côté. Ces faits sont sortis des révolutions et des guerres, ils sont, ils vivent, ils ont droit de s'installer dans la société et ils s'y installent; et la plupart du temps les faits sont des maréchaux des logis et des fourriers qui ne font que préparer le logement aux principes.

Alors voici ce qui apparaît aux philosophes politiques.

En même temps que les hommes fatigués demandent le repos, les faits accomplis demandent des garanties. Les garanties pour les faits, c'est la même chose que le repos pour les hommes.

C'est ce que l'Angleterre demandait aux Stuarts après le protecteur; c'est ce que la France demandait aux Bourbons après l'Empire.

Ces garanties sont une nécessité des temps. Il faut bien les accorder. Les princes les «octroient», mais en réalité c'est la force des choses qui les donne. Vérité profonde et utile à savoir, dont les Stuarts ne se doutèrent pas en 1660, que les Bourbons n'entrevirent même pas en 1814.

La famille prédestinée qui revint en France quand Napoléon s'écroula eut la simplicité fatale de croire que c'était elle qui donnait, et que ce qu'elle avait donné elle pouvait le reprendre; que la maison de Bourbon possédait le droit divin, que la France ne possédait rien; et que le droit politique concédé dans la charte de Louis XVIII n'était autre chose qu'une branche du droit divin, détachée par la maison de Bourbon et gracieusement donnée au peuple jusqu'au jour où il plairait au roi de s'en ressaisir. Cependant, au déplaisir que le don lui faisait, la maison de Bourbon aurait dû sentir qu'il ne venait pas d'elle.

Elle fut hargneuse au dix-neuvième siècle. Elle fit mauvaise mine à chaque épanouissement de la nation. Pour nous servir du mot trivial, c'est-à-dire populaire et vrai, elle rechigna. Le peuple le vit.

Elle crut qu'elle avait de la force parce que l'Empire avait été emporté devant elle comme un châssis de théâtre. Elle ne s'aperçut pas qu'elle avait été apportée elle-même de la même façon. Elle ne vit pas qu'elle aussi était dans cette main qui avait ôté de là Napoléon.

Elle crut qu'elle avait des racines parce qu'elle était le passé. Elle se trompait; elle faisait partie du passé, mais tout le passé c'était la France. Les racines de la société française n'étaient point dans les Bourbons, mais dans la nation. Ces obscures et vivaces racines ne constituaient point le droit d'une famille, mais l'histoire d'un peuple. Elles étaient partout, excepté sous le trône.

La maison de Bourbon était pour la France le nœud illustre et sanglant de son histoire, mais n'était plus l'élément principal de sa destinée et la base nécessaire de sa politique. On pouvait se passer des Bourbons; on s'en était passé vingt-deux ans; il y avait eu solution de continuité; ils ne s'en doutaient pas. Et comment s'en seraient-ils doutés, eux qui se figuraient que Louis XVII régnait le 9 thermidor et que Louis XVIII régnait le jour de Marengo? Jamais, depuis l'origine de l'histoire, les princes n'avaient été si aveugles en présence des faits et de la portion d'autorité divine que les faits contiennent et promulguent. Jamais cette prétention d'en bas qu'on appelle le droit des rois n'avait nié à ce point le droit d'en haut.

Erreur capitale qui amena cette famille à remettre la main sur les garanties «octroyées» en 1814, sur les concessions, comme elle les qualifiait. Chose triste! ce qu'elle nommait ses concessions, c'étaient nos conquêtes; ce qu'elle appelait nos empiétements, c'étaient nos droits.

Lorsque l'heure lui sembla venue, la Restauration, se supposant victorieuse de Bonaparte et enracinée dans le pays, c'est-à-dire se croyant forte et se croyant profonde, prit brusquement son parti et risqua son coup. Un matin elle se dressa en face de la France, et, élevant la voix, elle contesta le titre collectif et le titre individuel, à la nation la souveraineté, au citoyen la liberté. En d'autres termes, elle nia à la nation ce qui la faisait nation et au citoyen ce qui le faisait citoyen.

C'est là le fond de ces actes fameux qu'on appelle les Ordonnances de juillet.

La Restauration tomba.

Elle tomba justement. Cependant, disons-le, elle n'avait pas été absolument hostile à toutes les formes du progrès. De grandes choses s'étaient faites, elle étant à côté.

Sous la Restauration la nation s'était habituée à la discussion dans le calme, ce qui avait manqué à la République, et à la grandeur dans la paix, ce qui avait manqué à l'Empire. La France libre et forte avait été un spectacle encourageant pour les autres peuples de l'Europe. La révolution avait eu la parole sous Robespierre; le canon avait eu la parole sous Bonaparte; c'est sous Louis XVIII et Charles X que vint le tour de parole de l'intelligence. Le vent cessa, le flambeau se ralluma. On vit frissonner sur les cimes sereines la pure lumière des esprits. Spectacle magnifique, utile et charmant. On vit travailler pendant quinze ans, en pleine paix, en pleine place publique, ces grands principes, si vieux pour le penseur, si nouveaux pour l’homme d’État: l’égalité devant la loi, la liberté de la conscience, la liberté de la parole, la liberté de la presse, l’accessibilité de toutes les aptitudes à toutes les fonctions. Cela alla ainsi jusqu’en 1830. Les Bourbons furent un instrument de civilisation qui cassa dans les mains de la providence.

La chute des Bourbons fut pleine de grandeur, non de leur côté, mais du côté de la nation. Eux quittèrent le trône avec gravité, mais sans autorité; leur descente dans la nuit ne fut pas une de ces disparitions solennelles qui laissent une sombre émotion à l’histoire; ce ne fut ni le calme spectral de Charles I, ni le cri d’aigle de Napoléon. Ils s’en allèrent, voilà tout. Ils déposèrent la couronne et ne gardèrent pas d’auréole. Ils furent dignes, mais ils ne furent pas augustes. Ils manquèrent dans une certaine mesure à la majesté de leur malheur. Charles X, pendant le voyage de Cherbourg, faisant couper une table ronde en table carrée, parut plus soucieux de l’étiquette en péril que de la monarchie croulante. Cette diminution attrista les hommes dévoués qui aimaient leurs personnes et les hommes sérieux qui honoraient leur race. Le peuple, lui, fut admirable. La nation, attaquée un matin à main armée par une sorte d’insurrection royale, se sentit tant de force qu’elle n’eut pas de colère. Elle se défendit, se contint, remit les choses à leur place, le gouvernement dans la loi, les Bourbons dans l’exil, hélas! et s’arrêta. Elle prit le vieux roi Charles X sous ce dais qui avait abrité Louis XIV, et le posa à terre doucement. Elle ne toucha aux personnes royales qu’avec tristesse et précaution. Ce ne fut pas un homme, ce ne furent pas quelques hommes, ce fut la France, la France entière, la France victorieuse et enivrée de sa victoire, qui sembla se rappeler et qui pratiqua aux yeux du monde entier ces graves paroles de Guillaume du Vair après la journée des barricades: «Il est aysé à ceux qui ont accoutumé d’effleurer les faveurs des grands et saulter, comme un oiseau de branche en branche, d’une fortune affligée à une florissante, de se montrer hardis contre leur prince en son adversité; mais pour moi la fortune de mes roys me sera toujours vénérable, et principalement des affligés.»

Les Bourbons emportèrent le respect, mais non le regret. Comme nous venons de le dire, leur malheur fut plus grand qu’eux. Ils s’effacèrent à l’horizon.

La Révolution de Juillet eut tout de suite des amis et des ennemis dans le monde entier. Les uns se précipitèrent vers elle avec enthousiasme et joie, les autres s’en détournèrent, chacun selon sa nature. Les princes de l’Europe, au premier moment, hiboux de cette aube, fermèrent les yeux, blessés et stupéfaits, et ne les rouvrirent que pour menacer. Effroi qui se comprend, colère qui s’excuse. Cette étrange révolution avait à peine été un choc; elle n’avait pas même fait à la royauté vaincue l’honneur de la traiter en ennemie et de verser son sang. Aux yeux des gouvernements despotiques toujours intéressés à ce que la liberté se calomnie elle-même, la Révolution de Juillet avait le tort d’être formidable et de rester douce. Rien du reste ne fut tenté ni machiné contre elle. Les plus mécontents, les plus irrités, les plus frémissants, la saluaient; quels que soient nos égoïsmes et nos rancunes, un respect mystérieux sort des événements dans lesquels on sent la collaboration de quelqu’un qui travaille plus haut que l’homme.

La Révolution de Juillet est le triomphe du droit terrassant le fait. Chose pleine de splendeur.

Le droit terrassant le fait. De là l’éclat de la révolution de 1830, de là sa mansuétude aussi. Le droit qui triomphe n’a nul besoin d’être violent.

Le droit, c’est le juste et le vrai.

Le propre du droit, c’est de rester éternellement beau et pur. Le fait, même le plus nécessaire en apparence, même le mieux accepté des contemporains, s’il n’existe que comme fait et s’il ne contient que trop peu de droit ou point du tout de droit, est destiné infailliblement à devenir, avec la durée du temps, difforme, immonde, peut-être même monstrueux. Si l’on veut constater d’un coup à quel degré de laideur le fait peut arriver, vu à la distance des siècles, qu’on regarde Machiavel. Machiavel, ce n’est point un mauvais génie, ni un démon, ni un écrivain lâche et misérable; ce n’est rien que le fait. Et ce n’est pas seulement le fait italien, c’est le fait européen, le fait du seizième siècle. Il semble hideux, et il l’est, en présence de l’idée morale du dix-neuvième.

Cette lutte du droit et du fait dure depuis l’origine des sociétés. Terminer le duel, amalgamer l’idée pure avec la réalité humaine, faire pénétrer pacifiquement le droit dans le fait et le fait dans le droit, voilà le travail des sages.

Chapitre II

Mal cousu

Mais autre est le travail des sages, autre est le travail des habiles.

La révolution de 1830 s’était vite arrêtée.

Sitôt qu’une révolution a fait côte, les habiles dépècent l’échouement.

Les habiles, dans notre siècle, se sont décerné à eux-mêmes la qualification d’hommes d’État; si bien que ce mot, homme d’État, a fini par être un peu un mot d’argot. Qu’on ne l’oublie pas en effet, là où il n’y a qu’habileté, il y a nécessairement petitesse. Dire: les habiles, cela revient à dire: les médiocres.

De même que dire: les hommes d’État, cela équivaut quelquefois à dire: les traîtres.

À en croire les habiles donc, les révolutions comme la Révolution de Juillet sont des artères coupées; il faut une prompte ligature. Le droit, trop grandement proclamé, ébranle. Aussi, une fois le droit affirmé, il faut raffermir l’État. La liberté assurée, il faut songer au pouvoir.

Ici les sages ne se séparent pas encore des habiles, mais ils commencent à se défier. Le pouvoir, soit. Mais, premièrement, qu’est-ce que le pouvoir? deuxièmement, d’où vient-il?

Les habiles semblent ne pas entendre l’objection murmurée, et ils continuent leur manœuvre.

Selon ces politiques, ingénieux à mettre aux fictions profitables un masque de nécessité, le premier besoin d’un peuple après une révolution, quand ce peuple fait partie d’un continent monarchique, c’est de se procurer une dynastie. De cette façon, disent-ils, il peut avoir la paix après sa révolution, c’est-à-dire le temps de panser ses plaies et de réparer sa maison. La dynastie cache l’échafaudage et couvre l’ambulance.

Or, il n’est pas toujours facile de se procurer une dynastie.

À la rigueur, le premier homme de génie ou même le premier homme de fortune venu suffit pour faire un roi. Vous avez dans le premier cas Bonaparte et dans le second Iturbide.

Mais la première famille venue ne suffit pas pour faire une dynastie. Il y a nécessairement une certaine quantité d’ancienneté dans une race, et la ride des siècles ne s’improvise pas.

Si l’on se place au point de vue des «hommes d’État», sous toutes réserves, bien entendu, après une révolution, quelles sont les qualités du roi qui en sort? Il peut être et il est utile qu’il soit révolutionnaire, c’est-à-dire participant de sa personne à cette révolution, qu’il y ait mis la main, qu’il s’y soit compromis ou illustré, qu’il en ait touché la hache ou manié l’épée.

Quelles sont les qualités d’une dynastie? Elle doit être nationale, c’est-à-dire révolutionnaire à distance, non par des actes commis, mais par les idées acceptées. Elle doit se composer de passé et être historique, se composer d’avenir et être sympathique.

Tout ceci explique pourquoi les premières révolutions se contentent de trouver un homme, Cromwell ou Napoléon; et pourquoi les deuxièmes veulent absolument trouver une famille, la maison de Brunswick ou la maison d’Orléans.

Les maisons royales ressemblent à ces figuiers de l’Inde dont chaque rameau, en se courbant jusqu’à terre, y prend racine et devient un figuier. Chaque branche peut devenir une dynastie. À la seule condition de se courber jusqu’au peuple.

Telle est la théorie des habiles.

Voici donc le grand art: faire un peu rendre à un succès le son d’une catastrophe afin que ceux qui en profitent en tremblent aussi, assaisonner de peur un pas de fait, augmenter la courbe de la transition jusqu’au ralentissement du progrès, affadir cette aurore, dénoncer et retrancher les âpretés de l’enthousiasme, couper les angles et les ongles, ouater le triomphe, emmitoufler le droit, envelopper le géant peuple de flanelle et le coucher bien vite, imposer la diète à cet excès de santé, mettre Hercule en traitement de convalescence, délayer l’événement dans l’expédient, offrir aux esprits altérés d’idéal ce nectar étendu de tisane, prendre ses précautions contre le trop de réussite, garnir la révolution d’un abat-jour.

1830 pratiqua cette théorie, déjà appliquée à l’Angleterre par 1688.

1830 est une révolution arrêtée à mi-côte. Moitié de progrès; quasi-droit. Or la logique ignore l’à peu près; absolument comme le soleil ignore la chandelle.

Qui arrête les révolutions à mi-côte? La bourgeoisie.

Pourquoi?

Parce que la bourgeoisie est l’intérêt arrivé à satisfaction. Hier c’était l’appétit, aujourd’hui c’est la plénitude, demain ce sera la satiété.

Le phénomène de 1814 après Napoléon se reproduisit en 1830 après Charles X.

On a voulu, à tort, faire de la bourgeoisie une classe. La bourgeoisie est tout simplement la portion contentée du peuple. Le bourgeois, c'est l'homme qui a maintenant le temps de s'asseoir. Une chaise n'est pas une caste.

Mais, pour vouloir s'asseoir trop tôt, on peut arrêter la marche même du genre humain. Cela a été souvent la faute de la bourgeoisie.

On n'est pas une classe parce qu'on fait une faute. L'égoïsme n'est pas une des divisions de l'ordre social.

Du reste, il faut être juste même envers l'égoïsme, l'état auquel aspirait, après la secousse de 1830, cette partie de la nation qu'on nomme la bourgeoisie, ce n'était pas l'inertie, qui se complique d'indifférence et de paresse et qui contient un peu de honte, ce n'était pas le sommeil, qui suppose un oubli momentané accessible aux songes; c'était la halte.

La halte est un mot formé d'un double sens singulier et presque contradictoire: troupe en marche, c'est-à-dire mouvement; station, c'est-à-dire repos.

La halte, c'est la réparation des forces; c'est le repos armé et éveillé; c'est le fait accompli qui pose des sentinelles et se tient sur ses gardes. La halte suppose le combat hier et le combat demain.

C'est l'entre-deux de 1830 et de 1848.

Ce que nous appelons ici combat peut aussi s'appeler progrès.

Il fallait donc à la bourgeoisie, comme aux hommes d'État, un homme qui exprimait ce mot: halte. Un Quoique Parce que. Une individualité composite, signifiant révolution et signifiant stabilité, en d'autres termes affermissant le présent par la compatibilité évidente du passé avec l'avenir.

Cet homme était «tout trouvé». Il s'appelait Louis-Philippe d'Orléans.

Les 221 firent Louis-Philippe roi. Lafayette se chargea du sacre. Il le nomma la meilleure des républiques. L'hôtel de ville de Paris remplaça la cathédrale de Reims.

Cette substitution d'un demi-trône au trône complet fut «l'œuvre de 1830».

Quand les habiles eurent fini, le vice immense de leur solution apparut. Tout cela était fait en dehors du droit absolu. Le droit absolu cria: Je proteste! puis, chose redoutable, il rentra dans l'ombre.

Chapitre III

Louis-Philippe

Les révolutions ont le bras terrible et la main heureuse; elles frappent ferme et choisissent bien. Même incomplètes, même abâtardies et mâtinées, et réduites à l'état de révolution cadette, comme la révolution de 1830, il leur reste presque toujours assez de lucidité providentielle pour qu'elles ne puissent mal tomber. Leur éclipse n'est jamais une abdication.

Pourtant, ne nous vantons pas trop haut, les révolutions, elles aussi, se trompent, et de graves méprises se sont vues.

Revenons à 1830. 1830, dans sa déviation, eut du bonheur. Dans l'établissement qui s'appela l'ordre après la révolution coupée court, le roi valait mieux que la royauté. Louis-Philippe était un homme rare.

Fils d'un père auquel l'histoire accordera certainement les circonstances atténuantes, mais aussi digne d'estime que ce père avait été digne de blâme; ayant toutes les vertus privées et plusieurs des vertus publiques; soigneux de sa santé, de sa fortune, de sa personne, de ses affaires; connaissant le prix d'une minute et pas toujours le prix d'une année; sobre, serein, paisible, patient; bonhomme et bon prince; couchant avec sa femme, et ayant dans son palais des laquais chargés de faire voir le lit conjugal aux bourgeois, ostentation d'alcôve régulière devenue utile après les anciens étalages illégitimes de la branche aînée; sachant toutes les langues de l'Europe, et, ce qui est plus rare, tous les langages de tous les intérêts, et les parlant; admirable représentant de «la classe moyenne», mais la dépassant, et de toutes les façons plus grand qu'elle; ayant l'excellent esprit, tout en appréciant le sang dont il sortait, de se compter surtout pour sa valeur intrinsèque, et, sur la question même de sa race, très particulier, se déclarant Orléans et non Bourbon; très premier prince du sang tant qu'il n'avait été qu'altesse sérénissime, mais franc bourgeois le jour où il fut majesté; diffus en public, concis dans l'intimité; avare signalé, mais non prouvé; au fond, un de ces économes aisément prodigues pour leur fantaisie ou leur devoir; lettré, et peu sensible aux lettres; gentilhomme, mais non chevalier; simple, calme et fort; adoré de sa famille et de sa maison; causeur séduisant; homme d'État désabusé, intérieurement froid, dominé par l'intérêt immédiat, gouvernant toujours au plus près, incapable de rancune et de reconnaissance, usant sans pitié les supériorités sur les médiocrités, habile à faire donner tort par les majorités parlementaires à ces unanimités mystérieuses qui grondent sourdement sous les trônes; expansif, parfois imprudent dans son expansion, mais d’une merveilleuse adresse dans cette imprudence; fertile en expédients, en visages, en masques; faisant peur à la France de l’Europe et à l’Europe de la France; aimant incontestablement son pays, mais préférant sa famille; prisant plus la domination que l’autorité et l’autorité que la dignité, disposition qui a cela de funeste que, tournant tout au succès, elle admet la ruse et ne répudie pas absolument la bassesse, mais qui a cela de profitable qu’elle préserve la politique des chocs violents, l’État des fractures et la société des catastrophes; minutieux, correct, vigilant, attentif, sagace, infatigable, se contredisant quelquefois, et se démentant; hardi contre l’Autriche à Ancône, opiniâtre contre l’Angleterre en Espagne, bombardant Anvers et payant Pritchard; chantant avec conviction la Marseillaise; inaccessible à l’abattement, aux lassitudes, au goût du beau et de l’idéal, aux générosités téméraires, à l’utopie, à la chimère, à la colère, à la vanité, à la crainte; ayant toutes les formes de l’intrépidité personnelle; général à Valmy, soldat à Jemmapes; tâté huit fois par le régicide, et toujours souriant; brave comme un grenadier, courageux comme un penseur; inquiet seulement devant les chances d’un ébranlement européen, et impropre aux grandes aventures politiques; toujours prêt à risquer sa vie, jamais son œuvre; déguisant sa volonté en influence afin d’être plutôt obéi comme intelligence que comme roi; doué d’observation et non de divination; peu attentif aux esprits, mais se connaissant en hommes, c’est-à-dire ayant besoin de voir pour juger; bon sens prompt et pénétrant, sagesse pratique, parole facile, mémoire prodigieuse; puisant sans cesse dans cette mémoire, son unique point de ressemblance avec César, Alexandre et Napoléon; sachant les faits, les détails, les dates, les noms propres, ignorant les tendances, les passions, les génies divers de la foule, les aspirations intérieures, les soulèvements cachés et obscurs des âmes, en un mot, tout ce qu’on pourrait appeler les courants invisibles des consciences; accepté par la surface, mais peu d’accord avec la France de dessous; s’en tirant par la finesse; gouvernant trop et ne régnant pas assez; son premier ministre à lui-même; excellent à faire de la petitesse des réalités un obstacle à l’immensité des idées; mêlant à une vraie faculté créatrice de civilisation, d’ordre et d’organisation on ne sait quel esprit de procédure et de chicane; fondateur et procureur d’une dynastie; ayant quelque chose de

Charlemagne et quelque chose d’un avoué; en somme, figure haute et originale, prince qui sut faire du pouvoir malgré l’inquiétude de la France, et de la puissance malgré la jalousie de l’Europe, Louis-Philippe sera classé parmi les hommes éminents de son siècle, et serait rangé parmi les gouvernants les plus illustres de l’histoire, s’il eût un peu aimé la gloire et s’il eût eu le sentiment de ce qui est grand au même degré que le sentiment de ce qui est utile.

Louis-Philippe avait été beau, et, vieilli, était resté gracieux; pas toujours agréé de la nation, il l’était toujours de la foule; il plaisait. Il avait ce don, le charme. La majesté lui faisait défaut; il ne portait ni la couronne, quoique roi, ni les cheveux blancs, quoique vieillard. Ses manières étaient du vieux régime et ses habitudes du nouveau, mélange du noble et du bourgeois qui convenait à 1830; Louis-Philippe était la transition régnante; il avait conservé l’ancienne prononciation et l’ancienne orthographe qu’il mettait au service des opinions modernes; il aimait la Pologne et la Hongrie, mais il écrivait les polonois et il prononçait les hongrais. Il portait l’habit de la garde nationale comme Charles X, et le cordon de la Légion d’honneur comme Napoléon.

Il allait peu à la chapelle, point à la chasse, jamais à l’Opéra. Incorruptible aux sacristains, aux valets de chiens et aux danseuses; cela entrait dans sa popularité bourgeoise. Il n’avait point de cour. Il sortait avec son parapluie sous son bras, et ce parapluie a longtemps fait partie de son auréole. Il était un peu maçon, un peu jardinier et un peu médecin; il saignait un postillon tombé de cheval; Louis-Philippe n’allait pas plus sans sa lancette que Henri III sans son poignard. Les royalistes raillaient ce roi ridicule, le premier qui ait versé le sang pour guérir.

Dans les griefs de l’histoire contre Louis-Philippe, il y a une défalcation à faire; il y a ce qui accuse la royauté, ce qui accuse le règne, et ce qui accuse le roi; trois colonnes qui donnent chacune un total différent. Le droit démocratique confisqué, le progrès devenu le deuxième intérêt, les protestations de la rue réprimées violemment, l’exécution militaire des insurrections, l’émeute passée par les armes, la rue Transnonain, les conseils de guerre, l’absorption du pays réel par le pays légal, le gouvernement de compte à demi avec trois cent mille privilégiés, sont le fait de la royauté; la Belgique refusée, l’Algérie trop durement conquise, et, comme l’Inde par les Anglais, avec plus de barbarie que de civilisation, le manque de foi à Abd-el-Kader, Blaye, Deutz acheté, Pritchard payé, sont le fait du règne; la politique plus familiale que nationale est le fait du roi.

Comme on voit, le décompte opéré, la charge du roi s'amoindrit.

Sa grande faute, la voici: il a été modeste au nom de la France.

D'où vient cette faute?

Disons-le.

Louis-Philippe a été un roi trop père; cette incubation d'une famille qu'on veut faire éclore dynastie a peur de tout et n'entend pas être dérangée; de là des timidités excessives, importunes au peuple qui a le 14 juillet dans sa tradition civile et Austerlitz dans sa tradition militaire.

Du reste, si l'on fait abstraction des devoirs publics, qui veulent être remplis les premiers, cette profonde tendresse de Louis-Philippe pour sa famille, la famille la méritait. Ce groupe domestique était admirable. Les vertus y coudoyaient les talents. Une des filles de Louis-Philippe, Marie d'Orléans, mettait le nom de sa race parmi les artistes comme Charles d'Orléans l'avait mis parmi les poètes. Elle avait fait de son âme un marbre qu'elle avait nommé Jeanne d'Arc. Deux des fils de Louis-Philippe avaient arraché à Metternich cet éloge démagogique. Ce sont des jeunes gens comme on n'en voit guère et des princes comme on n'en voit pas.

Voilà, sans rien dissimuler, mais aussi sans rien aggraver, le vrai sur Louis-Philippe.

Être le prince égalité, porter en soi la contradiction de la Restauration et de la Révolution, avoir ce côté inquiétant du révolutionnaire qui devient rassurant dans le gouvernant, ce fut là la fortune de Louis-Philippe en 1830; jamais il n'y eut adaptation plus complète d'un homme à un événement; l'un entra dans l'autre, et l'incarnation se fit. Louis-Philippe, c'est 1830 fait homme. De plus il avait pour lui cette grande désignation au trône, l'exil. Il avait été proscrit, errant, pauvre. Il avait vécu de son travail. En Suisse, cet apanagiste des plus riches domaines princiers de France avait vendu un vieux cheval pour manger. À Reichenau, il avait donné des leçons de mathématiques pendant que sa sœur Adélaïde faisait de la broderie et cousait. Ces souvenirs mêlés à un roi enthousiasmaient la bourgeoisie. Il avait démoli de ses propres mains la dernière cage de fer du Mont Saint-Michel, bâtie par Louis XI et utilisée par Louis XV. C'était le compagnon de Dumouriez, c'était l'ami de Lafayette; il avait été du club des jacobins; Mirabeau lui avait frappé sur l'épaule; Danton lui avait dit: Jeune homme! À vingt-quatre ans, en 93, étant M. de Chartres, du fond d'une logette obscure de la Convention, il avait assisté au procès de Louis XVI, si bien nommé ce pauvre tyran. La clairvoyance aveugle de la Révolution, brisant la royauté dans le roi et le roi avec la royauté, sans presque remarquer l'homme dans le farouche écrasement de l'idée, le vaste orage de l'assemblée tribunal, la colère publique interrogeant, Capet ne sachant que répondre, l'effrayante vacillation stupéfaite de cette tête royale sous ce souffle sombre, l'innocence relative de tous dans cette catastrophe, de ceux qui condamnaient comme de celui qui était condamné, il avait regardé ces choses, il avait contemplé ces vertiges; il avait vu les siècles comparaître à la barre de la Convention; il avait vu, derrière Louis XVI, cet infortuné passant responsable, se dresser dans les ténèbres la formidable accusée, la monarchie; et il lui était resté dans l'âme l'épouvante respectueuse de ces immenses justices du peuple presque aussi impersonnelles que la justice de Dieu.

La trace que la Révolution avait laissée en lui était prodigieuse. Son souvenir était comme une empreinte vivante de ces grandes années minute par minute. Un jour, devant un témoin dont il nous est impossible de douter, il rectifia de mémoire toute la lettre A de la liste alphabétique de l'assemblée constituante.

Louis-Philippe a été un roi de plein jour. Lui régnant, la presse a été libre, la tribune a été libre, la conscience et la parole ont été libres. Les lois de septembre sont à claire-voie. Bien que sachant le pouvoir rongeur de la lumière sur les privilèges, il a laissé son trône exposé à la lumière. L'histoire lui tiendra compte de cette loyauté.

Louis-Philippe, comme tous les hommes historiques sortis de scène, est aujourd'hui mis en jugement par la conscience humaine. Son procès n'est encore qu'en première instance.

L'heure où l'histoire parle avec son accent vénérable et libre n'a pas encore sonné pour lui; le moment n'est pas venu de prononcer sur ce roi le jugement définitif; l'austère et illustre historien Louis Blanc a lui-même récemment adouci son premier verdict; Louis-Philippe a été l'élu de ces deux à peu près qu'on appelle les 221 et 1830; c'est-à-dire d'un demi-parlement et d'une demi-révolution; et dans tous les cas, au point de vue supérieur où doit se placer la philosophie, nous ne pourrions le juger ici, comme on a pu l'entrevoir plus haut, qu'avec de certaines réserves au nom du principe démocratique absolu; aux yeux de l'absolu, en dehors de ces deux droits, le droit de l'homme d'abord, le droit du peuple ensuite, tout est usurpation; mais ce que nous pouvons dire dès à présent, ces réserves faites, c'est que, somme toute et de quelque façon qu'on le considère, Louis-Philippe, pris en lui-même et au point de vue de la bonté humaine, demeurera, pour nous servir du vieux langage de l'ancienne histoire, un des meilleurs princes qui aient passé sur un trône.

Qu'a-t-il contre lui? Ce trône. Ôtez de Louis-Philippe le roi, il reste l'homme. Et l'homme est bon. Il est bon parfois jusqu'à être admirable. Souvent, au milieu des plus graves soucis, après une journée de lutte contre toute la diplomatie du continent, il rentrait le soir dans son appartement, et là, épuisé de fatigue, accablé de sommeil, que faisait-il? il prenait un dossier, et il passait sa nuit à réviser un procès criminel, trouvant que c'était quelque chose de tenir tête à l'Europe, mais que c'était une plus grande affaire encore d'arracher un homme au bourreau. Il s'opiniâtrait contre son garde des sceaux; il disputait pied à pied le terrain de la guillotine aux procureurs généraux, ces bavards de la loi, comme il les appelait. Quelquefois les dossiers empilés couvraient sa table; il les examinait tous; c'était une angoisse pour lui d'abandonner ces misérables têtes condamnées. Un jour il disait au même témoin que nous avons indiqué tout à l'heure: Cette nuit, j'en ai gagné sept. Pendant les premières années de son règne, la peine de mort fut comme abolie, et l'échafaud relevé fut une violence faite au roi. La Grève ayant disparu avec la branche aînée, une Grève bourgeoise fut instituée sous le nom de Barrière Saint-Jacques; les «hommes pratiques» sentirent le besoin d'une guillotine quasi légitime; et ce fut là une des victoires de Casimir Perier, qui représentait les côtés étroits de la bourgeoisie, sur Louis-Philippe, qui en représentait les côtés libéraux. Louis-Philippe avait annoté de sa main Beccaria. Après la machine Fieschi, il s'écriait: Quel dommage que je n'aie pas été blessé! j'aurais pu faire grâce. Une autre fois, faisant allusion aux résistances de ses ministres, il écrivait à propos d'un condamné politique qui est une des plus généreuses figures de notre temps: Sa grâce est accordée, il ne me reste plus qu'à l'obtenir. Louis-Philippe était doux comme Louis IX et bon comme Henri IV.

Or, pour nous, dans l'histoire où là bonté est la perle rare, qui a été bon passe presque avant qui a été grand.

Louis-Philippe ayant été apprécié sévèrement par les uns, durement peut-être par les autres, il est tout simple qu'un homme, fantôme lui-même aujourd'hui, qui a connu ce roi, vienne déposer pour lui devant l'histoire; cette déposition, quelle qu’elle soit, est évidemment et avant tout désintéressée; une épitaphe écrite par un mort est sincère; une ombre peut consoler une autre ombre; le partage des mêmes ténèbres donne le droit de louange; et il est peu à craindre qu’on dise jamais de deux tombeaux dans l’exil: Celui-ci a flatté l’autre.

Chapitre IV

Lézardes sous la fondation

Au moment où le drame que nous racontons va pénétrer dans l’épaisseur d’un des nuages tragiques qui couvrent les commencements du règne de Louis-Philippe, il ne fallait pas d’équivoque, et il était nécessaire que ce livre s’expliquât sur ce roi.

Louis-Philippe était entré dans l’autorité royale sans violence, sans action directe de sa part, par le fait d’un virement révolutionnaire, évidemment fort distinct du but réel de la révolution, mais dans lequel lui, duc d’Orléans, n’avait aucune initiative personnelle. Il était né prince et se croyait élu roi. Il ne s’était point donné à lui-même ce mandat; il ne l’avait point pris; on le lui avait offert et il l’avait accepté; convaincu, à tort certes, mais convaincu que l’offre était selon le droit et que l’acceptation était selon le devoir. De là une possession de bonne foi. Or, nous le disons en toute conscience, Louis-Philippe étant de bonne foi dans sa possession, et la démocratie étant de bonne foi dans son attaque, la quantité d’épouvante qui se dégage des luttes sociales ne charge ni le roi, ni la démocratie. Un choc de principes ressemble à un choc d’éléments. L’océan défend l’eau, l’ouragan défend l’air; le roi défend la royauté, la démocratie défend le peuple; le relatif, qui est la monarchie, résiste à l’absolu, qui est la république; la société saigne sous ce conflit, mais ce qui est sa souffrance aujourd’hui sera plus tard son salut; et, dans tous les cas, il n’y a point ici à blâmer ceux qui luttent; un des deux partis évidemment se trompe; le droit n’est pas, comme le colosse de Rhodes, sur deux rivages à la fois, un pied dans la république, un pied dans la royauté; il est indivisible, et tout d’un côté; mais ceux qui se trompent se trompent sincèrement; un aveugle n’est pas plus un coupable qu’un Vendéen n’est un brigand. N’imputons donc qu’à la fatalité des choses ces collisions redoutables. Quelles que soient ces tempêtes, l’irresponsabilité humaine y est mêlée.

Achevons cet exposé.

Le gouvernement de 1830 eut tout de suite la vie dure. Il dut, né d’hier, combattre aujourd’hui. À peine installé, il sentait déjà partout de vagues mouvements de traction sur l’appareil de juillet encore si fraîchement posé et si peu solide.

La résistance naquit le lendemain; peut-être même était-elle née la veille.

De mois en mois, l'hostilité grandit, et de sourde devint patente.

La Révolution de Juillet, peu acceptée hors de France par les rois, nous l'avons dit, avait été en France diversement interprétée.

Dieu livre aux hommes ses volontés visibles dans les événements, texte obscur écrit dans une langue mystérieuse. Les hommes en font sur-le-champ des traductions; traductions hâtives, incorrectes, pleines de fautes, de lacunes et de contre-sens. Bien peu d'esprits comprennent la langue divine. Les plus sagaces, les plus calmes, les plus profonds, déchiffrent lentement, et, quand ils arrivent avec leur texte, la besogne est faite depuis longtemps; il y a déjà vingt traductions sur la place publique. De chaque traduction naît un parti, et de chaque contre-sens une faction; et chaque parti croit avoir le seul vrai texte, et chaque faction croit posséder la lumière.

Souvent le pouvoir lui-même est une faction.

Il y a dans les révolutions des nageurs à contre-courant; ce sont les vieux partis.

Pour les vieux partis qui se rattachent à l'hérédité par la grâce de Dieu, les révolutions étant sorties du droit de révolte, on a droit de révolte contre elles. Erreur. Car dans les révolutions le révolté, ce n'est pas le peuple, c'est le roi. Révolution est précisément le contraire de révolte. Toute révolution, étant un accomplissement normal, contient en elle sa légitimité, que de faux révolutionnaires déshonorent quelquefois, mais qui persiste, même souillée, qui survit, même ensanglantée. Les révolutions sortent, non d'un accident, mais de la nécessité. Une révolution est un retour du factice au réel. Elle est parce qu'il faut qu'elle soit.

Les vieux partis légitimistes n'en assaillaient pas moins la révolution de 1830 avec toutes les violences qui jaillissent du faux raisonnement. Les erreurs sont d'excellents projectiles. Ils la frappaient savamment là où elle était vulnérable, au défaut de sa cuirasse, à son manque de logique; ils attaquaient cette révolution dans sa royauté. Ils lui criaient: Révolution, pourquoi ce roi? Les factions sont des aveugles qui visent juste.

Ce cri, les républicains le poussaient également. Mais, venant d'eux, ce cri était logique. Ce qui était cécité chez les légitimistes était clairvoyance chez les démocrates. 1830 avait fait banqueroute au peuple. La démocratie indignée le lui reprochait.

Entre l'attaque du passé et l'attaque de l'avenir, l'établissement de juillet se débattait. Il représentait la minute, aux prises d'une part avec les siècles monarchiques, d'autre part avec le droit éternel.

En outre, au dehors, n'étant plus la révolution et devenant la monarchie, 1830 était obligé de prendre le pas de l'Europe. Garder la paix, surcroît de complication. Une harmonie voulue à contre-sens est souvent plus onéreuse qu'une guerre. De ce sourd conflit, toujours muselé, mais toujours grondant, naquit la paix armée, ce ruineux expédient de la civilisation suspecte à elle-même. La royauté de juillet se cabrait, malgré qu'elle en eût, dans l'attelage des cabinets européens. Metternich l'eût volontiers mise à la plate-longe. Poussée en France par le progrès, elle poussait en Europe les monarchies, ces tardigrades. Remorquée, elle remorquait.

Cependant, à l'intérieur, paupérisme, prolétariat, salaire, éducation, pénalité, prostitution, sort de la femme, richesse, misère, production, consommation, répartition, échange, monnaie, crédit, droit du capital, droit du travail, toutes ces questions se multipliaient au-dessus de la société; surplomb terrible.

En dehors des partis politiques proprement dits, un autre mouvement se manifestait. À la fermentation démocratique répondait la fermentation philosophique. L'élite se sentait troublée comme la foule; autrement, mais autant.

Des penseurs méditaient, tandis que le sol, c'est-à-dire le peuple, traversé par les courants révolutionnaires, tremblait sous eux avec je ne sais quelles vagues secousses épileptiques. Ces songeurs, les uns isolés, les autres réunis en familles et presque en communions, remuaient les questions sociales, pacifiquement, mais profondément; mineurs impassibles, qui poussaient tranquillement leurs galeries dans les profondeurs d'un volcan, à peine dérangés par les commotions sourdes et par les fournaises entrevues.

Cette tranquillité n'était pas le moins beau spectacle de cette époque agitée.

Ces hommes laissaient aux partis politiques la question des droits, ils s'occupaient de la question du bonheur.

Le bien-être de l'homme, voilà ce qu'ils voulaient extraire de la société.

Ils élevaient les questions matérielles, les questions d'agriculture, d'industrie, de commerce, presque à la dignité d'une religion. Dans la civilisation telle qu'elle se fait, un peu par Dieu, beaucoup par l'homme, les intérêts se combinent, s'agrègent et s'amalgament de manière à former une véritable roche dure, selon une loi dynamique patiemment étudiée par les économistes, ces géologues de la politique.

Ces hommes, qui se groupaient sous des appellations différentes, mais qu’on peut désigner tous par le titre générique de socialistes, tâchaient de percer cette roche et d’en faire jaillir les eaux vives de la félicité humaine.

Depuis la question de l’échafaud jusqu’à la question de la guerre, leurs travaux embrassaient tout. Au droit de l’homme, proclamé par la Révolution française, ils ajoutaient le droit de la femme et le droit de l’enfant.

On ne s’étonnera pas que, pour des raisons diverses, nous ne traitions pas ici à fond, au point de vue théorique, les questions soulevées par le socialisme. Nous nous bornons à les indiquer.

Tous les problèmes que les socialistes se proposaient, les visions cosmogoniques, la rêverie et le mysticisme écartés, peuvent être ramenés à deux problèmes principaux:

Premier problème: Produire la richesse.

Deuxième problème: La répartir.

Le premier problème contient la question du travail.

Le deuxième contient la question du salaire.

Dans le premier problème il s’agit de l’emploi des forces.

Dans le second de la distribution des jouissances.

Du bon emploi des forces résulte la puissance publique.

De la bonne distribution des jouissances résulte le bonheur individuel.

Par bonne distribution, il faut entendre non distribution égale, mais distribution équitable. La première égalité, c’est l’équité.

De ces deux choses combinées, puissance publique au dehors, bonheur individuel au dedans, résulte la prospérité sociale.

Prospérité sociale, cela veut dire l’homme heureux, le citoyen libre, la nation grande. L’Angleterre résout le premier de ces deux problèmes. Elle crée admirablement la richesse; elle la répartit mal. Cette solution qui n’est complète que d’un côté la mène fatalement à ces deux extrêmes: opulence monstrueuse, misère monstrueuse. Toutes les jouissances à quelques-uns, toutes les privations aux autres, c’est-à-dire au peuple; le privilège, l’exception, le monopole, la féodalité, naissent du travail même. Situation fausse et dangereuse qui assoit la puissance publique sur la misère privée, et qui enracine la grandeur de l’État dans les souffrances de l’individu. Grandeur mal composée où se combinent tous les éléments matériels et dans laquelle n’entre aucun élément moral.

Le communisme et la loi agraire croient résoudre le deuxième problème. Ils se trompent. Leur répartition tue la production. Le partage égal abolit l'émulation. Et par conséquent le travail. C'est une répartition faite par le boucher, qui tue ce qu'il partage. Il est donc impossible de s'arrêter à ces prétendues solutions. Tuer la richesse, ce n'est pas la répartir. Les deux problèmes veulent être résolus ensemble pour être bien résolus. Les deux solutions veulent être combinées et n'en faire qu'une.

Ne résolvez que le premier des deux problèmes, vous serez Venise, vous serez l'Angleterre. Vous aurez comme Venise une puissance artificielle, ou comme l'Angleterre une puissance matérielle; vous serez le mauvais riche. Vous périrez par une voie de fait, comme est morte Venise, ou par une banqueroute, comme tombera l'Angleterre. Et le monde vous laissera mourir et tomber, parce que le monde laisse tomber et mourir tout ce qui n'est que l'égoïsme, tout ce qui ne représente pas pour le genre humain une vertu ou une idée.

Il est bien entendu ici que par ces mots, Venise, l'Angleterre, nous désignons non des peuples, mais des constructions sociales, les oligarchies superposées aux nations, et non les nations elles-mêmes. Les nations ont toujours notre respect et notre sympathie. Venise, peuple, renaîtra; l'Angleterre, aristocratie, tombera, mais l'Angleterre, nation, est immortelle. Cela dit, nous poursuivons.

Résolvez les deux problèmes, encouragez le riche et protégez le pauvre, supprimez la misère, mettez un terme à l'exploitation injuste du faible par le fort, mettez un frein à la jalousie inique de celui qui est en route contre celui qui est arrivé, ajustez mathématiquement et fraternellement le salaire au travail, mêlez l'enseignement gratuit et obligatoire à la croissance de l'enfance et faites de la science la base de la virilité, développez les intelligences tout en occupant les bras, soyez à la fois un peuple puissant et une famille d'hommes heureux, démocratisez la propriété, non en l'abolissant, mais en l'universalisant, de façon que tout citoyen sans exception soit propriétaire, chose plus facile qu'on ne croit, en deux mots sachez produire la richesse et sachez la répartir; et vous aurez tout ensemble la grandeur matérielle et la grandeur morale; et vous serez dignes de vous appeler la France.

Voilà, en dehors et au-dessus de quelques sectes qui s'égaraient, ce que disait le socialisme; voilà ce qu'il cherchait dans les faits, voilà ce qu'il ébauchait dans les esprits.

Efforts admirables! tentatives sacrées!

Ces doctrines, ces théories, ces résistances, la nécessité inattendue pour l’homme d’État de compter avec les philosophes, de confuses évidences entrevues, une politique nouvelle à créer, d’accord avec le vieux monde sans trop de désaccord avec l’idéal révolutionnaire, une situation dans laquelle il fallait user Lafayette à défendre Polignac, l’intuition du progrès transparent sous l’émeute, les chambres et la rue, les compétitions à équilibrer autour de lui, sa foi dans la révolution, peut-être on ne sait quelle résignation éventuelle née de la vague acceptation d’un droit définitif et supérieur, sa volonté de rester de sa race, son esprit de famille, son sincère respect du peuple, sa propre honnêteté, préoccupaient Louis-Philippe presque douloureusement, et par instants, si fort et si courageux qu’il fût, l’accablaient sous la difficulté d’être roi.

Il sentait sous ses pieds une désagrégation redoutable, qui n’était pourtant pas une mise en poussière, la France étant plus France que jamais.

De ténébreux amoncellements couvraient l’horizon. Une ombre étrange gagnant de proche en proche, s’étendait peu à peu sur les hommes, sur les choses, sur les idées; ombre qui venait des colères et des systèmes. Tout ce qui avait été hâtivement étouffé remuait et fermentait. Parfois la conscience de l’honnête homme reprenait sa respiration tant il y avait de malaise dans cet air où les sophismes se mêlaient aux vérités. Les esprits tremblaient dans l’anxiété sociale comme les feuilles à l’approche d’un orage. La tension électrique était telle qu’à de certains instants le premier venu, un inconnu, éclairait. Puis l’obscurité crépusculaire retombait. Par intervalles, de profonds et sourds grondements pouvaient faire juger de la quantité de foudre qu’il y avait dans la nuée.

Vingt mois à peine s’étaient écoulés depuis la Révolution de Juillet, l’année 1832 s’était ouverte avec un aspect d’imminence et de détresse. La détresse du peuple, les travailleurs sans pain, le dernier prince de Condé disparu dans les ténèbres, Bruxelles chassant les Nassau comme Paris les Bourbons, la Belgique s’offrant à un prince français et donnée à un prince anglais, la haine russe de Nicolas, derrière nous deux démons du midi, Ferdinand en Espagne, Miguel en Portugal, la terre tremblant en Italie, Metternich étendant la main sur Bologne, la France brusquant l’Autriche à Ancône, au nord on ne sait quel sinistre bruit de marteau reclouant la Pologne dans son cercueil, dans toute l’Europe des regards irrités guettant la France, l’Angleterre, alliée suspecte, prête à pousser ce qui pencherait et à se jeter sur ce qui tomberait, la pairie s’abritant derrière Beccaria pour refuser quatre têtes à la loi, les fleurs de lys raturées sur la voiture du roi, la croix arrachée de Notre-Dame, Lafayette amoindri, Laffitte ruiné, Benjamin Constant mort dans l’indigence, Casimir Perier mort dans l’épuisement du pouvoir; la maladie politique et la maladie sociale se déclarant à la fois dans les deux capitales du royaume, l’une la ville de la pensée, l’autre la ville du travail; à Paris la guerre civile, à Lyon la guerre servile; dans les deux cités la même lueur de fournaise; une pourpre de cratère au front du peuple; le midi fanatisé, l’ouest troublé, la duchesse de Berry dans la Vendée, les complots, les conspirations, les soulèvements, le choléra, ajoutaient à la sombre rumeur des idées le sombre tumulte des événements.

Chapitre V

Faits d’où l’histoire sort et que l’histoire ignore

Vers la fin d’avril, tout s’était aggravé. La fermentation devenait du bouillonnement. Depuis 1830, il y avait eu çà et là de petites émeutes partielles, vite comprimées, mais renaissantes, signe d’une vaste conflagration sous-jacente. Quelque chose de terrible couvait. On entrevoyait les linéaments encore peu distincts et mal éclairés d’une révolution possible. La France regardait Paris; Paris regardait le faubourg Saint-Antoine.

Le faubourg Saint-Antoine, sourdement chauffé, entrait en ébullition.

Les cabarets de la rue de Charonne étaient, quoique la jonction de ces deux épithètes semble singulière appliquée à des cabarets, graves et orageux.

Le gouvernement y était purement et simplement mis en question. On y discutait publiquement la chose pour se battre ou pour rester tranquille. Il y avait des arrière-boutiques où l’on faisait jurer à des ouvriers qu’ils se trouveraient dans la rue au premier cri d’alarme, et «qu’ils se battraient sans compter le nombre des ennemis.» Une fois l’engagement pris, un homme assis dans un coin du cabaret»faisait une voix sonore» et disait: Tu l’entends! tu l’as juré! Quelquefois on montait au premier étage dans une chambre close, et là il se passait des scènes presque maçonniques. On faisait prêter à l’initié des serments pour lui rendre service ainsi qu’aux pères de famille. C’était la formule.

Dans les salles basses on lisait des brochures «subversives». Ils crossaient le gouvernement, dit un rapport secret du temps.

On y entendait des paroles comme celles-ci: — Je ne sais pas les noms des chefs. Nous autres, nous ne saurons le jour que deux heures d’avance. — Un ouvrier disait: — Nous sommes trois cents, mettons chacun dix sous, cela fera cent cinquante francs pour fabriquer des balles et de la poudre. — Un autre disait: — Je ne demande pas six mois, je n’en demande pas deux. Avant quinze jours nous serons en parallèle avec le gouvernement. Avec vingt-cinq mille hommes on peut se mettre en face. — Un autre disait: — Je ne me couche pas parce que je fais des cartouches la nuit. — De temps en temps des hommes «en bourgeois et en beaux habits» venaient, «faisant des embarras», et ayant l'air»de commander», donnaient des poignées de mains aux plus importants, et s'en allaient. Ils ne restaient jamais plus de dix minutes. On échangeait à voix basse des propos significatifs. — Le complot est mûr, la chose est comble. — «C'était bourdonné par tous ceux qui étaient là», pour emprunter l'expression même d'un des assistants. L'exaltation était telle qu'un jour, en plein cabaret, un ouvrier s'écria: Nous n'avons pas d'armes! — Un de ses camarades répondit: — Les soldats en ont! — parodiant ainsi, sans s'en douter, la proclamation de Bonaparte à l'armée d'Italie. — «Quand ils avaient quelque chose de plus secret, ajoute un rapport, ils ne se le communiquaient pas là.» On ne comprend guère ce qu'ils pouvaient cacher après avoir dit ce qu'ils disaient.

Les réunions étaient quelquefois périodiques. À de certaines, on n'était jamais plus de huit ou dix, et toujours les mêmes. Dans d'autres, entrait qui voulait, et la salle était si pleine qu'on était forcé de se tenir debout. Les uns s'y trouvaient par enthousiasme et passion; les autres parce que c'était leur chemin pour aller au travail. Comme pendant la révolution, il y avait dans ces cabarets des femmes patriotes qui embrassaient les nouveaux venus.

D'autres faits expressifs se faisaient jour.

Un homme entrait dans un cabaret, buvait et sortait en disant: Marchand de vin, ce qui est dû, la révolution le payera.

Chez un cabaretier en face de la rue de Charonne on nommait des agents révolutionnaires. Le scrutin se faisait dans des casquettes.

Des ouvriers se réunissaient chez un maître d'escrime qui donnait des assauts rue de Cotte. Il y avait là un trophée d'armes formé d'espadons en bois, de cannes, de bâtons et de fleurets. Un jour on démoucheta les fleurets. Un ouvrier disait: — Nous sommes vingt-cinq, mais on ne compte pas sur moi, parce qu'on me regarde comme une machine. — Cette machine a été plus tard Quénisset.

Les choses quelconques qui se préméditaient prenaient peu à peu on ne sait quelle étrange notoriété. Une femme balayant sa porte disait à une autre femme: — Depuis longtemps on travaille à force à faire des cartouches. — On lisait en pleine rue des proclamations adressées aux gardes nationales des départements. Une de ces proclamations était signée: Burtot, marchand de vin.

Un jour, à la porte d'un liquoriste du marché Lenoir, un homme ayant un collier de barbe et l'accent italien montait sur une borne et lisait à haute voix un écrit singulier qui semblait émaner d'un pouvoir occulte. Des groupes s’étaient formés autour de lui et applaudissaient. Les passages qui remuaient le plus la foule ont été recueillis et notés. — «...Nos doctrines sont entravées, nos proclamations sont déchirées, nos afficheurs sont guettés et jetés en prison...».»La débâcle qui vient d’avoir lieu dans les cotons nous a converti plusieurs juste-milieu.» — «...L’avenir des peuples s’élabore dans nos rangs obscurs.» — «...Voici les termes posés: action ou réaction, révolution ou contre-révolution. Car, à notre époque, on ne croit plus à l’inertie ni à l’immobilité. Pour le peuple ou contre le peuple, c’est la question. Il n’y en a pas d’autre.» — «...Le jour où nous ne vous conviendrons plus, cassez-nous, mais jusque-là aidez-nous à marcher.» Tout cela en plein jour.

D’autres faits, plus audacieux encore, étaient suspects au peuple à cause de leur audace même. Le 4 avril 1832, un passant montait sur la borne qui fait l’angle de la rue Sainte-Marguerite et criait: Je suis babouviste! Mais sous Babeuf le peuple flairait Gisquet.

Entre autres choses, ce passant disait:

— «À bas la propriété! L’opposition de gauche est lâche et traître. Quand elle veut avoir raison, elle prêche la révolution. Elle est démocrate pour n’être pas battue, et royaliste pour ne pas combattre. Les républicains sont des bêtes à plumes. Défiez-vous des républicains, citoyens travailleurs.»

— Silence, citoyen mouchard! cria un ouvrier.

Ce cri mit fin au discours.

Des incidents mystérieux se produisaient.

À la chute du jour, un ouvrier rencontrait près du canal»un homme bien mis» qui lui disait: — Où vas-tu, citoyen? — Monsieur, répondait l’ouvrier, je n’ai pas l’honneur de vous connaître. — Je te connais bien, moi. Et l’homme ajoutait: Ne crains pas. Je suis l’agent du comité. On te soupçonne de n’être pas bien sûr. Tu sais que si tu révélais quelque chose, on a l’œil sur toi. — Puis il donnait à l’ouvrier une poignée de main et s’en allait en disant: — Nous nous reverrons bientôt.

La police, aux écoutes, recueillait, non plus seulement dans les cabarets, mais dans la rue, des dialogues singuliers:

— Fais-toi recevoir bien vite, disait un tisserand à un ébéniste.

— Pourquoi?

— Il va y avoir un coup de feu à faire.

Deux passants en haillons échangeaient ces répliques remarquables, grosses d’une apparente jacquerie:

— Qui nous gouverne?

— C’est monsieur Philippe.

— Non, c’est la bourgeoisie.

On se tromperait si l’on croyait que nous prenons le mot jacquerie en mauvaise part. Les Jacques, c’étaient les pauvres. Or ceux qui ont faim ont droit.

Une autre fois, on entendait passer deux hommes dont l’un disait à l’autre: — Nous avons un bon plan d’attaque.

D’une conversation intime entre quatre hommes accroupis dans un fossé du rond-point de la barrière du Trône, on ne saisissait que ceci:

— On fera le possible pour qu’il ne se promène plus dans Paris.

Qui, il? Obscurité menaçante.

«Les principaux chefs», comme on disait dans le faubourg, se tenaient à l’écart. On croyait qu’ils se réunissaient, pour se concerter, dans un cabaret près de la pointe Saint-Eustache. Un nommé Aug. — , chef de la Société des Secours pour les tailleurs, rue Mondétour, passait pour servir d’intermédiaire central entre les chefs et le faubourg Saint-Antoine. Néanmoins, il y eut toujours beaucoup d’ombre sur ces chefs, et aucun fait certain ne put infirmer la fierté singulière de cette réponse faite plus tard par un accusé devant la Cour des pairs:

— Quel était votre chef?

— Je n’en connaissais pas, et je n’en reconnaissais pas.

Ce n’étaient guère encore que des paroles, transparentes, mais vagues; quelquefois des propos en l’air, des on-dit, des ouï-dire. D’autres indices survenaient.

Un charpentier, occupé rue de Reuilly à clouer les planches d’une palissade autour d’un terrain où s’élevait une maison en construction, trouvait dans ce terrain un fragment de lettre déchirée où étaient encore lisibles les lignes que voici:

— «...Il faut que le comité prenne des mesures pour empêcher le recrutement dans les sections pour les différentes sociétés...»

Et en post-scriptum:

«Nous avons appris qu’il y avait des fusils rue du Faubourg-Poissonnière, nº 5 (bis), au nombre de cinq ou six mille, chez un armurier, dans une cour. La section ne possède point d’armes.»

Ce qui fit que le charpentier s'émut et montra la chose à ses voisins, c'est qu'à quelques pas plus loin il ramassa un autre papier également déchiré et plus significatif encore, dont nous reproduisons la configuration à cause de l'intérêt historique de ces étranges documents:

Q C D E

u og a1 fe

Apprenez cette liste par cœur. Après, vous la déchirerez. Les hommes admis en feront autant lorsque vous leur aurez transmis des ordres.

Salut et fraternité.

L.

Les personnes qui furent alors dans le secret de cette trouvaille n'ont connu que plus tard le sous-entendu de ces quatre majuscules: quinturions, centurions, décurions, éclaireurs, et le sens de ces lettres: u og a1 fe qui était une date et qui voulait dire ce 15 avril 1832. Sous chaque majuscule étaient inscrits des noms suivis d'indications très caractéristiques. Ainsi: — Q. Bannerel. 8 fusils. 83 cartouches. Homme sûr. — C. Boubière. 1 pistolet. 40 cartouches. — D. Rollet. 1 fleuret. 1 pistolet. 1 livre de poudre. — E. Teissier. 1 sabre. 1 giberne. Exact. — Terreur 8 fusils, Brave, etc.

Enfin ce charpentier trouva, toujours dans le même enclos, un troisième papier sur lequel était écrite au crayon, mais très lisiblement, cette espèce de liste énigmatique:

Unité. Blanchard. Arbre-sec. 6.
Barra. Soize. Salle-au-Comte.
Kosciusko. Aubry le boucher?
J. J. R.
Caïus Gracchus.
Droit de révision. Dufond. Four.
Chute des Girondins. Derbac. Maubuée.
Washington. Pinson. 1 pist. 86 cart.
Marseillaise.
Souver. du peuple. Michel. Quincampoix. Sabre.
Hoche.
Marceau. Platon. Arbre-sec.
Varsovie. Tilly, crieur du Populaire.

L'honnête bourgeois entre les mains duquel cette liste était demeurée en sut la signification. Il paraît que cette liste était la nomenclature complète des sections du quatrième arrondissement de la société des Droits de l’Homme, avec les noms et les demeures des chefs de sections. Aujourd’hui que tous ces faits restés dans l’ombre ne sont plus que de l’histoire, on peut les publier. Il faut ajouter que la fondation de la société des Droits de l’Homme semble avoir été postérieure à la date où ce papier fut trouvé. Peut-être n’était-ce qu’une ébauche.

Cependant, après les propos et les paroles, après les indices écrits, des faits matériels commençaient à percer.

Rue Popincourt, chez un marchand de bric-à-brac, on saisissait dans le tiroir d’une commode sept feuilles de papier gris toutes également pliées en long et en quatre; ces feuilles recouvraient vingt-six carrés de ce même papier gris pliés en forme de cartouche, et une carte sur laquelle on lisait ceci:

Salpêtre — 12 onces.

Soufre — 2 onces.

Charbon — 2 onces et demie.

Eau — 2 onces.

Le procès-verbal de saisie constatait que le tiroir exhalait une forte odeur de poudre.

Un maçon revenant, sa journée faite, oubliait un petit paquet sur un banc près du pont d’Austerlitz. Ce paquet était porté au corps de garde. On l’ouvrait et l’on y trouvait deux dialogues imprimés, signés Lahautière, une chanson intitulée: Ouvriers, associez-vous, et une boîte de fer-blanc pleine de cartouches.

Un ouvrier buvant avec un camarade lui faisait tâter comme il avait chaud, l’autre sentait un pistolet sous sa veste.

Dans un fossé sur le boulevard, entre le Père-Lachaise et la barrière du Trône, à l’endroit le plus désert, des enfants, en jouant, découvraient sous un tas de copeaux et d’épluchures un sac qui contenait un moule à balles, un mandrin en bois à faire des cartouches, une sébile dans laquelle il y avait des grains de poudre de chasse, et une petite marmite en fonte dont l’intérieur offrait des traces évidentes de plomb fondu.

Des agents de police, pénétrant à l’improviste à cinq heures du matin chez un nommé Pardon, qui fut plus tard sectionnaire de la section Barricade-Merry et se fit tuer dans l’insurrection d’avril 1834, le trouvaient debout près de son lit, tenant à la main des cartouches qu’il était en train de faire.

Vers l’heure où les ouvriers se reposent, deux hommes étaient vus se rencontrant entre la barrière Picpus et la barrière Charenton dans un petit chemin de ronde entre deux murs près d’un cabaretier qui a un jeu de Siam devant sa porte. L’un tirait de dessous sa blouse et remettait à l’autre un pistolet. Au moment de le lui remettre il s’apercevait que la transpiration de sa poitrine avait communiqué quelque humidité à la poudre. Il amorçait le pistolet et ajoutait de la poudre à celle qui était déjà dans le bassinet. Puis les deux hommes se quittaient.

Un nommé Gallais, tué plus tard rue Beaubourg dans l’affaire d’avril, se vantait d’avoir chez lui sept cents cartouches et vingt-quatre pierres à fusil.

Le gouvernement reçut un jour l’avis qu’il venait d’être distribué des armes au faubourg et deux cent mille cartouches. La semaine d’après trente mille cartouches furent distribuées. Chose remarquable, la police n’en put saisir aucune. Une lettre interceptée portait: — «Le jour n’est pas loin où en quatre heures d’horloge quatre-vingt mille patriotes seront sous les armes.»

Toute cette fermentation était publique, on pourrait presque dire tranquille. L’insurrection imminente apprêtait son orage avec calme en face du gouvernement. Aucune singularité ne manquait à cette crise encore souterraine, mais déjà perceptible. Les bourgeois parlaient paisiblement aux ouvriers de ce qui se préparait. On disait: Comment va l’émeute? du ton dont on eût dit: Comment va votre femme?

Un marchand de meubles, rue Moreau, demandait: — Eh bien, quand attaquez-vous?

Un autre boutiquier disait:

— On attaquera bientôt? je le sais. Il y a un mois vous étiez quinze mille, maintenant vous êtes vingt-cinq mille. — Il offrait son fusil, et un voisin offrait un petit pistolet qu’il voulait vendre sept francs.

Du reste, la fièvre révolutionnaire gagnait. Aucun point de Paris ni de la France n’en était exempt. L’artère battait partout. Comme ces membranes qui naissent de certaines inflammations et se forment dans le corps humain, le réseau des sociétés secrètes commençait à s’étendre sur le pays. De l’association des Amis du peuple, publique et secrète tout à la fois, naissait la société des Droits de l’Homme, qui datait ainsi un de ses ordres du jour: Pluviôse, an 40 de l’ère républicaine, qui devait survivre même à des arrêts de cour d’assises prononçant sa dissolution, et qui n’hésitait pas à donner à ses sections des noms significatifs tels que ceux-ci:

Des piques.

Tocsin.
Canon d’alarme.
Bonnet phrygien.
21 janvier.
Des Gueux.
Des Truands.
Marche en avant.
Robespierre.
Niveau.
Ça ira.

La société des Droits de l’Homme engendrait la société d’Action. C’étaient les impatients qui se détachaient et couraient devant. D’autres associations cherchaient à se recruter dans les grandes sociétés mères. Les sectionnaires se plaignaient d’être tiraillés. Ainsi la société Gauloise et le Comité organisateur des municipalités. Ainsi les associations pour la liberté de la presse, pour la liberté individuelle, pour l’instruction du peuple, contre les impôts indirects. Puis la société des Ouvriers égalitaires, qui se divisait en trois fractions, les égalitaires, les communistes, les réformistes. Puis l’Armée des Bastilles, une espèce de cohorte organisée militairement, quatre hommes commandés par un caporal, dix par un sergent, vingt par un sous-lieutenant, quarante par un lieutenant; il n’y avait jamais plus de cinq hommes qui se connussent. Création où la précaution est combinée avec l’audace et qui semble empreinte du génie de Venise. Le comité central, qui était la tête, avait deux bras, la société d’Action et l’Armée des Bastilles. Une association légitimiste, les Chevaliers de la Fidélité, remuait parmi ces affiliations républicaines. Elle y était dénoncée et répudiée.

Les sociétés parisiennes se ramifiaient dans les principales villes. Lyon, Nantes, Lille et Marseille avaient leur société des Droits de l’Homme, la Charbonnière, les Hommes libres. Aix avait une société révolutionnaire qu’on appelait la Cougourde. Nous avons déjà prononcé ce mot.

À Paris, le faubourg Saint-Marceau n’était guère moins bourdonnant que le faubourg Saint-Antoine, et les écoles pas moins émues que les faubourgs. Un café de la rue Saint-Hyacinthe et l’estaminet des Sept-Billards, rue des Mathurins-Saint-Jacques, servaient de lieux de ralliement aux étudiants. La société des Amis de l’A B C, affiliée aux mutuellistes d’Angers et à la Cougourde d’Aix, se réunissait, on l’a vu, au café Musain. Ces mêmes jeunes gens se retrouvaient aussi, nous l’avons dit, dans un restaurant cabaret près de la rue Mondétour qu’on appelait Corinthe. Ces réunions étaient secrètes. D’autres étaient aussi publiques que possible, et l’on peut juger de ces hardiesses par ce fragment d’un interrogatoire subi dans un des procès ultérieurs: — Où se tint cette réunion? — Rue de la Paix. — Chez qui? — Dans la rue. — Quelles sections étaient là? — Une seule. — Laquelle? — La section Manuel. — Qui était le chef? — Moi. — Vous êtes trop jeune pour avoir pris tout seul ce grave parti d’attaquer le gouvernement. D’où vous venaient vos instructions? — Du comité central.

L’armée était minée en même temps que la population, comme le prouvèrent plus tard les mouvements de Belfort, de Lunéville et d’Épinal. On comptait sur le cinquante-deuxième régiment, sur le cinquième, sur le huitième, sur le trente-septième, et sur le vingtième léger. En Bourgogne, et dans les villes du midi on plantait l’arbre de la Liberté, c’est-à-dire un mât surmonté d’un bonnet rouge.

Telle était la situation.

Cette situation, le faubourg Saint-Antoine, plus que tout autre groupe de population, comme nous l’avons dit en commençant, la rendait sensible et l’accentuait. C’est là qu’était le point de côté.

Ce vieux faubourg, peuplé comme une fourmilière, laborieux, courageux et colère comme une ruche, frémissait dans l’attente et dans le désir d’une commotion. Tout s’y agitait sans que le travail fût pour cela interrompu. Rien ne saurait donner l’idée de cette physionomie vive et sombre. Il y a dans ce faubourg de poignantes détresses cachées sous le toit des mansardes; il y a là aussi des intelligences ardentes et rares. C’est surtout en fait de détresse et d’intelligence qu’il est dangereux que les extrêmes se touchent.

Le faubourg Saint-Antoine avait encore d’autres causes de tressaillement; car il reçoit le contre-coup des crises commerciales, des faillites, des grèves, des chômages, inhérents aux grands ébranlements politiques. En temps de révolution la misère est à la fois cause et effet. Le coup qu’elle frappe lui revient. Cette population, pleine de vertu fière, capable au plus haut point de calorique latent, toujours prête aux prises d’armes, prompte aux explosions, irritée, profonde, minée, semblait n’attendre que la chute d’une flammèche. Toutes les fois que de certaines étincelles flottent sur l’horizon, chassées par le vent des événements, on ne peut s’empêcher de songer au faubourg Saint-Antoine et au redoutable hasard qui a placé aux portes de Paris cette poudrière de souffrances et d'idées.

Les cabarets du faubourg Antoine, qui se sont plus d'une fois dessinés dans l'esquisse qu'on vient de lire, ont une notoriété historique. En temps de troubles on s'y enivre de paroles plus que de vin. Une sorte d'esprit prophétique et un effluve d'avenir y circule, enflant les cœurs et grandissant les âmes. Les cabarets du faubourg Antoine ressemblent à ces tavernes du Mont Aventin bâties sur l'antre de la sibylle et communiquant avec les profonds souffles sacrés; tavernes dont les tables étaient presque des trépieds, et où l'on buvait ce qu'Ennius appelle le vin sibyllin.

Le faubourg Saint-Antoine est un réservoir de peuple. L'ébranlement révolutionnaire y fait des fissures par où coule la souveraineté populaire. Cette souveraineté peut mal faire, elle se trompe comme toute autre; mais, même fourvoyée, elle reste grande. On peut dire d'elle comme du cyclope aveugle, Ingens.

En 93, selon que l'idée qui flottait était bonne ou mauvaise, selon que c'était le jour du fanatisme ou de l'enthousiasme, il partait du faubourg Saint-Antoine tantôt des légions sauvages, tantôt des bandes héroïques.

Sauvages. Expliquons-nous sur ce mot. Ces hommes hérissés qui, dans les jours génésiaques du chaos révolutionnaire, déguenillés, hurlants, farouches, le casse-tête levé, la pique haute, se ruaient sur le vieux Paris bouleversé, que voulaient-ils? Ils voulaient la fin des oppressions, la fin des tyrannies, la fin du glaive, le travail pour l'homme, l'instruction pour l'enfant, la douceur sociale pour la femme, la liberté, l'égalité, la fraternité, le pain pour tous, l'idée pour tous, l'édénisation du monde, le progrès; et cette chose sainte, bonne et douce, le progrès, poussés à bout, hors d'eux-mêmes, ils la réclamaient terribles, demi-nus, la massue au poing, le rugissement à la bouche. C'étaient les sauvages, oui; mais les sauvages de la civilisation.

Ils proclamaient avec furie le droit; ils voulaient, fût-ce par le tremblement et l'épouvante, forcer le genre humain au paradis. Ils semblaient des barbares et ils étaient des sauveurs. Ils réclamaient la lumière avec le masque de la nuit.

En regard de ces hommes, farouches, nous en convenons, et effrayants, mais farouches et effrayants pour le bien, il y a d'autres hommes, souriants, brodés, dorés, enrubannés, constellés, en bas de soie, en plumes blanches, en gants jaunes, en souliers vernis, qui, accoudés à une table de velours au coin d’une cheminée de marbre, insistent doucement pour le maintien et la conservation du passé, du Moyen-Âge, du droit divin, du fanatisme, de l’ignorance, de l’esclavage, de la peine de mort, de la guerre, glorifiant à demi-voix et avec politesse le sabre, le bûcher et l’échafaud. Quant à nous, si nous étions forcé à l’option entre les barbares de la civilisation et les civilisés de la barbarie, nous choisirions les barbares.

Mais, grâce au ciel, un autre choix est possible. Aucune chute à pic n’est nécessaire, pas plus en avant qu’en arrière. Ni despotisme, ni terrorisme. Nous voulons le progrès en pente douce.

Dieu y pourvoit. L’adoucissement des pentes, c’est là toute la politique de Dieu.

Chapitre VI

Enjolras et ses lieutenants

À peu près vers cette époque, Enjolras, en vue de l'événement possible, fit une sorte de recensement mystérieux.

Tous étaient en conciliabule au café Musain.

Enjolras dit, en mêlant à ses paroles quelques métaphores demi-énigmatiques, mais significatives:

— Il convient de savoir où l'on en est et sur qui l'on peut compter. Si l'on veut des combattants, il faut en faire. Avoir de quoi frapper. Cela ne peut nuire. Ceux qui passent ont toujours plus de chance d'attraper des coups de corne quand il y a des bœufs sur la route que lorsqu'il n'y en a pas. Donc comptons un peu le troupeau. Combien sommes-nous? Il ne s'agit pas de remettre ce travail-là à demain. Les révolutionnaires doivent toujours être pressés; le progrès n'a pas de temps à perdre. Défions-nous de l'inattendu. Ne nous laissons pas prendre au dépourvu. Il s'agit de repasser sur toutes les coutures que nous avons faites et de voir si elles tiennent. Cette affaire doit être coulée à fond aujourd'hui. Courfeyrac, tu verras les polytechniciens. C'est leur jour de sortie. Aujourd'hui mercredi. Feuilly, n'est-ce pas? vous verrez ceux de la Glacière. Combeferre m'a promis d'aller à Picpus. Il y a là tout un fourmillement excellent. Bahorel visitera l'Estrapade. Prouvaire, les maçons s'attiédissent; tu nous rapporteras des nouvelles de la loge de la rue de Grenelle-Saint-Honoré. Joly ira à la clinique de Dupuytren et tâtera le pouls à l'école de médecine. Bossuet fera un petit tour au palais et causera avec les stagiaires. Moi, je me charge de la Cougourde.

— Voilà tout réglé, dit Courfeyrac.

— Non.

— Qu'y a-t-il donc encore?

— Une chose très importante.

— Qu'est-ce? demanda Combeferre.

— La barrière du Maine, répondit Enjolras.

Enjolras resta un moment comme absorbé dans ses réflexions, puis reprit:

— Barrière du Maine il y a des marbriers, des peintres, les praticiens des ateliers de sculpture. C’est une famille enthousiaste, mais sujette à refroidissement. Je ne sais pas ce qu’ils ont depuis quelque temps. Ils pensent à autre chose. Ils s’éteignent. Ils passent leur temps à jouer aux dominos. Il serait urgent d’aller leur parler un peu et ferme. C’est chez Richefeu qu’ils se réunissent. On les y trouverait entre midi et une heure. Il faudrait souffler sur ces cendres-là. J’avais compté pour cela sur ce distrait de Marius, qui en somme est bon, mais il ne vient plus. Il me faudrait quelqu’un pour la barrière du Maine. Je n’ai plus personne.

— Et moi, dit Grantaire, je suis là.

— Toi?

— Moi.

— Toi, endoctriner des républicains! toi, réchauffer, au nom des principes, des cœurs refroidis!

— Pourquoi pas?

— Est-ce que tu peux être bon à quelque chose?

— Mais j’en ai la vague ambition, dit Grantaire.

— Tu ne crois à rien.

— Je crois à toi.

— Grantaire, veux-tu me rendre un service?

— Tous. Cirer tes bottes.

— Eh bien, ne te mêle pas de nos affaires. Cuve ton absinthe.

— Tu es un ingrat, Enjolras.

— Tu serais homme à aller barrière du Maine! tu en serais capable!

— Je suis capable de descendre rue des Grès, de traverser la place Saint-Michel, d’obliquer par la rue Monsieur-le-Prince, de prendre la rue de Vaugirard, de dépasser les Carmes, de tourner rue d’Assas, d’arriver rue du Cherche-Midi, de laisser derrière moi le Conseil de guerre, d’arpenter la rue des Vieilles-Tuileries, d’enjamber le boulevard, de suivre la chaussée du Maine, de franchir la barrière, et d’entrer chez Richefeu. Je suis capable de cela. Mes souliers en sont capables.

— Connais-tu un peu ces camarades-là de chez Richefeu?

— Pas beaucoup. Nous nous tutoyons seulement.

— Qu’est-ce que tu leur diras?

— Je leur parlerai de Robespierre, pardi. De Danton. Des principes.

— Toi!

— Moi. Mais on ne me rend pas justice. Quand je m’y mets, je suis terrible. J’ai lu Prud’homme, je connais le Contrat social, je sais par cœur ma constitution de l’an Deux.»La liberté du citoyen finit où la liberté d’un autre citoyen commence.» Est-ce que tu me prends pour une brute? J’ai un vieil assignat dans mon tiroir. Les droits de l’Homme, la souveraineté du peuple, sapristi! Je suis même un peu hébertiste. Je puis rabâcher, pendant six heures d’horloge, montre en main, des choses superbes.

— Sois sérieux, dit Enjolras.

— Je suis farouche, répondit Grantaire.

Enjolras pensa quelques secondes, et fit le geste d’un homme qui prend son parti.

— Grantaire, dit-il gravement, je consens à t’essayer. Tu iras barrière du Maine.

Grantaire logeait dans un garni tout voisin du café Musain. Il sortit, et revint cinq minutes après. Il était allé chez lui mettre un gilet à la Robespierre.

— Rouge, dit-il en entrant, et en regardant fixement Enjolras.

Puis, d’un plat de main énergique, il appuya sur sa poitrine les deux pointes écarlates du gilet.

Et, s’approchant d’Enjolras, il lui dit à l’oreille:

— Sois tranquille.

Il enfonça son chapeau résolument et partit.

Un quart d’heure après, l’arrière-salle du café Musain était déserte. Tous les amis de l’A B C étaient allés, chacun de leur côté, à leur besogne. Enjolras, qui s’était réservé la Cougourde, sortit le dernier.

Ceux de la Cougourde d’Aix qui étaient à Paris se réunissaient alors plaine d’Issy, dans une des carrières abandonnées si nombreuses de ce côté de Paris.

Enjolras, tout en cheminant vers ce lieu de rendez-vous, passait en lui-même la revue de la situation. La gravité des événements était visible. Quand les faits, prodromes d’une espèce de maladie sociale latente, se meuvent lourdement, la moindre complication les arrête et les enchevêtre. Phénomène d’où sortent les écroulements et les renaissances. Enjolras entrevoyait un soulèvement lumineux sous les pans ténébreux de l’avenir. Qui sait? le moment approchait peut-être. Le peuple ressaisissant le droit, quel beau spectacle! la révolution reprenant majestueusement possession de la France, et disant au monde: La suite à demain! Enjolras était content. La fournaise chauffait. Il avait, dans ce même instant-là, une traînée de poudre d’amis éparse sur Paris. Il composait, dans sa pensée, avec l’éloquence philosophique et pénétrante de Combeferre, l’enthousiasme cosmopolite de Feuilly, la verve de Courfeyrac, le rire de Bahorel, la mélancolie de Jean Prouvaire, la science de Joly, les sarcasmes de Bossuet, une sorte de pétillement électrique prenant feu à la fois un peu partout. Tous à l’œuvre. À coup sûr le résultat répondrait à l’effort. C’était bien. Ceci le fit penser à Grantaire. — Tiens, se dit-il, la barrière du Maine me détourne à peine de mon chemin. Si je poussais jusque chez Richefeu? Voyons un peu ce que fait Grantaire, et où il en est.

Une heure sonnait au clocher de Vaugirard quand Enjolras arriva à la tabagie Richefeu. Il poussa la porte, entra, croisa les bras, laissant retomber la porte qui vint lui heurter les épaules, et regarda dans la salle pleine de tables, d’hommes et de fumée.

Une voix éclatait dans cette brume, vivement coupée par une autre voix. C’était Grantaire dialoguant avec un adversaire qu’il avait.

Grantaire était assis vis-à-vis d’une autre figure, à une table de marbre Sainte-Anne semée de grains de son et constellée de dominos, il frappait ce marbre du poing, et voici ce qu’Enjolras entendit:

— Double-six.

— Du quatre.

— Le porc! je n’en ai plus.

— Tu es mort. Du deux.

— Du six.

— Du trois.

— De l’as.

— À moi la pose.

— Quatre points.

— Péniblement.

— À toi.

— J’ai fait une faute énorme.

— Tu vas bien.

— Quinze.

— Sept de plus.

— Cela me fait vingt-deux. (Rêvant.) Vingt-deux!

— Tu ne t’attendais pas au double-six. Si je l’avais mis au commencement, cela changeait tout le jeu.

— Du deux même.

— De l’as.

— De l’as! Eh bien, du cinq.

— Je n’en ai pas.

— C’est toi qui as posé, je crois?

— Oui.

— Du blanc.

— A-t-il de la chance! Ah! tu as une chance! (Longue rêverie.) Du deux.

— De l’as.

— Ni cinq, ni as. C’est embêtant pour toi.

— Domino.

— Nom d’un caniche!

Livre deuxième — Éponine

Chapitre I

Le Champ de l’Alouette

Marius avait assisté au dénouement inattendu du guet-apens sur la trace duquel il avait mis Javert; mais à peine Javert eut-il quitté la masure, emmenant ses prisonniers dans trois fiacres, que Marius de son côté se glissa hors de la maison. Il n’était encore que neuf heures du soir. Marius alla chez Courfeyrac. Courfeyrac n’était plus l’imperturbable habitant du quartier latin; il était allé demeurer rue de la Verrerie «pour des raisons politiques»; ce quartier était de ceux où l’insurrection dans ce temps-là s’installait volontiers. Marius dit à Courfeyrac: Je viens coucher chez toi. Courfeyrac tira un matelas de son lit qui en avait deux, l’étendit à terre, et dit: Voilà.

Le lendemain, dès sept heures du matin, Marius revint à la masure, paya le terme et ce qu’il devait à mame Bougon, fit charger sur une charrette à bras ses livres, son lit, sa table, sa commode et ses deux chaises, et s’en alla sans laisser son adresse, si bien que, lorsque Javert revint dans la matinée afin de questionner Marius sur les événements de la veille, il ne trouva que mame Bougon qui lui répondit: Déménagé!

Mame Bougon fut convaincue que Marius était un peu complice des voleurs saisis dans la nuit. — Qui aurait dit cela? s’écria-t-elle chez les portières du quartier, un jeune homme, que ça vous avait l’air d’une fille!

Marius avait eu deux raisons pour ce déménagement si prompt. La première, c’est qu’il avait horreur maintenant de cette maison où il avait vu, de si près et dans tout son développement le plus repoussant et le plus féroce, une laideur sociale plus affreuse peut-être encore que le mauvais riche, le mauvais pauvre. La deuxième, c’est qu’il ne voulait pas figurer dans le procès quelconque qui s’ensuivrait probablement, et être amené à déposer contre Thénardier.

Javert crut que le jeune homme, dont il n’avait pas retenu le nom, avait eu peur et s’était sauvé ou n’était peut-être même pas rentré chez lui au moment du guet-apens; il fit pourtant quelques efforts pour le retrouver, mais il n’y parvint pas.

Un mois s’écoula, puis un autre. Marius était toujours chez Courfeyrac. Il avait su par un avocat stagiaire, promeneur habituel de la salle des pas perdus, que Thénardier était au secret. Tous les lundis, Marius faisait remettre au greffe de la Force cinq francs pour Thénardier.

Marius n’ayant plus d’argent, empruntait les cinq francs à Courfeyrac. C’était la première fois de sa vie qu’il empruntait de l’argent. Ces cinq francs périodiques étaient une double énigme pour Courfeyrac qui les donnait et pour Thénardier qui les recevait. — À qui cela peut-il aller? songeait Courfeyrac. — D’où cela peut-il me venir? se demandait Thénardier.

Marius du reste était navré. Tout était de nouveau rentré dans une trappe. Il ne voyait plus rien devant lui; sa vie était replongée dans ce mystère où il errait à tâtons. Il avait un moment revu de très près dans cette obscurité la jeune fille qu’il aimait, le vieillard qui semblait son père, ces êtres inconnus qui étaient son seul intérêt et sa seule espérance en ce monde; et au moment où il avait cru les saisir, un souffle avait emporté toutes ces ombres. Pas une étincelle de certitude et de vérité n’avait jailli même du choc le plus effrayant. Aucune conjecture possible. Il ne savait même plus le nom qu’il avait cru savoir. À coup sûr ce n’était plus Ursule. Et l’Alouette était un sobriquet. Et que penser du vieillard? Se cachait-il en effet de la police? L’ouvrier à cheveux blancs que Marius avait rencontré aux environs des Invalides lui était revenu à l’esprit. Il devenait probable maintenant que cet ouvrier et M. Leblanc étaient le même homme. Il se déguisait donc? Cet homme avait des côtés héroïques et des côtés équivoques. Pourquoi n’avait-il pas appelé au secours? pourquoi s’était-il enfui? était-il, oui ou non, le père de la jeune fille? enfin était-il réellement l’homme que Thénardier avait cru reconnaître? Thénardier avait pu se méprendre? Autant de problèmes sans issue. Tout ceci, il est vrai, n’ôtait rien au charme angélique de la jeune fille du Luxembourg. Détresse poignante; Marius avait une passion dans le cœur, et la nuit sur les yeux. Il était poussé, il était attiré, et il ne pouvait bouger. Tout s’était évanoui, excepté l’amour. De l’amour même, il avait perdu les instincts et les illuminations subites. Ordinairement cette flamme qui nous brûle nous éclaire aussi un peu, et nous jette quelque lueur utile au dehors. Ces sourds conseils de la passion, Marius ne les entendait même plus. Jamais il ne se disait: Si j’allais là? si j’essayais ceci? Celle qu’il ne pouvait plus nommer Ursule était évidemment quelque part; rien n’avertissait Marius du côté où il fallait chercher. Toute sa vie se résumait maintenant en deux mots: une incertitude absolue dans une brume impénétrable. La revoir, elle; il y aspirait toujours, il ne l’espérait plus.

Pour comble, la misère revenait. Il sentait tout près de lui, derrière lui, ce souffle glacé. Dans toutes ces tourmentes, et depuis longtemps déjà, il avait discontinué son travail, et rien n'est plus dangereux que le travail discontinué; c'est une habitude qui s'en va. Habitude facile à quitter, difficile à reprendre.

Une certaine quantité de rêverie est bonne, comme un narcotique à dose discrète. Cela endort les fièvres, quelquefois dures, de l'intelligence en travail, et fait naître dans l'esprit une vapeur molle et fraîche qui corrige les contours trop âpres de la pensée pure, comble çà et là des lacunes et des intervalles, lie les ensembles et estompe les angles des idées. Mais trop de rêverie submerge et noie. Malheur au travailleur par l'esprit qui se laisse tomber tout entier de la pensée dans la rêverie! Il croit qu'il remontera aisément, et il se dit qu'après tout c'est la même chose. Erreur!

La pensée est le labeur de l'intelligence, la rêverie en est la volupté. Remplacer la pensée par la rêverie, c'est confondre un poison avec une nourriture.

Marius, on s'en souvient, avait commencé par là. La passion était survenue, et avait achevé de le précipiter dans les chimères sans objet et sans fond. On ne sort plus de chez soi que pour aller songer. Enfantement paresseux. Gouffre tumultueux et stagnant. Et, à mesure que le travail diminuait, les besoins croissaient. Ceci est une loi. L'homme, à l'état rêveur, est naturellement prodigue et mou; l'esprit détendu ne peut pas tenir la vie serrée. Il y a, dans cette façon de vivre, du bien mêlé au mal, car si l'amollissement est funeste, la générosité est saine et bonne. Mais l'homme pauvre, généreux et noble, qui ne travaille pas, est perdu. Les ressources tarissent, les nécessités surgissent.

Pente fatale où les plus honnêtes et les plus fermes sont entraînés comme les plus faibles et les plus vicieux, et qui aboutit à l'un de ces deux trous, le suicide ou le crime.

À force de sortir pour aller songer, il vient un jour où l'on sort pour aller se jeter à l'eau.

L'excès de songe fait les Escousse et les Lebras.

Marius descendait cette pente à pas lents, les yeux fixés sur celle qu'il ne voyait plus. Ce que nous venons d'écrire là semble étrange et pourtant est vrai. Le souvenir d'un être absent s'allume dans les ténèbres du cœur; plus il a disparu, plus il rayonne; l'âme désespérée et obscure voit cette lumière à son horizon; étoile de la nuit intérieure. Elle, c'était là toute la pensée de

Marius. Il ne songeait pas à autre chose; il sentait confusément que son vieux habit devenait un habit impossible et que son habit neuf devenait un vieux habit, que ses chemises s’usaient, que son chapeau s’usait, que ses bottes s’usaient, c’est-à-dire que sa vie s’usait, et il se disait: Si je pouvais seulement la revoir avant de mourir!

Une seule idée douce lui restait, c’est qu’Elle l’avait aimé, que son regard le lui avait dit, qu’elle ne connaissait pas son nom, mais qu’elle connaissait son âme, et que peut-être là où elle était, quel que fût ce lieu mystérieux, elle l’aimait encore. Qui sait si elle ne songeait pas à lui comme lui songeait à elle? Quelquefois, dans des heures inexplicables comme en a tout cœur qui aime, n’ayant que des raisons de douleur et se sentant pourtant un obscur tressaillement de joie, il se disait: Ce sont ses pensées qui viennent à moi! — Puis il ajoutait: Mes pensées lui arrivent aussi peut-être.

Cette illusion, dont il hochait la tête le moment d’après, réussissait pourtant à lui jeter dans l’âme des rayons qui ressemblaient parfois à de l’espérance. De temps en temps, surtout à cette heure du soir qui attriste le plus les songeurs, il laissait tomber sur un cahier de papier où il n’y avait que cela, le plus pur, le plus impersonnel, le plus idéal des rêveries dont l’amour lui emplissait le cerveau. Il appelait cela «lui écrire».

Il ne faut pas croire que sa raison fût en désordre. Au contraire. Il avait perdu la faculté de travailler et de se mouvoir fermement vers un but déterminé, mais il avait plus que jamais la clairvoyance et la rectitude. Marius voyait à un jour calme et réel, quoique singulier, ce qui se passait sous ses yeux, même les faits ou les hommes les plus indifférents; il disait de tout le mot juste avec une sorte d’accablement honnête et de désintéressement candide. Son jugement, presque détaché de l’espérance, se tenait haut et planait.

Dans cette situation d’esprit rien ne lui échappait, rien ne le trompait, et il découvrait à chaque instant le fond de la vie, de l’humanité et de la destinée. Heureux, même dans les angoisses, celui à qui Dieu a donné une âme digne de l’amour et du malheur! Qui n’a pas vu les choses de ce monde et le cœur des hommes à cette double lumière n’a rien vu de vrai et ne sait rien.

L’âme qui aime et qui souffre est à l’état sublime.

Du reste les jours se succédaient et rien de nouveau ne se présentait. Il lui semblait seulement que l’espace sombre qui lui restait à parcourir se raccourcissait à chaque instant. Il croyait déjà entrevoir distinctement le bord de l’escarpement sans fond.

— Quoi! se répétait-il, est-ce que je ne la reverrai pas auparavant?

Quand on a monté la rue Saint-Jacques, laissé de côté la barrière et suivi quelque temps à gauche l’ancien boulevard intérieur, on atteint la rue de la Santé, puis la Glacière, et, un peu avant d’arriver à la petite rivière des Gobelins, on rencontre une espèce de champ, qui est, dans toute la longue et monotone ceinture des boulevards de Paris, le seul endroit où Ruisdael serait tenté de s’asseoir.

Ce je ne sais quoi d’où la grâce se dégage est là, un pré vert traversé de cordes tendues où des loques sèchent au vent, une vieille ferme à maraîchers bâtie du temps de Louis XIII avec son grand toit bizarrement percé de mansardes, des palissades délabrées, un peu d’eau entre des peupliers, des femmes, des rires, des voix; à l’horizon le Panthéon, l’arbre des Sourds-Muets, le Val-de-Grâce, noir, trapu, fantasque, amusant, magnifique, et au fond le sévère faîte carré des tours de Notre-Dame.

Comme le lieu vaut la peine d’être vu, personne n’y vient. À peine une charrette ou un routier tous les quarts d’heure.

Il arriva une fois que les promenades solitaires de Marius le conduisirent à ce terrain près de cette eau. Ce jour-là, il y avait sur ce boulevard une rareté, un passant. Marius, vaguement frappé du charme presque sauvage du lieu, demanda à ce passant: — Comment se nomme cet endroit-ci?

Le passant répondit: — C’est le champ de l’Alouette.

Et il ajouta: — C’est ici qu’Ulbach a tué la bergère d’Ivry.

Mais après ce mot: l’Alouette, Marius n’avait plus entendu. Il y a de ces congélations subites dans l’état rêveur qu’un mot suffit à produire. Toute la pensée se condense brusquement autour d’une idée, et n’est plus capable d’aucune autre perception. L’Alouette, c’était l’appellation qui, dans les profondeurs de la mélancolie de Marius, avait remplacé Ursule. — Tiens, dit-il, dans l’espèce de stupeur irraisonnée propre à ces apartés mystérieux, ceci est son champ. Je saurai ici où elle demeure.

Cela était absurde, mais irrésistible.

Et il vint tous les jours à ce champ de l’Alouette.

Chapitre II

Formation embryonnaire des crimes dans l'incubation des prisons

Le triomphe de Javert dans la masure Gorbeau avait semblé complet, mais ne l'avait pas été.

D'abord, et c'était là son principal souci, Javert n'avait point fait prisonnier le prisonnier. L'assassiné qui s'évade est plus suspect que l'assassin; et il est probable que ce personnage, si précieuse capture pour les bandits, n'était pas de moins bonne prise pour l'autorité.

Ensuite, Montparnasse avait échappé à Javert.

Il fallait attendre une autre occasion pour remettre la main sur ce «muscadin du diable». Montparnasse en effet, ayant rencontré Éponine qui faisait le guet sous les arbres du boulevard l'avait emmenée, aimant mieux être Némorin avec la fille que Schinderhannes avec le père. Bien lui en avait pris. Il était libre. Quant à Éponine, Javert l'avait fait «repincer». Consolation médiocre. Éponine avait rejoint Azelma aux Madelonnettes.

Enfin, dans le trajet de la masure Gorbeau à la Force, un des principaux arrêtés, Claquesous, s'était perdu. On ne savait comment cela s'était fait, les agents et les sergents «n'y comprenaient rien», il s'était changé en vapeur, il avait glissé entre les poucettes, il avait coulé entre les fentes de la voiture, le fiacre était fêlé, et avait fui; on ne savait que dire, sinon qu'en arrivant à la prison, plus de Claquesous. Il y avait là de la féerie, ou de la police. Claquesous avait-il fondu dans les ténèbres comme un flocon de neige dans l'eau? Y avait-il eu connivence inavouée des agents? Cet homme appartenait-il à la double énigme du désordre et de l'ordre? Était-il concentrique à l'infraction et à la répression? Ce sphinx avait-il les pattes de devant dans le crime et les pattes de derrière dans l'autorité? Javert n'acceptait point ces combinaisons-là, et se fût hérissé devant de tels compromis; mais son escouade comprenait d'autres inspecteurs que lui, plus initiés peut-être que lui-même, quoique ses subordonnés, aux secrets de la préfecture, et Claquesous était un tel scélérat qu'il pouvait être un fort bon agent. Être en de si intimes rapports d'escamotage avec la nuit, cela est excellent pour le brigandage et admirable pour la police. Il y a de ces coquins à deux tranchants. Quoi qu'il en fût, Claquesous égaré ne se retrouva pas. Javert en parut plus irrité qu'étonné.

Quant à Marius, «ce dadais d’avocat qui avait eu probablement peur», et dont Javert avait oublié le nom, Javert y tenait peu. D’ailleurs, un avocat, cela se retrouve toujours. Mais était-ce un avocat seulement?

L’information avait commencé.

Le juge d’instruction avait trouvé utile de ne point mettre un des hommes de la bande Patron-Minette au secret, espérant quelque bavardage. Cet homme était Brujon, le chevelu de la rue du Petit-Banquier. On l’avait lâché dans la cour Charlemagne, et l’œil des surveillants était ouvert sur lui.

Ce nom, Brujon, est un des souvenirs de la Force. Dans la hideuse cour dite du Bâtiment-Neuf, que l’administration appelait cour Saint-Bernard et que les voleurs appelaient fosse-aux-lions, sur cette muraille couverte de squames et de lèpres qui montait à gauche à la hauteur des toits, près d’une vieille porte de fer rouillée qui menait à l’ancienne chapelle de l’hôtel ducal de la Force devenue un dortoir de brigands, on voyait encore il y a douze ans une espèce de bastille grossièrement sculptée au clou dans la pierre, et au-dessous cette signature:

BRUJON, 1811.

Le Brujon de 1811 était le père du Brujon de 1832.

Ce dernier, qu’on n’a pu qu’entrevoir dans le guet-apens Gorbeau, était un jeune gaillard fort rusé et fort adroit, ayant l’air ahuri et plaintif. C’est sur cet air ahuri que le juge d’instruction l’avait lâché, le croyant plus utile dans la cour Charlemagne que dans la cellule du secret.

Les voleurs ne s’interrompent pas parce qu’ils sont entre les mains de la justice. On ne se gêne point pour si peu. Être en prison pour un crime n’empêche pas de commencer un autre crime. Ce sont des artistes qui ont un tableau au Salon et qui n’en travaillent pas moins à une nouvelle œuvre dans leur atelier.

Brujon semblait stupéfié par la prison. On le voyait quelquefois des heures entières dans la cour Charlemagne, debout près de la lucarne du cantinier, et contemplant comme un idiot cette sordide pancarte des prix de la cantine qui commençait par: ail, 62 centimes, et finissait par: cigare, cinq centimes. Ou bien il passait son temps à trembler, claquant des dents, disant qu’il avait la fièvre, et s’informant si l’un des vingt-huit lits de la salle des fiévreux était vacant.

Tout à coup, vers la deuxième quinzaine de février 1832, on sut que Brujon, cet endormi, avait fait faire, par des commissionnaires de la maison, pas sous son nom, mais sous le nom de trois de ses camarades, trois commissions différentes, lesquelles lui avaient coûté en tout cinquante sous, dépense exorbitante qui attira l'attention du brigadier de la prison.

On s'informa, et en consultant le tarif des commissions affiché dans le parloir des détenus, on arriva à savoir que les cinquante sous se décomposaient ainsi: trois commissions; une au Panthéon, dix sous; une au Val-de-Grâce, quinze sous; et une à la barrière de Grenelle, vingt-cinq sous. Celle-ci était la plus chère de tout le tarif. Or, au Panthéon, au Val-de-Grâce, à la barrière de Grenelle, se trouvaient précisément les domiciles de trois rôdeurs de barrières fort redoutés, Kruideniers, dit Bizarro, Glorieux, forçat libéré, et Barre-Carrosse, sur lesquels cet incident ramena le regard de la police. On croyait deviner que ces hommes étaient affiliés à Patron-Minette, dont on avait coffré deux chefs, Babet et Gueulemer. On supposa que dans les envois de Brujon, remis, non à des adresses de maisons, mais à des gens qui attendaient dans la rue, il devait y avoir des avis pour quelque méfait comploté. On avait d'autres indices encore; on mit la main sur les trois rôdeurs, et l'on crut avoir éventé la machination quelconque de Brujon.

Une semaine environ après ces mesures prises, une nuit, un surveillant de ronde, qui inspectait le dortoir d'en bas du Bâtiment-Neuf, au moment de mettre son marron dans la boîte à marrons, — c'est le moyen qu'on employait pour s'assurer que les surveillants faisaient exactement leur service; toutes les heures un marron devait tomber dans toutes les boîtes clouées aux portes des dortoirs; — un surveillant donc vit par le judas du dortoir Brujon sur son séant qui écrivait quelque chose dans son lit à la clarté de l'applique. Le gardien entra, on mit Brujon pour un mois au cachot, mais on ne put saisir ce qu'il avait écrit. La police n'en sut pas davantage.

Ce qui est certain, c'est que le lendemain «un postillon» fut lancé de la cour Charlemagne dans la fosse-aux-lions par-dessus le bâtiment à cinq étages qui séparait les deux cours.

Les détenus appellent postillon une boulette de pain artistement pétrie qu'on envoie en Irlande, c'est-à-dire par-dessus les toits d'une prison, d'une cour à l'autre. Étymologie: par-dessus l'Angleterre; d'une terre à l'autre; en Irlande. Cette boulette tombe dans la cour. Celui qui la ramasse l'ouvre et y trouve un billet adressé à quelque prisonnier de la cour. Si c'est un détenu qui fait la trouvaille, il remet le billet à sa destination; si c'est un gardien, ou l'un de ces prisonniers secrètement vendus qu'on appelle moutons dans les prisons et renards dans les bagnes, le billet est porté au greffe et livré à la police.

Cette fois, le postillon parvint à son adresse, quoique celui auquel le message était destiné fût en ce moment au séparé. Ce destinataire n'était rien moins que Babet, l'une des quatre têtes de Patron-Minette.

Le postillon contenait un papier roulé sur lequel il n'y avait que ces deux lignes:

— Babet. Il y a une affaire rue Plumet. Une grille sur un jardin.

C'était la chose que Brujon avait écrite dans la nuit.

En dépit des fouilleurs et des fouilleuses, Babet trouva moyen de faire passer le billet de la Force à la Salpêtrière à une «bonne amie» qu'il avait là, et qui y était enfermée. Cette fille à son tour transmit le billet à une autre qu'elle connaissait, une appelée Magnon, fort regardée par la police, mais pas encore arrêtée. Cette Magnon, dont le lecteur a déjà vu le nom, avait avec les Thénardier des relations qui seront précisées plus tard et pouvait, en allant voir Éponine, servir de pont entre la Salpêtrière et les Madelonnettes.

Il arriva justement qu'en ce moment-là même, les preuves manquant dans l'instruction dirigée contre Thénardier à l'endroit de ses filles, Éponine et Azelma furent relâchées.

Quand Éponine sortit, Magnon, qui la guettait à la porte des Madelonnettes, lui remit le billet de Brujon à Babet en la chargeant d'éclairer l'affaire.

Éponine alla rue Plumet, reconnut la grille et le jardin, observa la maison, épia, guetta, et, quelques jours après, porta à Magnon, qui demeurait rue Clocheperce, un biscuit que Magnon transmit à la maîtresse de Babet à la Salpêtrière. Un biscuit, dans le ténébreux symbolisme des prisons, signifie: rien à faire.

Si bien qu'en moins d'une semaine de là, Babet et Brujon se croisant dans le chemin de ronde de la Force, comme l'un allait «à l'instruction» et que l'autre en revenait: — Eh bien, demanda Brujon, la rue P? — Biscuit, répondit Babet.

Ainsi avorta ce foetus de crime enfanté par Brujon à la Force.

Cet avortement pourtant eut des suites, parfaitement étrangères au programme de Brujon. On les verra.

Souvent en croyant nouer un fil, on en lie un autre.

Chapitre III

Apparition au père Mabeuf

Marius n’allait plus chez personne, seulement il lui arrivait quelquefois de rencontrer le père Mabeuf.

Pendant que Marius descendait lentement ces degrés lugubres qu’on pourrait nommer l’escalier des caves et qui mènent dans les lieux sans lumière où l’on entend les heureux marcher au-dessus de soi, M. Mabeuf descendait de son côté.

La Flore de Cauteretz ne se vendait absolument plus. Les expériences sur l’indigo n’avaient point réussi dans le petit jardin d’Austerlitz qui était mal exposé. M. Mabeuf n’y pouvait cultiver que quelques plantes rares qui aiment l’humidité et l’ombre. Il ne se décourageait pourtant pas. Il avait obtenu un coin de terre au Jardin des plantes, en bonne exposition, pour y faire, «à ses frais», ses essais d’indigo. Pour cela il avait mis les cuivres de sa Flore au mont-de-piété. Il avait réduit son déjeuner à deux œufs, et il en laissait un à sa vieille servante dont il ne payait plus les gages depuis quinze mois. Et souvent son déjeuner était son seul repas. Il ne riait plus de son rire enfantin, il était devenu morose, et ne recevait plus de visites. Marius faisait bien de ne plus songer à venir. Quelquefois, à l’heure où M. Mabeuf allait au Jardin des plantes, le vieillard et le jeune homme se croisaient sur le boulevard de l’Hôpital. Ils ne parlaient pas et se faisaient un signe de tête tristement. Chose poignante, qu’il y ait un moment où la misère dénoue! On était deux amis, on est deux passants.

Le libraire Royol était mort. M. Mabeuf ne connaissait plus que ses livres, son jardin et son indigo; c’étaient les trois formes qu’avaient prises pour lui le bonheur, le plaisir et l’espérance. Cela lui suffisait pour vivre. Il se disait: — Quand j’aurai fait mes boules de bleu je serai riche, je retirerai mes cuivres du mont-de-piété, je remettrai ma Flore en vogue avec du charlatanisme, de la grosse caisse et des annonces dans les journaux, et j’achèterai, je sais bien où, un exemplaire de l’Art de naviguer de Pierre de Médine, avec bois, édition de 1559. — En attendant, il travaillait toute la journée à son carré d’indigo, et le soir il rentrait chez lui pour arroser son jardin, et lire ses livres. M. Mabeuf avait à cette époque fort près de quatre-vingts ans.

Un soir il eut une singulière apparition.

Il était rentré qu'il faisait grand jour encore. La mère Plutarque dont la santé se dérangeait était malade et couchée. Il avait dîné d'un os où il restait un peu de viande et d'un morceau de pain qu'il avait trouvé sur la table de cuisine, et s'était assis sur une borne de pierre renversée qui tenait lieu de banc dans son jardin.

Près de ce banc se dressait, à la mode des vieux jardins vergers, une espèce de grand bahut en solives et en planches fort délabré, clapier au rez-de-chaussée, fruitier au premier étage. Il n'y avait pas de lapins dans le clapier, mais il y avait quelques pommes dans le fruitier. Reste de la provision d'hiver.

M. Mabeuf s'était mis à feuilleter et à lire, à l'aide de ses lunettes, deux livres qui le passionnaient, et même, chose plus grave à son âge, le préoccupaient. Sa timidité naturelle le rendait propre à une certaine acceptation des superstitions. Le premier de ces livres était le fameux traité du président Delancre, De l'inconstance des démons, l'autre était l'in-quarto de Mutor de la Rubaudière. Sur les diables de Vauvert et les gobelins de la Bièvre. Ce dernier bouquin l'intéressait d'autant plus que son jardin avait été un des terrains anciennement hantés par les gobelins. Le crépuscule commençait à blanchir ce qui est en haut et à noircir ce qui est en bas. Tout en lisant, et par-dessus le livre qu'il tenait à la main, le père Mabeuf considérait ses plantes et entre autres un rhododendron magnifique qui était une de ses consolations; quatre jours de hâle, de vent et de soleil, sans une goutte de pluie, venaient de passer; les tiges se courbaient, les boutons penchaient, les feuilles tombaient, tout cela avait besoin d'être arrosé; le rhododendron surtout était triste. Le père Mabeuf était de ceux pour qui les plantes ont des âmes. Le vieillard avait travaillé toute la journée à son carré d'indigo, il était épuisé de fatigue, il se leva pourtant, posa ses livres sur le banc, et marcha tout courbé et à pas chancelants jusqu'au puits, mais quand il eut saisi la chaîne, il ne put même pas la tirer assez pour la décrocher. Alors il se retourna et leva un regard d'angoisse vers le ciel qui s'emplissait d'étoiles.

La soirée avait cette sérénité qui accable les douleurs de l'homme sous je ne sais quelle lugubre et éternelle joie. La nuit promettait d'être aussi aride que l'avait été le jour.

— Des étoiles partout! pensait le vieillard; pas la plus petite nuée! pas une larme d'eau!

Et sa tête, qui s’était soulevée un moment, retomba sur sa poitrine.

Il la releva et regarda encore le ciel en murmurant:

— Une larme de rosée! un peu de pitié!

Il essaya encore une fois de décrocher la chaîne du puits, et ne put.

En ce moment il entendit une voix qui disait:

— Père Mabeuf, voulez-vous que je vous arrose votre jardin?

En même temps un bruit de bête fauve qui passe se fit dans la haie, et il vit sortir de la broussaille une espèce de grande fille maigre qui se dressa devant lui en le regardant hardiment. Cela avait moins l’air d’un être humain que d’une forme qui venait d’éclore au crépuscule.

Avant que le père Mabeuf, qui s’effarait aisément et qui avait, comme nous avons dit, l’effroi facile, eût pu répondre une syllabe, cet être, dont les mouvements avaient dans l’obscurité une sorte de brusquerie bizarre, avait décroché la chaîne, plongé et retiré le seau, et rempli l’arrosoir, et le bonhomme voyait cette apparition qui avait les pieds nus et une jupe en guenilles courir dans les plates-bandes en distribuant la vie autour d’elle. Le bruit de l’arrosoir sur les feuilles remplissait l’âme du père Mabeuf de ravissement. Il lui semblait que maintenant le rhododendron était heureux.

Le premier seau vidé, la fille en tira un second, puis un troisième. Elle arrosa tout le jardin.

À la voir marcher ainsi dans les allées où sa silhouette apparaissait toute noire, agitant sur ses grands bras anguleux son fichu tout déchiqueté, elle avait je ne sais quoi d’une chauve-souris.

Quand elle eut fini, le père Mabeuf s’approcha les larmes aux yeux, et lui posa la main sur le front.

— Dieu vous bénira, dit-il, vous êtes un ange puisque vous avez soin des fleurs.

— Non, répondit-elle, je suis le diable, mais ça m’est égal.

Le vieillard s’écria, sans attendre et sans entendre sa réponse:

— Quel dommage que je sois si malheureux et si pauvre, et que je ne puisse rien faire pour vous!

— Vous pouvez quelque chose, dit-elle.

— Quoi?

— Me dire où demeure M. Marius.

Le vieillard ne comprit point.

— Quel monsieur Marius?

Il leva son regard vitreux et parut chercher quelque chose d’évanoui.

— Un jeune homme qui venait ici dans les temps.

Cependant M. Mabeuf avait fouillé dans sa mémoire.

— Ah! oui,... s’écria-t-il, je sais ce que vous voulez dire. Attendez donc! monsieur Marius... le baron Marius Pontmercy, parbleu! Il demeure... ou plutôt il ne demeure plus.... Ah bien, je ne sais pas.

Tout en parlant, il s’était courbé pour assujettir une branche du rhododendron, et il continuait:

— Tenez, je me souviens à présent. Il passe très souvent sur le boulevard et va du côté de la Glacière. Rue Croulebarbe. Le champ de l’Alouette. Allez par là. Il n’est pas difficile à rencontrer.

Quand M. Mabeuf se releva, il n’y avait plus personne, la fille avait disparu.

Il eut décidément un peu peur.

— Vrai, pensa-t-il, si mon jardin n’était pas arrosé, je croirais que c’est un esprit.

Une heure plus tard, quand il fut couché, cela lui revint, et, en s’endormant, à cet instant trouble où la pensée, pareille à cet oiseau fabuleux qui se change en poisson pour passer la mer, prend peu à peu la forme du songe pour traverser le sommeil, il se disait confusément:

— Au fait, cela ressemble beaucoup à ce que la Rubaudière raconte des gobelins. Serait-ce un gobelin?

Chapitre IV

Apparition à Marius

Quelques jours après cette visite d’un «esprit» au père Mabeuf, un matin, — c’était un lundi, le jour de la pièce de cent sous que Marius empruntait à Courfeyrac pour Thénardier, — Marius avait mis cette pièce de cent sous dans sa poche, et, avant de la porter au greffe, il était allé «se promener un peu», espérant qu’à son retour cela le ferait travailler. C’était d’ailleurs éternellement ainsi. Sitôt levé, il s’asseyait devant un livre et une feuille de papier pour bâcler quelque traduction; il avait à cette époque-là pour besogne la translation en français d’une célèbre querelle d’allemands, la controverse de Gans et de Savigny; il prenait Savigny, il prenait Gans, lisait quatre lignes, essayait d’en écrire une, ne pouvait, voyait une étoile entre son papier et lui, et se levait de sa chaise en disant: — Je vais sortir. Cela me mettra en train.

Et il allait au champ de l’Alouette.

Là il voyait plus que jamais l’étoile, et moins que jamais Savigny et Gans.

Il rentrait, essayait de reprendre son labeur, et n’y parvenait point; pas moyen de renouer un seul des fils cassés dans son cerveau; alors il disait: — Je ne sortirai pas demain. Cela m’empêche de travailler. — Et il sortait tous les jours.

Il habitait le champ de l’Alouette plus que le logis de Courfeyrac. Sa véritable adresse était celle-ci: boulevard de la Santé, au septième arbre après la rue Croulebarbe.

Ce matin-là, il avait quitté ce septième arbre, et s’était assis sur le parapet de la rivière des Gobelins. Un gai soleil pénétrait les feuilles fraîches épanouies et toutes lumineuses.

Il songeait à «Elle». Et sa songerie, devenant reproche, retombait sur lui; il pensait douloureusement à la paresse, paralysie de l’âme, qui le gagnait, et à cette nuit qui s’épaississait d’instant en instant devant lui au point qu’il ne voyait même déjà plus le soleil.

Cependant, à travers ce pénible dégagement d’idées indistinctes qui n’étaient pas même un monologue tant l’action s’affaiblissait en lui, et il n’avait plus même la force de vouloir se désoler, à travers cette absorption mélancolique, les sensations du dehors lui arrivaient. Il entendait derrière lui, au-dessous de lui, sur les deux bords de la rivière, les laveuses des Gobelins battre leur linge, et, au-dessus de sa tête, les oiseaux jaser et chanter dans les ormes. D'un côté le bruit de la liberté, de l'insouciance heureuse, du loisir qui a des ailes; de l'autre le bruit du travail. Chose qui le faisait rêver profondément, et presque réfléchir, c'étaient deux bruits joyeux.

Tout à coup, au milieu de son extase accablée, il entendit une voix connue qui disait:

— Tiens! le voilà!

Il leva les yeux, et reconnut cette malheureuse enfant qui était venue un matin chez lui, l'aînée des filles Thénardier, Éponine; il savait maintenant comment elle se nommait. Chose étrange, elle était appauvrie et embellie, deux pas qu'il ne semblait point qu'elle pût faire. Elle avait accompli un double progrès, vers la lumière et vers la détresse. Elle était pieds nus et en haillons comme le jour où elle était entrée si résolûment dans sa chambre, seulement ses haillons avaient deux mois de plus; les trous étaient plus larges, les guenilles plus sordides. C'était cette même voix enrouée, ce même front terni et ridé par le hâle, ce même regard libre, égaré et vacillant. Elle avait de plus qu'autrefois dans la physionomie ce je ne sais quoi d'effrayé et de lamentable que la prison traversée ajoute à la misère.

Elle avait des brins de paille et de foin dans les cheveux, non comme Ophélia pour être devenue folle à la contagion de la folie d'Hamlet, mais parce qu'elle avait couché dans quelque grenier d'écurie.

Et avec tout cela elle était belle. Quel astre vous êtes, ô jeunesse!

Cependant elle était arrêtée devant Marius avec un peu de joie sur son visage livide et quelque chose qui ressemblait à un sourire.

Elle fut quelques moments comme si elle ne pouvait parler.

— Je vous rencontre donc! dit-elle enfin. Le père Mabeuf avait raison, c'était sur ce boulevard-ci! Comme je vous ai cherché! si vous saviez! Savez-vous cela? j'ai été au bloc. Quinze jours! Ils m'ont lâchée! vu qu'il n'y avait rien sur moi et que d'ailleurs je n'avais pas l'âge du discernement. Il s'en fallait de deux mois. Oh! comme je vous ai cherché! Voilà six semaines. Vous ne demeurez donc plus là-bas?

— Non, dit Marius.

— Oh! je comprends. À cause de la chose. C'est désagréable ces esbroufes-là. Vous avez déménagé. Tiens! pourquoi donc portez-vous des vieux chapeaux comme ça? Un jeune homme comme vous, ça doit avoir de beaux habits. Savez-vous, monsieur Marius? le père Mabeuf vous appelle le baron Marius je ne sais plus quoi. Pas vrai que vous n’êtes pas baron? Les barons c’est des vieux, ça va au Luxembourg devant le château, où il y a le plus de soleil, ça lit la Quotidienne pour un sou. J’ai été une fois porter une lettre chez un baron qui était comme ça. Il avait plus de cent ans. Dites donc, où est-ce que vous demeurez à présent?

Marius ne répondit pas.

— Ah! continua-t-elle, vous avez un trou à votre chemise. Il faudra que je vous recouse cela.

Elle reprit avec une expression qui s’assombrissait peu à peu: Vous n’avez pas l’air content de me voir?

Marius se taisait; elle garda elle-même un instant le silence, puis s’écria:

— Si je voulais pourtant, je vous forcerais bien à avoir l’air content!

— Quoi? demanda Marius. Que voulez-vous dire?

— Ah! vous me disiez tu! reprit-elle.

— Eh bien, que veux-tu dire?

Elle se mordit la lèvre; elle semblait hésiter comme en proie à une sorte de combat intérieur. Enfin elle partit prendre son parti.

— Tant pis, c’est égal. Vous avez l’air triste, je veux que vous soyez content. Promettez-moi seulement que vous allez rire. Je veux vous voir rire et vous voir dire: Ah bien! c’est bon. Pauvre M. Marius! vous savez! vous m’avez promis que vous me donneriez tout ce que je voudrais....

— Oui! mais parle donc!

Elle regarda Marius dans le blanc des yeux et lui dit:

— J’ai l’adresse.

Marius pâlit. Tout son sang reflua à son cœur.

— Quelle adresse?

— L’adresse que vous m’avez demandée!

Elle ajouta comme si elle faisait effort:

— L’adresse... vous savez bien?

— Oui! bégaya Marius.

— De la demoiselle!

Ce mot prononcé, elle soupira profondément.

Marius sauta du parapet où il était assis et lui prit éperdument la main.

— Oh! eh bien! conduis-moi! dis-moi! demande-moi tout ce que tu voudras! Où est-ce?

— Venez avec moi, répondit-elle. Je ne sais pas bien la rue et le numéro; c’est tout de l’autre côté d’ici, mais je connais bien la maison, je vais vous conduire.

Elle retira sa main et reprit, d’un ton qui eût navré un observateur, mais qui n’effleura même pas Marius ivre et transporté:

— Oh! comme vous êtes content!

Un nuage passa sur le front de Marius. Il saisit Éponine par le bras.

— Jure-moi une chose!

— Jurer? dit-elle, qu’est-ce que cela veut dire? Tiens! vous voulez que je jure?

Et elle rit.

— Ton père! promets-moi, Éponine! jure-moi que tu ne diras pas cette adresse à ton père!

Elle se tourna vers lui d’un air stupéfait.

— Éponine! comment savez-vous que je m’appelle Éponine?

— Promets-moi ce que je te dis!

Mais elle semblait ne pas l’entendre.

— C’est gentil, ça! vous m’avez appelée Éponine! Marius lui prit les deux bras à la fois.

— Mais réponds-moi donc, au nom du ciel! fais attention à ce que je te dis, jure-moi que tu ne diras pas l’adresse que tu sais à ton père!

— Mon père? dit-elle. Ah oui, mon père! Soyez donc tranquille. Il est au secret. D’ailleurs est-ce que je m’occupe de mon père!

— Mais tu ne me promets pas! s’écria Marius.

— Mais lâchez-moi donc! dit-elle en éclatant de rire, comme vous me secouez! Si! si! je vous promets ça! je vous jure ça! qu’est-ce que cela me fait? je ne dirai pas l’adresse à mon père. Là! ça va-t-il? c’est-il ça?

— Ni à personne? fit Marius.

— Ni à personne.

— À présent, reprit Marius, conduis-moi.

— Tout de suite?

— Tout de suite.

— Venez. — Oh! comme il est content! dit-elle.

Après quelques pas, elle s’arrêta.

— Vous me suivez de trop près, monsieur Marius. Laissez-moi aller devant, et suivez-moi comme cela, sans faire semblant. Il ne faut pas qu’on voie un jeune homme bien, comme vous, avec une femme comme moi.

Aucune langue ne saurait dire tout ce qu’il y avait dans ce mot, femme, ainsi prononcé par cette enfant.

Elle fit une dizaine de pas, et s’arrêta encore; Marius la rejoignit. Elle lui adressa la parole de côté et sans se tourner vers lui:

— À propos, vous savez que vous m’avez promis quelque chose?

Marius fouilla dans sa poche. Il ne possédait au monde que les cinq francs destinés au père Thénardier. Il les prit, et les mit dans la main d’Éponine.

Elle ouvrit les doigts et laissa tomber la pièce à terre, et le regardant d’un air sombre:

— Je ne veux pas de votre argent, dit-elle.

Livre troisième — La maison de la rue Plumet

Chapitre I

La maison à secret

Vers le milieu du siècle dernier, un président à mortier au parlement de Paris ayant une maîtresse et s’en cachant, car à cette époque les grands seigneurs montraient leurs maîtresses et les bourgeois les cachaient, fit construire «une petite maison» faubourg Saint-Germain, dans la rue déserte de Blomet, qu’on nomme aujourd’hui rue Plumet, non loin de l’endroit qu’on appelait alors le Combat des Animaux.

Cette maison se composait d’un pavillon à un seul étage, deux salles au rez-de-chaussée, deux chambres au premier, en bas une cuisine, en haut un boudoir, sous le toit un grenier, le tout précédé d’un jardin avec large grille donnant sur la rue. Ce jardin avait environ un arpent. C’était là tout ce que les passants pouvaient entrevoir; mais en arrière du pavillon il y avait une cour étroite et au fond de la cour un logis bas de deux pièces sur cave, espèce d’en-cas destiné à dissimuler au besoin un enfant et une nourrice. Ce logis communiquait, par derrière, par une porte masquée et ouvrant à secret, avec un long couloir étroit, pavé, sinueux, à ciel ouvert, bordé de deux hautes murailles, lequel, caché avec un art prodigieux et comme perdu entre les clôtures des jardins et des cultures dont il suivait tous les angles et tous les détours, allait aboutir à une autre porte également à secret qui s’ouvrait à un demi-quart de lieue de là, presque dans un autre quartier, à l’extrémité solitaire de la rue de Babylone.

M. le président s’introduisait par là, si bien que ceux-là mêmes qui l’eussent épié et suivi et qui eussent observé que M. le président se rendait tous les jours mystérieusement quelque part, n’eussent pu se douter qu’aller rue de Babylone c’était aller rue Blomet. Grâce à d’habiles achats de terrains, l’ingénieux magistrat avait pu faire faire ce travail de voirie secrète chez lui, sur sa propre terre, et par conséquent sans contrôle. Plus tard il avait revendu par petites parcelles pour jardins et cultures les lots de terre riverains du corridor, et les propriétaires de ces lots de terre croyaient des deux côtés avoir devant les yeux un mur mitoyen, et ne soupçonnaient pas même l’existence de ce long ruban de pavé serpentant entre deux murailles parmi leurs plates-bandes et leurs vergers. Les oiseaux seuls voyaient cette curiosité. Il est probable que les fauvettes et les mésanges du siècle dernier avaient fort jasé sur le compte de M. le président.

Le pavillon, bâti en pierre dans le goût Mansart, lambrissé et meublé dans le goût Watteau, rocaille au dedans, perruque au dehors, muré d'une triple haie de fleurs, avait quelque chose de discret, de coquet et de solennel, comme il sied à un caprice de l'amour et de la magistrature.

Cette maison et ce couloir, qui ont disparu aujourd'hui, existaient encore il y a une quinzaine d'années. En 93, un chaudronnier avait acheté la maison pour la démolir, mais n'ayant pu en payer le prix, la nation le mit en faillite. De sorte que ce fut la maison qui démolit le chaudronnier. Depuis la maison resta inhabitée, et tomba lentement en ruine, comme toute demeure à laquelle la présence de l'homme ne communique plus la vie. Elle était restée meublée de ses vieux meubles et toujours à vendre ou à louer, et les dix ou douze personnes qui passent par an rue Plumet en étaient averties par un écriteau jaune et illisible accroché à la grille du jardin depuis 1810.

Vers la fin de la Restauration, ces mêmes passants purent remarquer que l'écriteau avait disparu, et que, même, les volets du premier étage étaient ouverts. La maison en effet était occupée. Les fenêtres avaient «des petits rideaux», signe qu'il y avait une femme.

Au mois d'octobre 1829, un homme d'un certain âge s'était présenté et avait loué la maison telle qu'elle était, y compris, bien entendu, l'arrière-corps de logis et le couloir qui allait aboutir à la rue de Babylone. Il avait fait rétablir les ouvertures à secret des deux portes de ce passage. La maison, nous venons de le dire, était encore à peu près meublée des vieux ameublements du président, le nouveau locataire avait ordonné quelques réparations, ajouté çà et là ce qui manquait, remis des pavés à la cour, des briques aux carrelages, des marches à l'escalier, des feuilles aux parquets et des vitres aux croisées, et enfin était venu s'installer avec une jeune fille et une servante âgée, sans bruit, plutôt comme quelqu'un qui se glisse que comme quelqu'un qui entre chez soi. Les voisins n'en jasèrent point, par la raison qu'il n'y avait pas de voisins.

Ce locataire peu à effet était Jean Valjean, la jeune fille était Cosette. La servante était une fille appelée Toussaint que Jean Valjean avait sauvée de l'hôpital et de la misère et qui était vieille, provinciale et bègue, trois qualités qui avaient déterminé Jean Valjean à la prendre avec lui. Il avait loué la maison sous le nom de M. Fauchelevent, rentier. Dans tout ce qui a été raconté plus haut, le lecteur a sans doute moins tardé encore que Thénardier à reconnaître Jean Valjean.

Pourquoi Jean Valjean avait-il quitté le couvent du Petit-Picpus? Que s’était-il passé?

Il ne s’était rien passé.

On s’en souvient. Jean Valjean était heureux dans le couvent, si heureux que sa conscience finit par s’inquiéter. Il voyait Cosette tous les jours, il sentait la paternité naître et se développer en lui de plus en plus, il couvait de l’âme cette enfant, il se disait qu’elle était à lui, que rien ne pouvait la lui enlever, que cela serait ainsi indéfiniment, que certainement elle se ferait religieuse, y étant chaque jour doucement provoquée, qu’ainsi le couvent était désormais l’univers pour elle comme pour lui, qu’il y vieillirait et qu’elle y grandirait, qu’elle y vieillirait et qu’il y mourrait, qu’enfin, ravissante espérance, aucune séparation n’était possible. En réfléchissant à ceci, il en vint à tomber dans des perplexités. Il s’interrogea. Il se demandait si tout ce bonheur-là était bien à lui, s’il ne se composait pas du bonheur d’un autre, du bonheur de cette enfant qu’il confisquait et qu’il dérobait, lui vieillard; si ce n’était point là un vol? Il se disait que cette enfant avait le droit de connaître la vie avant d’y renoncer, que lui retrancher, d’avance et en quelque sorte sans la consulter, toutes les joies sous prétexte de lui sauver toutes les épreuves, profiter de son ignorance et de son isolement pour lui faire germer une vocation artificielle, c’était dénaturer une créature humaine et mentir à Dieu. Et qui sait si, se rendant compte un jour de tout cela et religieuse à regret, Cosette n’en viendrait pas à le haïr? Dernière pensée, presque égoïste et moins héroïque que les autres, mais qui lui était insupportable. Il résolut de quitter le couvent.

Il le résolut, il reconnut avec désolation qu’il le fallait. Quant aux objections, il n’y en avait pas. Cinq ans de séjour entre ces quatre murs et de disparition avaient nécessairement détruit ou dispersé les éléments de crainte. Il pouvait rentrer parmi les hommes tranquillement. Il avait vieilli, et tout avait changé. Qui le reconnaîtrait maintenant? Et puis, à voir le pire, il n’y avait de danger que pour lui-même, et il n’avait pas le droit de condamner Cosette au cloître par la raison qu’il avait été condamné au bagne. D’ailleurs, qu’est-ce que le danger devant le devoir? Enfin, rien ne l’empêchait d’être prudent et de prendre ses précautions.

Quant à l’éducation de Cosette, elle était à peu près terminée et complète.

Une fois sa détermination arrêtée, il attendit l’occasion. Elle ne tarda pas à se présenter. Le vieux Fauchelevent mourut.

Jean Valjean demanda audience à la révérende prieure et lui dit qu’ayant fait à la mort de son frère un petit héritage qui lui permettait de vivre désormais sans travailler, il quittait le service du couvent, et emmenait sa fille; mais que, comme il n’était pas juste que Cosette, ne prononçant point ses vœux, eût été élevée gratuitement, il suppliait humblement la révérende prieure de trouver bon qu’il offrît à la communauté, comme indemnité des cinq années que Cosette y avait passées, une somme de cinq mille francs.

C’est ainsi que Jean Valjean sortit du couvent de l’Adoration Perpétuelle.

En quittant le couvent, il prit lui-même dans ses bras et ne voulut confier à aucun commissionnaire la petite valise dont il avait toujours la clef sur lui. Cette valise intriguait Cosette, à cause de l’odeur d’embaumement qui en sortait.

Disons tout de suite que désormais cette malle ne le quitta plus. Il l’avait toujours dans sa chambre. C’était la première et quelquefois l’unique chose qu’il emportait dans ses déménagements. Cosette en riait, et appelait cette valise l’inséparable, disant: J’en suis jalouse.

Jean Valjean du reste ne reparut pas à l’air libre sans une profonde anxiété.

Il découvrit la maison de la rue Plumet et s’y blottit. Il était désormais en possession du nom d’Ultime Fauchelevent.

En même temps il loua deux autres appartements dans Paris, afin de moins attirer l’attention que s’il fût toujours resté dans le même quartier, de pouvoir faire au besoin des absences à la moindre inquiétude qui le prendrait, et enfin de ne plus se trouver au dépourvu comme la nuit où il avait si miraculeusement échappé à Javert. Ces deux appartements étaient deux logis fort chétifs et d’apparence pauvre, dans deux quartiers très éloignés l’un de l’autre, l’un rue de l’Ouest, l’autre rue de l’Homme-Armé.

Il allait de temps en temps, tantôt rue de l’Homme-Armé, tantôt rue de l’Ouest, passer un mois ou six semaines avec Cosette sans emmener Toussaint. Il s’y faisait servir par les portiers et s’y donnait pour un rentier de la banlieue ayant un pied-à-terre en ville. Cette haute vertu avait trois domiciles dans Paris pour échapper à la police.

Chapitre II

Jean Valjean garde national

Du reste, à proprement parler, il vivait rue Plumet et il y avait arrangé son existence de la façon que voici:

Cosette avec la servante occupait le pavillon; elle avait la grande chambre à coucher aux trumeaux peints, le boudoir aux baguettes dorées, le salon du président meublé de tapisseries et de vastes fauteuils; elle avait le jardin. Jean Valjean avait fait mettre dans la chambre de Cosette un lit à baldaquin d’ancien damas à trois couleurs, et un vieux et beau tapis de Perse acheté rue du Figuier-Saint-Paul chez la mère Gaucher, et, pour corriger la sévérité de ces vieilleries magnifiques, il avait amalgamé à ce bric-à-brac tous les petits meubles gais et gracieux des jeunes filles, l’étagère, la bibliothèque et les livres dorés, la papeterie, le buvard, la table à ouvrage incrustée de nacre, le nécessaire de vermeil, la toilette en porcelaine du Japon. De longs rideaux de damas fond rouge à trois couleurs pareils au lit pendaient aux fenêtres du premier étage. Au rez-de-chaussée, des rideaux de tapisserie. Tout l’hiver la petite maison de Cosette était chauffée du haut en bas. Lui, il habitait l’espèce de loge de portier qui était dans la cour du fond avec un matelas sur un lit de sangle, une table de bois blanc, deux chaises de paille, un pot à l’eau de faïence, quelques bouquins sur une planche, sa chère valise dans un coin, jamais de feu. Il dînait avec Cosette, et il y avait un pain bis pour lui sur la table. Il avait dit à Toussaint lorsqu’elle était entrée: — C’est mademoiselle qui est la maîtresse de la maison. — Et vous, mo-onsieur? avait répliqué Toussaint stupéfaite. — Moi, je suis bien mieux que le maître, je suis le père.

Cosette au couvent avait été dressée au ménage et réglait la dépense qui était fort modeste. Tous les jours Jean Valjean prenait le bras de Cosette et la menait promener. Il la conduisait au Luxembourg, dans l’allée la moins fréquentée, et tous les dimanches à la messe, toujours à Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas, parce que c’était fort loin. Comme c’est un quartier très pauvre, il y faisait beaucoup l’aumône, et les malheureux l’entouraient dans l’église, ce qui lui avait valu l’épître des Thénardier: Au monsieur bienfaisant de l’église Saint-Jacques-du-Haut-Pas. Il menait volontiers Cosette visiter les indigents et les malades. Aucun étranger n’entrait dans la maison de la rue Plumet. Toussaint apportait les provisions, et Jean Valjean allait lui-même chercher l’eau à une prise d’eau qui était tout proche sur le boulevard. On mettait le bois et le vin dans une espèce de renfoncement demi-souterrain tapissé de rocailles qui avoisinait la porte de la rue de Babylone et qui autrefois avait servi de grotte à M. le président; car au temps des Folies et des Petites-Maisons, il n’y avait pas d’amour sans grotte.

Il y avait dans la porte bâtarde de la rue de Babylone une de ces boîtes tirelires destinées aux lettres et aux journaux; seulement, les trois habitants du pavillon de la rue Plumet ne recevant ni journaux ni lettres, toute l’utilité de la boîte, jadis entremetteuse d’amourettes et confidente d’un robin dameret, était maintenant limitée aux avis du percepteur des contributions et aux billets de garde. Car M. Fauchelevent, rentier, était de la garde nationale; il n’avait pu échapper aux mailles étroites du recensement de 1831. Les renseignements municipaux pris à cette époque étaient remontés jusqu’au couvent du Petit-Picpus, sorte de nuée impénétrable et sainte d’où Jean Valjean était sorti vénérable aux yeux de sa mairie, et, par conséquent, digne de monter sa garde.

Trois ou quatre fois l’an, Jean Valjean endossait son uniforme et faisait sa faction; très volontiers d’ailleurs; c’était pour lui un déguisement correct qui le mêlait à tout le monde en le laissant solitaire. Jean Valjean venait d’atteindre ses soixante ans, âge de l’exemption légale; mais il n’en paraissait pas plus de cinquante; d’ailleurs il n’avait aucune envie de se soustraire à son sergent-major et de chicaner le comte de Lobau; il n’avait pas d’état civil; il cachait son nom, il cachait son identité, il cachait son âge, il cachait tout; et, nous venons de le dire, c’était un garde national de bonne volonté. Ressembler au premier venu qui paye ses contributions, c’était là toute son ambition. Cet homme avait pour idéal, au dedans, l’ange, au dehors, le bourgeois.

Notons un détail pourtant. Quand Jean Valjean sortait avec Cosette, il s’habillait comme on l’a vu et avait assez l’air d’un ancien officier. Lorsqu’il sortait seul, et c’était le plus habituellement le soir, il était toujours vêtu d’une veste et d’un pantalon d’ouvrier, et coiffé d’une casquette qui lui cachait le visage. Était-ce précaution, ou humilité? Les deux à la fois. Cosette était accoutumée au côté énigmatique de sa destinée et remarquait à peine les singularités de son père. Quant à Toussaint, elle vénérait Jean Valjean, et trouvait bon tout ce qu’il faisait. — Un jour, son boucher, qui avait entrevu Jean Valjean, lui dit: C’est un drôle de corps. Elle répondit: C’est un-un saint.

Ni Jean Valjean, ni Cosette, ni Toussaint n’entraient et ne sortaient jamais que par la porte de la rue de Babylone. À moins de les apercevoir par la grille du jardin, il était difficile de deviner qu’ils demeuraient rue Plumet. Cette grille restait toujours fermée. Jean Valjean avait laissé le jardin inculte, afin qu’il n’attirât pas l’attention.

En cela il se trompait peut-être.

Chapitre III

Foliis ac frondibus

Ce jardin ainsi livré à lui-même depuis plus d’un demi-siècle était devenu extraordinaire et charmant. Les passant d’il y a quarante ans s’arrêtaient dans cette rue pour le contempler, sans se douter des secrets qu’il dérobait derrière ses épaisseurs fraîches et vertes. Plus d’un songeur à cette époque a laissé bien des fois ses yeux et sa pensée pénétrer indiscrètement à travers les barreaux de l’antique grille cadenassée, tordue, branlante, scellée à deux piliers verdis et moussus, bizarrement couronné d’un fronton d’arabesques indéchiffrables.

Il y avait un banc de pierre dans un coin, une ou deux statues moisies, quelques treillages décloués par le temps pourrissant sur le mur; du reste plus d’allées ni de gazon; du chiendent partout. Le jardinage était parti, et la nature était revenue. Les mauvaises herbes abondaient, aventure admirable pour un pauvre coin de terre. La fête des giroflées y était splendide. Rien dans ce jardin ne contrariait l’effort sacré des choses vers la vie; la croissance vénérable était là chez elle. Les arbres s’étaient baissés vers les ronces, les ronces étaient montées vers les arbres, la plante avait grimpé, la branche avait fléchi, ce qui rampe sur la terre avait été trouver ce qui s’épanouit dans l’air, ce qui flotte au vent s’était penché vers ce qui se traîne dans la mousse; troncs, rameaux, feuilles, fibres, touffes, vrilles, sarments, épines, s’étaient mêlés, traversés, mariés, confondus; la végétation, dans un embrassement étroit et profond, avait célébré et accompli là, sous l’œil satisfait du créateur, en cet enclos de trois cents pieds carrés, le saint mystère de sa fraternité, symbole de la fraternité humaine. Ce jardin n’était plus un jardin, c’était une broussaille colossale; c’est-à-dire quelque chose qui est impénétrable comme une forêt, peuplé comme une ville, frissonnant comme un nid, sombre comme une cathédrale, odorant comme un bouquet, solitaire comme une tombe, vivant comme une foule.

En floréal, cet énorme buisson, libre derrière sa grille et dans ses quatre murs, entrait en rut dans le sourd travail de la germination universelle, tressaillait au soleil levant presque comme une bête qui aspire les effluves de l’amour cosmique et qui sent la sève d’avril monter et bouillonner dans ses veines, et, secouant au vent sa prodigieuse chevelure verte, semait sur la terre humide, sur les statues frustes, sur le perron croulant du pavillon et jusque sur le pavé de la rue déserte, les fleurs en étoiles, la rosée en perles, la fécondité, la beauté, la vie, la joie, les parfums. À midi mille papillons blancs s'y réfugiaient, et c'était un spectacle divin de voir là tourbillonner en flocons dans l'ombre cette neige vivante de l'été. Là, dans ces gaies ténèbres de la verdure, une foule de voix innocentes parlaient doucement à l'âme, et ce que les gazouillements avaient oublié de dire, les bourdonnements le complétaient. Le soir une vapeur de rêverie se dégageait du jardin et l'enveloppait; un linceul de brume, une tristesse céleste et calme, le couvraient; l'odeur si enivrante des chèvrefeuilles et des liserons en sortait de toute part comme un poison exquis et subtil; on entendait les derniers appels des grimperaux et des bergeronnettes s'assoupissant sous les branchages; on y sentait cette intimité sacrée de l'oiseau et de l'arbre; le jour les ailes réjouissent les feuilles, la nuit les feuilles protègent les ailes.

L'hiver, la broussaille était noire, mouillée, hérissée, grelottante, et laissait un peu voir la maison. On apercevait, au lieu de fleurs dans les rameaux et de rosée dans les fleurs, les longs rubans d'argent des limaces sur le froid et épais tapis des feuilles jaunes; mais de toute façon, sous tout aspect, en toute saison, printemps, hiver, été, automne, ce petit enclos respirait la mélancolie, la contemplation, la solitude, la liberté, l'absence de l'homme, la présence de Dieu; et la vieille grille rouillée avait l'air de dire: ce jardin est à moi.

Le pavé de Paris avait beau être là tout autour, les hôtels classiques et splendides de la rue de Varenne à deux pas, le dôme des Invalides tout près, la Chambre des députés pas loin; les carrosses de la rue de Bourgogne et de la rue Saint-Dominique avaient beau rouler fastueusement dans le voisinage, les omnibus jaunes, bruns, blancs, rouges avaient beau se croiser dans le carrefour prochain, le désert était rue Plumet; et la mort des anciens propriétaires, une révolution qui avait passé, l'écroulement des antiques fortunes, l'absence, l'oubli, quarante ans d'abandon et de viduité, avaient suffi pour ramener dans ce lieu privilégié les fougères, les bouillons-blancs, les ciguës, les achillées, les digitales, les hautes herbes, les grandes plantes gaufrées aux larges feuilles de drap vert pâle, les lézards, les scarabées, les insectes inquiets et rapides; pour faire sortir des profondeurs de la terre et reparaître entre ces quatre murs je ne sais quelle grandeur sauvage et farouche; et pour que la nature, qui déconcerte les arrangements mesquins de l'homme et qui se répand toujours tout entière là où elle se répand, aussi bien dans la fourmi que dans l’aigle, en vînt à s’épanouir dans un méchant petit jardin parisien avec autant de rudesse et de majesté que dans une forêt vierge du Nouveau Monde.

Rien n’est petit en effet; quiconque est sujet aux pénétrations profondes de la nature, le sait. Bien qu’aucune satisfaction absolue ne soit donnée à la philosophie, pas plus de circonscrire la cause que de limiter l’effet, le contemplateur tombe dans des extases sans fond à cause de toutes ces décompositions de forces aboutissant à l’unité. Tout travaille à tout.

L’algèbre s’applique aux nuages; l’irradiation de l’astre profite à la rose; aucun penseur n’oserait dire que le parfum de l’aubépine est inutile aux constellations. Qui donc peut calculer le trajet d’une molécule? que savons-nous si des créations de mondes ne sont point déterminées par des chutes de grains de sable? qui donc connaît les flux et les reflux réciproques de l’infiniment grand et de l’infiniment petit, le retentissement des causes dans les précipices de l’être, et les avalanches de la création? Un ciron importe; le petit est grand, le grand est petit; tout est en équilibre dans la nécessité; effrayante vision pour l’esprit. Il y a entre les êtres et les choses des relations de prodige; dans cet inépuisable ensemble, de soleil à puceron, on ne se méprise pas; on a besoin les uns des autres. La lumière n’emporte pas dans l’azur les parfums terrestres sans savoir ce qu’elle en fait; la nuit fait des distributions d’essence stellaire aux fleurs endormies. Tous les oiseaux qui volent ont à la patte le fil de l’infini. La germination se complique de l’éclosion d’un météore et du coup de bec de l’hirondelle brisant l’œuf, et elle mène de front la naissance d’un ver de terre et l’avènement de Socrate. Où finit le télescope, le microscope commence. Lequel des deux a la vue la plus grande? Choisissez. Une moisissure est une pléiade de fleurs; une nébuleuse est une fourmilière d’étoiles. Même promiscuité, et plus inouïe encore, des choses de l’intelligence et des faits de la substance. Les éléments et les principes se mêlent, se combinent, s’épousent, se multiplient les uns par les autres, au point de faire aboutir le monde matériel et le monde moral à la même clarté. Le phénomène est en perpétuel repli sur lui-même. Dans les vastes échanges cosmiques, la vie universelle va et vient en quantités inconnues, roulant tout dans l’invisible mystère des effluves, employant tout, ne perdant pas un rêve de pas un sommeil, semant un animalcule ici, émiettant un astre là, oscillant et serpentant, faisant de la lumière une force et de la pensée un élément, disséminée et indivisible, dissolvant tout, excepté ce point géométrique, le moi; ramenant tout à l’âme atome; épanouissant tout en Dieu; enchevêtrant, depuis la plus haute jusqu’à la plus basse, toutes les activités dans l’obscurité d’un mécanisme vertigineux, rattachant le vol d’un insecte au mouvement de la terre, subordonnant, qui sait? ne fût-ce que par l’identité de la loi, l’évolution de la comète dans le firmament au tournoiement de l’infusoire dans la goutte d’eau. Machine faite d’esprit. Engrenage énorme dont le premier moteur est le moucheron et dont la dernière roue est le zodiaque.

Chapitre IV

Changement de grille

Il semblait que ce jardin, créé autrefois pour cacher les mystères libertins, se fût transformé et fût devenu propre à abriter les mystères chastes. Il n’avait plus ni berceaux, ni boulingrins, ni tonnelles, ni grottes; il avait une magnifique obscurité échevelée tombant comme un voile de toutes parts. Paphos s’était refait Éden. On ne sait quoi de repentant avait assaini cette retraite. Cette bouquetière offrait maintenant ses fleurs à l’âme. Ce coquet jardin, jadis fort compromis, était rentré dans la virginité et la pudeur. Un président assisté d’un jardinier, un bonhomme qui croyait continuer Lamoignon et un autre bonhomme qui croyait continuer Le Nôtre, l’avaient contourné, taillé, chiffonné, attifé, façonné pour la galanterie; la nature l’avait ressaisi, l’avait rempli d’ombre, et l’avait arrangé pour l’amour.

Il y avait aussi dans cette solitude un cœur qui était tout prêt. L’amour n’avait qu’à se montrer; il avait là un temple composé de verdures, d’herbe, de mousse, de soupirs d’oiseaux, de molles ténèbres, de branches agitées, et une âme faite de douceur, de foi, de candeur, d’espoir, d’aspiration et d’illusion.

Cosette était sortie du couvent encore presque enfant; elle avait un peu plus de quatorze ans, et elle était «dans l’âge ingrat»; nous l’avons dit, à part les yeux, elle semblait plutôt laide que jolie; elle n’avait cependant aucun trait disgracieux, mais elle était gauche, maigre, timide et hardie à la fois, une grande petite fille enfin.

Son éducation était terminée; C’est-à-dire on lui avait appris la religion, et même, et surtout la dévotion; puis «l’histoire», c’est-à-dire la chose qu’on appelle ainsi au couvent, la géographie, la grammaire, les participes, les rois de France, un peu de musique, à faire un nez, etc., mais du reste elle ignorait tout, ce qui est un charme et un péril. L’âme d’une jeune fille ne doit pas être laissée obscure; plus tard, il s’y fait des mirages trop brusques et trop vifs comme dans une chambre noire. Elle doit être doucement et discrètement éclairée, plutôt du reflet des réalités que de leur lumière directe et dure. Demi-jour utile et gracieusement austère qui dissipe les peurs puériles et empêche les chutes. Il n’y a que l’instinct maternel, intuition admirable où entrent les souvenirs de la vierge et l’expérience de la femme, qui sache comment et de quoi doit être fait ce demi-jour. Rien ne supplée à cet instinct. Pour former l'âme d'une jeune fille, toutes les religieuses du monde ne valent pas une mère.

Cosette n'avait pas eu de mère. Elle n'avait eu que beaucoup de mères au pluriel.

Quant à Jean Valjean, il y avait bien en lui toutes les tendresses à la fois, et toutes les sollicitudes; mais ce n'était qu'un vieux homme qui ne savait rien du tout.

Or, dans cette œuvre de l'éducation, dans cette grave affaire de la préparation d'une femme à la vie, que de science il faut pour lutter contre cette grande ignorance qu'on appelle l'innocence!

Rien ne prépare une jeune fille aux passions comme le couvent. Le couvent tourne la pensée du côté de l'inconnu. Le cœur, replié sur lui-même, se creuse, ne pouvant s'épancher, et s'approfondit, ne pouvant s'épanouir. De là des visions, des suppositions, des conjectures, des romans ébauchés, des aventures souhaitées, des constructions fantastiques, des édifices tout entiers bâtis dans l'obscurité intérieure de l'esprit, sombres et secrètes demeures où les passions trouvent tout de suite à se loger dès que la grille franchie leur permet d'entrer. Le couvent est une compression qui, pour triompher du cœur humain, doit durer toute la vie.

En quittant le couvent, Cosette ne pouvait rien trouver de plus doux et de plus dangereux que la maison de la rue Plumet. C'était la continuation de la solitude avec le commencement de la liberté; un jardin fermé, mais une nature âcre, riche, voluptueuse et odorante; les mêmes songes que dans le couvent, mais de jeunes hommes entrevus; une grille, mais sur la rue.

Cependant, nous le répétons, quand elle y arriva, elle n'était encore qu'un enfant. Jean Valjean lui livra ce jardin inculte. — Fais-y tout ce que tu voudras, lui disait-il. Cela amusait Cosette; elle en remuait toutes les touffes et toutes les pierres, elle y cherchait «des bêtes»; elle y jouait, en attendant qu'elle y rêvât; elle aimait ce jardin pour les insectes qu'elle y trouvait sous ses pieds à travers l'herbe, en attendant qu'elle l'aimât pour les étoiles qu'elle y verrait dans les branches au-dessus de sa tête.

Et puis, elle aimait son père, c'est-à-dire Jean Valjean, de toute son âme, avec une naïve passion filiale qui lui faisait du bonhomme un compagnon désiré et charmant. On se souvient que M. Madeleine lisait beaucoup, Jean Valjean avait continué; il en était venu à causer bien; il avait la richesse secrète et l'éloquence d'une intelligence humble et vraie qui s'est spontanément cultivée. Il lui était resté juste assez d’âpreté pour assaisonner sa bonté; c’était un esprit rude et un cœur doux. Au Luxembourg, dans leurs tête-à-tête, il faisait de longues explications de tout, puisant dans ce qu’il avait lu, puisant aussi dans ce qu’il avait souffert. Tout en l’écoutant, les yeux de Cosette erraient vaguement.

Cet homme simple suffisait à la pensée de Cosette, de même que ce jardin sauvage à ses yeux. Quand elle avait bien poursuivi les papillons, elle arrivait près de lui essoufflée et disait: Ah! comme j’ai couru! Il la baisait au front.

Cosette adorait le bonhomme. Elle était toujours sur ses talons. Là où était Jean Valjean était le bien-être. Comme Jean Valjean n’habitait ni le pavillon, ni le jardin, elle se plaisait mieux dans l’arrière-cour pavée que dans l’enclos plein de fleurs, et dans la petite loge meublée de chaises de paille que dans le grand salon tendu de tapisseries où s’adossaient des fauteuils capitonnés. Jean Valjean lui disait quelquefois, en souriant du bonheur d’être importuné: — Mais va-t’en chez toi! Laisse-moi donc un peu seul!

Elle lui faisait de ces charmantes gronderies tendres qui ont tant de grâce remontant de la fille au père:

— Père, j’ai très froid chez vous; pourquoi ne mettez-vous pas ici un tapis et un poêle?

— Chère enfant, il y a tant de gens qui valent mieux que moi et qui n’ont même pas un toit sur leur tête.

— Alors pourquoi y a-t-il du feu chez moi et tout ce qu’il faut?

— Parce que tu es une femme et un enfant.

— Bah! les hommes doivent donc avoir froid et être mal?

— Certains hommes.

— C’est bon, je viendrai si souvent ici que vous serez bien obligé d’y faire du feu.

Elle lui disait encore:

— Père, Pourquoi mangez-vous du vilain pain comme cela?

— Parce que..., ma fille.

— Eh bien, si vous en mangez, j’en mangerai.

Alors, pour que Cosette ne mangeât pas de pain noir, Jean Valjean mangeait du pain blanc.

Cosette ne se rappelait que confusément son enfance. Elle priait matin et soir pour sa mère qu’elle n’avait pas connue. Les Thénardier lui étaient restés comme deux figures hideuses à l'état de rêve. Elle se rappelait qu'elle avait été «un jour, la nuit» chercher de l'eau dans un bois. Elle croyait que c'était très loin de Paris. Il lui semblait qu'elle avait commencé à vivre dans un abîme et que c'était Jean Valjean qui l'en avait tirée. Son enfance lui faisait l'effet d'un temps où il n'y avait autour d'elle que des mille-pieds, des araignées, et des serpents. Quand elle songeait le soir avant de s'endormir, comme elle n'avait pas une idée très nette d'être la fille de Jean Valjean et qu'il fût son père, elle s'imaginait que l'âme de sa mère avait passé dans ce bonhomme et était venue demeurer auprès d'elle.

Lorsqu'il était assis, elle appuyait sa joue sur ses cheveux blancs et y laissait silencieusement tomber une larme en se disant: C'est peut-être ma mère, cet homme-là!

Cosette, quoique ceci soit étrange à énoncer, dans sa profonde ignorance de fille élevée au couvent, la maternité d'ailleurs étant absolument inintelligible à la virginité, avait fini par se figurer qu'elle avait eu aussi peu de mère que possible. Cette mère, elle ne savait pas même son nom. Toutes les fois qu'il lui arrivait de le demander à Jean Valjean, Jean Valjean se taisait. Si elle répétait sa question, il répondait par un sourire. Une fois elle insista; le sourire s'acheva par une larme.

Ce silence de Jean Valjean couvrait de nuit Fantine.

Etait-ce prudence? était-ce respect? était-ce crainte de livrer ce nom aux hasards d'une autre mémoire que la sienne?

Tant que Cosette avait été petite, Jean Valjean lui avait volontiers parlé de sa mère; quand elle fut jeune fille, cela lui fut impossible. Il lui sembla qu'il n'osait plus. Était-ce à cause de Cosette? était-ce à cause de Fantine? il éprouvait une sorte d'horreur religieuse à faire entrer cette ombre dans la pensée de Cosette, et à mettre la morte en tiers dans leur destinée. Plus cette ombre lui était sacrée, plus elle lui semblait redoutable. Il songeait à Fantine et se sentait accablé de silence. Il voyait vaguement dans les ténèbres quelque chose qui ressemblait à un doigt sur une bouche. Toute cette pudeur qui avait été dans Fantine et qui, pendant sa vie, était sortie d'elle violemment, était-elle revenue après sa mort se poser sur elle, veiller, indignée, sur la paix de cette morte, et, farouche, la garder dans sa tombe? Jean Valjean, à son insu, en subissait-il la pression? Nous qui croyons en la mort, nous ne sommes pas de ceux qui rejetteraient cette explication mystérieuse. De là l'impossibilité de prononcer, même pour Cosette, ce nom: Fantine.

Un jour Cosette lui dit:

— Père, j’ai vu cette nuit ma mère en songe. Elle avait deux grandes ailes. Ma mère dans sa vie doit avoir touché à la sainteté.

— Par le martyre, répondit Jean Valjean.

Du reste, Jean Valjean était heureux.

Quand Cosette sortait avec lui, elle s’appuyait sur son bras, fière, heureuse, dans la plénitude du cœur. Jean Valjean, à toutes ces marques d’une tendresse si exclusive et si satisfaite de lui seul, sentait sa pensée se fondre en délices. Le pauvre homme tressaillait inondé d’une joie angélique; il s’affirmait avec transport que cela durerait toute la vie; il se disait qu’il n’avait vraiment pas assez souffert pour mériter un si radieux bonheur, et il remerciait Dieu, dans les profondeurs de son âme, d’avoir permis qu’il fût ainsi aimé, lui misérable, par cet être innocent.

Chapitre V

La rose s’aperçoit qu’elle est une machine de guerre

Un jour Cosette se regarda par hasard dans son miroir et se dit: Tiens! Il lui semblait presque qu’elle était jolie. Ceci la jeta dans un trouble singulier. Jusqu’à ce moment elle n’avait point songé à sa figure. Elle se voyait dans son miroir, mais elle ne s’y regardait pas. Et puis, on lui avait souvent dit qu’elle était laide; Jean Valjean seul disait doucement: Mais non! mais non! Quoi qu’il en fût, Cosette s’était toujours crue laide, et avait grandi dans cette idée avec la résignation facile de l’enfance. Voici que tout d’un coup son miroir lui disait comme Jean Valjean: Mais non! Elle ne dormit pas de la nuit. — Si j’étais jolie? pensait-elle, comme cela serait drôle que je fusse jolie! — Et elle se rappelait celles de ses compagnes dont la beauté faisait effet dans le couvent, et elle se disait: Comment! je serais comme mademoiselle une telle!

Le lendemain elle se regarda, mais non par hasard, et elle douta: — Où avais-je l’esprit? dit-elle, non, je suis laide. — Elle avait tout simplement mal dormi, elle avait les yeux battus et elle était pâle. Elle ne s’était pas sentie très joyeuse la veille de croire à sa beauté, mais elle fut triste de n’y plus croire. Elle ne se regarda plus, et pendant plus de quinze jours elle tâcha de se coiffer tournant le dos au miroir.

Le soir, après le dîner, elle faisait assez habituellement de la tapisserie dans le salon, ou quelque ouvrage de couvent, et Jean Valjean lisait à côté d’elle. Une fois elle leva les yeux de son ouvrage et elle fut toute surprise de la façon inquiète dont son père la regardait.

Une autre fois, elle passait dans la rue, et il lui sembla que quelqu’un qu’elle ne vit pas disait derrière elle: Jolie femme! mais mal mise. — Bah! pensa-t-elle, ce n’est pas moi. Je suis bien mise et laide. — Elle avait alors son chapeau de peluche et sa robe de mérinos.

Un jour enfin, elle était dans le jardin, et elle entendit la pauvre vieille Toussaint qui disait: Monsieur, remarquez-vous comme mademoiselle devient jolie? Cosette n’entendit pas ce que son père répondit, les paroles de Toussaint furent pour elle une sorte de commotion. Elle s’échappa du jardin, monta à sa chambre, courut à la glace, il y avait trois mois qu’elle ne s’était regardée, et poussa un cri. Elle venait de s’éblouir elle-même.

Elle était belle et jolie; elle ne pouvait s’empêcher d’être de l’avis de Toussaint et de son miroir. Sa taille s’était faite, sa peau avait blanchi, ses cheveux s’étaient lustrés, une splendeur inconnue s’était allumée dans ses prunelles bleues. La conscience de sa beauté lui vint tout entière, en une minute, comme un grand jour qui se fait; les autres la remarquaient d’ailleurs, Toussaint le disait, c’était d’elle évidemment que le passant avait parlé, il n’y avait plus à douter; elle redescendit au jardin, se croyant reine, entendant les oiseaux chanter, c’était en hiver, voyant le ciel doré, le soleil dans les arbres, des fleurs dans les buissons, éperdue, folle, dans un ravissement inexprimable.

De son côté, Jean Valjean éprouvait un profond et indéfinissable serrement de cœur.

C’est qu’en effet, depuis quelque temps, il contemplait avec terreur cette beauté qui apparaissait chaque jour plus rayonnante sur le doux visage de Cosette. Aube riante pour tous, lugubre pour lui.

Cosette avait été belle assez longtemps avant de s’en apercevoir. Mais, du premier jour, cette lumière inattendue qui se levait lentement et enveloppait par degrés toute la personne de la jeune fille blessa la paupière sombre de Jean Valjean. Il sentit que c’était un changement dans une vie heureuse, si heureuse qu’il n’osait y remuer dans la crainte d’y déranger quelque chose. Cet homme qui avait passé par toutes les détresses, qui était encore tout saignant des meurtrissures de sa destinée, qui avait été presque méchant et qui était devenu presque saint, qui, après avoir traîné la chaîne du bagne, traînait maintenant la chaîne invisible, mais pesante, de l’infamie indéfinie, cet homme que la loi n’avait pas lâché et qui pouvait être à chaque instant ressaisi et ramené de l’obscurité de sa vertu au grand jour de l’opprobre public, cet homme acceptait tout, excusait tout, pardonnait tout, bénissait tout, voulait bien tout, et ne demandait à la providence, aux hommes, aux lois, à la société, à la nature, au monde, qu’une chose, que Cosette l’aimât!

Que Cosette continuât de l’aimer! que Dieu n’empêchât pas le cœur de cette enfant de venir à lui, et de rester à lui! Aimé de Cosette, il se trouvait guéri, reposé, apaisé, comblé, récompensé, couronné. Aimé de Cosette, il était bien! il n’en demandait pas davantage. On lui eût dit: Veux-tu être mieux? il eût répondu: Non. Dieu lui eût dit: Veux-tu le ciel? il eût répondu: J’y perdrais.

Tout ce qui pouvait effleurer cette situation, ne fût-ce qu'à la surface, le faisait frémir comme le commencement d'autre chose. Il n'avait jamais trop su ce que c'était que la beauté d'une femme; mais, par instinct, il comprenait que c'était terrible.

Cette beauté qui s'épanouissait de plus en plus triomphante et superbe à côté de lui, sous ses yeux, sur le front ingénu et redoutable de l'enfant, du fond de sa laideur, de sa vieillesse, de sa misère, de sa réprobation, de son accablement, il la regardait effaré.

Il se disait: Comme elle est belle! Qu'est-ce que je vais devenir, moi?

Là du reste était la différence entre sa tendresse et la tendresse d'une mère. Ce qu'il voyait avec angoisse, une mère l'eût vu avec joie.

Les premiers symptômes ne tardèrent pas à se manifester.

Dès le lendemain du jour où elle s'était dit: Décidément, je suis belle! Cosette fit attention à sa toilette. Elle se rappela le mot du passant: — Jolie, mais mal mise, — souffle d'oracle qui avait passé à côté d'elle et s'était évanoui après avoir déposé dans son cœur un des deux germes qui doivent plus tard emplir toute la vie de la femme, la coquetterie. L'amour est l'autre.

Avec la foi en sa beauté, toute l'âme féminine s'épanouit en elle. Elle eut horreur du mérinos et honte de la peluche. Son père ne lui avait jamais rien refusé. Elle sut tout de suite toute la science du chapeau, de la robe, du mantelet, du brodequin, de la manchette, de l'étoffe qui va, de la couleur qui sied, cette science qui fait de la femme parisienne quelque chose de si charmant, de si profond et de si dangereux. Le mot femme capiteuse a été inventé pour la Parisienne.

En moins d'un mois la petite Cosette fut dans cette thébaïde de la rue de Babylone une des femmes, non seulement les plus jolies, ce qui est quelque chose, mais «les mieux mises» de Paris, ce qui est bien davantage. Elle eût voulu rencontrer «son passant» pour voir ce qu'il dirait, et «pour lui apprendre!» Le fait est qu'elle était ravissante de tout point, et qu'elle distinguait à merveille un chapeau de Gérard d'un chapeau d'Herbaut.

Jean Valjean considérait ces ravages avec anxiété. Lui qui sentait qu'il ne pourrait jamais que ramper, marcher tout au plus, il voyait des ailes venir à Cosette.

Du reste, rien qu'à la simple inspection de la toilette de Cosette, une femme eût reconnu qu'elle n'avait pas de mère. Certaines petites bienséances, certaines conventions spéciales, n'étaient point observées par

Cosette. Une mère, par exemple, lui eût dit qu'une jeune fille ne s'habille point en damas.

Le premier jour que Cosette sortit avec sa robe et son camail de damas noir et son chapeau de crêpe blanc, elle vint prendre le bras de Jean Valjean, gaie, radieuse, rose, fière, éclatante. — Père, dit-elle, comment me trouvez-vous ainsi? Jean Valjean répondit d'une voix qui ressemblait à la voix amère d'un envieux: — Charmante! — Il fut dans la promenade comme à l'ordinaire. En rentrant il demanda à Cosette:

— Est-ce que tu ne remettras plus ta robe et ton chapeau, tu sais?

Ceci se passait dans la chambre de Cosette. Cosette se tourna vers le porte-manteau de la garde-robe où sa défroque de pensionnaire était accrochée.

— Ce déguisement! dit-elle. Père, que voulez-vous que j'en fasse? Oh! par exemple, non, je ne remettrai jamais ces horreurs. Avec ce machin-là sur la tête, j'ai l'air de madame Chien-fou.

Jean Valjean soupira profondément.

À partir de ce moment, il remarqua que Cosette, qui autrefois demandait toujours à rester, disant: Père, je m'amuse mieux ici avec vous, — demandait maintenant toujours à sortir. En effet, à quoi bon avoir une jolie figure et une délicieuse toilette, si on ne les montre pas?

Il remarqua aussi que Cosette n'avait plus le même goût pour l'arrière-cour. À présent, elle se tenait plus volontiers au jardin, se promenant sans déplaisir devant la grille. Jean Valjean, farouche, ne mettait pas les pieds dans le jardin. Il restait dans son arrière-cour, comme le chien.

Cosette, à se savoir belle, perdit la grâce de l'ignorer; grâce exquise, car la beauté rehaussée de naïveté est ineffable, et rien n'est adorable comme une innocente éblouissante qui marche tenant en main, sans le savoir, la clef d'un paradis. Mais ce qu'elle perdit en grâce ingénue, elle le regagna en charme pensif et sérieux. Toute sa personne, pénétrée des joies de la jeunesse, de l'innocence et de la beauté, respirait une mélancolie splendide.

Ce fut à cette époque que Marius, après six mois écoulés, la revit au Luxembourg.

Chapitre VI

La bataille commence

Cosette était dans son ombre, comme Marius dans la sienne, toute disposée pour l'embrasement. La destinée, avec sa patience mystérieuse et fatale, approchait lentement l'un de l'autre ces deux êtres tout chargés et tout languissants des orageuses électricités de la passion, ces deux âmes qui portaient l'amour comme deux nuages portent la foudre, et qui devaient s'aborder et se mêler dans un regard comme les nuages dans un éclair.

On a tant abusé du regard dans les romans d'amour qu'on a fini par le déconsidérer. C'est à peine si l'on ose dire maintenant que deux êtres se sont aimés parce qu'ils se sont regardés. C'est pourtant comme cela qu'on s'aime et uniquement comme cela. Le reste n'est que le reste, et vient après. Rien n'est plus réel que ces grandes secousses que deux âmes se donnent en échangeant cette étincelle.

À cette certaine heure où Cosette eut sans le savoir ce regard qui troubla Marius, Marius ne se douta pas que lui aussi eut un regard qui troubla Cosette.

Il lui fit le même mal et le même bien.

Depuis longtemps déjà elle le voyait et elle l'examinait comme les filles examinent et voient, en regardant ailleurs. Marius trouvait encore Cosette laide que déjà Cosette trouvait Marius beau. Mais comme il ne prenait point garde à elle, ce jeune homme lui était bien égal.

Cependant elle ne pouvait s'empêcher de se dire qu'il avait de beaux cheveux, de beaux yeux, de belles dents, un charmant son de voix quand elle l'entendait causer avec ses camarades, qu'il marchait en se tenant mal, si l'on veut, mais avec une grâce à lui, qu'il ne paraissait pas bête du tout, que toute sa personne était noble, douce, simple et fière, et qu'enfin il avait l'air pauvre, mais qu'il avait bon air.

Le jour où leurs yeux se rencontrèrent et se dirent enfin brusquement ces premières choses obscures et ineffables que le regard balbutie, Cosette ne comprit pas d'abord. Elle rentra pensive à la maison de la rue de l'Ouest où Jean Valjean, selon son habitude, était venu passer six semaines. Le lendemain, en s'éveillant, elle songea à ce jeune homme inconnu, si longtemps indifférent et glacé, qui semblait maintenant faire attention à elle, et il ne lui sembla pas le moins du monde que cette attention lui fût agréable. Elle avait plutôt un peu de colère contre ce beau dédaigneux. Un fond de guerre remua en elle. Il lui sembla, et elle en éprouvait une joie encore tout enfantine, qu'elle allait enfin se venger.

Se sachant belle, elle sentait bien, quoique d'une façon indistincte, qu'elle avait une arme. Les femmes jouent avec leur beauté comme les enfants avec leur couteau. Elles s'y blessent.

On se rappelle les hésitations de Marius, ses palpitations, ses terreurs. Il restait sur son banc et n'approchait pas. Ce qui dépitait Cosette. Un jour elle dit à Jean Valjean: — Père, promenons-nous donc un peu de ce côté-là. — Voyant que Marius ne venait point à elle, elle alla à lui. En pareil cas, toute femme ressemble à Mahomet. Et puis, chose bizarre, le premier symptôme de l'amour vrai chez un jeune homme, c'est la timidité, chez une jeune fille, c'est la hardiesse. Ceci étonne, et rien n'est plus simple pourtant. Ce sont les deux sexes qui tendent à se rapprocher et qui prennent les qualités l'un de l'autre.

Ce jour-là, le regard de Cosette rendit Marius fou, le regard de Marius rendit Cosette tremblante. Marius s'en alla confiant, et Cosette inquiète. À partir de ce jour, ils s'adorèrent.

La première chose que Cosette éprouva, ce fut une tristesse confuse et profonde. Il lui sembla que, du jour au lendemain, son âme était devenue noire. Elle ne la reconnaissait plus. La blancheur de l'âme des jeunes filles, qui se compose de froideur et de gaîté, ressemble à la neige. Elle fond à l'amour qui est son soleil.

Cosette ne savait pas ce que c'était que l'amour. Elle n'avait jamais entendu prononcer ce mot dans le sens terrestre. Sur les livres de musique profane qui entraient dans le couvent, amour était remplacé par tambour ou pandour. Cela faisait des énigmes qui exerçaient l'imagination des grandes comme: Ah! que le tambour est agréable! ou: La pitié n'est pas un pandour! Mais Cosette était sortie encore trop jeune pour s'être beaucoup préoccupée du «tambour». Elle n'eût donc su quel nom donner à ce qu'elle éprouvait maintenant. Est-on moins malade pour ignorer le nom de sa maladie?

Elle aimait avec d'autant plus de passion qu'elle aimait avec ignorance. Elle ne savait pas si cela est bon ou mauvais, utile ou dangereux, nécessaire ou mortel, éternel ou passager, permis ou prohibé; elle aimait. On l'eût bien étonnée si on lui eût dit: Vous ne dormez pas? mais c'est défendu! Vous ne mangez pas? mais c’est fort mal! Vous avez des oppressions et des battements de cœur? mais cela ne se fait pas! Vous rougissez et vous pâlissez quand un certain être vêtu de noir paraît au bout d’une certaine allée verte? mais c’est abominable! Elle n’eût pas compris, et elle eût répondu: Comment peut-il y avoir de ma faute dans une chose où je ne puis rien et où je ne sais rien?

Il se trouva que l’amour qui se présenta était précisément celui qui convenait le mieux à l’état de son âme. C’était une sorte d’adoration à distance, une contemplation muette, la déification d’un inconnu. C’était l’apparition de l’adolescence à l’adolescence, le rêve des nuits devenu roman et resté rêve, le fantôme souhaité enfin réalisé et fait chair, mais n’ayant pas encore de nom, ni de tort, ni de tache, ni d’exigence, ni de défaut; en un mot, l’amant lointain et demeuré dans l’idéal, une chimère ayant une forme. Toute rencontre plus palpable et plus proche eût à cette première époque effarouché Cosette, encore à demi plongée dans la brume grossissante du cloître. Elle avait toutes les peurs des enfants et toutes les peurs des religieuses, mêlées. L’esprit du couvent, dont elle s’était pénétrée pendant cinq ans, s’évaporait encore lentement de toute sa personne et faisait tout trembler autour d’elle. Dans cette situation, ce n’était pas un amant qu’il lui fallait, ce n’était pas même un amoureux, c’était une vision. Elle se mit à adorer Marius comme quelque chose de charmant, de lumineux et d’impossible.

Comme l’extrême naïveté touche à l’extrême coquetterie, elle lui souriait, tout franchement.

Elle attendait tous les jours l’heure de la promenade avec impatience, elle y trouvait Marius, se sentait indiciblement heureuse, et croyait sincèrement exprimer toute sa pensée en disant à Jean Valjean: — Quel délicieux jardin que ce Luxembourg!

Marius et Cosette étaient dans la nuit l’un pour l’autre. Ils ne se parlaient pas, ils ne se saluaient pas, ils ne se connaissaient pas; ils se voyaient; et comme les astres dans le ciel que des millions de lieues séparent, ils vivaient de se regarder.

C’est ainsi que Cosette devenait peu à peu une femme et se développait, belle et amoureuse, avec la conscience de sa beauté et l’ignorance de son amour. Coquette par-dessus le marché, par innocence.

Chapitre VII

À tristesse, tristesse et demie

Toutes les situations ont leurs instincts. La vieille et éternelle mère nature avertissait sourdement Jean Valjean de la présence de Marius. Jean Valjean tressaillait dans le plus obscur de sa pensée. Jean Valjean ne voyait rien, ne savait rien, et considérait pourtant avec une attention opiniâtre les ténèbres où il était, comme s'il sentait d'un côté quelque chose qui se construisait, et de l'autre quelque chose qui s'écroulait. Marius, averti aussi, et, ce qui est la profonde loi du bon Dieu, par cette même mère nature, faisait tout ce qu'il pouvait pour se dérober au «père». Il arrivait cependant que Jean Valjean l'apercevait quelquefois. Les allures de Marius n'étaient plus du tout naturelles. Il avait des prudences louches et des témérités gauches. Il ne venait plus tout près comme autrefois; il s'asseyait loin et restait en extase; il avait un livre et faisait semblant de lire; pourquoi faisait-il semblant? Autrefois il venait avec son vieux habit, maintenant il avait tous les jours son habit neuf; il n'était pas bien sûr qu'il ne se fît point friser, il avait des yeux tout drôles, il mettait des gants; bref, Jean Valjean détestait cordialement ce jeune homme.

Cosette ne laissait rien deviner. Sans savoir au juste ce qu'elle avait, elle avait bien le sentiment que c'était quelque chose et qu'il fallait le cacher.

Il y avait entre le goût de toilette qui était venu à Cosette et l'habitude d'habits neufs qui était poussée à cet inconnu un parallélisme importun à Jean Valjean. C'était un hasard peut-être, sans doute, à coup sûr, mais un hasard menaçant.

Jamais il n'ouvrait la bouche à Cosette de cet inconnu.

Un jour cependant, il ne put s'en tenir, et avec ce vague désespoir qui jette brusquement la sonde dans son malheur, il lui dit: — Que voilà un jeune homme qui a l'air pédant!

Cosette, l'année d'auparavant, petite fille indifférente, eût répondu: — Mais non, il est charmant. Dix ans plus tard, avec l'amour de Marius au cœur, elle eût répondu: — Pédant et insupportable à voir! vous avez bien raison! — Au moment de la vie et du cœur où elle était, elle se borna à répondre avec un calme suprême:

— Ce jeune homme-là!

Comme si elle le regardait pour la première fois de sa vie.

— Que je suis stupide! pensa Jean Valjean. Elle ne l’avait pas encore remarqué. C’est moi qui le lui montre.

Ô simplicité des vieux! profondeur des enfants!

C’est encore une loi de ces fraîches années de souffrance et de souci, de ces vives luttes du premier amour contre les premiers obstacles, la jeune fille ne se laisse prendre à aucun piège, le jeune homme tombe dans tous. Jean Valjean avait commencé contre Marius une sourde guerre que Marius, avec la bêtise sublime de sa passion et de son âge, ne devina point. Jean Valjean lui tendit une foule d’embûches; il changea d’heures, il changea de banc, il oublia son mouchoir, il vint seul au Luxembourg; Marius donna tête baissée dans tous les panneaux; et à tous ces points d’interrogation plantés sur sa route par Jean Valjean, il répondit ingénument oui. Cependant Cosette restait murée dans son insouciance apparente et dans sa tranquillité imperturbable, si bien que Jean Valjean arriva à cette conclusion: Ce dadais est amoureux fou de Cosette, mais Cosette ne sait seulement pas qu’il existe.

Il n’en avait pas moins dans le cœur un tremblement douloureux. La minute où Cosette aimerait pouvait sonner d’un instant à l’autre. Tout ne commence-t-il pas par l’indifférence?

Une seule fois Cosette fit une faute et l’effraya. Il se levait du banc pour partir après trois heures de station, elle dit: — Déjà!

Jean Valjean n’avait pas discontinué les promenades au Luxembourg, ne voulant rien faire de singulier et par-dessus tout redoutant de donner l’éveil à Cosette; mais pendant ces heures si douces pour les deux amoureux, tandis que Cosette envoyait son sourire à Marius enivré qui ne s’apercevait que de cela et maintenant ne voyait plus rien dans ce monde qu’un radieux visage adoré, Jean Valjean fixait sur Marius des yeux étincelants et terribles. Lui qui avait fini par ne plus se croire capable d’un sentiment malveillant, il y avait des instants où, quand Marius était là, il croyait redevenir sauvage et féroce, et il sentait se rouvrir et se soulever contre ce jeune homme ces vieilles profondeurs de son âme où il y avait eu jadis tant de colère. Il lui semblait presque qu’il se reformait en lui des cratères inconnus.

Quoi! il était là, cet être! que venait-il faire? il venait tourner, flairer, examiner, essayer! il venait dire: hein? pourquoi pas? il venait rôder autour de sa vie, à lui Jean Valjean! rôder autour de son bonheur, pour le prendre et l’emporter!

Jean Valjean ajoutait: — Oui, c'est cela! que vient-il chercher? une aventure! que veut-il? une amourette! Une amourette! et moi! Quoi! j'aurai été d'abord le plus misérable des hommes, et puis le plus malheureux, j'aurai fait soixante ans de la vie sur les genoux, j'aurai souffert tout ce qu'on peut souffrir, j'aurai vieilli sans avoir été jeune, j'aurai vécu sans famille, sans parents, sans amis, sans femme, sans enfants, j'aurai laissé de mon sang sur toutes les pierres, sur toutes les ronces, à toutes les bornes, le long de tous les murs, j'aurai été doux quoiqu'on fût dur pour moi et bon quoiqu'on fût méchant, je serai redevenu honnête homme malgré tout, je me serai repenti du mal que j'ai fait et j'aurai pardonné le mal qu'on m'a fait, et au moment où je suis récompensé, au moment où c'est fini, au moment où je touche au but, au moment où j'ai ce que je veux, c'est bon, c'est bien, je l'ai payé, je l'ai gagné, tout cela s'en ira, tout cela s'évanouira, et je perdrai Cosette, et je perdrai ma vie, ma joie, mon âme, parce qu'il aura plu à un grand niais de venir flâner au Luxembourg!

Alors ses prunelles s'emplissaient d'une clarté lugubre et extraordinaire. Ce n'était plus un homme qui regarde un homme; ce n'était pas un ennemi qui regarde un ennemi. C'était un dogue qui regarde un voleur.

On sait le reste. Marius continua d'être insensé. Un jour il suivit Cosette rue de l'Ouest, un autre jour il parla au portier. Le portier de son côté parla, et dit à Jean Valjean: — Monsieur, qu'est-ce que c'est donc qu'un jeune homme curieux qui vous a demandé? — Le lendemain Jean Valjean jeta à Marius ce coup d'œil dont Marius s'aperçut enfin. Huit jours après, Jean Valjean avait déménagé. Il se jura qu'il ne remettrait plus les pieds ni au Luxembourg, ni rue de l'Ouest. Il retourna rue Plumet.

Cosette ne se plaignit pas, elle ne dit rien, elle ne fit pas de questions, elle ne chercha à savoir aucun pourquoi; elle en était déjà à la période où l'on craint d'être pénétré et de se trahir. Jean Valjean n'avait aucune expérience de ces misères, les seules qui soient charmantes et les seules qu'il ne connût pas; cela fit qu'il ne comprit point la grave signification du silence de Cosette. Seulement il remarqua qu'elle était devenue triste, et il devint sombre. C'était de part et d'autre des inexpériences aux prises.

Une fois il fit un essai. Il demanda à Cosette:

— Veux-tu venir au Luxembourg?

Un rayon illumina le visage pâle de Cosette.

— Oui, dit-elle.

Ils y allèrent. Trois mois s'étaient écoulés. Marius n'y allait plus. Marius n'y était pas.

Le lendemain Jean Valjean redemanda à Cosette:

— Veux-tu venir au Luxembourg?

Elle répondit tristement et doucement:

— Non.

Jean Valjean fut froissé de cette tristesse et navré de cette douceur.

Que se passait-il dans cet esprit si jeune et déjà si impénétrable? Qu'est-ce qui était en train de s'y accomplir? qu'arrivait-il à l'âme de Cosette? Quelquefois, au lieu de se coucher, Jean Valjean restait assis près de son grabat la tête dans ses mains, et il passait des nuits entières à se demander: Qu'y a-t-il dans la pensée de Cosette? et à songer aux choses auxquelles elle pouvait songer.

Oh! dans ces moments-là, quels regards douloureux il tournait vers le cloître, ce sommet chaste, ce lieu des anges, cet inaccessible glacier de la vertu! Comme il contemplait avec un ravissement désespéré ce jardin du couvent, plein de fleurs ignorées et de vierges enfermées, où tous les parfums et toutes les âmes montent droit vers le ciel! Comme il adorait cet éden refermé à jamais, dont il était sorti volontairement et follement descendu! Comme il regrettait son abnégation et sa démence d'avoir ramené Cosette au monde, pauvre héros du sacrifice, saisi et terrassé par son dévouement même! comme il se disait: Qu'ai-je fait?

Du reste rien de ceci ne perçait pour Cosette. Ni humeur, ni rudesse. Toujours la même figure sereine et bonne. Les manières de Jean Valjean étaient plus tendres et plus paternelles que jamais. Si quelque chose eût pu faire deviner moins de joie, c'était plus de mansuétude.

De son côté, Cosette languissait. Elle souffrait de l'absence de Marius comme elle avait joui de sa présence, singulièrement, sans savoir au juste. Quand Jean Valjean avait cessé de la conduire aux promenades habituelles, un instinct de femme lui avait confusément murmuré au fond du cœur qu'il ne fallait pas paraître tenir au Luxembourg, et que si cela lui était indifférent, son père l'y ramènerait. Mais les jours, les semaines et les mois se succédèrent. Jean Valjean avait accepté tacitement le consentement tacite de Cosette. Elle le regretta. Il était trop tard. Le jour où elle retourna au Luxembourg, Marius n'y était plus. Marius avait donc disparu; c'était fini, que faire? le retrouverait-elle jamais? Elle se sentit un serrement de cœur que rien ne dilatait et qui s'accroissait chaque jour; elle ne sut plus si c'était l’hiver ou l’été, le soleil ou la pluie, si les oiseaux chantaient, si l’on était aux dahlias ou aux pâquerettes, si le Luxembourg était plus charmant que les Tuileries, si le linge que rapportait la blanchisseuse était trop empesé ou pas assez, si Toussaint avait fait bien ou mal «son marché», et elle resta accablée, absorbée, attentive à une seule pensée, l’œil vague et fixe, comme lorsqu’on regarde dans la nuit la place noire et profonde où une apparition s’est évanouie.

Du reste elle non plus ne laissa rien voir à Jean Valjean, que sa pâleur. Elle lui continua son doux visage.

Cette pâleur ne suffisait que trop pour occuper Jean Valjean. Quelquefois il lui demandait:

— Qu’as-tu?

Elle répondait:

— Je n’ai rien.

Et après un silence, comme elle le devinait triste aussi, elle reprenait:

— Et vous, père, est-ce que vous avez quelque chose?

— Moi? rien, disait-il.

Ces deux êtres qui s’étaient si exclusivement aimés, et d’un si touchant amour, et qui avaient vécu longtemps l’un pour l’autre, souffraient maintenant l’un à côté de l’autre, l’un à cause de l’autre, sans se le dire, sans s’en vouloir, et en souriant.

Chapitre VIII

La cadène

Le plus malheureux des deux, c'était Jean Valjean. La jeunesse, même dans ses chagrins, a toujours une clarté à elle.

À de certains moments, Jean Valjean souffrait tant qu'il devenait puéril. C'est le propre de la douleur de faire reparaître le côté enfant de l'homme. Il sentait invinciblement que Cosette lui échappait. Il eût voulu lutter, la retenir, l'enthousiasmer par quelque chose d'extérieur et d'éclatant. Ces idées, puériles, nous venons de le dire, et en même temps séniles, lui donnèrent, par leur enfantillage même, une notion assez juste de l'influence de la passementerie sur l'imagination des jeunes filles. Il lui arriva une fois de voir passer dans la rue un général à cheval en grand uniforme, le comte Coutard, commandant de Paris. Il envia cet homme doré; il se dit quel bonheur ce serait de pouvoir mettre cet habit-là qui était une chose incontestable, que si Cosette le voyait ainsi, cela l'éblouirait, que lorsqu'il donnerait le bras à Cosette et qu'il passerait devant la grille des Tuileries, on lui présenterait les armes, et que cela suffirait à Cosette et lui ôterait l'idée de regarder les jeunes gens.

Une secousse inattendue vint se mêler à ces pensées tristes.

Dans la vie isolée qu'ils menaient, et depuis qu'ils étaient venus se loger rue Plumet, ils avaient une habitude. Ils faisaient quelquefois la partie de plaisir d'aller voir se lever le soleil, genre de joie douce qui convient à ceux qui entrent dans la vie et à ceux qui en sortent.

Se promener de grand matin, pour qui aime la solitude, équivaut à se promener la nuit, avec la gaîté de la nature de plus. Les rues sont désertes, et les oiseaux chantent. Cosette, oiseau elle-même, s'éveillait volontiers de bonne heure. Ces excursions matinales se préparaient la veille. Il proposait, elle acceptait. Cela s'arrangeait comme un complot, on sortait avant le jour, et c'était autant de petits bonheurs pour Cosette. Ces excentricités innocentes plaisent à la jeunesse.

La pente de Jean Valjean était, on le sait, d'aller aux endroits peu fréquentés, aux recoins solitaires, aux lieux d'oubli. Il y avait alors aux environs des barrières de Paris des espèces de champs pauvres, presque mêlés à la ville, où il poussait, l'été, un blé maigre, et qui, l'automne, après la récolte faite, n’avaient pas l’air moissonnés, mais pelés. Jean Valjean les hantait avec prédilection. Cosette ne s’y ennuyait point. C’était la solitude pour lui, la liberté pour elle. Là, elle redevenait petite fille, elle pouvait courir et presque jouer, elle ôtait son chapeau, le posait sur les genoux de Jean Valjean, et cueillait des bouquets. Elle regardait les papillons sur les fleurs, mais ne les prenait pas; les mansuétudes et les attendrissements naissent avec l’amour, et la jeune fille, qui a en elle un idéal tremblant et fragile, a pitié de l’aile du papillon. Elle tressait en guirlandes des coquelicots qu’elle mettait sur sa tête, et qui, traversés et pénétrés de soleil, empourprés jusqu’au flamboiement, faisaient à ce frais visage rose une couronne de braises.

Même après que leur vie avait été attristée, ils avaient conservé leur habitude de promenades matinales.

Donc un matin d’octobre, tentés par la sérénité parfaite de l’automne de 1831, ils étaient sortis, et ils se trouvaient au petit jour près de la barrière du Maine. Ce n’était pas l’aurore, c’était l’aube; minute ravissante et farouche. Quelques constellations çà et là dans l’azur pâle et profond, la terre toute noire, le ciel tout blanc, un frisson dans les brins d’herbe, partout le mystérieux saisissement du crépuscule. Une alouette, qui semblait mêlée aux étoiles, chantait à une hauteur prodigieuse, et l’on eût dit que cet hymne de la petitesse à l’infini calmait l’immensité. À l’orient, le Val-de-Grâce découpait, sur l’horizon clair d’une clarté d’acier, sa masse obscure; Vénus éblouissante montait derrière ce dôme et avait l’air d’une âme qui s’évade d’un édifice ténébreux.

Tout était paix et silence; personne sur la chaussée; dans les bas côtés, quelques rares ouvriers, à peine entrevus, se rendant à leur travail.

Jean Valjean s’était assis dans la contre-allée sur des charpentes déposées à la porte d’un chantier. Il avait le visage tourné vers la route, et le dos tourné au jour; il oubliait le soleil qui allait se lever; il était tombé dans une de ces absorptions profondes où tout l’esprit se concentre, qui emprisonnent même le regard et qui équivalent à quatre murs. Il y a des méditations qu’on pourrait nommer verticales; quand on est au fond, il faut du temps pour revenir sur la terre. Jean Valjean était descendu dans une de ces songeries-là. Il pensait à Cosette, au bonheur possible si rien ne se mettait entre elle et lui, à cette lumière dont elle remplissait sa vie, lumière qui était la respiration de son âme. Il était presque heureux dans cette rêverie. Cosette, debout près de lui, regardait les nuages devenir roses.

Tout à coup, Cosette s’écria: Père, on dirait qu’on vient là-bas. Jean Valjean leva les yeux.

Cosette avait raison.

La chaussée qui mène à l’ancienne barrière du Maine prolonge, comme on sait, la rue de Sèvres, et est coupée à angle droit par le boulevard intérieur. Au coude de la chaussée et du boulevard, à l’endroit où se fait l’embranchement, on entendait un bruit difficile à expliquer à pareille heure, et une sorte d’encombrement confus apparaissait. On ne sait quoi d’informe, qui venait du boulevard, entrait dans la chaussée.

Cela grandissait, cela semblait se mouvoir avec ordre, pourtant c’était hérissé et frémissant; cela semblait une voiture, mais on n’en pouvait distinguer le chargement. Il y avait des chevaux, des roues, des cris; des fouets claquaient. Par degrés les linéaments se fixèrent, quoique noyés de ténèbres. C’était une voiture, en effet, qui venait de tourner du boulevard sur la route et qui se dirigeait vers la barrière près de laquelle était Jean Valjean; une deuxième, du même aspect, la suivit, puis une troisième, puis une quatrième; sept chariots débouchèrent successivement, la tête des chevaux touchant l’arrière des voitures. Des silhouettes s’agitaient sur ces chariots, on voyait des étincelles dans le crépuscule comme s’il y avait des sabres nus, on entendait un cliquetis qui ressemblait à des chaînes remuées, cela avançait, les voix grossissaient, et c’était une chose formidable comme il en sort de la caverne des songes.

En approchant, cela prit forme, et s’ébaucha derrière les arbres avec le blêmissement de l’apparition; la masse blanchit; le jour qui se levait peu à peu plaquait une lueur blafarde sur ce fourmillement à la fois sépulcral et vivant, les têtes de silhouettes devinrent des faces de cadavres, et voici ce que c’était:

Sept voitures marchaient à la file sur la route. Les six premières avaient une structure singulière. Elles ressemblaient à des haquets de tonneliers; c’étaient des espèces de longues échelles posées sur deux roues et formant brancard à leur extrémité antérieure. Chaque haquet, disons mieux, chaque échelle était attelée de quatre chevaux bout à bout. Sur ces échelles étaient traînées d’étranges grappes d’hommes. Dans le peu de jour qu’il faisait, on ne voyait pas ces hommes; on les devinait. Vingt-quatre sur chaque voiture, douze de chaque côté, adossés les uns aux autres, faisant face aux passants, les jambes dans le vide, ces hommes cheminaient ainsi; et ils avaient derrière le dos quelque chose qui sonnait et qui était une chaîne et au cou quelque chose qui brillait et qui était un carcan. Chacun avait son carcan, mais la chaîne était pour tous; de façon que ces vingt-quatre hommes, s’il leur arrivait de descendre du haquet et de marcher, étaient saisis par une sorte d’unité inexorable et devaient serpenter sur le sol avec la chaîne pour vertèbre à peu près comme le mille-pieds. À l’avant et à l’arrière de chaque voiture, deux hommes, armés de fusils, se tenaient debout, ayant chacun une des extrémités de la chaîne sous son pied. Les carcans étaient carrés. La septième voiture, vaste fourgon à ridelles, mais sans capote, avait quatre roues et six chevaux, et portait un tas sonore de chaudières de fer, de marmites de fonte, de réchauds et de chaînes, où étaient mêlés quelques hommes garrottés et couchés tout de leur long, qui paraissaient malades. Ce fourgon, tout à claire-voie, était garni de claies délabrées qui semblaient avoir servi aux vieux supplices.

Ces voitures tenaient le milieu du pavé. Des deux côtés marchaient en double haie des gardes d’un aspect infâme, coiffés de tricornes claques comme les soldats du Directoire, tachés, troués, sordides, affublés d’uniformes d’invalides et de pantalons de croque-morts, mi-partis gris et bleus, presque en lambeaux, avec des épaulettes rouges, des bandoulières jaunes, des coupe-choux, des fusils et des bâtons; espèces de soldats goujats. Ces sbires semblaient composés de l’abjection du mendiant et de l’autorité du bourreau. Celui qui paraissait leur chef tenait à la main un fouet de poste. Tous ces détails, estompés par le crépuscule, se dessinaient de plus en plus dans le jour grandissant. En tête et en queue du convoi, marchaient des gendarmes à cheval, graves, le sabre au poing.

Ce cortège était si long qu’au moment où la première voiture atteignait la barrière, la dernière débouchait à peine du boulevard.

Une foule, sortie on ne sait d’où et formée en un clin d’œil, comme cela est fréquent à Paris, se pressait des deux côtés de la chaussée et regardait. On entendait dans les ruelles voisines des cris de gens qui s’appelaient et les sabots des maraîchers qui accouraient pour voir.

Les hommes entassés sur les haquets se laissaient cahoter en silence. Ils étaient livides du frisson du matin. Ils avaient tous des pantalons de toile et les pieds nus dans des sabots. Le reste du costume était à la fantaisie de la misère. Leurs accoutrements étaient hideusement disparates; rien n’est plus funèbre que l’arlequin des guenilles. Feutres défoncés, casquettes goudronnées, d’affreux bonnets de laine, et, près du bourgeron, l’habit noir crevé aux coudes; plusieurs avaient des chapeaux de femme; d’autres étaient coiffés d’un panier; on voyait des poitrines velues, et à travers les déchirures des vêtements on distinguait des tatouages, des temples de l’amour, des cœurs enflammés, des Cupidons. On apercevait aussi des dartres et des rougeurs malsaines. Deux ou trois avaient une corde de paille fixée aux traverses du haquet, et suspendue au-dessous d’eux comme un étrier, qui leur soutenait les pieds. L’un d’eux tenait à la main et portait à sa bouche quelque chose qui avait l’air d’une pierre noire et qu’il semblait mordre; c’était du pain qu’il mangeait. Il n’y avait là que des yeux secs, éteints, ou lumineux d’une mauvaise lumière. La troupe d’escorte maugréait, les enchaînés ne soufflaient pas; de temps en temps on entendait le bruit d’un coup de bâton sur les omoplates ou sur les têtes; quelques-uns de ces hommes bâillaient; les haillons étaient terribles; les pieds pendaient, les épaules oscillaient; les têtes s’entre-heurtaient, les fers tintaient, les prunelles flambaient férocement, les poings se crispaient ou s’ouvraient inertes comme des mains de morts; derrière le convoi, une troupe d’enfants éclatait de rire.

Cette file de voitures, quelle qu’elle fût, était lugubre. Il était évident que demain, que dans une heure, une averse pouvait éclater, qu’elle serait suivie d’une autre, et d’une autre, et que les vêtements délabrés seraient traversés, qu’une fois mouillés, ces hommes ne se sécheraient plus, qu’une fois glacés, ils ne se réchaufferaient plus, que leurs pantalons de toile seraient collés par l’ondée sur leurs os, que l’eau emplirait leurs sabots, que les coups de fouet ne pourraient empêcher le claquement des mâchoires, que la chaîne continuerait de les tenir par le cou, que leurs pieds continueraient de pendre; et il était impossible de ne pas frémir en voyant ces créatures humaines liées ainsi et passives sous les froides nuées d’automne, et livrées à la pluie, à la bise, à toutes les furies de l’air, comme des arbres et comme des pierres.

Les coups de bâton n’épargnaient pas même les malades, qui gisaient noués de cordes et sans mouvement sur la septième voiture et qu’on semblait avoir jetés là comme des sacs pleins de misère.

Brusquement, le soleil parut; l’immense rayon de l’orient jaillit, et l’on eût dit qu’il mettait le feu à toutes ces têtes farouches. Les langues se délièrent; un incendie de ricanements, de jurements et de chansons fit explosion. La large lumière horizontale coupa en deux toute la file, illuminant les têtes et les torses, laissant les pieds et les roues dans l’obscurité. Les pensées apparurent sur les visages; ce moment fut épouvantable; des démons visibles, à masques tombés, des âmes féroces toutes nues. Éclairée, cette cohue resta ténébreuse. Quelques-uns, gais, avaient à la bouche des tuyaux de plume d'où ils soufflaient de la vermine sur la foule, choisissant les femmes; l'aurore accentuait par la noirceur des ombres ces profils lamentables; pas un de ces êtres qui ne fût difforme à force de misère; et c'était si monstrueux qu'on eût dit que cela changeait la clarté du soleil en lueur d'éclair. La voiturée qui ouvrait le cortège avait entonné et psalmodiait à tue-tête avec une jovialité hagarde un pot-pourri de Désaugiers, alors fameux, la Vestale, les arbres frémissaient lugubrement; dans les contre-allées, des faces de bourgeois écoutaient avec une béatitude idiote ces gaudrioles chantées par des spectres.

Toutes les détresses étaient dans ce cortège comme un chaos; il y avait là l'angle facial de toutes les bêtes, des vieillards, des adolescents, des crânes nus, des barbes grises, des monstruosités cyniques, des résignations hargneuses, des rictus sauvages, des attitudes insensées, des groins coiffés de casquettes, des espèces de têtes de jeunes filles avec des tire-bouchons sur les tempes, des visages enfantins et, à cause de cela, horribles, de maigres faces de squelettes auxquelles il ne manquait que la mort. On voyait sur la première voiture un nègre, qui, peut-être, avait été esclave et qui pouvait comparer les chaînes. L'effrayant niveau d'en bas, la honte, avait passé sur ces fronts; à ce degré d'abaissement, les dernières transformations étaient subies par tous dans les dernières profondeurs; et l'ignorance changée en hébétement était l'égale de l'intelligence, changée en désespoir. Pas de choix possible entre ces hommes qui apparaissaient aux regards comme l'élite de la boue. Il était clair que l'ordonnateur quelconque de cette procession immonde ne les avait pas classés. Ces êtres avaient été liés et accouplés pêle-mêle, dans le désordre alphabétique probablement, et chargés au hasard sur ces voitures. Cependant des horreurs groupées finissent toujours par dégager une résultante; toute addition de malheureux donne un total; il sortait de chaque chaîne une âme commune, et chaque charretée avait sa physionomie. À côté de celle qui chantait, il y en avait une qui hurlait; une troisième mendiait; on en voyait une qui grinçait des dents; une autre menaçait les passants, une autre blasphémait Dieu; la dernière se taisait comme la tombe. Dante eût cru voir les sept cercles de l'enfer en marche.

Marche des damnations vers les supplices, faite sinistrement, non sur le formidable char fulgurant de l'Apocalypse mais, chose plus sombre, sur la charrette des gémonies.

Un des gardes, qui avait un crochet au bout de son bâton, faisait de temps en temps mine de remuer ces tas d’ordure humains. Une vieille femme dans la foule les montrait du doigt à un petit garçon de cinq ans, et lui disait: Gredin, cela t’apprendra!

Comme les chants et les blasphèmes grossissaient, celui qui semblait le capitaine de l’escorte fit claquer son fouet, et, à ce signal, une effroyable bastonnade sourde et aveugle qui faisait le bruit de la grêle tomba sur les sept voiturées; beaucoup rugirent et écumèrent; ce qui redoubla la joie des gamins accourus, nuée de mouches sur ces plaies.

L’œil de Jean Valjean était devenu effrayant. Ce n’était plus une prunelle; c’était cette vitre profonde qui remplace le regard chez certains infortunés, qui semble inconsciente de la réalité, et où flamboie la réverbération des épouvantes et des catastrophes. Il ne regardait pas un spectacle; il subissait une vision. Il voulut se lever, fuir, échapper; il ne put remuer un pied. Quelquefois les choses qu’on voit vous saisissent et vous tiennent. Il demeura cloué, pétrifié, stupide, se demandant, à travers une confuse angoisse inexprimable, ce que signifiait cette persécution sépulcrale, et d’où sortait ce pandémonium qui le poursuivait. Tout à coup il porta la main à son front, geste habituel de ceux auxquels la mémoire revient subitement; il se souvint que c’était là l’itinéraire en effet, que ce détour était d’usage pour éviter les rencontres royales toujours possibles sur la route de Fontainebleau, et que, trente-cinq ans auparavant, il avait passé par cette barrière-là.

Cosette, autrement épouvantée, ne l’était pas moins. Elle ne comprenait pas; le souffle lui manquait; ce qu’elle voyait ne lui semblait pas possible; enfin elle s’écria:

— Père! qu’est-ce qu’il y a donc dans ces voitures-là?

Jean Valjean répondit:

— Des forçats.

— Où donc est-ce qu’ils vont?

— Aux galères.

En ce moment la bastonnade, multipliée par cent mains, fit du zèle, les coups de plat de sabre s’en mêlèrent, ce fut comme une rage de fouets et de bâtons; les galériens se courbèrent, une obéissance hideuse se dégagea du supplice, et tous se turent avec des regards de loups enchaînés. Cosette tremblait de tous ses membres; elle reprit:

— Père, est-ce que ce sont encore des hommes?

— Quelquefois, dit le misérable.

C'était la Chaîne en effet qui, partie avant le jour de Bicêtre, prenait la route du Mans pour éviter Fontainebleau où était alors le roi. Ce détour faisait durer l'épouvantable voyage trois ou quatre jours de plus; mais, pour épargner à la personne royale la vue d'un supplice, on peut bien le prolonger.

Jean Valjean rentra accablé. De telles rencontres sont des chocs et le souvenir qu'elles laissent ressemble à un ébranlement.

Pourtant Jean Valjean, en regagnant avec Cosette la rue de Babylone, ne remarqua point qu'elle lui fît d'autres questions au sujet de ce qu'ils venaient de voir; peut-être était-il trop absorbé lui-même dans son accablement pour percevoir ses paroles et pour lui répondre. Seulement le soir, comme Cosette le quittait pour s'aller coucher, il l'entendit qui disait à demi-voix et comme se parlant à elle-même: — Il me semble que si je trouvais sur mon chemin un de ces hommes-là, ô mon Dieu, je mourrais rien que de le voir de près!

Heureusement le hasard fit que le lendemain de ce jour tragique il y eut, à propos de je ne sais plus quelle solennité officielle, des fêtes dans Paris, revue au Champ de Mars, joutes sur la Seine, théâtres aux Champs-Élysées, feu d'artifice à l'Étoile, illuminations partout. Jean Valjean, faisant violence à ses habitudes, conduisit Cosette à ces réjouissances, afin de la distraire du souvenir de la veille et d'effacer sous le riant tumulte de tout Paris la chose abominable qui avait passé devant elle. La revue, qui assaisonnait la fête, faisait toute naturelle la circulation des uniformes; Jean Valjean mit son habit de garde national avec le vague sentiment intérieur d'un homme qui se réfugie. Du reste, le but de cette promenade sembla atteint. Cosette, qui se faisait une loi de complaire à son père et pour qui d'ailleurs tout spectacle était nouveau, accepta la distraction avec la bonne grâce facile et légère de l'adolescence, et ne fit pas une moue trop dédaigneuse devant cette gamelle de joie qu'on appelle une fête publique; si bien que Jean Valjean put croire qu'il avait réussi, et qu'il ne restait plus trace de la hideuse vision.

Quelques jours après, un matin, comme il faisait beau soleil et qu'ils étaient tous deux sur le perron du jardin, autre infraction aux règles que semblait s'être imposées Jean Valjean, et à l'habitude de rester dans sa chambre que la tristesse avait fait prendre à Cosette, Cosette, en peignoir, se tenait debout dans ce négligé de la première heure qui enveloppe adorablement les jeunes filles et qui a l’air du nuage sur l’astre; et, la tête dans la lumière, rose d’avoir bien dormi, regardée doucement par le bonhomme attendri, elle effeuillait une pâquerette. Cosette ignorait la ravissante légende je t’aime, un peu, passionnément, etc.; qui la lui eût apprise? Elle maniait cette fleur, d’instinct, innocemment, sans se douter qu’effeuiller une pâquerette, c’est éplucher un cœur. S’il y avait une quatrième Grâce appelée la Mélancolie, et souriante, elle eût eu l’air de cette Grâce-là. Jean Valjean était fasciné par la contemplation de ces petits doigts sur cette fleur, oubliant tout dans le rayonnement que cette enfant avait. Un rouge-gorge chuchotait dans la broussaille d’à côté. Des nuées blanches traversaient le ciel si gaîment qu’on eût dit qu’elles venaient d’être mises en liberté. Cosette continuait d’effeuiller sa fleur attentivement; elle semblait songer à quelque chose; mais cela devait être charmant; tout à coup elle tourna la tête sur son épaule avec la lenteur délicate du cygne, et dit à Jean Valjean: Père, qu’est-ce que c’est donc que cela, les galères?

Livre quatrième — Secours d’en bas peut être secours d’en haut

Chapitre I

Blessure au dehors, guérison au dedans

Leur vie s’assombrissait ainsi par degrés.

Il ne leur restait plus qu’une distraction qui avait été autrefois un bonheur, c’était d’aller porter du pain à ceux qui avaient faim et des vêtements à ceux qui avaient froid. Dans ces visites aux pauvres, où Cosette accompagnait souvent Jean Valjean, ils retrouvaient quelque reste de leur ancien épanchement; et, parfois, quand la journée avait été bonne, quand il y avait eu beaucoup de détresses secourues et beaucoup de petits enfants ranimés et réchauffés, Cosette, le soir, était un peu gaie. Ce fut à cette époque qu’ils firent visite au bouge Jondrette.

Le lendemain même de cette visite, Jean Valjean parut le matin dans le pavillon, calme comme à l’ordinaire, mais avec une large blessure au bras gauche, fort enflammée, fort venimeuse, qui ressemblait à une brûlure et qu’il expliqua d’une façon quelconque. Cette blessure fit qu’il fut plus d’un mois avec la fièvre sans sortir. Il ne voulut voir aucun médecin. Quand Cosette l’en pressait: Appelle le médecin des chiens, disait-il.

Cosette le pansait matin et soir avec un air si divin et un si angélique bonheur de lui être utile, que Jean Valjean sentait toute sa vieille joie lui revenir, ses craintes et ses anxiétés se dissiper, et contemplait Cosette en disant: Oh! la bonne blessure! Oh! le bon mal!

Cosette, voyant son père malade, avait déserté le pavillon, et avait repris goût à la petite logette et à l’arrière-cour. Elle passait presque toutes ses journées près de Jean Valjean, et lui lisait les livres qu’il voulait. En général, des livres de voyages. Jean Valjean renaissait; son bonheur revivait avec des rayons ineffables; le Luxembourg, le jeune rôdeur inconnu, le refroidissement de Cosette, toutes ces nuées de son âme s’effaçaient. Il en venait à se dire: J’ai imaginé tout cela. Je suis un vieux fou.

Son bonheur était tel, que l’affreuse trouvaille des Thénardier, faite au bouge Jondrette, et si inattendue, avait en quelque sorte glissé sur lui. Il avait réussi à s’échapper, sa piste, à lui, était perdue, que lui importait le reste! il n’y songeait que pour plaindre ces misérables. Les voilà en prison, et désormais hors d’état de nuire, pensait-il, mais quelle lamentable famille en détresse!

Quant à la hideuse vision de la barrière du Maine, Cosette n’en avait plus reparlé.

Au couvent, sœur Sainte-Mechtilde avait appris la musique à Cosette. Cosette avait la voix d’une fauvette qui aurait une âme, et quelquefois le soir, dans l’humble logis du blessé, elle chantait des chansons tristes qui réjouissaient Jean Valjean.

Le printemps arrivait, le jardin était si admirable dans cette saison de l’année, que Jean Valjean dit à Cosette: — Tu n’y vas jamais, je veux que tu t’y promènes. — Comme vous voudrez, père, dit Cosette.

Et, pour obéir à son père, elle reprit ses promenades dans son jardin, le plus souvent seule, car, comme nous l’avons indiqué, Jean Valjean, qui probablement craignait d’être aperçu par la grille, n’y venait presque jamais.

La blessure de Jean Valjean avait été une diversion.

Quand Cosette vit que son père souffrait moins, et qu’il guérissait, et qu’il semblait heureux, elle eut un contentement qu’elle ne remarqua même pas, tant il vint doucement et naturellement. Puis c’était le mois de mars, les jours allongeaient, l’hiver s’en allait, l’hiver emporte toujours avec lui quelque chose de nos tristesses; puis vint avril, ce point du jour de l’été, frais comme toutes les aubes, gai comme toutes les enfances; un peu pleureur parfois comme un nouveau-né qu’il est. La nature en ce mois-là a des lueurs charmantes qui passent du ciel, des nuages, des arbres, des prairies et des fleurs, au cœur de l’homme.

Cosette était trop jeune encore pour que cette joie d’avril qui lui ressemblait ne la pénétrât pas. Insensiblement, et sans qu’elle s’en doutât, le noir s’en alla de son esprit. Au printemps il fait clair dans les âmes tristes comme à midi il fait clair dans les caves. Cosette même n’était déjà plus très triste. Du reste, cela était ainsi, mais elle ne s’en rendait pas compte. Le matin, vers dix heures, après déjeuner, lorsqu’elle avait réussi à entraîner son père pour un quart d’heure dans le jardin, et qu’elle le promenait au soleil devant le perron en lui soutenant son bras malade, elle ne s’apercevait point qu’elle riait à chaque instant et qu’elle était heureuse.

Jean Valjean, enivré, la voyait redevenir vermeille et fraîche.

— Oh! la bonne blessure! répétait-il tout bas.

Et il était reconnaissant aux Thénardier.

Une fois sa blessure guérie, il avait repris ses promenades solitaires et crépusculaires.

Ce serait une erreur de croire qu’on peut se promener de la sorte seul dans les régions inhabitées de Paris sans rencontrer quelque aventure.

Chapitre II

La mère Plutarque n'est pas embarrassée pour expliquer un

Un soir le petit Gavroche n'avait point mangé; il se souvint qu'il n'avait pas non plus dîné la veille; cela devenait fatigant. Il prit la résolution d'essayer de souper. Il s'en alla rôder au delà de la Salpêtrière, dans les lieux déserts; c'est là que sont les aubaines; où il n'y a personne, on trouve quelque chose. Il parvint jusqu'à une peuplade qui lui parut être le village d'Austerlitz.

Dans une de ses précédentes flâneries, il avait remarqué là un vieux jardin hanté d'un vieux homme et d'une vieille femme, et dans ce jardin un pommier passable. À côté de ce pommier, il y avait une espèce de fruitier mal clos où l'on pouvait conquérir une pomme. Une pomme, c'est un souper; une pomme, c'est la vie. Ce qui a perdu Adam pouvait sauver Gavroche. Le jardin côtoyait une ruelle solitaire non pavée et bordée de broussailles en attendant les maisons; une haie l'en séparait.

Gavroche se dirigea vers le jardin; il retrouva la ruelle, il reconnut le pommier, il constata le fruitier, il examina la haie; une haie, c'est une enjambée. Le jour déclinait, pas un chat dans la ruelle, l'heure était bonne. Gavroche ébaucha l'escalade, puis s'arrêta tout à coup. On parlait dans le jardin. Gavroche regarda par une des claires-voies de la haie.

À deux pas de lui, au pied de la haie et de l'autre côté, précisément au point où l'eût fait déboucher la trouée qu'il méditait, il y avait une pierre couchée qui faisait une espèce de banc, et sur ce banc était assis le vieux homme du jardin, ayant devant lui la vieille femme debout. La vieille bougonnait. Gavroche, peu discret, écouta.

— Monsieur Mabeuf! disait la vieille.

— Mabeuf! pensa Gavroche, ce nom est farce.

Le vieillard interpellé ne bougeait point. La vieille répéta:

— Monsieur Mabeuf!

Le vieillard, sans quitter la terre des yeux, se décida à répondre:

— Quoi, mère Plutarque?

— Mère Plutarque! pensa Gavroche, autre nom farce.

La mère Plutarque reprit, et force fut au vieillard d'accepter la conversation.

— Le propriétaire n'est pas content.

— Pourquoi?

— On lui doit trois termes.

— Dans trois mois on lui en devra quatre.

— Il dit qu’il vous enverra coucher dehors.

— J’irai.

— La fruitière veut qu’on la paye. Elle ne lâche plus ses falourdes. Avec quoi vous chaufferez-vous cet hiver? Nous n’aurons point de bois.

— Il y a le soleil.

— Le boucher refuse crédit, il ne veut plus donner de viande.

— Cela se trouve bien. Je digère mal la viande. C’est trop lourd.

— Qu’est-ce qu’on aura pour dîner?

— Du pain.

— Le boulanger exige un acompte, et dit que pas d’argent, pas de pain.

— C’est bon.

— Qu’est-ce que vous mangerez?

— Nous avons les pommes du pommier.

— Mais, monsieur, on ne peut pourtant pas vivre comme ça sans argent.

— Je n’en ai pas.

La vieille s’en alla, le vieillard resta seul. Il se mit à songer. Gavroche songeait de son côté. Il faisait presque nuit.

Le premier résultat de la songerie de Gavroche, ce fut qu’au lieu d’escalader la haie, il s’accroupit dessous. Les branches s’écartaient un peu au bas de la broussaille.

— Tiens, s’écria intérieurement Gavroche, une alcôve! et il s’y blottit. Il était presque adossé au banc du père Mabeuf. Il entendait l’octogénaire respirer.

Alors, pour dîner, il tâcha de dormir.

Sommeil de chat, sommeil d’un œil. Tout en s’assoupissant, Gavroche guettait.

La blancheur du ciel crépusculaire blanchissait la terre, et la ruelle faisait une ligne livide entre deux rangées de buissons obscurs.

Tout à coup, sur cette bande blanchâtre deux silhouettes parurent. L’une venait devant, l’autre, à quelque distance, derrière.

— Voilà deux êtres, grommela Gavroche.

La première silhouette semblait quelque vieux bourgeois courbé et pensif, vêtu plus que simplement, marchant lentement à cause de l’âge, et flânant le soir aux étoiles.

La seconde était droite, ferme, mince. Elle réglait son pas sur le pas de la première; mais dans la lenteur volontaire de l’allure, on sentait de la souplesse et de l’agilité. Cette silhouette avait, avec on ne sait quoi de farouche et d’inquiétant, toute la tournure de ce qu’on appelait alors un élégant; le chapeau était d’une bonne forme, la redingote était noire, bien coupée, probablement de beau drap, et serrée à la taille. La tête se dressait avec une sorte de grâce robuste, et, sous le chapeau, on entrevoyait dans le crépuscule un pâle profil d’adolescent. Ce profil avait une rose à la bouche. Cette seconde silhouette était bien connue de Gavroche c’était Montparnasse.

Quant à l’autre, il n’en eût rien pu dire, sinon que c’était un vieux bonhomme.

Gavroche entra sur-le-champ en observation.

L’un de ces deux passants avait évidemment des projets sur l’autre. Gavroche était bien situé pour voir la suite. L’alcôve était fort à propos devenue cachette.

Montparnasse à la chasse, à une pareille heure, en un pareil lieu, cela était menaçant. Gavroche sentait ses entrailles de gamin s’émouvoir de pitié pour le vieux.

Que faire? intervenir? une faiblesse en secourant une autre! C’était de quoi rire pour Montparnasse. Gavroche ne se dissimulait pas que, pour ce redoutable bandit de dix-huit ans, le vieillard d’abord, l’enfant ensuite, c’étaient deux bouchées.

Pendant que Gavroche délibérait, l’attaque eut lieu, brusque et hideuse. Attaque de tigre à l’onagre, attaque d’araignée à la mouche. Montparnasse, à l’improviste, jeta la rose, bondit sur le vieillard, le colleta, l’empoigna et s’y cramponna, et Gavroche eut de la peine à retenir un cri. Un moment après, l’un de ces hommes était sous l’autre, accablé, râlant, se débattant, avec un genou de marbre sur la poitrine. Seulement ce n’était pas tout à fait ce à quoi Gavroche s’était attendu. Celui qui était à terre, c’était Montparnasse; celui qui était dessus, c’était le bonhomme.

Tout ceci se passait à quelques pas de Gavroche.

Le vieillard avait reçu le choc, et l’avait rendu, et rendu si terriblement qu’en un clin d’œil l’assaillant et l’assailli avaient changé de rôle.

— Voilà un fier invalide! pensa Gavroche.

Et il ne put s’empêcher de battre des mains. Mais ce fut un battement de mains perdu. Il n’arriva pas jusqu’aux deux combattants, absorbés et assourdis l’un par l’autre et mêlant leurs souffles dans la lutte.

Le silence se fit. Montparnasse cessa de se débattre. Gavroche eut cet aparté: Est-ce qu’il est mort?

Le bonhomme n’avait pas prononcé un mot ni jeté un cri. Il se redressa, et Gavroche l’entendit qui disait à Montparnasse:

— Relève-toi.

Montparnasse se releva, mais le bonhomme le tenait. Montparnasse avait l’attitude humiliée et furieuse d’un loup qui serait happé par un mouton.

Gavroche regardait et écoutait, faisant effort pour doubler ses yeux par ses oreilles. Il s’amusait énormément.

Il fut récompensé de sa consciencieuse anxiété de spectateur. Il put saisir au vol ce dialogue qui empruntait à l’obscurité on ne sait quel accent tragique. Le bonhomme questionnait. Montparnasse répondait.

— Quel âge as-tu?

— Dix-neuf ans.

— Tu es fort et bien portant. Pourquoi ne travailles-tu, pas?

— Ça m’ennuie.

— Quel est ton état?

— Fainéant.

— Parle sérieusement. Peut-on faire quelque chose pour toi? Qu’est-ce que tu veux être?

— Voleur.

Il y eut un silence. Le vieillard semblait profondément pensif. Il était immobile et ne lâchait point Montparnasse.

De moment en moment, le jeune bandit, vigoureux et leste, avait des soubresauts de bête prise au piège. Il donnait une secousse, essayait un croc-en-jambe, tordait éperdument ses membres, tâchait de s’échapper. Le vieillard n’avait pas l’air de s’en apercevoir, et lui tenait les deux bras d’une seule main avec l’indifférence souveraine d’une force absolue.

La rêverie du vieillard dura quelque temps, puis, regardant fixement Montparnasse, il éleva doucement la voix, et lui adressa, dans cette ombre où ils étaient, une sorte d’allocution solennelle dont Gavroche ne perdit pas une syllabe:

— Mon enfant tu entres par paresse dans la plus laborieuse des existences. Ah! tu te déclares fainéant! prépare-toi à travailler. As-tu vu une machine qui est redoutable? cela s’appelle le laminoir. Il faut y prendre garde, c’est une chose sournoise et féroce; si elle vous attrape le pan de votre habit, vous y passez tout entier. Cette machine, c’est l’oisiveté.... Arrête-toi, pendant qu’il en est temps encore, et sauve-toi! Autrement, c’est fini; avant peu tu seras dans l’engrenage. Une fois pris, n’espère plus rien. À la fatigue, paresseux! plus de repos. La main de fer du travail implacable t’a saisi. Gagner ta vie, avoir une tâche, accomplir un devoir, tu ne veux pas! être comme les autres, cela t’ennuie! Eh bien, tu seras autrement. Le travail est la loi; qui le repousse ennui, l’aura supplice. Tu ne veux pas être ouvrier, tu seras esclave. Le travail ne vous lâche d’un côté que pour vous reprendre de l’autre; tu ne veux pas être son ami, tu seras son nègre. Ah! tu n’as pas voulu de la lassitude honnête des hommes, tu vas avoir la sueur des damnés. Où les autres chantent, tu râleras. Tu verras de loin, d’en bas, les autres hommes travailler; il te semblera qu’ils se reposent. Le laboureur, le moissonneur, le matelot, le forgeron, t’apparaîtront dans la lumière comme les bienheureux d’un paradis. Quel rayonnement dans l’enclume! Mener la charrue, lier la gerbe, c’est de la joie. La barque en liberté dans le vent, quelle fête! Toi, paresseux, pioche, traîne, roule, marche! Tire ton licou, te voilà bête de somme dans l’attelage de l’enfer! Ah! ne rien faire, c’était là ton but. Eh bien! pas une semaine, pas une journée, pas une heure sans accablement. Tu ne pourras rien soulever qu’avec angoisse. Toutes les minutes qui passeront feront craquer tes muscles. Ce qui sera plume pour les autres sera pour toi rocher. Les choses les plus simple s’escarperont. La vie se fera monstre autour de toi. Aller, venir, respirer, autant de travaux terribles. Ton poumon te fera l’effet d’un poids de cent livres. Marcher ici plutôt que là, ce sera un problème à résoudre. Le premier venu qui veut sortir pousse sa porte, c’est fait, le voilà dehors. Toi, si tu veux sortir, il te faudra percer ton mur. Pour aller dans la rue, qu’est-ce que tout le monde fait? Tout le monde descend l’escalier; toi, tu déchireras tes draps de lit, tu en feras brin à brin une corde, puis tu passeras par ta fenêtre, et tu te suspendras à ce fil sur un abîme, et ce sera la nuit, dans l’orage, dans la pluie, dans l’ouragan, et, si la corde est trop courte, tu n’auras plus qu’une manière de descendre, tomber. Tomber au hasard, dans le gouffre, d’une hauteur quelconque sur, quoi? Sur ce qui est en bas, sur l’inconnu. Ou tu grimperas par un tuyau de cheminée, au risque de t’y brûler; ou tu ramperas par un conduit de latrines, au risque de t’y noyer. Je ne te parle pas des trous qu’il faut masquer, des pierres qu’il faut ôter et remettre vingt fois par jour, des plâtras qu’il faut cacher dans sa paillasse. Une serrure se présente; le bourgeois a dans sa poche sa clef fabriquée par un serrurier. Toi, si tu veux passer outre tu es condamné à faire un chef-d’œuvre effrayant, tu prendras un gros sou, tu le couperas en deux lames avec quels outils? tu les inventeras. Cela te regarde. Puis tu creuseras l’intérieur de ces deux lames, en ménageant soigneusement le dehors, et tu pratiqueras sur le bord tout autour un pas de vis, de façon qu’elles s’ajustent étroitement l’une sur l’autre comme un fond et comme un couvercle. Le dessous et le dessus ainsi vissés, on n’y devinera rien. Pour les surveillants, car tu seras guetté, ce sera un gros sou; pour toi, ce sera une boîte. Que mettras-tu dans cette boîte? Un petit morceau d’acier. Un ressort de montre auquel tu auras fait des dents et qui sera une scie. Avec cette scie, longue comme une épingle et cachée dans un sou, tu devras couper le pêne de la serrure, la mèche du verrou, l’anse du cadenas, et le barreau que tu auras à ta fenêtre, et la manille que tu auras à ta jambe. Ce chef-d’œuvre fait ce prodige accompli, tous ces miracles d’art, d’adresse, d’habileté, de patience, exécutés, si l’on vient à savoir que tu en es l’auteur, quelle sera ta récompense? le cachot. Voilà l’avenir. La paresse, le plaisir, quels précipices! Ne rien faire, c’est un lugubre parti pris, sais-tu bien? Vivre oisif de la substance sociale! être inutile, c’est-à-dire nuisible! cela mène droit au fond de la misère. Malheur à qui veut être parasite! il sera vermine. Ah! il ne te plaît pas de travailler? Ah! tu n’as qu’une pensée, bien boire, bien manger, bien dormir. Tu boiras de l’eau, tu mangeras du pain noir, tu dormiras sur une planche avec une ferraille rivée à tes membres et dont tu sentiras la nuit le froid sur ta chair? Tu briseras cette ferraille, tu t’enfuiras. C’est bon. Tu te traîneras sur le ventre dans les broussailles et tu mangeras de l’herbe comme les brutes des bois. Et tu seras repris. Et alors tu passeras des années dans une basse-fosse, scellé à une muraille, tâtonnant pour boire à ta cruche, mordant dans un affreux pain de ténèbres dont les chiens ne voudraient pas, mangeant des fèves que les vers auront mangées avant toi. Tu seras cloporte dans une cave. Ah! aie pitié de toi-même, misérable enfant, tout jeune, qui tétais ta nourrice il n’y a pas vingt ans, et qui as sans doute encore ta mère! je t’en conjure, écoute-moi. Tu veux de fin drap noir, des escarpins vernis, te friser, te mettre dans tes boucles de l’huile qui sent bon, plaire aux créatures, être joli. Tu seras tondu ras avec une casaque rouge et des sabots. Tu veux une bague au doigt, tu auras un carcan au cou. Et si tu regardes une femme, un coup de bâton. Et tu entreras là à vingt ans, et tu en sortiras à cinquante! Tu entreras jeune, rose, frais, avec tes yeux brillants et toutes tes dents blanches, et ta chevelure d’adolescent, tu sortiras cassé, courbé, ridé, édenté, horrible, en cheveux blancs! Ah! mon pauvre enfant, tu fais fausse route, la fainéantise te conseille mal; le plus rude des travaux, c'est le vol. Crois-moi, n'entreprends pas cette pénible besogne d'être un paresseux. Devenir un coquin, ce n'est pas commode. Il est moins malaisé d'être honnête homme. Va maintenant, et pense à ce que je t'ai dit. À propos, que voulais-tu de moi? Ma bourse. La voici.

Et le vieillard, lâchant Montparnasse, lui mit dans la main sa bourse, que Montparnasse soupesa un moment; après quoi, avec la même précaution machinale que s'il l'eût volée, Montparnasse la laissa glisser doucement dans la poche de derrière de sa redingote.

Tout cela dit et fait, le bonhomme tourna le dos et reprit tranquillement sa promenade.

— Ganache! murmura Montparnasse.

Qui était ce bonhomme? le lecteur l'a sans doute deviné.

Montparnasse, stupéfait, le regarda disparaître dans le crépuscule. Cette contemplation lui fut fatale.

Tandis que le vieillard s'éloignait, Gavroche s'approchait.

Gavroche, d'un coup d'œil de côté, s'était assuré que le père Mabeuf, endormi peut-être, était toujours assis sur le banc. Puis le gamin était sorti de sa broussaille, et s'était mis à ramper dans l'ombre en arrière de Montparnasse immobile. Il parvint ainsi jusqu'à Montparnasse sans en être vu ni entendu, insinua doucement sa main dans la poche de derrière de la redingote de fin drap noir, saisit la bourse, retira sa main, et, se remettant à ramper, fit une évasion de couleuvre dans les ténèbres. Montparnasse, qui n'avait aucune raison d'être sur ses gardes et qui songeait pour la première fois de sa vie, ne s'aperçut de rien. Gavroche, quand il fut revenu au point où était le père Mabeuf, jeta la bourse par-dessus la haie, et s'enfuit à toutes jambes.

La bourse tomba sur le pied du père Mabeuf. Cette commotion le réveilla. Il se pencha, et ramassa la bourse. Il n'y comprit rien, et l'ouvrit. C'était une bourse à deux compartiments; dans l'un, il y avait quelque monnaie; dans l'autre, il y avait six napoléons.

M. Mabeuf, fort effaré, porta la chose à sa gouvernante.

— Cela tombe du ciel, dit la mère Plutarque.

Livre cinquième — Dont la fin ne ressemble pas au commencement

Chapitre I

La solitude et la caserne combinées

La douleur de Cosette, si poignante encore et si vive quatre ou cinq mois auparavant, était, à son insu même, entrée en convalescence. La nature, le printemps, la jeunesse, l’amour pour son père, la gaîté des oiseaux et des fleurs faisaient filtrer peu à peu, jour à jour, goutte à goutte, dans cette âme si vierge et si jeune, on ne sait quoi qui ressemblait presque à l’oubli. Le feu s’y éteignait-il tout à fait? ou s’y formait-il seulement des couches de cendre? Le fait est qu’elle ne se sentait presque plus de point douloureux et brûlant.

Un jour elle pensa tout à coup à Marius: — Tiens! dit-elle, je n’y pense plus.

Dans cette même semaine elle remarqua, passant devant la grille du jardin, un fort bel officier de lanciers, taille de guêpe, ravissant uniforme, joues de jeune fille, sabre sous le bras, moustaches cirées, schapska verni. Du reste cheveux blonds, yeux bleus à fleur de tête, figure ronde, vaine, insolente et jolie; tout le contraire de Marius. Un cigare à la bouche. — Cosette songea que cet officier était sans doute du régiment caserné rue de Babylone.

Le lendemain, elle le vit encore passer. Elle remarqua l’heure.

À dater de ce moment, était-ce le hasard? presque tous les jours elle le vit passer.

Les camarades de l’officier s’aperçurent qu’il y avait là, dans ce jardin «mal tenu», derrière cette méchante grille rococo, une assez jolie créature qui se trouvait presque toujours là au passage du beau lieutenant, lequel n’est point inconnu au lecteur et s’appelait Théodule Gillenormand.

— Tiens! lui disaient-ils. Il y a une petite qui te fait de l’œil, regarde donc.

— Est-ce que j’ai le temps, répondait le lancier, de regarder toutes les filles qui me regardent?

C’était précisément l’instant où Marius descendait gravement vers l’agonie et disait: — Si je pouvais seulement la revoir avant de mourir! — Si son souhait eût été réalisé, s’il eût vu en ce moment-là Cosette regardant un lancier, il n’eût pas pu prononcer une parole et il eût expiré de douleur.

À qui la faute? À personne.

Marius était de ces tempéraments qui s’enfoncent dans le chagrin et qui y séjournent; Cosette était de ceux qui s’y plongent et qui en sortent.

Cosette du reste traversait ce moment dangereux, phase fatale de la rêverie féminine abandonnée à elle-même, où le cœur d’une jeune fille isolée ressemble à ces vrilles de la vigne qui s’accrochent, selon le hasard, au chapiteau d’une colonne de marbre ou au poteau d’un cabaret. Moment rapide et décisif, critique pour toute orpheline, qu’elle soit pauvre ou qu’elle soit riche, car la richesse ne défend pas du mauvais choix; on se mésallie très haut; la vraie mésalliance est celle des âmes; et, de même que plus d’un jeune homme inconnu, sans nom, sans naissance, sans fortune, est un chapiteau de marbre qui soutient un temple de grands sentiments et de grandes idées, de même tel homme du monde, satisfait et opulent, qui a des bottes polies et des paroles vernies, si l’on regarde, non le dehors, mais le dedans, c’est-à-dire ce qui est réservé à la femme, n’est autre chose qu’un soliveau stupide obscurément hanté par les passions violentes, immondes et avinées; le poteau d’un cabaret.

Qu’y avait-il dans l’âme de Cosette? De la passion calmée ou endormie; de l’amour à l’état flottant; quelque chose qui était limpide, brillant, trouble à une certaine profondeur, sombre plus bas. L’image du bel officier se reflétait à la surface. Y avait-il un souvenir au fond? — tout au fond? — Peut-être. Cosette ne savait pas.

Il survint un incident singulier.

Chapitre II

Peurs de Cosette

Dans la première quinzaine d’avril, Jean Valjean fit un voyage. Cela, on le sait, lui arrivait de temps en temps, à de très longs intervalles. Il restait absent un ou deux jours, trois jours au plus. Où allait-il? personne ne le savait, pas même Cosette. Une fois seulement, à un de ces départs, elle l’avait accompagné en fiacre jusqu’au coin d’un petit cul-de-sac sur l’angle duquel elle avait lu: Impasse de la Planchette. Là il était descendu, et le fiacre avait ramené Cosette rue de Babylone. C’était en général quand l’argent manquait à la maison que Jean Valjean faisait ces petits voyages.

Jean Valjean était donc absent. Il avait dit: Je reviendrai dans trois jours.

Le soir, Cosette était seule dans le salon. Pour se désennuyer, elle avait ouvert son piano-orgue et elle s’était mise à chanter, en s’accompagnant, le chœur d’Euryanthe: Chasseurs égarés dans les bois! qui est peut-être ce qu’il y a de plus beau dans toute la musique. Quand elle eut fini, elle demeura pensive.

Tout à coup il lui sembla qu’elle entendait marcher dans le jardin.

Ce ne pouvait être son père, il était absent; ce ne pouvait être Toussaint, elle était couchée. Il était dix heures du soir.

Elle alla près du volet du salon qui était fermé et y colla son oreille.

Il lui parut que c’était le pas d’un homme, et qu’on marchait très doucement.

Elle monta rapidement au premier, dans sa chambre, ouvrit un vasistas percé dans son volet, et regarda dans le jardin. C’était le moment de la pleine lune. On y voyait comme s’il eût fait jour.

Il n’y avait personne.

Elle ouvrit la fenêtre. Le jardin était absolument calme, et tout ce qu’on apercevait de la rue était désert comme toujours.

Cosette pensa qu’elle s’était trompée. Elle avait cru entendre ce bruit. C’était une hallucination produite par le sombre et prodigieux chœur de Weber qui ouvre devant l’esprit des profondeurs effarées, qui tremble au regard comme une forêt vertigineuse, et où l’on entend le craquement des branches mortes sous le pas inquiet des chasseurs entrevus dans le crépuscule.

Elle n’y songea plus.

D’ailleurs Cosette de sa nature n’était pas très effrayée. Il y avait dans ses veines du sang de bohémienne et d’aventurière qui va pieds nus. On s’en souvient, elle était plutôt alouette que colombe. Elle avait un fond farouche et brave.

Le lendemain, moins tard, à la tombée de la nuit, elle se promenait dans le jardin. Au milieu des pensées confuses qui l’occupaient, elle croyait bien percevoir par instants un bruit pareil au bruit de la veille, comme de quelqu’un qui marcherait dans l’obscurité sous les arbres pas très loin d’elle, mais elle se disait que rien ne ressemble à un pas qui marche dans l’herbe comme le froissement de deux branches qui se déplacent d’elles-mêmes, et elle n’y prenait pas garde. Elle ne voyait rien d’ailleurs.

Elle sortit de «la broussaille»; il lui restait à traverser une petite pelouse verte pour regagner le perron. La lune qui venait de se lever derrière elle, projeta, comme Cosette sortait du massif, son ombre devant elle sur cette pelouse.

Cosette s’arrêta terrifiée.

À côté de son ombre, la lune découpait distinctement sur le gazon une autre ombre singulièrement effrayante et terrible, une ombre qui avait un chapeau rond.

C’était comme l’ombre d’un homme qui eût été debout sur la lisière du massif à quelques pas en arrière de Cosette.

Elle fut une minute sans pouvoir parler, ni crier, ni appeler, ni bouger, ni tourner la tête.

Enfin elle rassembla tout son courage et se retourna résolument.

Il n’y avait personne.

Elle regarda à terre. L’ombre avait disparu.

Elle rentra dans la broussaille, fureta hardiment dans les coins, alla jusqu’à la grille, et ne trouva rien.

Elle se sentit vraiment glacée. Était-ce encore une hallucination? Quoi! deux jours de suite? Une hallucination, passe, mais deux hallucinations? Ce qui était inquiétant, c’est que l’ombre n’était assurément pas un fantôme. Les fantômes ne portent guère de chapeaux ronds.

Le lendemain Jean Valjean revint. Cosette lui conta ce qu’elle avait cru entendre et voir. Elle s’attendait à être rassurée et que son père hausserait les épaules et lui dirait: Tu es une petite fille folle.

Jean Valjean devint soucieux.

— Ce ne peut être rien, lui dit-il.

Il la quitta sous un prétexte et alla dans le jardin, et elle l’aperçut qui examinait la grille avec beaucoup d’attention.

Dans la nuit elle se réveilla; cette fois elle était sûre, elle entendait distinctement marcher tout près du perron au-dessous de sa fenêtre. Elle courut à son vasistas et l’ouvrit. Il y avait en effet dans le jardin un homme qui tenait un gros bâton à la main. Au moment où elle allait crier, la lune éclaira le profil de l’homme. C’était son père.

Elle se recoucha en se disant: — Il est donc bien inquiet!

Jean Valjean passa dans le jardin cette nuit-là et les deux nuits qui suivirent. Cosette le vit par le trou de son volet.

La troisième nuit, la lune décroissait et commençait à se lever plus tard, il pouvait être une heure du matin, elle entendit un grand éclat de rire et la voix de son père qui l’appelait.

— Cosette!

Elle se jeta à bas du lit, passa sa robe de chambre et ouvrit sa fenêtre.

Son père était en bas sur la pelouse.

— Je te réveille pour te rassurer, dit-il. Regarde. Voici ton ombre en chapeau rond.

Et il lui montrait sur le gazon une ombre portée que la lune dessinait et qui ressemblait en effet assez bien au spectre d’un homme qui eût eu un chapeau rond. C’était une silhouette produite par un tuyau de cheminée en tôle, à chapiteau, qui s’élevait au-dessus d’un toit voisin.

Cosette aussi se mit à rire, toutes ses suppositions lugubres tombèrent, et le lendemain, en déjeunant avec son père, elle s’égaya du sinistre jardin hanté par des ombres de tuyaux de poêle.

Jean Valjean redevint tout à fait tranquille; quant à Cosette, elle ne remarqua pas beaucoup si le tuyau de poêle était bien dans la direction de l’ombre qu’elle avait vue ou cru voir, et si la lune se trouvait au même point du ciel. Elle ne s’interrogea point sur cette singularité d’un tuyau de poêle qui craint d’être pris en flagrant délit et qui se retire quand on regarde son ombre, car l’ombre s’était effacée quand Cosette s’était retournée et Cosette avait bien cru en être sûre. Cosette se rasséréna pleinement. La démonstration lui parut complète, et qu’il pût y avoir quelqu’un qui marchait le soir ou la nuit dans le jardin, ceci lui sortit de la tête.

À quelques jours de là cependant un nouvel incident se produisit.

Chapitre III

Enrichies des commentaires de Toussaint

Dans le jardin, près de la grille sur la rue, il y avait un banc de pierre défendu par une charmille du regard des curieux, mais auquel pourtant, à la rigueur, le bras d'un passant pouvait atteindre à travers la grille et la charmille.

Un soir de ce même mois d'avril, Jean Valjean était sorti; Cosette, après le soleil couché, s'était assise sur ce banc. Le vent fraîchissait dans les arbres; Cosette songeait; une tristesse sans objet la gagnait peu à peu, cette tristesse invincible que donne le soir et qui vient peut-être, qui sait? du mystère de la tombe entr'ouvert à cette heure-là.

Fantine était peut-être dans cette ombre.

Cosette se leva, fit lentement le tour du jardin, marchant dans l'herbe inondée de rosée et se disant à travers l'espèce de somnambulisme mélancolique où elle était plongée: — Il faudrait vraiment des sabots pour le jardin à cette heure-ci. On s'enrhume.

Elle revint au banc.

Au moment de s'y rasseoir, elle remarqua à la place qu'elle avait quittée une assez grosse pierre qui n'y était évidemment pas l'instant d'auparavant.

Cosette considéra cette pierre, se demandant ce que cela voulait dire. Tout à coup l'idée que cette pierre n'était point venue sur ce banc toute seule, que quelqu'un l'avait mise là, qu'un bras avait passé à travers cette grille, cette idée lui apparut et lui fit peur. Cette fois ce fut une vraie peur; la pierre était là. Pas de doute possible; elle n'y toucha pas, s'enfuit sans oser regarder derrière elle, se réfugia dans la maison, et ferma tout de suite au volet, à la barre et au verrou la porte-fenêtre du perron. Elle demanda à Toussaint:

— Mon père est-il rentré?

— Pas encore, mademoiselle.

(Nous avons indiqué une fois pour toutes le bégayement de Toussaint. Qu'on nous permette de ne plus l'accentuer. Nous répugnons à la notation musicale d'une infirmité.)

Jean Valjean, homme pensif et promeneur nocturne, ne rentrait souvent qu'assez tard dans la nuit.

— Toussaint, reprit Cosette, vous avez soin de bien barricader le soir les volets sur le jardin au moins, avec les barres, et de bien mettre les petites choses en fer dans les petits anneaux qui ferment?

— Oh! soyez tranquille, mademoiselle.

Toussaint n’y manquait pas, et Cosette le savait bien, mais elle ne put s’empêcher d’ajouter:

— C’est que c’est si désert par ici!

— Pour ça, dit Toussaint, c’est vrai. On serait assassiné avant d’avoir le temps de dire ouf! Avec cela que monsieur ne couche pas dans la maison. Mais ne craignez rien, mademoiselle, je ferme les fenêtres comme des bastilles. Des femmes seules! je crois bien que cela fait frémir! Vous figurez-vous? voir entrer la nuit des hommes dans la chambre qui vous disent: — tais-toi! et qui se mettent à vous couper le cou. Ce n’est pas tant de mourir, on meurt, c’est bon, on sait bien qu’il faut qu’on meure, mais c’est l’abomination de sentir ces gens-là vous toucher. Et puis leurs couteaux, ça doit mal couper! Ah Dieu!

— Taisez-vous, dit Cosette. Fermez bien tout.

Cosette, épouvantée du mélodrame improvisé par Toussaint et peut-être aussi du souvenir des apparitions de l’autre semaine qui lui revenaient, n’osa même pas lui dire: — Allez donc voir la pierre qu’on a mise sur le banc! de peur de rouvrir la porte du jardin, et que «les hommes» n’entrassent. Elle fit clore soigneusement partout les portes et fenêtres, fit visiter par Toussaint toute la maison de la cave au grenier, s’enferma dans sa chambre, mit ses verrous, regarda sous son lit, se coucha, et dormit mal. Toute la nuit elle vit la pierre grosse comme une montagne et pleine de cavernes.

Au soleil levant, — le propre du soleil levant est de nous faire rire de toutes nos terreurs de la nuit, et le rire qu’on a est toujours proportionné à la peur qu’on a eue, — au soleil levant Cosette, en s’éveillant, vit son effroi comme un cauchemar, et se dit: — À quoi ai-je été songer? C’est comme ces pas que j’avais cru entendre l’autre semaine dans le jardin la nuit! c’est comme l’ombre du tuyau de poêle! Est-ce que je vais devenir poltronne à présent? — Le soleil, qui rutilait aux fentes de ses volets et faisait de pourpre les rideaux de damas, la rassura tellement que tout s’évanouit dans sa pensée, même la pierre.

— Il n’y avait pas plus de pierre sur le banc qu’il n’y avait d’homme en chapeau rond dans le jardin; j’ai rêvé la pierre comme le reste.

Elle s’habilla, descendit au jardin, courut au banc, et se sentit une sueur froide. La pierre y était.

Mais ce ne fut qu’un moment. Ce qui est frayeur la nuit est curiosité le jour.

— Bah! dit-elle, voyons donc.

Elle souleva cette pierre qui était assez grosse. Il y avait dessous quelque chose qui ressemblait à une lettre.

C’était une enveloppe de papier blanc. Cosette s’en saisit. Il n’y avait pas d’adresse d’un côté, pas de cachet de l’autre. Cependant l’enveloppe, quoique ouverte, n’était point vide. On entrevoyait des papiers dans l’intérieur.

Cosette y fouilla. Ce n’était plus de la frayeur, ce n’était plus de la curiosité; c’était un commencement d’anxiété.

Cosette tira de l’enveloppe ce qu’elle contenait, un petit cahier de papier dont chaque page était numérotée et portait quelques lignes écrites d’une écriture assez jolie, pensa Cosette, et très fine.

Cosette chercha un nom, il n’y en avait pas; une signature, il n’y en avait pas. À qui cela était-il adressé? À elle probablement, puisqu’une main avait déposé le paquet sur son banc. De qui cela venait-il? Une fascination irrésistible s’empara d’elle, elle essaya de détourner ses yeux de ces feuillets qui tremblaient dans sa main, elle regarda le ciel, la rue, les acacias tout trempés de lumière, des pigeons qui volaient sur un toit voisin, puis tout à coup son regard s’abaissa vivement sur le manuscrit, et elle se dit qu’il fallait qu’elle sût ce qu’il y avait là dedans.

Voici ce qu’elle lut:

Chapitre IV

Un cœur sous une pierre

La réduction de l'univers à un seul être, la dilatation d'un seul être jusqu'à Dieu, voilà l'amour.

L'amour, c'est la salutation des anges aux astres.

Comme l'âme est triste quand elle est triste par l'amour!

Quel vide que l'absence de l'être qui à lui seul remplit le monde! Oh! comme il est vrai que l'être aimé devient Dieu. On comprendrait que Dieu en fût jaloux si le Père de tout n'avait pas évidemment fait la création pour l'âme, et l'âme pour l'amour.

Il suffît d'un sourire entrevu là-bas sous un chapeau de crêpe blanc à bavolet lilas, pour que l'âme entre dans le palais des rêves.

Dieu est derrière tout, mais tout cache Dieu. Les choses sont noires, les créatures sont opaques. Aimer un être, c'est le rendre transparent.

De certaines pensées sont des prières. Il y a des moments où, quelle que soit l'attitude du corps, l'âme est à genoux.

Les amants séparés trompent l'absence par mille choses chimériques qui ont pourtant leur réalité. On les empêche de se voir, ils ne peuvent s'écrire; ils trouvent une foule de moyens mystérieux de correspondre. Ils s'envoient le chant des oiseaux, le parfum des fleurs, le rire des enfants, la lumière du soleil, les soupirs du vent, les rayons des étoiles, toute la création. Et pourquoi non? Toutes les œuvres de Dieu sont faites pour servir l'amour. L'amour est assez puissant pour charger la nature entière de ses messages.

O printemps, tu es une lettre que je lui écris.

L'avenir appartient encore bien plus aux cœurs qu'aux esprits. Aimer, voilà la seule chose qui puisse occuper et emplir l'éternité. À l'infini, il faut l'inépuisable.

L'amour participe de l'âme même. Il est de même nature qu'elle. Comme elle il est étincelle divine, comme elle il est incorruptible, indivisible, impérissable. C'est un point de feu qui est en nous, qui est immortel et infini, que rien ne peut borner et que rien ne peut éteindre. On le sent brûler jusque dans la moelle des os et on le voit rayonner jusqu'au fond du ciel.

Ô amour! adorations! volupté de deux esprits qui se comprennent, de deux cœurs qui s’échangent, de deux regards qui se pénètrent? Vous me viendrez, n’est-ce pas, bonheurs! Promenades à deux dans les solitudes! journées bénies et rayonnantes! J’ai quelquefois rêvé que de temps en temps des heures se détachaient de la vie des anges et venaient ici-bas traverser la destinée des hommes.

Dieu ne peut rien ajouter au bonheur de ceux qui s’aiment que de leur donner la durée sans fin. Après une vie d’amour, une éternité d’amour, c’est une augmentation en effet; mais accroître en son intensité même la félicité ineffable que l’amour donne à l’âme dès ce monde, c’est impossible, même à Dieu. Dieu, c’est la plénitude du ciel; l’amour, c’est la plénitude de l’homme.

Vous regardez une étoile pour deux motifs, parce qu’elle est lumineuse et parce qu’elle est impénétrable. Vous avez auprès de vous un plus doux rayonnement et un plus grand mystère, la femme.

Tous, qui ne nous soyons, nous avons nos êtres respirables. S’ils nous manquent, l’air nous manque, nous étouffons. Alors on meurt. Mourir par manque d’amour, c’est affreux! L’asphyxie de l’âme!

Quand l’amour a fondu et mêlé deux êtres dans une unité angélique et sacrée, le secret de la vie est trouvé pour eux; ils ne sont plus que les deux termes d’une même destinée; ils ne sont plus que les deux ailes d’un même esprit. Aimez, planez!

Le jour où une femme qui passe devant vous dégage de la lumière en marchant, vous êtes perdu, vous aimez. Vous n’avez plus qu’une chose à faire, penser à elle si fixement qu’elle soit contrainte de penser à vous.

Ce que l’amour commence ne peut être achevé que par Dieu.

L’amour vrai se désole et s’enchante pour un gant perdu ou pour un mouchoir trouvé, et il a besoin de l’éternité pour son dévouement et ses espérances. Il se compose à la fois de l’infiniment grand et de l’infiniment petit.

Si vous êtes pierre, soyez aimant; si vous êtes plante, soyez sensitive; si vous êtes homme, soyez amour.

Rien ne suffit à l’amour. On a le bonheur, on veut le paradis; on a le paradis, on veut le ciel.

Ô vous qui vous aimez, tout cela est dans l’amour. Sachez l’y trouver. L’amour a autant que le ciel, la contemplation, et de plus que le ciel, la volupté.

— Vient-elle encore au Luxembourg? — Non, monsieur. — C’est dans cette église qu’elle entend la messe, n’est-ce pas? — Elle n’y vient plus. — Habite-t-elle toujours cette maison? — Elle est déménagée. — Où est-elle allée demeurer? — Elle ne l’a pas dit.

Quelle chose sombre de ne pas savoir l’adresse de son âme!

L’amour a des enfantillages, les autres passions ont des petitesses. Honte aux passions qui rendent l’homme petit! Honneur à celle qui le fait enfant!

C’est une chose étrange, savez-vous cela? Je suis dans la nuit. Il y a un être qui en s’en allant a emporté le ciel.

Oh! être couchés côte à côte dans le même tombeau la main dans la main, et de temps en temps, dans les ténèbres, nous caresser doucement un doigt, cela suffirait à mon éternité.

Vous qui souffrez parce que vous aimez, aimez plus encore. Mourir d’amour, c’est en vivre.

Aimez. Une sombre transfiguration étoilée est mêlée à ce supplice. Il y a de l’extase dans l’agonie.

Ô joie des oiseaux! c’est parce qu’ils ont le nid qu’ils ont le chant.

L’amour est une respiration céleste de l’air du paradis.

Cœurs profonds, esprits sages, prenez la vie comme Dieu la faite; c’est une longue épreuve, une préparation inintelligible à la destinée inconnue. Cette destinée, la vraie, commence pour l’homme à la première marche de l’intérieur du tombeau. Alors il lui apparaît quelque chose, et il commence à distinguer le définitif. Le définitif, songez à ce mot. Les vivants voient l’infini; le définitif ne se laisse voir qu’aux morts. En attendant, aimez et souffrez, espérez et contemplez. Malheur, hélas! à qui n’aura aimé que des corps, des formes, des apparences! La mort lui ôtera tout. Tâchez d’aimer des âmes, vous les retrouverez.

J’ai rencontré dans la rue un jeune homme très pauvre qui aimait. Son chapeau était vieux, son habit était usé; il avait les coudes troués; l’eau passait à travers ses souliers et les astres à travers son âme.

Quelle grande chose, être aimé! Quelle chose plus grande encore, aimer! Le cœur devient héroïque à force de passion. Il ne se compose plus de rien que de pur; il ne s’appuie plus sur rien que d’élevé et de grand. Une pensée indigne n’y peut pas plus germer qu’une ortie sur un glacier. L’âme haute et sereine, inaccessible aux passions et aux émotions vulgaires, dominant les nuées et les ombres de ce monde, les folies, les mensonges, les haines, les vanités, les misères, habite le bleu du ciel, et ne sent plus que les ébranlements profonds et souterrains de la destinée, comme le haut des montagnes sent les tremblements de terre.

S’il n’y avait pas quelqu’un qui aime, le soleil s’éteindrait.

Chapitre V

Cosette après la lettre

Pendant cette lecture, Cosette entrait peu à peu en rêverie. Au moment où elle levait les yeux de la dernière ligne du cahier, le bel officier, c’était son heure, passa triomphant devant la grille. Cosette le trouva hideux.

Elle se remit à contempler le cahier. Il était écrit d’une écriture ravissante, pensa Cosette; de la même main, mais avec des encres diverses, tantôt très noires, tantôt blanchâtres, comme lorsqu’on met de l’eau dans l’encrier, et par conséquent à des jours différents. C’était donc une pensée qui s’était épanchée là, soupir à soupir, irrégulièrement, sans ordre, sans choix, sans but, au hasard. Cosette n’avait jamais rien lu de pareil. Ce manuscrit où elle voyait plus de clarté encore que d’obscurité, lui faisait l’effet d’un sanctuaire entr’ouvert. Chacune de ces lignes mystérieuses resplendissait à ses yeux et lui inondait le cœur d’une lumière étrange. L’éducation qu’elle avait reçue lui avait parlé toujours de l’âme et jamais de l’amour, à peu près comme qui parlerait du tison et point de la flamme. Ce manuscrit de quinze pages lui révélait brusquement et doucement tout l’amour, la douleur, la destinée, la vie, l’éternité, le commencement, la fin. C’était comme une main qui se serait ouverte et lui aurait jeté subitement une poignée de rayons. Elle sentait dans ces quelques lignes une nature passionnée, ardente, généreuse, honnête, une volonté sacrée, une immense douleur et un espoir immense, un cœur serré, une extase épanouie. Qu’était-ce que ce manuscrit? Une lettre. Lettre sans adresse, sans nom, sans date, sans signature, pressante et désintéressée, énigme composée de vérités, message d’amour fait pour être apporté par un ange et lu par une vierge, rendez-vous donné hors de la terre, billet doux d’un fantôme à une ombre. C’était un absent tranquille et accablé qui semblait prêt à se réfugier dans la mort et qui envoyait à l’absente le secret de la destinée, la clef de la vie, l’amour. Cela avait été écrit le pied dans le tombeau et le doigt dans le ciel. Ces lignes, tombées une à une sur le papier, étaient ce qu’on pourrait appeler des gouttes d’âme.

Maintenant ces pages, de qui pouvaient-elles venir? qui pouvait les avoir écrites?

Cosette n’hésita pas une minute. Un seul homme.

Lui!

Le jour s’était refait dans son esprit. Tout avait reparu. Elle éprouvait une joie inouïe et une angoisse profonde. C’était lui! lui qui lui écrivait! lui qui était là! lui dont le bras avait passé à travers cette grille! Pendant qu’elle l’oubliait, il l’avait retrouvée! Mais est-ce qu’elle l’avait oublié? Non! jamais! Elle était folle d’avoir cru cela un moment. Elle l’avait toujours aimé, toujours adoré. Le feu s’était couvert et avait couvé quelque temps, mais, elle le voyait bien, il n’avait fait que creuser plus avant, et maintenant il éclatait de nouveau et l’embrasait tout entière. Ce cahier était comme une flammèche tombée de cette autre âme dans la sienne. Elle sentait recommencer l’incendie. Elle se pénétrait de chaque mot du manuscrit. — Oh oui! disait-elle, comme je reconnais tout cela! C’est tout ce que j’avais déjà lu dans ses yeux.

Comme elle l’achevait pour la troisième fois, le lieutenant Théodule revint devant la grille et fit sonner ses éperons sur le pavé. Force fut à Cosette de lever les yeux. Elle le trouva fade, niais, sot, inutile, fat, déplaisant, impertinent, et très laid. L’officier crut devoir lui sourire. Elle se détourna honteuse et indignée. Elle lui aurait volontiers jeté quelque chose à la tête.

Elle s’enfuit, rentra dans la maison et s’enferma dans sa chambre pour relire le manuscrit, pour l’apprendre par cœur, et pour songer. Quand elle l’eut bien lu, elle le baisa et le mit dans son corset.

C’en était fait, Cosette était retombée dans le profond amour séraphique. L’abîme Éden venait de se rouvrir.

Toute la journée, Cosette fut dans une sorte d’étourdissement. Elle pensait à peine, ses idées étaient à l’état d’écheveau brouillé dans son cerveau, elle ne parvenait à rien conjecturer, elle espérait à travers un tremblement, quoi? des choses vagues. Elle n’osait rien se promettre, et ne voulait rien se refuser. Des pâleurs lui passaient sur le visage et des frissons sur le corps. Il lui semblait par moments qu’elle entrait dans le chimérique; elle se disait: est-ce réel? alors elle tâtait le papier bien-aimé sous sa robe, elle le pressait contre son cœur, elle en sentait les angles sur sa chair, et si Jean Valjean l’eût vue en ce moment, il eût frémi devant cette joie lumineuse et inconnue qui lui débordait des paupières. — Oh oui! pensait-elle. C’est bien lui! ceci vient de lui pour moi!

Et elle se disait qu’une intervention des anges, qu’un hasard céleste, le lui avait rendu.

Ô transfigurations de l’amour! ô rêves! ce hasard céleste, cette intervention des anges, c’était cette boulette de pain lancée par un voleur à un autre voleur, de la cour Charlemagne à la fosse-aux-lions, par-dessus les toits de la Force.

Chapitre VI

Les vieux sont faits pour sortir à propos

Le soir venu, Jean Valjean sortit, Cosette s’habilla. Elle arrangea ses cheveux de la manière qui lui allait le mieux, et elle mit une robe dont le corsage, qui avait reçu un coup de ciseau de trop, et qui, par cette échancrure, laissait voir la naissance du cou, était, comme disent les jeunes filles, «un peu indécent». Ce n’était pas le moins du monde indécent, mais c’était plus joli qu’autrement. Elle fit toute cette toilette sans savoir pourquoi.

Voulait-elle sortir? non.

Attendait-elle une visite? non.

À la brune, elle descendit au jardin. Toussaint était occupée à sa cuisine qui donnait sur l’arrière-cour.

Elle se mit à marcher sous les branches, les écartant de temps en temps avec la main, parce qu’il y en avait de très basses.

Elle arriva au banc.

La pierre y était restée.

Elle s’assit, et posa sa douce main blanche sur cette pierre comme si elle voulait la caresser et la remercier.

Tout à coup, elle eut cette impression indéfinissable qu’on éprouve, même sans voir, lorsqu’on a quelqu’un debout derrière soi.

Elle tourna la tête et se dressa.

C’était lui.

Il était tête nue. Il paraissait pâle et amaigri. On distinguait à peine son vêtement noir. Le crépuscule blêmissait son beau front et couvrait ses yeux de ténèbres. Il avait, sous un voile d’incomparable douceur, quelque chose de la mort et de la nuit. Son visage était éclairé par la clarté du jour qui se meurt et par la pensée d’une âme qui s’en va.

Il semblait que ce n’était pas encore le fantôme et que ce n’était déjà plus l’homme.

Son chapeau était jeté à quelques pas dans les broussailles.

Cosette, prête à défaillir, ne poussa pas un cri. Elle reculait lentement, car elle se sentait attirée. Lui ne bougeait point. À je ne sais quoi d’ineffable et de triste qui l’enveloppait, elle sentait le regard de ses yeux qu’elle ne voyait pas.

Cosette, en reculant, rencontra un arbre et s’y adossa. Sans cet arbre, elle fût tombée.

Alors elle entendit sa voix, cette voix qu’elle n’avait vraiment jamais entendue, qui s’élevait à peine au-dessus du frémissement des feuilles, et qui murmurait:

— Pardonnez-moi, je suis là. J’ai le cœur gonflé, je ne pouvais pas vivre comme j’étais, je suis venu. Avez-vous lu ce que j’avais mis là, sur ce banc? Me reconnaissez-vous un peu? N’ayez pas peur de moi. Voilà du temps déjà, vous rappelez-vous le jour où vous m’avez regardé? c’était dans le Luxembourg, près du Gladiateur. Et le jour où vous avez passé devant moi? C’étaient le 16 juin et le 2 juillet. Il va y avoir un an. Depuis bien longtemps, je ne vous ai plus vue. J’ai demandé à la loueuse de chaises, elle m’a dit qu’elle ne vous voyait plus. Vous demeuriez rue de l’Ouest au troisième sur le devant dans une maison neuve, vous voyez que je sais. Je vous suivais, moi. Qu’est-ce que j’avais à faire? Et puis vous avez disparu. J’ai cru vous voir passer une fois que je lisais les journaux sous les arcades de l’Odéon. J’ai couru. Mais non. C’était une personne qui avait un chapeau comme vous. La nuit, je viens ici. Ne craignez pas, personne ne me voit. Je viens regarder vos fenêtres de près. Je marche bien doucement pour que vous n’entendiez pas, car vous auriez peut-être peur. L’autre soir j’étais derrière vous, vous vous êtes retournée, je me suis enfui. Une fois je vous ai entendue chanter. J’étais heureux. Est-ce que cela vous fait quelque chose que je vous entende chanter à travers le volet? cela ne peut rien vous faire. Non, n’est-ce pas? Voyez-vous, vous êtes mon ange, laissez-moi venir un peu. Je crois que je vais mourir. Si vous saviez! je vous adore, moi! Pardonnez-moi, je vous parle, je ne sais pas ce que je vous dis, je vous fâche peut-être; est-ce que je vous fâche?

— Ô ma mère! dit-elle.

Et elle s’affaissa sur elle-même comme si elle se mourait.

Il la prit, elle tombait, il la prit dans ses bras, il la serra étroitement sans avoir conscience de ce qu’il faisait. Il la soutenait tout en chancelant. Il était comme s’il avait la tête pleine de fumée; des éclairs lui passaient entre les cils; ses idées s’évanouissaient; il lui semblait qu’il accomplissait un acte religieux et qu’il commettait une profanation. Du reste il n’avait pas le moindre désir de cette femme ravissante dont il sentait la forme contre sa poitrine. Il était éperdu d’amour.

Elle lui prit une main et la posa sur son cœur. Il sentit le papier qui y était. Il balbutia:

— Vous m’aimez donc?

Elle répondit d’une voix si basse que ce n’était plus qu’un souffle qu’on entendait à peine:

— Tais-toi! tu le sais!

Et elle cacha sa tête rouge dans le sein du jeune homme superbe et enivré.

Il tomba sur le banc, elle près de lui. Ils n’avaient plus de paroles. Les étoiles commençaient à rayonner. Comment se fit-il que leurs lèvres se rencontrèrent? Comment se fait-il que l’oiseau chante, que la neige fonde, que la rose s’ouvre, que mai s’épanouisse, que l’aube blanchisse derrière les arbres noirs au sommet frissonnant des collines?

Un baiser, et ce fut tout.

Tous deux tressaillirent, et ils se regardèrent dans l’ombre avec des yeux éclatants.

Ils ne sentaient ni la nuit fraîche, ni la pierre froide, ni la terre humide, ni l’herbe mouillée, ils se regardaient et ils avaient le cœur plein de pensées. Ils s’étaient pris les mains, sans savoir.

Elle ne lui demandait pas, elle n’y songeait pas même, par où il était entré et comment il avait pénétré dans le jardin. Cela lui paraissait si simple qu’il fût là.

De temps en temps le genou de Marius touchait le genou de Cosette, et tous deux frémissaient.

Par intervalles, Cosette bégayait une parole. Son âme tremblait à ses lèvres comme une goutte de rosée à une fleur.

Peu à peu ils se parlèrent. L’épanchement succéda au silence qui est la plénitude. La nuit était sereine et splendide au-dessus de leur tête. Ces deux êtres, purs comme des esprits, se dirent tout, leurs songes, leurs ivresses, leurs extases, leurs chimères, leurs défaillances, comme ils s’étaient adorés de loin, comme ils s’étaient souhaités, leur désespoir, quand ils avaient cessé de s’apercevoir. Ils se confièrent dans une intimité idéale, que rien déjà ne pouvait plus accroître, ce qu’ils avaient de plus caché et de plus mystérieux. Ils se racontèrent, avec une foi candide dans leurs illusions, tout ce que l’amour, la jeunesse et ce reste d’enfance qu’ils avaient leur mettaient dans la pensée. Ces deux cœurs se versèrent l’un dans l’autre, de sorte qu’au bout d’une heure, c’était le jeune homme qui avait l’âme de la jeune fille et la jeune fille qui avait l’âme du jeune homme. Ils se pénétrèrent, ils s’enchantèrent, ils s’éblouirent.

Quand ils eurent fini, quand ils se furent tout dit, elle posa sa tête sur son épaule et lui demanda:

— Comment vous appelez-vous?

— Je m’appelle Marius, dit-il. Et vous?

— Je m’appelle Cosette.

Livre sixième — Le petit Gavroche

Chapitre I

Méchante espièglerie du vent

Depuis 1823, tandis que la gargote de Montfermeil sombrait et s'engloutissait peu à peu, non dans l'abîme d'une banqueroute, mais dans le cloaque des petites dettes, les mariés Thénardier avaient eu deux autres enfants, mâles tous deux. Cela faisait cinq; deux filles et trois garçons. C'était beaucoup.

La Thénardier s'était débarrassée des deux derniers, encore en bas âge et tout petits, avec un bonheur singulier.

Débarrassée est le mot. Il n'y avait chez cette femme qu'un fragment de nature. Phénomène dont il y a du reste plus d'un exemple. Comme la maréchale de La Mothe-Houdancourt, la Thénardier n'était mère que jusqu'à ses filles. Sa maternité finissait là. Sa haine du genre humain commençait à ses garçons. Du côté de ses fils sa méchanceté était à pic, et son cœur avait à cet endroit un lugubre escarpement. Comme on l'a vu, elle détestait l'aîné; elle exécrait les deux autres. Pourquoi? Parce que. Le plus terrible des motifs et la plus indiscutable des réponses: Parce que. — Je n'ai pas besoin d'une tiaulée d'enfants, disait cette mère.

Expliquons comment les Thénardier étaient parvenus à s'exonérer de leurs deux derniers enfants, et même à en tirer profit.

Cette fille Magnon, dont il a été question quelques pages plus haut, était la même qui avait réussi à faire renter par le bonhomme Gillenormand les deux enfants qu'elle avait. Elle demeurait quai des Célestins, à l'angle de cette antique rue du Petit-Musc qui a fait ce qu'elle a pu pour changer en bonne odeur sa mauvaise renommée. On se souvient de la grande épidémie de croup qui désola, il y a trente-cinq ans, les quartiers riverains de la Seine à Paris, et dont la science profita pour expérimenter sur une large échelle l'efficacité des insufflations d'alun, si utilement remplacées aujourd'hui par la teinture externe d'iode. Dans cette épidémie, la Magnon perdit, le même jour, l'un le matin, l'autre le soir, ses deux garçons, encore en très bas âge. Ce fut un coup. Ces enfants étaient précieux à leur mère; ils représentaient quatre-vingts francs par mois. Ces quatre-vingts francs étaient fort exactement soldés, au nom de M. Gillenormand, par son receveur de rentes, M. Barge, huissier retiré, rue du Roi-de-Sicile. Les enfants morts, la rente était enterrée. La Magnon chercha un expédient. Dans cette ténébreuse maçonnerie du mal dont elle faisait partie, on sait tout, on se garde le secret, et l'on s'entr'aide. Il fallait deux enfants à la Magnon; la Thénardier en avait deux. Même sexe, même âge. Bon arrangement pour l'une, bon placement pour l'autre. Les petits Thénardier devinrent les petits Magnon. La Magnon quitta le quai des Célestins et alla demeurer rue Clocheperce. À Paris, l'identité qui lie un individu à lui-même se rompt d'une rue à l'autre.

L'état civil, n'étant averti de rien, ne réclama pas, et la substitution se fit le plus simplement du monde. Seulement le Thénardier exigea, pour ce prêt d'enfants, dix francs par mois que la Magnon promit, et même paya. Il va sans dire que M. Gillenormand continua de s'exécuter. Il venait tous les six mois voir les petits. Il ne s'aperçut pas du changement. — Monsieur, lui disait la Magnon, comme ils vous ressemblent!

Thénardier, à qui les avatars étaient aisés, saisit cette occasion de devenir Jondrette. Ses deux filles et Gavroche avaient à peine eu le temps de s'apercevoir qu'ils avaient deux petits frères. À un certain degré de misère, on est gagné par une sorte d'indifférence spectrale, et l'on voit les êtres comme des larves. Vos plus proches ne sont souvent pour vous que de vagues formes de l'ombre, à peine distinctes du fond nébuleux de la vie et facilement remêlées à l'invisible.

Le soir du jour où elle avait fait livraison de ses deux petits à la Magnon, avec la volonté bien expresse d'y renoncer à jamais, la Thénardier avait eu, ou fait semblant d'avoir, un scrupule. Elle avait dit à son mari: — Mais c'est abandonner ses enfants, cela! Thénardier, magistral et flegmatique, cautérisa le scrupule avec ce mot: Jean-Jacques Rousseau a fait mieux! Du scrupule la mère avait passé à l'inquiétude: — Mais si la police allait nous tourmenter? Ce que nous avons fait là, monsieur Thénardier, dis donc, est-ce que c'est permis? — Thénardier répondit: — Tout est permis. Personne n'y verra que de l'azur. D'ailleurs, dans des enfants qui n'ont pas le sou, nul n'a intérêt à y regarder de près.

La Magnon était une sorte d'élégante du crime. Elle faisait de la toilette. Elle partageait son logis, meublé d'une façon maniérée et misérable, avec une savante voleuse anglaise francisée. Cette Anglaise naturalisée parisienne, recommandable par des relations fort riches, intimement liée avec les médailles de la bibliothèque et les diamants de Mlle Mars, fut plus tard célèbre dans les sommiers judiciaires. On l'appelait mamselle Miss.

Les deux petits échus à la Magnon n’eurent pas à se plaindre. Recommandés par les quatre-vingts francs, ils étaient ménagés, comme tout ce qui est exploité; point mal vêtus, point mal nourris, traités presque comme «de petits messieurs», mieux avec la fausse mère qu’avec la vraie. La Magnon faisait la dame et ne parlait pas argot devant eux.

Ils passèrent ainsi quelques années. Le Thénardier en augurait bien. Il lui arriva un jour de dire à la Magnon qui lui remettait ses dix francs mensuels: — Il faudra que «le père» leur donne de l’éducation.

Tout à coup, ces deux pauvres enfants, jusque-là assez protégés, même par leur mauvais sort, furent brusquement jetés dans la vie, et forcés de la commencer.

Une arrestation en masse de malfaiteurs comme celle du galetas Jondrette, nécessairement compliquée de perquisitions et d’incarcérations ultérieures, est un véritable désastre pour cette hideuse contre-société occulte qui vit sous la société publique; une aventure de ce genre entraîne toutes sortes d’écroulements dans ce monde sombre. La catastrophe des Thénardier produisit la catastrophe de la Magnon.

Un jour, peu de temps après que la Magnon eut remis à Éponine le billet relatif à la rue Plumet, il se fit rue Clocheperce une subite descente de police; la Magnon fut saisie, ainsi que mamselle Miss, et toute la maisonnée, qui était suspecte, passa dans le coup de filet. Les deux petits garçons jouaient pendant ce temps-là dans une arrière-cour et ne virent rien de la razzia. Quand ils voulurent rentrer, ils trouvèrent la porte fermée et la maison vide. Un savetier d’une échoppe en face les appela et leur remit un papier que «leur mère» avait laissé pour eux. Sur le papier il y avait une adresse: M. Barge, receveur de rentes, rue du Roi-de-Sicile, nº 8. L’homme de l’échoppe leur dit: — Vous ne demeurez plus ici. Allez là. C’est tout près. La première rue à gauche. Demandez votre chemin avec ce papier-ci.

Les enfants partirent, l’aîné menant le cadet, et tenant à la main le papier qui devait les guider. Il avait froid, et ses petits doigts engourdis serraient peu et tenaient mal ce papier. Au détour de la rue Clocheperce, un coup de vent le lui arracha, et, comme la nuit tombait, l’enfant ne put le retrouver.

Ils se mirent à errer au hasard dans les rues.

Chapitre II

Où le petit Gavroche tire parti de Napoléon le Grand

Le printemps à Paris est assez souvent traversé par des bises aigres et dures dont on est, non pas précisément glacé, mais gelé; ces bises, qui attristent les plus belles journées, font exactement l'effet de ces souffles d'air froid qui entrent dans une chambre chaude par les fentes d'une fenêtre ou d'une porte mal fermée. Il semble que la sombre porte de l'hiver soit restée entrebâillée et qu'il vienne du vent par là. Au printemps de 1832, époque où éclata la première grande épidémie de ce siècle en Europe, ces bises étaient plus âpres et plus poignantes que jamais. C'était une porte plus glaciale encore que celle de l'hiver qui était entr'ouverte. C'était la porte du sépulcre. On sentait dans ces bises le souffle du choléra.

Au point de vue météorologique, ces vents froids avaient cela de particulier qu'ils n'excluaient point une forte tension électrique. De fréquents orages, accompagnés d'éclairs et de tonnerres, éclatèrent à cette époque.

Un soir que ces bises soufflaient rudement, au point que janvier semblait revenu et que les bourgeois avaient repris les manteaux, le petit Gavroche, toujours grelottant gaîment sous ses loques, se tenait debout et comme en extase devant la boutique d'un perruquier des environs de l'Orme-Saint-Gervais. Il était orné d'un châle de femme en laine, cueilli on ne sait où, dont il s'était fait un cache-nez. Le petit Gavroche avait l'air d'admirer profondément une mariée en cire, décolletée et coiffée de fleurs d'oranger, qui tournait derrière la vitre, montrant, entre deux quinquets, son sourire aux passants; mais en réalité il observait la boutique afin de voir s'il ne pourrait pas «chiper» dans la devanture un pain de savon, qu'il irait ensuite revendre un sou à un «coiffeur» de la banlieue. Il lui arrivait souvent de déjeuner d'un de ces pains-là. Il appelait ce genre de travail, pour lequel il avait du talent, «faire la barbe aux barbiers».

Tout en contemplant la mariée et tout en lorgnant le pain de savon, il grommelait entre ces dents ceci: — Mardi. — Ce n'est pas mardi. — Est-ce mardi? — C'est peut-être mardi. — Oui, c'est mardi.

On n'a jamais su à quoi avait trait ce monologue.

Si, par hasard, ce monologue se rapportait à la dernière fois où il avait dîné, il y avait trois jours, car on était au vendredi.

Le barbier, dans sa boutique chauffée d'un bon poêle, rasait une pratique et jetait de temps en temps un regard de côté à cet ennemi, à ce gamin gelé et effronté qui avait les deux mains dans ses poches, mais l'esprit évidemment hors du fourreau.

Pendant que Gavroche examinait la mariée, le vitrage et les Windsor-soaps, deux enfants de taille inégale, assez proprement vêtus, et encore plus petits que lui, paraissant l'un sept ans, l'autre cinq, tournèrent timidement le bec-de-cane et entrèrent dans la boutique en demandant on ne sait quoi, la charité peut-être, dans un murmure plaintif et qui ressemblait plutôt à un gémissement qu'à une prière. Ils parlaient tous deux à la fois, et leurs paroles étaient inintelligibles parce que les sanglots coupaient la voix du plus jeune et que le froid faisait claquer les dents de l'aîné. Le barbier se tourna avec un visage furieux, et sans quitter son rasoir, refoulant l'aîné de la main gauche et le petit du genou, les poussa tous deux dans la rue, et referma sa porte en disant:

— Venir refroidir le monde pour rien!

Les deux enfants se remirent en marche en pleurant. Cependant une nuée était venue; il commençait à pleuvoir.

Le petit Gavroche courut après eux et les aborda:

— Qu'est-ce que vous avez donc, moutards?

— Nous ne savons pas où coucher, répondit l'aîné.

— C'est ça? dit Gavroche. Voilà grand'chose. Est-ce qu'on pleure pour ça? Sont-ils serins donc!

Et prenant, à travers sa supériorité un peu goguenarde, un accent d'autorité attendrie et de protection douce:

— Momacques, venez avec moi.

— Oui, monsieur, fit l'aîné.

Et les deux enfants le suivirent comme ils auraient suivi un archevêque. Ils avaient cessé de pleurer.

Gavroche leur fit monter la rue Saint-Antoine dans la direction de la Bastille.

Gavroche, tout en cheminant, jeta un coup d'œil indigné et rétrospectif à la boutique du barbier.

— Ça n'a pas de cœur, ce merlan-là, grommela-t-il. C'est un angliche.

Une fille, les voyant marcher à la file tous les trois, Gavroche en tête, partit d'un rire bruyant. Ce rire manquait de respect au groupe.

— Bonjour, mamselle Omnibus, lui dit Gavroche.

Un instant après, le perruquier lui revenant, il ajouta:

— Je me trompe de bête; ce n'est pas un merlan, c'est un serpent. Perruquier, j'irai chercher un serrurier, et je te ferai mettre une sonnette à la queue.

Ce perruquier l'avait rendu agressif. Il apostropha, en enjambant un ruisseau, une portière barbue et digne de rencontrer Faust sur le Brocken, laquelle avait son balai à la main.

— Madame, lui dit-il, vous sortez donc avec votre cheval?

Et sur ce, il éclaboussa les bottes vernies d'un passant.

— Drôle! cria le passant furieux.

Gavroche leva le nez par-dessus son châle.

— Monsieur se plaint?

— De toi! fit le passant.

— Le bureau est fermé, dit Gavroche, je ne reçois plus de plaintes.

Cependant, en continuant de monter la rue, il avisa, toute glacée sous une porte cochère, une mendiante de treize ou quatorze ans, si court-vêtue qu'on voyait ses genoux. La petite commençait à être trop grande fille pour cela. La croissance vous joue de ces tours. La jupe devient courte au moment où la nudité devient indécente.

— Pauvre fille! dit Gavroche. Ça n'a même pas de culotte. Tiens, prends toujours ça.

Et, défaisant toute cette bonne laine qu'il avait autour du cou, il la jeta sur les épaules maigres et violettes de la mendiante, où le cache-nez redevint châle.

La petite le considéra d'un air étonné et reçut le châle en silence. À un certain degré de détresse, le pauvre, dans sa stupeur, ne gémit plus du mal et ne remercie plus du bien.

Cela fait:

— Brrr! dit Gavroche, plus frissonnant que saint Martin, qui, lui du moins, avait gardé la moitié de son manteau.

Sur ce brrr! l'averse, redoublant d'humeur, fit rage. Ces mauvais ciels-là punissent les bonnes actions.

— Ah çà! s'écria Gavroche, qu'est-ce que cela signifie? Il repleut! Bon Dieu, si cela continue, je me désabonne.

Et il se remit en marche.

— C’est égal, reprit-il en jetant un coup d’œil à la mendiante qui se pelotonnait sous le châle, en voilà une qui a une fameuse pelure.

Et, regardant la nuée, il cria:

— Attrapé!

Les deux enfants emboîtaient le pas derrière lui.

Comme ils passaient devant un de ces épais treillis grillés qui indiquent la boutique d’un boulanger, car on met le pain comme l’or derrière des grillages de fer, Gavroche se tourna:

— Ah çà, mômes, avons-nous dîné?

— Monsieur, répondit l’aîné, nous n’avons pas mangé depuis tantôt ce matin.

— Vous êtes donc sans père ni mère? reprit majestueusement Gavroche.

— Faites excuse, monsieur, nous avons papa et maman, mais nous ne savons pas où ils sont.

— Des fois, cela vaut mieux que de le savoir, dit Gavroche qui était un penseur.

— Voilà, continua l’aîné, deux heures que nous marchons, nous avons cherché des choses au coin des bornes, mais nous ne trouvons rien.

— Je sais, fit Gavroche. C’est les chiens qui mangent tout.

Il reprit après un silence:

— Ah! nous avons perdu nos auteurs. Nous ne savons plus ce que nous en avons fait. Ça ne se doit pas, gamins. C’est bête d’égarer comme ça des gens d’âge. Ah çà! il faut licher pourtant.

Du reste il ne leur fit pas de questions. Être sans domicile, quoi de plus simple?

L’aîné des deux mômes, presque entièrement revenu à la prompte insouciance de l’enfance, fit cette exclamation:

— C’est drôle tout de même. Maman qui avait dit qu’elle nous mènerait chercher du buis bénit le dimanche des rameaux.

— Neurs, répondit Gavroche.

— Maman, reprit l’aîné, est une dame qui demeure avec mamselle Miss.

— Tanflûte, repartit Gavroche.

Cependant il s’était arrêté, et depuis quelques minutes il tâtait et fouillait toutes sortes de recoins qu’il avait dans ses haillons.

Enfin il releva la tête d’un air qui ne voulait qu’être satisfait, mais qui était en réalité triomphant.

— Calmons-nous, les momignards. Voici de quoi souper pour trois.

Et il tira d’une de ses poches un sou.

Sans laisser aux deux petits le temps de s’ébahir, il les poussa tous deux devant lui dans la boutique du boulanger, et mit son sou sur le comptoir en criant:

— Garçon! cinque centimes de pain.

Le boulanger, qui était le maître en personne, prit un pain et un couteau.

— En trois morceaux, garçon! reprit Gavroche, et il ajouta avec dignité:

— Nous sommes trois.

Et voyant que le boulanger, après avoir examiné les trois soupeurs, avait pris un pain bis, il plongea profondément son doigt dans son nez avec une aspiration aussi impérieuse que s’il eût eu au bout du pouce la prise de tabac du grand Frédéric, et jeta au boulanger en plein visage cette apostrophe indignée:

— Keksekça?

Ceux de nos lecteurs qui seraient tentés de voir dans cette interpellation de Gavroche au boulanger un mot russe ou polonais, ou l’un de ces cris sauvages que les Yoways et les Botocudos se lancent du bord d’un fleuve à l’autre à travers les solitudes, sont prévenus que c’est un mot qu’ils disent tous les jours (eux nos lecteurs) et qui tient lieu de cette phrase: qu’est-ce que c’est que cela? Le boulanger comprit parfaitement et répondit:

— Eh mais! c’est du pain, du très bon pain de deuxième qualité.

— Vous voulez dire du larton brutal, reprit Gavroche, calme et froidement dédaigneux. Du pain blanc, garçon! du larton savonné! je régale.

Le boulanger ne put s’empêcher de sourire, et tout en coupant le pain blanc, il les considérait d’une façon compatissante qui choqua Gavroche.

— Ah çà, mitron! dit-il, qu’est-ce que vous avez donc à nous toiser comme ça?

Mis tous trois bout à bout, ils auraient fait à peine une toise.

Quand le pain fut coupé, le boulanger encaissa le sou, et Gavroche dit aux deux enfants:

— Morfilez.

Les petits garçons le regardèrent interdits.

Gavroche se mit à rire:

— Ah! tiens, c’est vrai, ça ne sait pas encore, c’est si petit.

Et il reprit:

— Mangez.

En même temps, il leur tendait à chacun un morceau de pain.

Et, pensant que l’aîné, qui lui paraissait plus digne de sa conversation, méritait quelque encouragement spécial et devait être débarrassé de toute hésitation à satisfaire son appétit, il ajouta en lui donnant la plus grosse part:

— Colle-toi ça dans le fusil.

Il y avait un morceau plus petit que les deux autres; il le prit pour lui.

Les pauvres enfants étaient affamés, y compris Gavroche. Tout en arrachant leur pain à belles dents, ils encombraient la boutique du boulanger qui, maintenant qu’il était payé, les regardait avec humeur.

— Rentrons dans la rue, dit Gavroche.

Ils reprirent la direction de la Bastille.

De temps en temps, quand ils passaient devant les devantures de boutiques éclairées, le plus petit s’arrêtait pour regarder l’heure à une montre en plomb suspendue à son cou par une ficelle.

— Voilà décidément un fort serin, disait Gavroche.

Puis, pensif, il grommelait entre ses dents:

— C’est égal, si j’avais des mômes, je les serrerais mieux que ça.

Comme ils achevaient leur morceau de pain et atteignaient l’angle de cette morose rue des Ballets au fond de laquelle on aperçoit le guichet bas et hostile de la Force:

— Tiens, c’est toi, Gavroche? dit quelqu’un.

— Tiens, c’est toi, Montparnasse? dit Gavroche.

C’était un homme qui venait d’aborder le gamin, et cet homme n’était autre que Montparnasse déguisé, avec des besicles bleues, mais reconnaissable pour Gavroche.

— Mâtin, poursuivit Gavroche, tu as une pelure couleur cataplasme de graine de lin et des lunettes bleues comme un médecin. Tu as du style, parole de vieux!

— Chut, fit Montparnasse, pas si haut!

Et il entraîna vivement Gavroche hors de la lumière des boutiques.

Les deux petits suivaient machinalement en se tenant par la main.

Quand ils furent sous l’archivolte noire d’une porte cochère, à l’abri des regards et de la pluie:

— Sais-tu où je vas? demanda Montparnasse.

— À l’abbaye de Monte-à-Regret, dit Gavroche.

— Farceur!

Et Montparnasse reprit:

— Je vas retrouver Babet.

— Ah! fit Gavroche, elle s’appelle Babet.

Montparnasse baissa la voix.

— Pas elle, lui.

— Ah! Babet!

— Oui, Babet.

— Je le croyais bouclé.

— Il a défait la boucle, répondit Montparnasse.

Et il conta rapidement au gamin que, le matin de ce même jour où ils étaient, Babet, ayant été transféré à la Conciergerie, s’était évadé en prenant à gauche au lieu de prendre à droite dans «le corridor de l’instruction».

Gavroche admira l’habileté.

— Quel dentiste! dit-il.

Montparnasse ajouta quelques détails sur l’évasion de Babet, et termina par:

— Oh! ce n’est pas tout.

Gavroche, tout en écoutant, s’était saisi d’une canne que Montparnasse tenait à la main; il en avait machinalement tiré la partie supérieure, et la lame d’un poignard avait apparu.

— Ah! fit-il en repoussant vivement le poignard, tu as emmené ton gendarme déguisé en bourgeois.

Montparnasse cligna de l’œil.

— Fichtre! reprit Gavroche, tu vas donc te colleter avec les cognes?

— On ne sait pas, répondit Montparnasse d’un air indifférent. Il est toujours bon d’avoir une épingle sur soi.

Gavroche insista:

— Qu’est-ce que tu vas donc faire cette nuit?

Montparnasse prit de nouveau la corde grave et dit en mangeant les syllabes:

— Des choses.

Et, changeant brusquement de conversation:

— À propos!

— Quoi?

— Une histoire de l’autre jour. Figure-toi. Je rencontre un bourgeois. Il me fait cadeau d’un sermon et de sa bourse. Je mets ça dans ma poche. Une minute après, je fouille dans ma poche. Il n’y avait plus rien.

— Que le sermon, fit Gavroche.

— Mais toi, reprit Montparnasse, où vas-tu donc maintenant?

Gavroche montra ses deux protégés et dit:

— Je vas coucher ces enfants-là.

— Où ça, coucher?

— Chez moi.

— Où ça chez toi?

— Chez moi.

— Tu loges donc?

— Oui, je loge.

— Et où loges-tu?

— Dans l’éléphant, dit Gavroche.

Montparnasse, quoique de sa nature peu étonné, ne put retenir une exclamation:

— Dans l’éléphant!

— Eh bien oui, dans l’éléphant! repartit Gavroche. Kekçaa?

Ceci est encore un mot de la langue que personne n’écrit et que tout le monde parle. Kekçaa signifie: qu’est-ce que cela a?

L’observation profonde du gamin ramena Montparnasse au calme et au bon sens. Il parut revenir à de meilleurs sentiments pour le logis de Gavroche.

— Au fait! dit-il, oui, l’éléphant. Y est-on bien?

— Très bien, fit Gavroche. Là, vrai, chenûment. Il n’y a pas de vents coulis comme sous les ponts.

— Comment y entres-tu?

— J’entre.

— E y a donc un trou? demanda Montparnasse.

— Parbleu! Mais il ne faut pas le dire. C’est entre les jambes de devant. Les coqueurs ne l’ont pas vu.

— Et tu grimpes? Oui, je comprends.

— Un tour de main, cric, crac, c’est fait, plus personne.

Après un silence, Gavroche ajouta:

— Pour ces petits j’aurai une échelle.

Montparnasse se mit à rire.

— Où diable as-tu pris ces mômes-là?

Gavroche répondit avec simplicité:

— C’est des momichards dont un perruquier m’a fait cadeau.

Cependant Montparnasse était devenu pensif.

— Tu m’as reconnu bien aisément, murmura-t-il.

Il prit dans sa poche deux petits objets qui n’étaient autre chose que deux tuyaux de plume enveloppés de coton et s’en introduisit un dans chaque narine. Ceci lui faisait un autre nez.

— Ça te change, dit Gavroche, tu es moins laid, tu devrais garder toujours ça.

Montparnasse était joli garçon, mais Gavroche était railleur.

— Sans rire, demanda Montparnasse, comment me trouves-tu?

C’était aussi un autre son de voix. En un clin d’œil, Montparnasse était devenu méconnaissable.

— Oh! fais-nous Porrichinelle! s’écria Gavroche.

Les deux petits, qui n’avaient rien écouté jusque-là, occupés qu’ils étaient eux-mêmes à fourrer leurs doigts dans leur nez, s’approchèrent à ce nom et regardèrent Montparnasse avec un commencement de joie et d’admiration.

Malheureusement Montparnasse était soucieux.

Il posa la main sur l’épaule de Gavroche et lui dit en appuyant sur les mots:

— Écoute ce que je te dis, garçon, si j’étais sur la place, avec mon dogue, ma dague et ma digue, et si vous me prodiguiez dix gros sous, je ne refuserais pas d’y goupiner, mais nous ne sommes pas le mardi gras.

Cette phrase bizarre produisit sur le gamin un effet singulier. Il se tourna vivement, promena avec une attention profonde ses petits yeux brillants autour de lui, et aperçut, à quelques pas, un sergent de ville qui leur tournait le dos. Gavroche laissa échapper un: ah, bon! qu’il réprima sur-le-champ, et, secouant la main de Montparnasse:

— Eh bien, bonsoir, fit-il, je m’en vas à mon éléphant avec mes mômes. Une supposition que tu aurais besoin de moi une nuit, tu viendrais me trouver là. Je loge à l’entresol. Il n’y a pas de portier. Tu demanderais monsieur Gavroche.

— C’est bon, dit Montparnasse.

Et ils se séparèrent, Montparnasse cheminant vers la Grève et Gavroche vers la Bastille. Le petit de cinq ans, traîné par son frère que traînait Gavroche, tourna plusieurs fois la tête en arrière pour voir s’en aller «Porrichinelle».

La phrase amphigourique par laquelle Montparnasse avait averti Gavroche de la présence du sergent de ville ne contenait pas d’autre talisman que l’assonance dig répétée cinq ou six fois sous des formes variées. Cette syllabe dig, non prononcée isolément, mais artistement mêlée aux mots d’une phrase, veut dire: — Prenons garde, on ne peut pas parler librement. — Il y avait en outre dans la phrase de Montparnasse une beauté littéraire qui échappa à Gavroche, c’est mon dogue, ma dague et, ma digue, locution de l’argot du Temple qui signifie, mon chien, mon couteau et ma femme, fort usité parmi les pitres et les queues-rouges du grand siècle où Molière écrivait et où Callot dessinait.

Il y a vingt ans, on voyait encore dans l’angle sud-est de la place de la Bastille près de la gare du canal creusée dans l’ancien fossé de la prison-citadelle, un monument bizarre qui s’est effacé déjà de la mémoire des Parisiens, et qui méritait d’y laisser quelque trace, car c’était une pensée du «membre de l’Institut, général en chef de l’armée d’Égypte».

Nous disons monument, quoique ce ne fût qu’une maquette. Mais cette maquette elle-même, ébauche prodigieuse, cadavre grandiose d’une idée de Napoléon que deux ou trois coups de vent successifs avaient emportée et jetée à chaque fois plus loin de nous, était devenue historique, et avait pris je ne sais quoi de définitif qui contrastait avec son aspect provisoire. C’était un éléphant de quarante pieds de haut, construit en charpente et en maçonnerie, portant sur son dos sa tour qui ressemblait à une maison, jadis peint en vert par un badigeonneur quelconque, maintenant peint en noir par le ciel, la pluie et le temps. Dans cet angle désert et découvert de la place, le large front du colosse, sa trompe, ses défenses, sa tour, sa croupe énorme, ses quatre pieds pareils à des colonnes faisaient, la nuit, sur le ciel étoilé, une silhouette surprenante et terrible. On ne savait ce que cela voulait dire. C’était une sorte de symbole de la force populaire. C’était sombre, énigmatique et immense. C’était on ne sait quel fantôme puissant, visible et debout à côté du spectre invisible de la Bastille.

Peu d’étrangers visitaient cet édifice, aucun passant ne le regardait. Il tombait en ruine; à chaque saison, des plâtras qui se détachaient de ses flancs lui faisaient des plaies hideuses. Les «édiles», comme on dit en patois élégant, l’avaient oublié depuis 1814. Il était là dans son coin, morne, malade, croulant, entouré d’une palissade pourrie, souillée à chaque instant par des cochers ivres; des crevasses lui lézardaient le ventre, une latte lui sortait de la queue, les hautes herbes lui poussaient entre les jambes; et comme le niveau de la place s’élevait depuis trente ans tout autour par ce mouvement lent et continu qui exhausse insensiblement le sol des grandes villes, il était dans un creux et il semblait que la terre s’enfonçât sous lui. Il était immonde, méprisé, repoussant et superbe, laid aux yeux du bourgeois, mélancolique aux yeux du penseur. Il avait quelque chose d’une ordure qu’on va balayer et quelque chose d’une majesté qu’on va décapiter.

Comme nous l’avons dit, la nuit l’aspect changeait. La nuit est le véritable milieu de tout ce qui est ombre. Dès que tombait le crépuscule, le vieil éléphant se transfigurait; il prenait une figure tranquille et redoutable dans la formidable sérénité des ténèbres. Étant du passé, il était de la nuit; et cette obscurité allait à sa grandeur.

Ce monument, rude, trapu, pesant, âpre, austère, presque difforme, mais à coup sûr majestueux et empreint d’une sorte de gravité magnifique et sauvage, a disparu pour laisser régner en paix l’espèce de poêle gigantesque, orné de son tuyau, qui a remplacé la sombre forteresse à neuf tours, à peu près comme la bourgeoisie remplace la féodalité. Il est tout simple qu’un poêle soit le symbole d’une époque dont une marmite contient la puissance. Cette époque passera, elle passe déjà; on commence à comprendre que, s’il peut y avoir de la force dans une chaudière, il ne peut y avoir de puissance que dans un cerveau; en d’autres termes, que ce qui mène et entraîne le monde, ce ne sont pas les locomotives, ce sont les idées. Attelez les locomotives aux idées, c’est bien; mais ne prenez pas le cheval pour le cavalier.

Quoi qu’il en soit, pour revenir à la place de la Bastille, l’architecte de l’éléphant avec du plâtre était parvenu à faire du grand; l’architecte du tuyau de poêle a réussi à faire du petit avec du bronze.

Ce tuyau de poêle, qu’on a baptisé d’un nom sonore et nommé la colonne de Juillet, ce monument manqué d’une révolution avortée, était encore enveloppé en 1832 d’une immense chemise en charpente que nous regrettons pour notre part, et d’un vaste enclos en planches, qui achevait d’isoler l’éléphant.

Ce fut vers ce coin de la place, à peine éclairé du reflet d’un réverbère éloigné, que le gamin dirigea les deux «mômes».

Qu’on nous permette de nous interrompre ici et de rappeler que nous sommes dans la simple réalité, et qu’il y a vingt ans les tribunaux correctionnels eurent à juger, sous prévention de vagabondage et de bris d’un monument public, un enfant qui avait été surpris couché dans l’intérieur même de l’éléphant de la Bastille.

Ce fait constaté, nous continuons.

En arrivant près du colosse, Gavroche comprit l’effet que l’infiniment grand peut produire sur l’infiniment petit, et dit:

— Moutards! n’ayez pas peur.

Puis il entra par une lacune de la palissade dans l’enceinte de l’éléphant et aida les mômes à enjamber la brèche. Les deux enfants, un peu effrayés, suivaient sans dire mot Gavroche et se confiaient à cette petite providence en guenilles qui leur avait donné du pain et leur avait promis un gîte.

Il y avait là, couchée le long de la palissade, une échelle qui servait le jour aux ouvriers du chantier voisin. Gavroche la souleva avec une singulière vigueur, et l’appliqua contre une des jambes de devant de l’éléphant. Vers le point où l’échelle allait aboutir, on distinguait une espèce de trou noir dans le ventre du colosse.

Gavroche montra l’échelle et le trou à ses hôtes et leur dit:

— Montez et entrez.

Les deux petits garçons se regardèrent terrifiés.

— Vous avez peur, mômes! s’écria Gavroche.

Et il ajouta:

— Vous allez voir.

Il étreignit le pied rugueux de l’éléphant, et en un clin d’œil, sans daigner se servir de l’échelle, il arriva à la crevasse. Il y entra comme une couleuvre qui se glisse dans une fente, il s’y enfonça, et un moment après les deux enfants virent vaguement apparaître, comme une forme blanchâtre et blafarde, sa tête pâle au bord du trou plein de ténèbres.

— Eh bien, cria-t-il, montez donc, les momignards! vous allez voir comme on est bien! — Monte, toi! dit-il à l’aîné, je te tends la main.

Les petits se poussèrent de l’épaule, le gamin leur faisait peur et les rassurait à la fois, et puis il pleuvait bien fort. L’aîné se risqua. Le plus jeune, en voyant monter son frère et lui resté tout seul entre les pattes de cette grosse bête, avait bien envie de pleurer, mais il n’osait.

L’aîné gravissait, tout en chancelant, les barreaux de l’échelle; Gavroche, chemin faisant, l’encourageait par des exclamations de maître d’armes à ses écoliers ou de muletier à ses mules:

— Aye pas peur!

— C’est ça!

— Va toujours!

— Mets ton pied là!

— Ta main ici.

— Hardi!

Et quand il fut à sa portée, il l’empoigna brusquement et vigoureusement par le bras et le tira à lui.

— Gobé! dit-il.

Le môme avait franchi la crevasse.

— Maintenant, fit Gavroche, attends-moi. Monsieur, prenez la peine de vous asseoir.

Et, sortant de la crevasse comme il y était entré, il se laissa glisser avec l’agilité d’un ouistiti le long de la jambe de l’éléphant, il tomba debout sur ses pieds dans l’herbe, saisit le petit de cinq ans à bras-le-corps et le planta au beau milieu de l’échelle, puis il se mit à monter derrière lui en criant à l’aîné:

— Je vas le pousser, tu vas le tirer.

En un instant le petit fut monté, poussé, traîné, tiré, bourré, fourré dans le trou sans avoir eu le temps de se reconnaître, et Gavroche, entrant après lui, repoussant d’un coup de talon l’échelle qui tomba sur le gazon, se mit à battre des mains et cria:

— Nous y v’là! Vive le général Lafayette!

Cette explosion passée, il ajouta:

— Les mioches, vous êtes chez moi.

Gavroche était en effet chez lui.

Ô utilité inattendue de l’inutile! charité des grandes choses! bonté des géants! Ce monument démesuré qui avait contenu une pensée de l’Empereur était devenu la boîte d’un gamin. Le môme avait été accepté et abrité par le colosse. Les bourgeois endimanchés qui passaient devant l’éléphant de la Bastille disaient volontiers en le toisant d’un air de mépris avec leurs yeux à fleur de tête: — À quoi cela sert-il? — Cela servait à sauver du froid, du givre, de la grêle, de la pluie, à garantir du vent d’hiver, à préserver du sommeil dans la boue qui donne la fièvre et du sommeil dans la neige qui donne la mort, un petit être sans père ni mère, sans pain, sans vêtements, sans asile. Cela servait à recueillir l’innocent que la société repoussait. Cela servait à diminuer la faute publique. C’était une tanière ouverte à celui auquel toutes les portes étaient fermées. Il semblait que le vieux mastodonte misérable, envahi par la vermine et par l’oubli, couvert de verrues, de moisissures et d’ulcères, chancelant, vermoulu, abandonné, condamné, espèce de mendiant colossal demandant en vain l’aumône d’un regard bienveillant au milieu du carrefour, avait eu pitié, lui, de cet autre mendiant, du pauvre pygmée qui s’en allait sans souliers aux pieds, sans plafond sur la tête, soufflant dans ses doigts, vêtu de chiffons, nourri de ce qu’on jette. Voilà à quoi servait l’éléphant de la Bastille. Cette idée de Napoléon, dédaignée par les hommes, avait été reprise par Dieu. Ce qui n’eût été qu’illustre était devenu auguste. Il eût fallu à l’Empereur, pour réaliser ce qu’il méditait, le porphyre, l’airain, le fer, l’or, le marbre; à Dieu le vieil assemblage de planches, de solives et de plâtras suffisait. L’Empereur avait eu un rêve de génie; dans cet éléphant titanique, armé, prodigieux, dressant sa trompe, portant sa tour, et faisant jaillir de toutes parts autour de lui des eaux joyeuses et vivifiantes, il voulait incarner le peuple; Dieu en avait fait une chose plus grande, il y logeait un enfant.

Le trou par où Gavroche était entré était une brèche à peine visible du dehors, cachée qu’elle était, nous l’avons dit, sous le ventre de l’éléphant, et si étroite qu’il n’y avait guère que des chats et des mômes qui pussent y passer.

— Commençons, dit Gavroche, par dire au portier que nous n’y sommes pas.

Et plongeant dans l’obscurité avec certitude comme quelqu’un qui connaît son appartement, il prit une planche et en boucha le trou.

Gavroche replongea dans l’obscurité. Les enfants entendirent le reniflement de l’allumette enfoncée dans la bouteille phosphorique. L’allumette chimique n’existait pas encore; le briquet Fumade représentait à cette époque le progrès.

Une clarté subite leur fit cligner les yeux; Gavroche venait d’allumer un de ces bouts de ficelle trempés dans la résine qu’on appelle rats de cave. Le rat de cave, qui fumait plus qu’il n’éclairait, rendait confusément visible le dedans de l’éléphant.

Les deux hôtes de Gavroche regardèrent autour d’eux et éprouvèrent quelque chose de pareil à ce qu’éprouverait quelqu’un qui serait enfermé dans la grosse tonne de Heidelberg, ou mieux encore à ce que dut éprouver Jonas dans le ventre biblique de la baleine. Tout un squelette gigantesque leur apparaissait et les enveloppait. En haut, une longue poutre brune d’où partaient de distance en distance de massives membrures cintrées figurait la colonne vertébrale avec les côtes, des stalactites de plâtre y pendaient comme des viscères, et d’un côté à l’autre de vastes toiles d’araignée faisaient des diaphragmes poudreux. On voyait çà et là dans les coins de grosses taches noirâtres qui avaient l'air de vivre et qui se déplaçaient rapidement avec un mouvement brusque et effaré.

Les débris tombés du dos de l'éléphant sur son ventre en avaient comblé la concavité, de sorte qu'on pouvait y marcher comme sur un plancher.

Le plus petit se rencogna contre son frère et dit à demi-voix:

— C'est noir.

Ce mot fit exclamer Gavroche. L'air pétrifié des deux mômes rendait une secousse nécessaire.

— Qu'est-ce que vous me fichez? s'écria-t-il. Blaguons-nous? faisons-nous les dégoûtés? vous faut-il pas les Tuileries? Seriez-vous des brutes? Dites-le. Je vous préviens que je ne suis pas du régiment des godiches. Ah çà, est-ce que vous êtes les moutards du moutardier du pape?

Un peu de rudoiement est bon dans l'épouvante. Cela rassure. Les deux enfants se rapprochèrent de Gavroche.

Gavroche, paternellement attendri de cette confiance, passa «du grave au doux» et s'adressant au plus petit:

— Bêta, lui dit-il en accentuant l'injure d'une nuance caressante, c'est dehors que c'est noir. Dehors il pleut, ici il ne pleut pas; dehors il fait froid, ici il n'y a pas une miette de vent; dehors il y a des tas de monde, ici il n'y a personne; dehors il n'y a pas même la lune, ici il y a ma chandelle, nom d'unch!

Les deux enfants commençaient à regarder l'appartement avec moins d'effroi; mais Gavroche ne leur laissa pas plus longtemps le loisir de la contemplation.

— Vite, dit-il.

Et il les poussa vers ce que nous sommes très heureux de pouvoir appeler le fond de la chambre.

Là était son lit.

Le lit de Gavroche était complet. C'est-à-dire qu'il y avait un matelas, une couverture et une alcôve avec rideaux.

Le matelas était une natte de paille, la couverture un assez vaste pagne de grosse laine grise fort chaud et presque neuf. Voici ce que c'était que l'alcôve:

Trois échalas assez longs enfoncés et consolidés dans les gravois du sol, c'est-à-dire du ventre de l'éléphant, deux en avant, un en arrière, et réunis par une corde à leur sommet, de manière à former un faisceau pyramidal. Ce faisceau supportait un treillage de fil de laiton qui était simplement posé dessus, mais artistement appliqué et maintenu par des attaches de fil de fer, de sorte qu'il enveloppait entièrement les trois échalas. Un cordon de grosses pierres fixait tout autour ce treillage sur le sol, de manière à ne rien laisser passer. Ce treillage n'était autre chose qu'un morceau de ces grillages de cuivre dont on revêt les volières dans les ménageries. Le lit de Gavroche était sous ce grillage comme dans une cage. L'ensemble ressemblait à une tente d'Esquimau.

C'est ce grillage qui tenait lieu de rideaux.

Gavroche dérangea un peu les pierres qui assujettissaient le grillage par devant; les deux pans du treillage qui retombaient l'un sur l'autre s'écartèrent.

— Mômes, à quatre pattes! dit Gavroche.

Il fit entrer avec précaution ses hôtes dans la cage, puis il y entra après eux, en rampant, rapprocha les pierres et referma hermétiquement l'ouverture.

Ils s'étaient étendus tous trois sur la natte.

Si petits qu'ils fussent, aucun d'eux n'eût pu se tenir debout dans l'alcôve. Gavroche avait toujours le rat de cave à sa main.

— Maintenant, dit-il, pioncez! Je vas supprimer le candélabre.

— Monsieur, demanda l'aîné des deux frères à Gavroche en montrant le grillage, qu'est-ce que c'est donc que ça?

— Ça, dit Gavroche gravement, c'est pour les rats. — Pioncez!

Cependant il se crut obligé d'ajouter quelques paroles pour l'instruction de ces êtres en bas âge, et il continua:

— C'est des choses du Jardin des plantes. Ça sert aux animaux féroces. Gniena (il y en a) plein un magasin. Gnia (il n'y a) qu'à monter par-dessus un mur, qu'à grimper par une fenêtre et qu'à passer sous une porte. On en a tant qu'on veut.

Tout en parlant, il enveloppait d'un pan de la couverture le tout petit qui murmura:

— Oh! c'est bon! c'est chaud!

Gavroche fixa un œil satisfait sur la couverture.

— C'est encore du Jardin des plantes, dit-il. J'ai pris ça aux singes.

Et montrant à l'aîné la natte sur laquelle il était couché, natte fort épaisse et admirablement travaillée, il ajouta:

— Ça, c'était à la girafe.

Après une pause, il poursuivit:

— Les bêtes avaient tout ça. Je le leur ai pris. Ça ne les a pas fâchées. Je leur ai dit: C’est pour l’éléphant.

Il fit encore un silence et reprit:

— On passe par-dessus les murs et on se fiche du gouvernement. V’là.

Les deux enfants considéraient avec un respect craintif et stupéfait cet être intrépide et inventif, vagabond comme eux, isolé comme eux, chétif comme eux, qui avait quelque chose d’admirable et de tout-puissant, qui leur semblait surnaturel, et dont la physionomie se composait de toutes les grimaces d’un vieux saltimbanque mêlées au plus naïf et au plus charmant sourire.

— Monsieur, fit timidement l’aîné, vous n’avez donc pas peur des sergents de ville?

Gavroche se borna à répondre:

— Môme! on ne dit pas les sergents de ville, on dit les cognes.

Le tout petit avait les yeux ouverts, mais il ne disait rien. Comme il était au bord de la natte, l’aîné étant au milieu, Gavroche lui borda la couverture comme eût fait une mère et exhaussa la natte sous sa tête avec de vieux chiffons de manière à faire au môme un oreiller. Puis il se tourna vers l’aîné.

— Hein? on est joliment bien, ici!

— Ah oui! répondit l’aîné en regardant Gavroche avec une expression d’ange sauvé.

Les deux pauvres petits enfants tout mouillés commençaient à se réchauffer.

— Ah çà, continua Gavroche, pourquoi donc est-ce que vous pleuriez?

Et montrant le petit à son frère:

— Un mioche comme ça, je ne dis pas; mais un grand comme toi, pleurer, c’est crétin; on a l’air d’un veau.

— Dame, fit l’enfant, nous n’avions plus du tout de logement où aller.

— Moutard! reprit Gavroche, on ne dit pas un logement, on dit une piolle.

— Et puis nous avions peur d’être tout seuls comme ça la nuit.

— On ne dit pas la nuit, on dit la sorgue.

— Merci, monsieur, dit l’enfant.

— Écoute, repartit Gavroche, il ne faut plus geindre jamais pour rien. J’aurai soin de vous. Tu verras comme on s’amuse. L’été, nous irons à la Glacière avec Navet, un camarade à moi, nous nous baignerons à la Gare, nous courrons tout nus sur les trains devant le pont d'Austerlitz, ça fait rager les blanchisseuses. Elles crient, elles bisquent, si tu savais comme elles sont farces! Nous irons voir l'homme squelette. Il est en vie. Aux Champs-Élysées. Il est maigre comme tout, ce paroissien-là. Et puis je vous conduirai au spectacle. Je vous mènerai à Frédérick-Lemaître. J'ai des billets, je connais des acteurs, j'ai même joué une fois dans une pièce. Nous étions des mômes comme ça, on courait sous une toile, ça faisait la mer. Je vous ferai engager à mon théâtre. Nous irons voir les sauvages. Ce n'est pas vrai, ces sauvages-là. Ils ont des maillots roses qui font des plis, et on leur voit aux coudes des reprises en fil blanc. Après ça, nous irons à l'Opéra. Nous entrerons avec les claqueurs. La claque à l'Opéra est très bien composée. Je n'irais pas avec la claque sur les boulevards. À l'Opéra, figure-toi, il y en a qui payent vingt sous, mais c'est des bêtas. On les appelle des lavettes. — Et puis nous irons voir guillotiner. Je vous ferai voir le bourreau. Il demeure rue des Marais. Monsieur Sanson. Il y a une boîte aux lettres à la porte. Ah! on s'amuse fameusement!

En ce moment, une goutte de cire tomba sur le doigt de Gavroche et le rappela aux réalités de la vie.

— Bigre! dit-il, v'là la mèche qui s'use. Attention! je ne peux pas mettre plus d'un sou par mois à mon éclairage. Quand on se couche, il faut dormir. Nous n'avons pas le temps de lire des romans de monsieur Paul de Kock. Avec ça que la lumière pourrait passer par les fentes de la porte cochère, et les cognes n'auraient qu'à voir.

— Et puis, observa timidement l'aîné qui seul osait causer avec Gavroche et lui donner la réplique, un fumeron pourrait tomber dans la paille, il faut prendre garde de brûler la maison.

— On ne dit pas brûler la maison, fit Gavroche, on dit riffauder le bocard.

L'orage redoublait. On entendait, à travers des roulements de tonnerre, l'averse battre le dos du colosse.

— Enfoncé, la pluie! dit Gavroche. Ça m'amuse d'entendre couler la carafe le long des jambes de la maison. L'hiver est une bête; il perd sa marchandise, il perd sa peine, il ne peut pas nous mouiller, et ça le fait bougonner, ce vieux porteur d'eau-là.

Cette allusion au tonnerre, dont Gavroche, en sa qualité de philosophe du dix-neuvième siècle, acceptait toutes les conséquences, fut suivie d'un large éclair, si éblouissant que quelque chose en entra par la crevasse dans le ventre de l'éléphant. Presque en même temps la foudre gronda, et très furieusement. Les deux petits poussèrent un cri, et se soulevèrent si vivement que le treillage en fut presque écarté; mais Gavroche tourna vers eux sa face hardie et profita du coup de tonnerre pour éclater de rire.

— Du calme, enfants. Ne bousculons pas l'édifice. Voilà du beau tonnerre, à la bonne heure! Ce n'est pas là de la gnognotte d'éclair. Bravo le bon Dieu! nom d'unch! c'est presque aussi bien qu'à l'Ambigu.

Cela dit, il refit l'ordre dans le treillage, poussa doucement les deux enfants sur le chevet du lit, pressa leurs genoux pour les bien étendre tout de leur long et s'écria:

— Puisque le bon Dieu allume sa chandelle, je peux souffler la mienne. Les enfants, il faut dormir, mes jeunes humains. C'est très mauvais de ne pas dormir. Ça vous ferait schlinguer du couloir, ou, comme on dit dans le grand monde, puer de la gueule. Entortillez-vous bien de la pelure! je vas éteindre. Y êtes-vous?

— Oui, murmura l'aîné, je suis bien. J'ai comme de la plume sous la tête.

— On ne dit pas la tête, cria Gavroche, on dit la tronche.

Les deux enfants se serrèrent l'un contre l'autre. Gavroche acheva de les arranger sur la natte et leur monta la couverture jusqu'aux oreilles, puis répéta pour la troisième fois l'injonction en langue hiératique:

— Pioncez!

Et il souffla le lumignon.

À peine la lumière était-elle éteinte qu'un tremblement singulier commença à ébranler le treillage sous lequel les trois enfants étaient couchés. C'était une multitude de frottements sourds qui rendaient un son métallique, comme si des griffes et des dents grinçaient sur le fil de cuivre. Cela était accompagné de toutes sortes de petits cris aigus.

Le petit garçon de cinq ans, entendant ce vacarme au-dessus de sa tête et glacé d'épouvante, poussa du coude son frère aîné, mais le frère aîné «pionçait» déjà, comme Gavroche le lui avait ordonné. Alors le petit, n'en pouvant plus de peur, osa interpeller Gavroche, mais tout bas, en retenant son haleine:

— Monsieur?

— Hein? fit Gavroche qui venait de fermer les paupières.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est donc que ça?

— C'est les rats, répondit Gavroche.

Et il remit sa tête sur la natte.

Les rats en effet, qui pullulaient par milliers dans la carcasse de l’éléphant et qui étaient ces taches noires vivantes dont nous avons parlé, avaient été tenus en respect par la flamme de la bougie tant qu’elle avait brillé, mais dès que cette caverne, qui était comme leur cité, avait été rendue à la nuit, sentant là ce que le bon conteur Perrault appelle «de la chair fraîche», ils s’étaient rués en foule sur la tente de Gavroche, avaient grimpé jusqu’au sommet, et en mordaient les mailles comme s’ils cherchaient à percer cette zinzelière d’un nouveau genre.

Cependant le petit ne s’endormait pas.

— Monsieur! reprit-il.

— Hein? fit Gavroche.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est donc que les rats?

— C’est des souris.

Cette explication rassura un peu l’enfant. Il avait vu dans sa vie des souris blanches et il n’en avait pas eu peur. Pourtant il éleva encore la voix:

— Monsieur?

— Hein? refit Gavroche.

— Pourquoi n’avez-vous pas un chat?

— J’en ai eu un, répondit Gavroche, j’en ai apporté un, mais ils me l’ont mangé.

Cette seconde explication défit l’œuvre de la première, et le petit recommença à trembler. Le dialogue entre lui et Gavroche reprit pour la quatrième fois.

— Monsieur!

— Hein?

— Qui ça qui a été mangé?

— Le chat.

— Qui ça qui a mangé le chat?

— Les rats.

— Les souris?

— Oui, les rats.

L’enfant, consterné de ces souris qui mangent les chats, poursuivit:

— Monsieur, est-ce qu’elles nous mangeraient, ces souris-là?

— Pardi! fit Gavroche.

La terreur de l’enfant était au comble. Mais Gavroche ajouta:

— N’eïlle pas peur! ils ne peuvent pas entrer. Et puis je suis là! Tiens, prends ma main. Tais-toi, et pionce!

Gavroche en même temps prit la main du petit par-dessus son frère. L’enfant serra cette main contre lui et se sentit rassuré. Le courage et la force ont de ces communications mystérieuses. Le silence s’était refait autour d’eux, le bruit des voix avait effrayé et éloigné les rats; au bout de quelques minutes ils eurent beau revenir et faire rage, les trois mômes, plongés dans le sommeil, n’entendaient plus rien.

Les heures de la nuit s’écoulèrent. L’ombre couvrait l’immense place de la Bastille, un vent d’hiver qui se mêlait à la pluie soufflait par bouffées, les patrouilles furetaient les portes, les allées, les enclos, les coins obscurs, et, cherchant les vagabonds nocturnes, passaient silencieusement devant l’éléphant; le monstre, debout, immobile, les yeux ouverts dans les ténèbres, avait l’air de rêver comme satisfait de sa bonne action, et abritait du ciel et des hommes les trois pauvres enfants endormis.

Pour comprendre ce qui va suivre, il faut se souvenir qu’à cette époque le corps de garde de la Bastille était situé à l’autre extrémité de la place, et que ce qui se passait près de l’éléphant ne pouvait être ni aperçu, ni entendu par la sentinelle.

Vers la fin de cette heure qui précède immédiatement le point du jour, un homme déboucha de la rue Saint-Antoine en courant, traversa la place, tourna le grand enclos de la colonne de Juillet, et se glissa entre les palissades jusque sous le ventre de l’éléphant. Si une lumière quelconque eût éclairé cet homme, à la manière profonde dont il était mouillé, on eût deviné qu’il avait passé la nuit sous la pluie. Arrivé sous l’éléphant, il fit entendre un cri bizarre qui n’appartient à aucune langue humaine et qu’une perruche seule pourrait reproduire. Il répéta deux fois ce cri dont l’orthographe que voici donne à peine quelque idée:

— Kirikikiou!

Au second cri, une voix claire, gaie et jeune, répondit du ventre de l’éléphant:

— Oui.

Presque immédiatement, la planche qui fermait le trou se dérangea et donna passage à un enfant qui descendit le long du pied de l’éléphant et vint lestement tomber près de l’homme. C’était Gavroche. L’homme était Montparnasse.

Quant à ce cri, kirikikiou, c’était là sans doute ce que l’enfant voulait dire par: Tu demanderas monsieur Gavroche.

En l’entendant, il s’était réveillé en sursaut, avait rampé hors de son «alcôve», en écartant un peu le grillage qu’il avait ensuite refermé soigneusement, puis il avait ouvert la trappe et était descendu.

L’homme et l’enfant se reconnurent silencieusement dans la nuit; Montparnasse se borna à dire:

— Nous avons besoin de toi. Viens nous donner un coup de main.

Le gamin ne demanda pas d’autre éclaircissement.

— Me v’là, dit-il.

Et tous deux se dirigèrent vers la rue Saint-Antoine, d’où sortait Montparnasse, serpentant rapidement à travers la longue file des charrettes de maraîchers qui descendent à cette heure-là vers la halle.

Les maraîchers accroupis dans leurs voitures parmi les salades et les légumes, à demi assoupis, enfouis jusqu’aux yeux dans leurs roulières à cause de la pluie battante, ne regardaient même pas ces étranges passants.

Chapitre III

Les péripéties de l’évasion

Voici ce qui avait eu lieu cette même nuit à la Force:

Une évasion avait été concertée entre Babet, Brujon, Gueulemer et Thénardier, quoique Thénardier fût au secret. Babet avait fait l’affaire pour son compte, le jour même, comme on a vu d’après le récit de Montparnasse à Gavroche. Montparnasse devait les aider du dehors.

Brujon, ayant passé un mois dans une chambre de punition, avait eu le temps, premièrement, d’y tresser une corde, deuxièmement, d’y mûrir un plan. Autrefois ces lieux sévères où la discipline de la prison livre le condamné à lui-même, se composaient de quatre murs de pierre, d’un plafond de pierre, d’un pavé de dalles, d’un lit de camp, d’une lucarne grillée, d’une porte doublée de fer, et s’appelaient cachots; mais le cachot a été jugé trop horrible; maintenant cela se compose d’une porte de fer, d’une lucarne grillée, d’un lit de camp, d’un pavé de dalles, d’un plafond de pierre, de quatre murs de pierre, et cela s’appelle chambre de punition. Il y fait un peu jour vers midi. L’inconvénient de ces chambres qui, comme on voit, ne sont pas des cachots, c’est de laisser songer des êtres qu’il faudrait faire travailler.

Brujon donc avait songé, et il était sorti de la chambre de punition avec une corde. Comme on le réputait fort dangereux dans la cour Charlemagne, on le mit dans le Bâtiment-Neuf. La première chose qu’il trouva dans le Bâtiment-Neuf, ce fut Gueulemer, la seconde, ce fut un clou; Gueulemer, c’est-à-dire le crime, un clou, c’est-à-dire la liberté.

Brujon, dont il est temps de se faire une idée complète, était, avec une apparence de complexion délicate et une langueur profondément préméditée, un gaillard poli, intelligent et voleur qui avait le regard caressant et le sourire atroce. Son regard résultait de sa volonté et son sourire résultait de sa nature. Ses premières études dans son art s’étaient dirigées vers les toits; il avait fait faire de grands progrès à l’industrie des arracheurs de plomb qui dépouillent les toitures et dépiautent les gouttières par le procédé dit au gras-double.

Ce qui achevait de rendre l’instant favorable pour une tentative d’évasion, c’est que les couvreurs remaniaient et rejointoyaient, en ce moment-là même, une partie des ardoises de la prison. La cour Saint-Bernard n’était plus absolument isolée de la cour Charlemagne et de la cour Saint-Louis. Il y avait par là-haut des échafaudages et des échelles; en d’autres termes, des ponts et des escaliers du côté de la délivrance.

Le Bâtiment-Neuf, qui était tout ce qu’on pouvait voir au monde de plus lézardé et de plus décrépit, était le point faible de la prison. Les murs en étaient à ce point rongés par le salpêtre qu’on avait été obligé de revêtir d’un parement de bois les voûtes des dortoirs, parce qu’il s’en détachait des pierres qui tombaient sur les prisonniers dans leurs lits. Malgré cette vétusté, on faisait la faute d’enfermer dans le Bâtiment-Neuf les accusés les plus inquiétants, d’y mettre «les fortes causes», comme on dit en langage de prison.

Le Bâtiment-Neuf contenait quatre dortoirs superposés et un comble qu’on appelait le Bel-Air. Un large tuyau de cheminée, probablement de quelque ancienne cuisine des ducs de La Force, partait du rez-de-chaussée, traversait les quatre étages, coupait en deux tous les dortoirs où il figurait une façon de pilier aplati, et allait trouer le toit.

Gueulemer et Brujon étaient dans le même dortoir. On les avait mis par précaution dans l’étage d’en bas. Le hasard faisait que la tête de leurs lits s’appuyait au tuyau de la cheminée.

Thénardier se trouvait précisément au-dessus de leur tête dans ce comble qualifié le Bel-Air.

Le passant qui s’arrête rue Culture-Sainte-Catherine, après la caserne des pompiers, devant la porte cochère de la maison des Bains, voit une cour pleine de fleurs et d’arbustes en caisses, au fond de laquelle se développe, avec deux ailes, une petite rotonde blanche égayée par des contrevents verts, le rêve bucolique de Jean-Jacques. Il n’y a pas plus de dix ans, au-dessus de cette rotonde s’élevait un mur noir, énorme, affreux, nu, auquel elle était adossée. C’était le mur du chemin de ronde de la Force.

Ce mur derrière cette rotonde, c’était Milton entrevu derrière Berquin.

Si haut qu’il fût, ce mur était dépassé par un toit plus noir encore qu’on apercevait au delà. C’était le toit du Bâtiment-Neuf. On y remarquait quatre lucarnes-mansardes armées de barreaux, c’étaient les fenêtres du Bel-Air. Une cheminée perçait ce toit; c’était la cheminée qui traversait les dortoirs.

Le Bel-Air, ce comble du Bâtiment-Neuf, était une espèce de grande halle mansardée, fermée de triples grilles et de portes doublées de tôle que constellaient des clous démesurés. Quand on y entrait par l’extrémité nord, on avait à sa gauche les quatre lucarnes, et à sa droite, faisant face aux lucarnes, quatre cages carrées assez vastes, espacées, séparées par des couloirs étroits, construites jusqu'à hauteur d'appui en maçonnerie et le reste jusqu'au toit en barreaux de fer.

Thénardier était au secret dans une de ces cages, depuis la nuit du 3 février. On n'a jamais pu découvrir comment, et par quelle connivence, il avait réussi à s'y procurer et à y cacher une bouteille de ce vin inventé, dit-on, par Desrues, auquel se mêle un narcotique et que la bande des Endormeurs a rendu célèbre.

Il y a dans beaucoup de prisons des employés traîtres, mi-partis geôliers et voleurs, qui aident aux évasions, qui vendent à la police une domesticité infidèle, et qui font danser l'anse du panier à salade.

Dans cette même nuit donc, où le petit Gavroche avait recueilli les deux enfants errants, Brujon et Gueulemer, qui savaient que Babet, évadé le matin même, les attendait dans la rue ainsi que Montparnasse, se levèrent doucement et se mirent à percer avec le clou que Brujon avait trouvé le tuyau de cheminée auquel leurs lits touchaient. Les gravois tombaient sur le lit de Brujon, de sorte qu'on ne les entendait pas. Les giboulées mêlées de tonnerre ébranlaient les portes sur leurs gonds et faisaient dans la prison un vacarme affreux et utile. Ceux des prisonniers qui se réveillèrent firent semblant de se rendormir et laissèrent faire Gueulemer et Brujon. Brujon était adroit; Gueulemer était vigoureux. Avant qu'aucun bruit fût parvenu au surveillant couché dans la cellule grillée qui avait jour sur le dortoir, le mur était percé, la cheminée escaladée, le treillis de fer qui fermait l'orifice supérieur du tuyau forcé, et les deux redoutables bandits sur le toit. La pluie et le vent redoublaient, le toit glissait.

— Quelle bonne sorgue pour une crampe! dit Brujon.

Un abîme de six pieds de large et de quatre-vingts pieds de profondeur les séparait du mur de ronde. Au fond de cet abîme ils voyaient reluire dans l'obscurité le fusil d'un factionnaire. Ils attachèrent par un bout aux tronçons des barreaux de la cheminée qu'ils venaient de tordre la corde que Brujon avait filée dans son cachot, lancèrent l'autre bout par-dessus le mur de ronde, franchirent d'un bond l'abîme, se cramponnèrent au chevron du mur, l'enjambèrent, se laissèrent glisser l'un après l'autre le long de la corde sur un petit toit qui touche à la maison des Bains, ramenèrent leur corde à eux, sautèrent dans la cour des Bains, la traversèrent, poussèrent le vasistas du portier, auprès duquel pendait son cordon, tirèrent le cordon, ouvrirent la porte cochère, et se trouvèrent dans la rue.

Il n'y avait pas trois quarts d'heure qu'ils s'étaient levés debout sur leurs lits dans les ténèbres, leur clou à la main, leur projet dans la tête.

Quelques instants après, ils avaient rejoint Babet et Montparnasse qui rôdaient dans les environs.

En tirant leur corde à eux, ils l'avaient cassée, et il en était resté un morceau attaché à la cheminée sur le toit. Ils n'avaient du reste d'autre avarie que de s'être à peu près entièrement enlevé la peau des mains.

Cette nuit-là, Thénardier était prévenu, sans qu'on ait pu éclaircir de quelle façon, et ne dormait pas.

Vers une heure du matin, la nuit étant très noire, il vit passer sur le toit, dans la pluie et dans la bourrasque, devant la lucarne qui était vis-à-vis de sa cage, deux ombres. L'une s'arrêta à la lucarne le temps d'un regard. C'était Brujon. Thénardier le reconnut, et comprit. Cela lui suffit.

Thénardier, signalé comme escarpe et détenu sous prévention de guet-apens nocturne à main armée, était gardé à vue. Un factionnaire, qu'on relevait de deux heures en deux heures, se promenait le fusil chargé devant sa cage. Le Bel-Air était éclairé par une applique. Le prisonnier avait aux pieds une paire de fers du poids de cinquante livres. Tous les jours à quatre heures de l'après-midi, un gardien escorté de deux dogues, — cela se faisait encore ainsi à cette époque, — entrait dans sa cage, déposait près de son lit un pain noir de deux livres, une cruche d'eau et une écuelle pleine d'un bouillon assez maigre où nageaient quelques gourganes, visitait ses fers et frappait sur les barreaux. Cet homme avec ses dogues revenait deux fois dans la nuit.

Thénardier avait obtenu la permission de conserver une espèce de cheville en fer dont il se servait pour clouer son pain dans une fente de la muraille, «afin, disait-il, de le préserver des rats». Comme on gardait Thénardier à vue, on n'avait point trouvé d'inconvénient à cette cheville. Cependant on se souvint plus tard qu'un gardien avait dit: — Il vaudrait mieux ne lui laisser qu'une cheville en bois.

À deux heures du matin on vint changer le factionnaire qui était un vieux soldat, et on le remplaça par un conscrit. Quelques instants après, l'homme aux chiens fit sa visite, et s'en alla sans avoir rien remarqué, si ce n'est la trop grande jeunesse et «l'air paysan» du «tourlourou». Deux heures après, à quatre heures, quand on vint relever le conscrit, on le trouva endormi et tombé à terre comme un bloc près de la cage de Thénardier. Quant à Thénardier, il n'y était plus. Ses fers brisés étaient sur le carreau. Il y avait un trou au plafond de sa cage, et, au-dessus, un autre trou dans le toit. Une planche de son lit avait été arrachée et sans doute emportée, car on ne la retrouva point. On saisit aussi dans la cellule une bouteille à moitié vidée qui contenait le reste du vin stupéfiant avec lequel le soldat avait été endormi. La bayonnette du soldat avait disparu.

Au moment où ceci fut découvert, on crut Thénardier hors de toute atteinte. La réalité est qu'il n'était plus dans le Bâtiment-Neuf, mais qu'il était encore fort en danger. Son évasion n'était point consommée.

Thénardier, en arrivant sur le toit du Bâtiment-Neuf, avait trouvé le reste de la corde de Brujon qui pendait aux barreaux de la trappe supérieure de la cheminée, mais ce bout cassé étant beaucoup trop court, il n'avait pu s'évader par-dessus le chemin de ronde comme avaient fait Brujon et Gueulemer.

Quand on détourne de la rue des Ballets dans la rue du Roi-de-Sicile, on rencontre presque tout de suite à droite un enfoncement sordide. Il y avait là au siècle dernier une maison dont il ne reste plus que le mur de fond, véritable mur de masure qui s'élève à la hauteur d'un troisième étage entre les bâtiments voisins. Cette ruine est reconnaissable à deux grandes fenêtres carrées qu'on y voit encore; celle du milieu, la plus proche du pignon de droite, est barrée d'une solive vermoulue ajustée en chevron d'étai. À travers ces fenêtres on distinguait autrefois une haute muraille lugubre qui était un morceau de l'enceinte du chemin de ronde de la Force.

Le vide que la maison démolie a laissé sur la rue est à moitié rempli par une palissade en planches pourries contrebutée de cinq bornes de pierre. Dans cette clôture se cache une petite baraque appuyée à la ruine restée debout. La palissade a une porte qui, il y a quelques années, n'était fermée que d'un loquet.

C'est sur la crête de cette ruine que Thénardier était parvenu un peu après trois heures du matin.

Comment était-il arrivé là? C'est ce qu'on n'a jamais pu expliquer ni comprendre. Les éclairs avaient dû tout ensemble le gêner et l'aider. S'était-il servi des échelles et des échafaudages des couvreurs pour gagner de toit en toit, de clôture en clôture, de compartiment en compartiment, les bâtiments de la cour Charlemagne, puis les bâtiments de la cour Saint-Louis, le mur de ronde, et de là la masure sur la rue du Roi-de-Sicile? Mais il y avait dans ce trajet des solutions de continuité qui semblaient le rendre impossible. Avait-il posé la planche de son lit comme un pont du toit du Bel-Air au mur du chemin de ronde, et s’était-il mis à ramper à plat ventre sur le chevron du mur de ronde tout autour de la prison jusqu’à la masure? Mais le mur du chemin de ronde de la Force dessinait une ligne crénelée et inégale, il montait et descendait, il s’abaissait à la caserne des pompiers, il se relevait à la maison des Bains, il était coupé par des constructions, il n’avait pas la même hauteur sur l’hôtel Lamoignon que sur la rue Pavée, il avait partout des chutes et des angles droits; et puis les sentinelles auraient dû voir la sombre silhouette du fugitif; de cette façon encore le chemin fait par Thénardier reste à peu près inexplicable. Des deux manières, fuite impossible. Thénardier, illuminé par cette effrayante soif de la liberté qui change les précipices en fossés, les grilles de fer en claies d’osier, un cul-de-jatte en athlète, un podagre en oiseau, la stupidité en instinct, l’instinct en intelligence et l’intelligence en génie, Thénardier avait-il inventé et improvisé une troisième manière? On ne l’a jamais su.

On ne peut pas toujours se rendre compte des merveilles de l’évasion. L’homme qui s’échappe, répétons-le, est un inspiré; il y a de l’étoile et de l’éclair dans la mystérieuse lueur de la fuite; l’effort vers la délivrance n’est pas moins surprenant que le coup d’aile vers le sublime; et l’on dit d’un voleur évadé: Comment a-t-il fait pour escalader ce toit? de même qu’on dit de Corneille: Où a-t-il trouvé Qu’il mourût?

Quoi qu’il en soit, ruisselant de sueur, trempé par la pluie, les vêtements en lambeaux, les mains écorchées, les coudes en sang, les genoux déchirés, Thénardier était arrivé sur ce que les enfants, dans leur langue figurée, appellent le coupant du mur de la ruine, il s’y était couché tout de son long, et là, la force lui avait manqué. Un escarpement à pic de la hauteur d’un troisième étage le séparait du pavé de la rue.

La corde qu’il avait était trop courte.

Il attendait là, pâle, épuisé, désespéré de tout l’espoir qu’il avait eu, encore couvert par la nuit, mais se disant que le jour allait venir, épouvanté de l’idée d’entendre avant quelques instants sonner à l’horloge voisine de Saint-Paul quatre heures, heure où l’on viendrait relever la sentinelle et où on la trouverait endormie sous le toit percé, regardant avec stupeur, à une profondeur terrible, à la lueur des réverbères, le pavé mouillé et noir, ce pavé désiré et effroyable qui était la mort et qui était la liberté.

Il se demandait si ses trois complices d'évasion avaient réussi, s'ils l'avaient attendu, et s'ils viendraient à son aide. Il écoutait. Excepté une patrouille, personne n'avait passé dans la rue depuis qu'il était là. Presque toute la descente des maraîchers de Montreuil, de Charonne, de Vincennes et de Bercy à la halle se fait par la rue Saint-Antoine.

Quatre heures sonnèrent. Thénardier tressaillit, peu d'instants après, cette rumeur effarée et confuse qui suit une évasion découverte éclata dans la prison. Le bruit des portes qu'on ouvre et qu'on ferme, le grincement des grilles sur leurs gonds, le tumulte du corps de garde, les appels rauques des guichetiers, le choc des crosses de fusil sur le pavé des cours, arrivaient jusqu'à lui. Des lumières montaient et descendaient aux fenêtres grillées des dortoirs, une torche courait sur le comble du Bâtiment-Neuf, les pompiers de la caserne d'à côté avaient été appelés. Leurs casques, que la torche éclairait dans la pluie, allaient et venaient le long des toits. En même temps Thénardier voyait du côté de la Bastille une nuance blafarde blanchir lugubrement le bas du ciel.

Lui était sur le haut d'un mur de dix pouces de large, étendu sous l'averse, avec deux gouffres à droite et à gauche, ne pouvant bouger, en proie au vertige d'une chute possible et à l'horreur d'une arrestation certaine, et sa pensée, comme le battant d'une cloche, allait de l'une de ces idées à l'autre: — Mort si je tombe, pris si je reste.

Dans cette angoisse, il vit tout à coup, la rue étant encore tout à fait obscure, un homme qui se glissait le long des murailles et qui venait du côté de la rue Pavée s'arrêter dans le renfoncement au-dessus duquel Thénardier était comme suspendu. Cet homme fût rejoint par un second qui marchait avec la même précaution, puis par un troisième, puis par un quatrième. Quand ces hommes furent réunis, l'un d'eux souleva le loquet de la porte de la palissade, et ils entrèrent tous quatre dans l'enceinte où est la baraque. Ils se trouvaient précisément au-dessous de Thénardier. Ces hommes avaient évidemment choisi ce renfoncement pour pouvoir causer sans être vus des passants ni de la sentinelle qui garde le guichet de la Force à quelques pas de là. Il faut dire aussi que la pluie tenait cette sentinelle bloquée dans sa guérite. Thénardier, ne pouvant distinguer leurs visages, prêta l'oreille à leurs paroles avec l'attention désespérée d'un misérable qui se sent perdu.

Thénardier vit passer devant ses yeux quelque chose qui ressemblait à l'espérance, ces hommes parlaient argot.

Le premier disait, bas, mais distinctement:

— Décarrons. Qu’est-ce que nous maquillons icigo?

Le second répondit:

— Allons nous en. Qu’est-ce que nous faisons ici?

— Il lansquine à éteindre le riffe du rabouin. Et puis les coqueurs vont passer, il y a là un grivier qui porte gaffe, nous allons nous faire emballer icicaille.

Ces deux mots, icigo et icicaille, qui tous deux veulent dire ici, et qui appartiennent, le premier à l’argot des barrières, le second à l’argot du Temple, furent des traits de lumière pour Thénardier. À icigo il reconnut Brujon, qui était rôdeur de barrières, et à icicaille Babet, qui, parmi tous ses métiers, avait été revendeur au Temple.

L’antique argot du grand siècle ne se parle plus qu’au Temple, et Babet était le seul même qui le parlât bien purement. Sans icicaille, Thénardier ne l’aurait point reconnu, car il avait tout à fait dénaturé sa voix.

Cependant le troisième était intervenu:

— Rien ne presse encore, attendons un peu. Qu’est-ce qui nous dit qu’il n’a pas besoin de nous?

À ceci, qui n’était que du français, Thénardier reconnut Montparnasse, lequel mettait son élégance à entendre tous les argots et à n’en parler aucun.

Quant au quatrième, il se taisait, mais ses vastes épaules le dénonçaient. Thénardier n’hésita pas. C’était Gueulemer.

Brujon répliqua presque impétueusement, mais toujours à voix basse:

— Qu’est-ce que tu nous bonis là? Le tapissier n’aura pas pu tirer sa crampe. Il ne sait pas le truc, quoi! Bouliner sa limace et faucher ses empaffes pour maquiller une tortouse, caler des boulins aux lourdes, braser des faffes, maquiller des caroubles, faucher les durs, balancer sa tortouse dehors, se planquer, se camoufler, il faut être mariol! Le vieux n’aura pas pu, il ne sait pas goupiner!

Babet ajouta, toujours dans ce sage argot classique que parlaient Poulailler et Cartouche, et qui est à l’argot hardi, nouveau, coloré et risqué dont usait Brujon ce que la langue de Racine est à la langue d’André Chénier:

— Ton orgue tapissier aura été fait marron dans l’escalier. Il faut être arcasien. C’est un galifard. Il se sera laissé jouer l’harnache par un roussin, peut-être même par un roussi, qui lui aura battu comtois. Prête l’oche, Montparnasse, entends-tu ces criblements dans le collège? Tu as vu toutes ces camoufles. Il est tombé, va! Il en sera quitte pour tirer ses vingt longes.

Je n’ai pas taf, je ne suis pas un taffeur, c’est colombé, mais il n’y a plus qu’à faire les lézards, ou autrement on nous la fera gambiller. Ne renaude pas, viens avec nousiergue, allons picter une rouillarde encible.

— On ne laisse pas les amis dans l’embarras, grommela Montparnasse.

— Je te bonis qu’il est malade, reprit Brujon. À l’heure qui toque, le tapissier ne vaut pas une broque! Nous n’y pouvons rien. Décarrons. Je crois à tout moment qu’un cogne me ceintre en pogne!

Montparnasse ne résistait plus que faiblement; le fait est que ces quatre hommes, avec cette fidélité qu’ont les bandits de ne jamais s’abandonner entre eux, avaient rôdé toute la nuit autour de la Force, quel que fût le péril, dans l’espérance de voir surgir au haut de quelque muraille Thénardier. Mais la nuit qui devenait vraiment trop belle, c’était une averse à rendre toutes les rues désertes, le froid qui les gagnait, leurs vêtements trempés, leurs chaussures percées, le bruit inquiétant qui venait d’éclater dans la prison, les heures écoulées, les patrouilles rencontrées, l’espoir qui s’en allait, la peur qui revenait, tout cela les poussait à la retraite. Montparnasse lui-même, qui était peut-être un peu le gendre de Thénardier, cédait. Un moment de plus, ils étaient partis. Thénardier haletait sur son mur comme les naufragés de la Méduse sur leur radeau en voyant le navire apparu s’évanouir à l’horizon.

Il n’osait les appeler, un cri entendu pouvait tout perdre, il eut une idée, une dernière, une lueur; il prit dans sa poche le bout de la corde de Brujon qu’il avait détaché de la cheminée du Bâtiment-Neuf, et le jeta dans l’enceinte de la palissade.

Cette corde tomba à leurs pieds.

— Une veuve, dit Babet.

— Ma tortouse! dit Brujon.

— L’aubergiste est là, dit Montparnasse.

Ils levèrent les yeux. Thénardier avança un peu la tête.

— Vite! dit Montparnasse, as-tu l’autre bout de la corde, Brujon?

— Oui.

— Noue les deux bouts ensemble, nous lui jetterons la corde, il la fixera au mur, il en aura assez pour descendre.

Thénardier se risqua à élever la voix.

— Je suis transi.

— On te réchauffera.

— Je ne puis plus bouger.

— Tu te laisseras glisser, nous te recevrons.

— J’ai les mains gourdes.

— Noue seulement la corde au mur.

— Je ne pourrai pas.

— Il faut que l’un de nous monte, dit Montparnasse.

— Trois étages! fit Brujon.

Un ancien conduit en plâtre, lequel avait servi à un poêle qu’on allumait jadis dans la baraque, rampait le long du mur et montait presque jusqu’à l’endroit où l’on apercevait Thénardier. Ce tuyau, alors fort lézardé et tout crevassé, est tombé depuis, mais on en voit encore les traces. Il était fort étroit.

— On pourrait monter par là, fit Montparnasse.

— Par ce tuyau? s’écria Babet, un orgue! jamais! il faudrait un mion.

— Il faudrait un môme, reprit Brujon.

— Où trouver un moucheron? dit Gueulemer.

— Attendez, dit Montparnasse. J’ai l’affaire.

Il entr’ouvrit doucement la porte de la palissade, s’assura qu’aucun passant ne traversait la rue, sortit avec précaution, referma la porte derrière lui, et partit en courant dans la direction de la Bastille.

Sept ou huit minutes s’écoulèrent, huit mille siècles pour Thénardier; Babet, Brujon et Gueulemer ne desserraient pas les dents; la porte se rouvrit enfin, et Montparnasse parut, essoufflé, et amenant Gavroche. La pluie continuait de faire la rue complètement déserte.

Le petit Gavroche entra dans l’enceinte et regarda ces figures de bandits d’un air tranquille. L’eau lui dégouttait des cheveux. Gueulemer lui adressa la parole:

— Mioche, es-tu un homme?

Gavroche haussa les épaules et répondit:

— Un môme comme mézig est un orgue, et des orgues comme vousailles sont des mômes.

— Comme le mion joue du crachoir! s’écria Babet.

— Le môme pantinois n’est pas maquillé de fertille lansquinée, ajouta Brujon.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il vous faut? dit Gavroche.

Montparnasse répondit:

— Grimper par ce tuyau.

— Avec cette veuve, fît Babet.

— Et ligoter la tortouse, continua Brujon.

— Au monté du montant, reprit Babet.

— Au pieu de la vanterne, ajouta Brujon.

— Et puis? dit Gavroche.

— Voilà! dit Gueulemer.

Le gamin examina la corde, le tuyau, le mur, les fenêtres, et fit cet inexprimable et dédaigneux bruit des lèvres qui signifie:

— Que ça!

— Il y a un homme là-haut que tu sauveras, reprit Montparnasse.

— Veux-tu? reprit Brujon.

— Serin! répondit l’enfant comme si la question lui paraissait inouïe; et il ôta ses souliers.

Gueulemer saisit Gavroche d’un bras, le posa sur le toit de la baraque, dont les planches vermoulues pliaient sous le poids de l’enfant, et lui remit la corde que Brujon avait renouée pendant l’absence de Montparnasse. Le gamin se dirigea vers le tuyau où il était facile d’entrer grâce à une large crevasse qui touchait au toit. Au moment où il allait monter, Thénardier, qui voyait le salut et la vie s’approcher, se pencha au bord du mur; la première lueur du jour blanchissait son front inondé de sueur, ses pommettes livides, son nez effilé et sauvage, sa barbe grise toute hérissée, et Gavroche le reconnut.

— Tiens! dit-il, c’est mon père!... Oh! cela n’empêche pas.

Et prenant la corde dans ses dents, il commença résolûment l’escalade.

Il parvint au haut de la masure, enfourcha le vieux mur comme un cheval, et noua solidement la corde à la traverse supérieure de la fenêtre.

Un moment après, Thénardier était dans la rue.

Dès qu’il eut touché le pavé, dès qu’il se sentit hors de danger, il ne fut plus ni fatigué, ni transi, ni tremblant; les choses terribles dont il sortait s’évanouirent comme une fumée, toute cette étrange et féroce intelligence se réveilla, et se trouva debout et libre, prête à marcher devant elle. Voici quel fut le premier mot de cet homme:

— Maintenant, qui allons-nous manger?

Il est inutile d’expliquer le sens de ce mot affreusement transparent qui signifie tout à la fois tuer, assassiner et dévaliser. Manger, sens vrai: dévorer.

— Rencognons-nous bien, dit Brujon. Finissons en trois mots, et nous nous séparerons tout de suite. Il y avait une affaire qui avait l’air bonne rue Plumet, une rue déserte, une maison isolée, une vieille grille pourrie sur un jardin, des femmes seules.

— Eh bien! pourquoi pas? demanda Thénardier.

— Ta fée, Éponine, a été voir la chose, répondit Babet.

— Et elle a apporté un biscuit à Magnon, ajouta Gueulemer. Rien à maquiller là.

— La fée n’est pas loffe, fit Thénardier. Pourtant il faudra voir.

— Oui, oui, dit Brujon, il faudra voir.

Cependant aucun de ces hommes n’avait plus l’air de voir Gavroche qui, pendant ce colloque, s’était assis sur une des bornes de la palissade; il attendit quelques instants, peut-être que son père se tournât vers lui, puis il remit ses souliers, et dit:

— C’est fini? Vous n’avez plus besoin de moi, les hommes? vous voilà tirés d’affaire. Je m’en vas. Il faut que j’aille lever mes mômes.

Et il s’en alla.

Les cinq hommes sortirent l’un après l’autre de la palissade.

Quand Gavroche eut disparu au tournant de la rue des Ballets, Babet prit Thénardier à part:

— As-tu regardé ce mion? lui demanda-t-il.

— Quel mion?

— Le mion qui a grimpé au mur et t’a porté la corde.

— Pas trop.

— Eh bien, je ne sais pas, mais il me semble que c’est ton fils.

— Bah! dit Thénardier, crois-tu?

Et il s’en alla.

Livre septième — L’argot

Chapitre I

Origine

Pigritia est un mot terrible.

Il engendre un monde, la pègre, lisez: le vol, et un enfer, la pégrenne, lisez: la faim.

Ainsi la paresse est mère.

Elle a un fils, le vol, et une fille, la faim.

Où sommes-nous en ce moment? Dans l'argot.

Qu'est-ce que l'argot? C'est tout à la fois la nation et l'idiome; c'est le vol sous ses deux espèces, peuple et langue.

Lorsqu'il y a trente-quatre ans, le narrateur de cette grave et sombre histoire introduisait au milieu d'un ouvrage écrit dans le même but que celui-ci un voleur parlant argot, il y eut ébahissement et clameur. — Quoi! comment! l'argot? Mais l'argot est affreux! mais c'est la langue des chiourmes, des bagnes, des prisons, de tout ce que la société a de plus abominable! etc., etc., etc.

Nous n'avons jamais compris ce genre d'objections.

Depuis, deux puissants romanciers, dont l'un est un profond observateur du cœur humain, l'autre un intrépide ami du peuple, Balzac et Eugène Sue, ayant fait parler des bandits dans leur langue naturelle comme l'avait fait en 1828 l'auteur du Dernier jour d'un condamné, les mêmes réclamations se sont élevées. On a répété: — Que nous veulent les écrivains avec ce révoltant patois? l'argot est odieux! l'argot fait frémir!

Qui le nie? Sans doute.

Lorsqu'il s'agit de sonder une plaie, un gouffre ou une société, depuis quand est-ce un tort de descendre trop avant, d'aller au fond? Nous avions toujours pensé que c'était quelquefois un acte de courage, et tout au moins une action simple et utile, digne de l'attention sympathique que mérite le devoir accepté et accompli. Ne pas tout explorer, ne pas tout étudier, s'arrêter en chemin, pourquoi? S'arrêter est le fait de la sonde et non du sondeur.

Certes, aller chercher dans les bas-fonds de l'ordre social, là où la terre finit et où la boue commence, fouiller dans ces vagues épaisses, poursuivre, saisir et jeter tout palpitant sur le pavé cet idiome abject qui ruisselle de fange ainsi tiré au jour, ce vocabulaire pustuleux dont chaque mot semble un anneau immonde d'un monstre de la vase et des ténèbres, ce n'est ni une tâche attrayante, ni une tâche aisée. Rien n'est plus lugubre que de contempler ainsi à nu, à la lumière de la pensée, le fourmillement effroyable de l'argot. Il semble en effet que ce soit une sorte d'horrible bête faite pour la nuit qu'on vient d'arracher de son cloaque. On croit voir une affreuse broussaille vivante et hérissée qui tressaille, se meut, s'agite, redemande l'ombre, menace et regarde. Tel mot ressemble à une griffe, tel autre à un œil éteint et sanglant; telle phrase semble remuer comme une pince de crabe. Tout cela vit de cette vitalité hideuse des choses qui se sont organisées dans la désorganisation.

Maintenant, depuis quand l'horreur exclut-elle l'étude? depuis quand la maladie chasse-t-elle le médecin? Se figure-t-on un naturaliste qui refuserait d'étudier la vipère, la chauve-souris, le scorpion, la scolopendre, la tarentule, et qui les rejetterait dans leurs ténèbres en disant: Oh! que c'est laid! Le penseur qui se détournerait de l'argot ressemblerait à un chirurgien qui se détournerait d'un ulcère ou d'une verrue. Ce serait un philologue hésitant à examiner un fait de la langue, un philosophe hésitant à scruter un fait de l'humanité. Car, il faut bien le dire à ceux qui l'ignorent, l'argot est tout ensemble un phénomène littéraire et un résultat social. Qu'est-ce que l'argot proprement dit? L'argot est la langue de la misère.

Ici on peut nous arrêter; on peut généraliser le fait, ce qui est quelquefois une manière de l'atténuer, on peut nous dire que tous les métiers, toutes les professions, on pourrait presque ajouter tous les accidents de la hiérarchie sociale et toutes les formes de l'intelligence, ont leur argot. Le marchand qui dit: Montpellier disponible; Marseille belle qualité, l'agent de change qui dit: report, prime, fin courant, le joueur qui dit: tiers et tout, refait de pique, l'huissier des îles normandes qui dit: l'affieffeur s'arrêtant à son fonds ne peut clâmer les fruits de ce fonds pendant la saisie héréditale des immeubles du renonciateur, le vaudevilliste qui dit: on a égayé l'ours, le comédien qui dit: j'ai fait four, le philosophe qui dit: triplicité phénoménale, le chasseur qui dit: voileci allais, voileci fuyant, le phrénologue qui dit: amativité, combativité, sécrétivité, le fantassin qui dit: ma clarinette, le cavalier qui dit: mon poulet d'Inde, le maître d'armes qui dit: tierce, quarte, rompez, l'imprimeur qui dit: parlons batio, tous, imprimeur, maître d'armes, cavalier, fantassin, phrénologue, chasseur, philosophe, comédien, vaudevilliste, huissier, joueur, agent de change, marchand, parlent argot. Le peintre qui dit: mon rapin, le notaire qui dit: mon saute-ruisseau, le perruquier qui dit: mon commis, le savetier qui dit: mon gniaf, parlent argot. À la rigueur, et si on le veut absolument, toutes ces façons diverses de dire la droite et la gauche, le matelot bâbord et tribord, le machiniste, côté cour et côté jardin, le bedeau, côté de l'épître et côté de l'évangile, sont de l'argot. Il y a l'argot des mijaurées comme il y a eu l'argot des précieuses. L'hôtel de Rambouillet confinait quelque peu à la Cour des Miracles. Il y a l'argot des duchesses, témoin cette phrase écrite dans un billet doux par une très grande dame et très jolie femme de la Restauration: «Vous trouverez dans ces potains-là une foultitude de raisons pour que je me libertise.» Les chiffres diplomatiques sont de l'argot; la chancellerie pontificale, en disant 26 pour Rome, grkztntgzyal pour envoi et abfxustgrnogrkzu tu XI pour duc de Modène, parle argot. Les médecins du moyen âge qui, pour dire carotte, radis et navet, disaient: opoponach, perfroschinum, reptitalmus, dracatholicum angelorum, postmegorum, parlaient argot. Le fabricant de sucre qui dit: vergeoise, tête, claircé, tape, lumps, mélis, bâtarde, commun, brûlé, plaque, cet honnête manufacturier parle argot. Une certaine école de critique d'il y a vingt ans qui disait: — La moitié de Shakespeare est jeux de mots et calembours, — parlait argot. Le poète et l'artiste qui, avec un sens profond, qualifieront M. de Montmorency «un bourgeois», s'il ne se connaît pas en vers et en statues, parlent argot. L'académicien classique qui appelle les fleurs Flore, les fruits Pomone, la mer Neptune, l'amour les feux, la beauté les appas, un cheval un coursier, la cocarde blanche ou tricolore la rose de Bellone, le chapeau à trois cornes le triangle de Mars, l'académicien classique parle argot. L'algèbre, la médecine, la botanique, ont leur argot. La langue qu'on emploie à bord, cette admirable langue de la mer, si complète et si pittoresque, qu'ont parlée Jean Bart, Duquesne, Suffren et Duperré, qui se mêle au sifflement des agrès, au bruit des porte-voix, au choc des haches d'abordage, au roulis, au vent, à la rafale, au canon, est tout un argot héroïque et éclatant qui est au farouche argot de la pègre ce que le lion est au chacal.

Sans doute. Mais, quoi qu'on en puisse dire, cette façon de comprendre le mot argot est une extension, que tout le monde même n'admettra pas. Quant à nous, nous conservons à ce mot sa vieille acception précise, circonscrite et déterminée, et nous restreignons l'argot à l'argot. L'argot véritable, l'argot par excellence, Si ces deux mots peuvent s'accoupler, l’immémorial argot qui était un royaume, n’est autre chose, nous le répétons, que la langue laide, inquiète, sournoise, traître, venimeuse, cruelle, louche, vile, profonde, fatale, de la misère. Il y a, à l’extrémité de tous les abaissements et de toutes les infortunes, une dernière misère qui se révolte et qui se décide à entrer en lutte contre l’ensemble des faits heureux et des droits régnants; lutte affreuse où, tantôt rusée, tantôt violente, à la fois malsaine et féroce, elle attaque l’ordre social à coups d’épingle par le vice et à coup de massue par le crime. Pour les besoins de cette lutte, la misère a inventé une langue de combat qui est l’argot.

Faire surnager et soutenir au-dessus de l’oubli, au-dessus du gouffre, ne fût-ce qu’un fragment d’une langue quelconque que l’homme a parlée et qui se perdrait, c’est-à-dire un des éléments, bons ou mauvais, dont la civilisation se compose ou se complique, c’est étendre les données de l’observation sociale, c’est servir la civilisation même. Ce service, Plaute l’a rendu, le voulant ou ne le voulant pas, en faisant parler le phénicien à deux soldats carthaginois; ce service, Molière l’a rendu en faisant parler le levantin et toutes sortes de patois à tant de ses personnages. Ici les objections se raniment. Le phénicien, à merveille! le levantin, à la bonne heure! même le patois, passe! ce sont des langues qui ont appartenu à des nations ou à des provinces; mais l’argot? à quoi bon conserver l’argot? à quoi bon «faire surnager» l’argot?

À cela nous ne répondrons qu’un mot. Certes, si la langue qu’a parlée une nation ou une province est digne d’intérêt, il est une chose plus digne encore d’attention et d’étude, c’est la langue qu’a parlée une misère.

C’est la langue qu’a parlée en France, par exemple, depuis plus de quatre siècles, non seulement une misère, mais la misère, toute la misère humaine possible.

Et puis, nous y insistons, étudier les difformités et les infirmités sociales et les signaler pour les guérir, ce n’est point une besogne où le choix soit permis. L’historien des mœurs et des idées n’a pas une mission moins austère que l’historien des événements. Celui-ci a la surface de la civilisation, les luttes des couronnes, les naissances de princes, les mariages de rois, les batailles, les assemblées, les grands hommes publics, les révolutions au soleil, tout le dehors; l’autre historien a l’intérieur, le fond, le peuple qui travaille, qui souffre et qui attend, la femme accablée, l’enfant qui agonise, les guerres sourdes d’homme à homme, les férocités obscures, les préjugés, les iniquités convenues, les contre-coups souterrains de la loi, les évolutions secrètes des âmes, les tressaillements indistincts des multitudes, les meurt-de-faim, les va-nu-pieds, les bras-nus, les déshérités, les orphelins, les malheureux et les infâmes, toutes les larves qui errent dans l'obscurité. Il faut qu'il descende, le cœur plein de charité et de sévérité à la fois, comme un frère et comme un juge, jusqu'à ces casemates impénétrables où rampent pêle-mêle ceux qui saignent et ceux qui frappent, ceux qui pleurent et ceux qui maudissent, ceux qui jeûnent et ceux qui dévorent, ceux qui endurent le mal et ceux qui le font. Ces historiens des cœurs et des âmes ont-ils des devoirs moindres que les historiens des faits extérieurs? Croit-on qu'Alighieri ait moins de choses à dire que Machiavel? Le dessous de la civilisation, pour être plus profond et plus sombre, est-il moins important que le dessus? Connaît-on bien la montagne quand on ne connaît pas la caverne?

Disons-le du reste en passant, de quelques mots de ce qui précède on pourrait inférer entre les deux classes d'historiens une séparation tranchée qui n'existe pas dans notre esprit. Nul n'est bon historien de la vie patente, visible, éclatante et publique des peuples s'il n'est en même temps, dans une certaine mesure, historien de leur vie profonde et cachée; et nul n'est bon historien du dedans s'il ne sait être, toutes les fois que besoin est, historien du dehors. L'histoire des mœurs et des idées pénètre l'histoire des événements, et réciproquement. Ce sont deux ordres de faits différents qui se répondent, qui s'enchaînent toujours et s'engendrent souvent. Tous les linéaments que la providence trace à la surface d'une nation ont leurs parallèles sombres, mais distincts, dans le fond, et toutes les convulsions du fond produisent des soulèvements à la surface. La vraie histoire étant mêlée à tout, le véritable historien se mêle de tout.

L'homme n'est pas un cercle à un seul centre; c'est une ellipse à deux foyers. Les faits sont l'un, les idées sont l'autre.

L'argot n'est autre chose qu'un vestiaire où la langue, ayant quelque mauvaise action à faire, se déguise. Elle s'y revêt de mots masques et de métaphores haillons.

De la sorte elle devient horrible.

On a peine à la reconnaître. Est-ce bien la langue française, la grande langue humaine? La voilà prête à entrer en scène et à donner au crime la réplique, et propre à tous les emplois du répertoire du mal. Elle ne marche plus, elle clopine; elle boite sur la béquille de la Cour des miracles, béquille métamorphosable en massue; elle se nomme truanderie; tous les spectres, ses habilleurs, l’ont grimée; elle se traîne et se dresse, double allure du reptile. Elle est apte à tous les rôles désormais, faite louche par le faussaire, vert-de-grisée par l’empoisonneur, charbonnée de la suie de l’incendiaire; et le meurtrier lui met son rouge.

Quand on écoute, du côté des honnêtes gens, à la porte de la société, on surprend le dialogue de ceux qui sont dehors. On distingue des demandes et des réponses. On perçoit, sans le comprendre, un murmure hideux, sonnant presque comme l’accent humain, mais plus voisin du hurlement que de la parole. C’est l’argot. Les mots sont difformes, et empreints d’on ne sait quelle bestialité fantastique. On croit entendre des hydres parler.

C’est l’inintelligible dans le ténébreux. Cela grince et cela chuchote, complétant le crépuscule par l’énigme. Il fait noir dans le malheur, il fait plus noir encore dans le crime; ces deux noirceurs amalgamées composent l’argot. Obscurité dans l’atmosphère, obscurité dans les actes, obscurité dans les voix. Épouvantable langue crapaude qui va, vient, sautèle, rampe, bave, et se meut monstrueusement dans cette immense brume grise faite de pluie, de nuit, de faim, de vice, de mensonge, d’injustice, de nudité, d’asphyxie et d’hiver, plein midi des misérables.

Ayons compassion des châtiés. Hélas! qui sommes-nous nous-mêmes? qui suis-je, moi qui vous parle? qui êtes-vous, vous qui m’écoutez? d’où venons-nous? et est-il bien sûr que nous n’ayons rien fait avant d’être nés? La terre n’est point sans ressemblance avec une geôle. Qui sait si l’homme n’est pas un repris de justice divine?

Regardez la vie de près. Elle est ainsi faite qu’on y sent partout de la punition.

Êtes-vous ce qu’on appelle un heureux? Eh bien, vous êtes triste tous les jours. Chaque jour a son grand chagrin ou son petit souci. Hier, vous trembliez pour une santé qui vous est chère, aujourd’hui vous craignez pour la vôtre, demain ce sera une inquiétude d’argent, après-demain la diatribe d’un calomniateur, l’autre après-demain le malheur d’un ami; puis le temps qu’il fait, puis quelque chose de cassé ou de perdu, puis un plaisir que la conscience et la colonne vertébrale vous reprochent; une autre fois, la marche des affaires publiques. Sans compter les peines de cœur. Et ainsi de suite. Un nuage se dissipe, un autre se reforme. À peine un jour sur cent de pleine joie et de plein soleil. Et vous êtes de ce petit nombre qui a le bonheur! Quant aux autres hommes, la nuit stagnante est sur eux.

Les esprits réfléchis usent peu de cette locution: les heureux et les malheureux. Dans ce monde, vestibule d’un autre évidemment, il n’y a pas d’heureux.

La vraie division humaine est celle-ci: les lumineux et les ténébreux.

Diminuer le nombre des ténébreux, augmenter le nombre des lumineux, voilà le but. C’est pourquoi nous crions: enseignement! science! Apprendre à lire, c’est allumer du feu; toute syllabe épelée étincelle.

Du reste qui dit lumière ne dit pas nécessairement joie. On souffre dans la lumière; l’excès brûle. La flamme est ennemie de l’aile. Brûler sans cesser de voler, c’est là le prodige du génie.

Quand vous connaîtrez et quand vous aimerez, vous souffrirez encore. Le jour naît en larmes. Les lumineux pleurent, ne fût-ce que sur les ténébreux.

L’argot, est la langue des ténébreux.

Chapitre II

Racines

La pensée est émue dans ses plus sombres profondeurs, la philosophie sociale est sollicitée à ses méditations les plus poignantes, en présence de cet énigmatique dialecte à la fois flétri et révolté. C'est là qu'il y a du châtiment visible. Chaque syllabe y a l'air marquée. Les mots de la langue vulgaire y apparaissent comme froncés et racornis sous le fer rouge du bourreau. Quelques-uns semblent fumer encore. Telle phrase vous fait l'effet de l'épaule fleurdelysée d'un voleur brusquement mise à nu. L'idée refuse presque de se laisser exprimer par ces substantifs repris de justice. La métaphore y est parfois si effrontée qu'on sent qu'elle a été au carcan.

Du reste, malgré tout cela et à cause de tout cela, ce patois étrange a de droit son compartiment dans ce grand casier impartial où il y a place pour le liard oxydé comme pour la médaille d'or, et qu'on nomme la littérature. L'argot, qu'on y consente ou non, a sa syntaxe et sa poésie. C'est une langue. Si, à la difformité de certains vocables, on reconnaît qu'elle a été mâchée par Mandrin, à la splendeur de certaines métonymies, on sent que Villon l'a parlée.

Ce vers si exquis et si célèbre:

Mais où sont les neiges d'antan?

est un vers d'argot. Antan — ante annum — est un mot de l'argot de Thunes qui signifiait l'an passé et par extension autrefois. On pouvait encore lire il y a trente-cinq ans, à l'époque du départ de la grande chaîne de 1827, dans un des cachots de Bicêtre, cette maxime gravée au clou sur le mur par un roi de Thunes condamné aux galères: Les dabs d'antan trimaient siempre pour la pierre du Coësre. Ce qui veut dire: Les rois d'autrefois allaient toujours se faire sacrer. Dans la pensée de ce roi-là, le sacre, c'était le bagne.

Le mot décarade, qui exprime le départ d'une lourde voiture au galop, est attribué à Villon, et il en est digne. Ce mot, qui fait feu des quatre pieds, résume dans une onomatopée magistrale tout l'admirable vers de La Fontaine:

Six forts chevaux tiraient un coche.

Au point de vue purement littéraire, peu d'études seraient plus curieuses et plus fécondes que celle de l'argot. C'est toute une langue dans la langue, une sorte d'excroissance maladive, une greffe malsaine qui a produit une végétation, un parasite qui a ses racines dans le vieux tronc gaulois et dont le feuillage sinistre rampe sur tout un côté de la langue. Ceci est ce qu'on pourrait appeler le premier aspect, l'aspect vulgaire de l'argot. Mais, pour ceux qui étudient la langue ainsi qu'il faut l'étudier, c'est-à-dire comme les géologues étudient la terre, l'argot apparaît comme une véritable alluvion. Selon qu'on y creuse plus ou moins avant, on trouve dans l'argot, au-dessous du vieux français populaire, le provençal, l'espagnol, de l'italien, du levantin, cette langue des ports de la Méditerranée, de l'anglais et de l'allemand, du roman dans ses trois variétés, roman français, roman italien, roman roman, du latin, enfin du basque et du celte. Formation profonde et bizarre. Édifice souterrain bâti en commun par tous les misérables. Chaque race maudite a déposé sa couche, chaque souffrance a laissé tomber sa pierre, chaque cœur a donné son caillou. Une foule d'âmes mauvaises, basses ou irritées, qui ont traversé la vie et sont allées s'évanouir dans l'éternité, sont là presque entières et en quelque sorte visibles encore sous la forme d'un mot monstrueux.

Veut-on de l'espagnol? le vieil argot gothique en fourmille. Voici boffette, soufflet, qui vient de bofeton; vantane, fenêtre (plus tard vanterne), qui vient de vantana; gat, chat, qui vient de gato; acite, huile, qui vient de aceyte. Veut-on de l'italien? Voici spade, épée, qui vient de spada; carvel, bateau, qui vient de caravella. Veut-on de l'anglais? Voici le bichot, l'évêque, qui vient de bishop; raille, espion, qui vient de rascal, rascalion, coquin; pilcker, étui, qui vient de pilcher, fourreau. Veut-on de l'allemand? Voici le caleur, le garçon, kellner; le hers, le maître, herzog (duc). Veut-on du latin? Voici frangir, casser, frangere; affurer, voler, fur; cadène, chaîne, catena. Il y a un mot qui reparaît dans toutes les langues du continent avec une sorte de puissance et d'autorité mystérieuse, c'est le mot magnus; l'Écosse en fait son mac, qui désigne le chef du clan, Mac-Farlane, Mac-Callummore, le grand Farlane, le grand Callummore; l'argot en fait le meck, et plus tard, le meg, c'est-à-dire Dieu. Veut-on du basque? Voici gahisto, le diable, qui vient de gaïztoa, mauvais; sorgabon, bonne nuit, qui vient de gabon, bonsoir. Veut-on du celte? Voici blavin, mouchoir, qui vient de blavet, eau jaillissante; ménesse, femme (en mauvaise part), qui vient de meinec, plein de pierres; barant, ruisseau, de baranton, fontaine; goffeur, serrurier, de goff, forgeron; la guédouze, la mort, qui vient de guenn-du, blanche-noire. Veut-on de l'histoire enfin? L'argot appelle les écus les maltèses, souvenir de la monnaie qui avait cours sur les galères de Malte.

Outre les origines philologiques qui viennent d'être indiquées, l'argot a d'autres racines plus naturelles encore et qui sortent pour ainsi dire de l'esprit même de l'homme:

Premièrement, la création directe des mots. Là est le mystère des langues. Peindre par des mots qui ont, on ne sait comment ni pourquoi, des figures. Ceci est le fond primitif de tout langage humain, ce qu'on en pourrait nommer le granit. L'argot pullule de mots de ce genre, mots immédiats, créés de toute pièce on ne sait où ni par qui, sans étymologies, sans analogies, sans dérivés, mots solitaires, barbares, quelquefois hideux, qui ont une singulière puissance d'expression et qui vivent. — Le bourreau, le taule; — la forêt, le sabri; la peur, la fuite, taf; — le laquais, le larbin; — le général, le préfet, le ministre, pharos; — le diable, le rabouin. Rien n'est plus étrange que ces mots qui masquent et qui montrent. Quelques-uns, le rabouin, par exemple, sont en même temps grotesques et terribles, et vous font l'effet d'une grimace cyclopéenne.

Deuxièmement, la métaphore. Le propre d'une langue qui veut tout dire et tout cacher, c'est d'abonder en figures. La métaphore est une énigme où se réfugie le voleur qui complote un coup, le prisonnier qui combine une évasion. Aucun idiome n'est plus métaphorique que l'argot. — Dévisser le coco, tordre le cou, — tortiller, manger; — être gerbé, être jugé; — un rat, un voleur de pain; — il lansquine, il pleut, vieille figure frappante, qui porte en quelque sorte sa date avec elle, qui assimile les longues lignes obliques de la pluie aux piques épaisses et penchées des lansquenets, et qui fait tenir dans un seul mot la métonymie populaire: il pleut des hallebardes. Quelquefois, à mesure que l'argot va de la première époque à la seconde, des mots passent de l'état sauvage et primitif au sens métaphorique. Le diable cesse d'être le rabouin et devient le boulanger, celui qui enfourne. C'est plus spirituel, mais moins grand; quelque chose comme Racine après Corneille, comme Euripide après Eschyle. Certaines phrases d'argot, qui participent des deux époques et ont à la fois le caractère barbare et le caractère métaphorique, ressemblent à des fantasmagories. — Les sorgueurs vont sollicer des gails à la lune (les rôdeurs vont voler des chevaux la nuit). — Cela passe devant l'esprit comme un groupe de spectres. On ne sait ce qu'on voit.

Troisièmement, l’expédient. L’argot vit sur la langue. Il en use à sa fantaisie, il y puise au hasard, et il se borne souvent, quand le besoin surgit, à la dénaturer sommairement et grossièrement. Parfois, avec les mots usuels ainsi déformés, et compliqués de mots d’argot pur, il compose des locutions pittoresques où l’on sent le mélange des deux éléments précédents, la création directe et la métaphore: — Le cab jaspine, je marronne que la roulotte de Pantin trime dans le sabri; le chien aboie, je soupçonne que la diligence de Paris passe dans le bois. — Le dab est sinve, la dabuge est merloussière, la fée est bative; le bourgeois est bête, la bourgeoise est rusée, la fille est jolie. — Le plus souvent, afin de dérouter les écouteurs, l’argot se borne à ajouter indistinctement à tous les mots de la langue une sorte de queue ignoble, une terminaison en aille, en orgue, en iergue, ou en uche. Ainsi Vousiergue trouvaille bonorgue ce gigotmuche? Trouvez-vous ce gigot bon? Phrase adressée par Cartouche à un guichetier, afin de savoir si la somme offerte pour l’évasion lui convenait. — La terminaison en mar a été ajoutée assez récemment.

L’argot, étant l’idiome de la corruption, se corrompt vite. En outre, comme il cherche toujours à se dérober, sitôt qu’il se sent compris, il se transforme. Au rebours de toute autre végétation, tout rayon de jour y tue ce qu’il touche. Aussi l’argot va-t-il se décomposant et se recomposant sans cesse; travail obscur et rapide qui ne s’arrête jamais. Il fait plus de chemin en dix ans que la langue en dix siècles. Ainsi le larton devient le lartif; le gail devient le gaye; la fertanche, la fertille; le momignard, le momacque; les siques, les frusques; la chique, l’égrugeoir; le colabre, le colas. Le diable est d’abord gahisto, puis le rabouin, puis le boulanger; le prêtre est le ratichon, puis le sanglier; le poignard est le vingt-deux, puis le surin, puis le lingre; les gens de police sont des railles, puis des roussins, puis des rousses, puis des marchands de lacets, puis des coqueurs, puis des cognes; le bourreau est le taule, puis Charlot, puis l’atigeur, puis le becquillard. Au dix-septième siècle, se battre, c’était se donner du tabac; au dix-neuvième, c’est se chiquer la gueule. Vingt locutions différentes ont passé entre ces deux extrêmes. Cartouche parlerait hébreu pour Lacenaire. Tous les mots de cette langue sont perpétuellement en fuite comme les hommes qui les prononcent.

Cependant, de temps en temps, et à cause de ce mouvement même, l’ancien argot reparaît et redevient nouveau. Il a ses chefs-lieux où il se maintient. Le Temple conservait l’argot du dix-septième siècle; Bicêtre, lorsqu’il était prison, conservait l’argot de Thunes. On y entendait la terminaison en anche des vieux thuneurs. Boyanches-tu (bois-tu?)? il croyanche (il croit). Mais le mouvement perpétuel n’en reste pas moins la loi.

Si le philosophe parvient à fixer un moment, pour l’observer, cette langue qui s’évapore sans cesse, il tombe dans de douloureuses et utiles méditations. Aucune étude n’est plus efficace et plus féconde en enseignements. Pas une métaphore, pas une étymologie de l’argot qui ne contienne une leçon. — Parmi ces hommes, battre veut dire feindre; on bat une maladie; la ruse est leur force.

Pour eux l’idée de l’homme ne se sépare pas de l’idée de l’ombre. La nuit se dit la sorgue; l’homme, l’orgue. L’homme est un dérivé de la nuit.

Ils ont pris l’habitude de considérer la société comme une atmosphère qui les tue, comme une force fatale, et ils parlent de leur liberté comme on parlerait de sa santé. Un homme arrêté est un malade; un homme condamné est un mort.

Ce qu’il y a de plus terrible pour le prisonnier dans les quatre murs de pierre qui l’ensevelissent, c’est une sorte de chasteté glaciale; il appelle le cachot, le castus. — Dans ce lieu funèbre, c’est toujours sous son aspect le plus riant que la vie extérieure apparaît. Le prisonnier a des fers aux pieds; vous croyez peut-être qu’il songe que c’est avec les pieds qu’on marche? non, il songe que c’est avec les pieds qu’on danse; aussi, qu’il parvienne à scier ses fers, sa première idée est que maintenant il peut danser, et il appelle la scie un bastringue. — Un nom est un centre; profonde assimilation. — Le bandit a deux têtes, l’une qui raisonne ses actions et le mène pendant toute sa vie, l’autre qu’il a sur ses épaules, le jour de sa mort; il appelle la tête qui lui conseille le crime, la sorbonne, et la tête qui l’expie, la tronche. — Quand un homme n’a plus que des guenilles sur le corps et des vices dans le cœur, quand il est arrivé à cette double dégradation matérielle et morale que caractérise dans ses deux acceptions le mot gueux, il est à point pour le crime, il est comme un couteau bien affilé; il a deux tranchants, sa détresse et sa méchanceté; aussi l’argot ne dit pas «un gueux»; il dit un réguisé. — Qu’est-ce que le bagne? un brasier de damnation, un enfer. Le forçat s’appelle un fagot. — Enfin, quel nom les malfaiteurs donnent-ils à la prison? le collège. Tout un système pénitentiaire peut sortir de ce mot.

Le voleur a lui aussi sa chair à canon, la matière volable, vous, moi, quiconque passe; le pantre. (Pan, tout le monde.)

Veut-on savoir où sont écloses la plupart des chansons de bagne, ces refrains appelés dans le vocabulaire spécial les lirlonfa? Qu'on écoute ceci:

Il y avait au Châtelet de Paris une grande cave longue. Cette cave était à huit pieds en contre-bas au-dessous du niveau de la Seine. Elle n'avait ni fenêtres ni soupiraux, l'unique ouverture était la porte; les hommes pouvaient y entrer, l'air non. Cette cave avait pour plafond une voûte de pierre et pour plancher dix pouces de boue. Elle avait été dallée; mais sous le suintement des eaux, le dallage s'était pourri et crevassé. À huit pieds au-dessus du sol, une longue poutre massive traversait ce souterrain de part en part; de cette poutre tombaient, de distance en distance, des chaînes de trois pieds de long, et à l'extrémité de ces chaînes il y avait des carcans. On mettait dans cette cave les hommes condamnés aux galères jusqu'au jour du départ pour Toulon. On les poussait sous cette poutre où chacun avait son serrement oscillant dans les ténèbres qui l'attendait. Les chaînes, ces bras pendants, et les carcans, ces mains ouvertes, prenaient ces misérables par le cou. On les rivait et on les laissait là. La chaîne étant trop courte, ils ne pouvaient se coucher. Ils restaient immobiles dans cette cave, dans cette nuit, sous cette poutre, presque pendus, obligés à des efforts inouïs pour atteindre au pain ou à la cruche, la voûte sur la tête, la boue jusqu'à mi-jambe, leurs excréments coulant sur leurs jarrets, écartelés de fatigue, ployant aux hanches et aux genoux, s'accrochant par les mains à la chaîne pour se reposer, ne pouvant dormir que debout, et réveillés à chaque instant par l'étranglement du carcan; quelques-uns ne se réveillaient pas. Pour manger, ils faisaient monter avec leur talon le long de leur tibia jusqu'à leur main leur pain qu'on leur jetait dans la boue. Combien de temps demeuraient-ils ainsi? Un mois, deux mois, six mois quelquefois; un resta une année. C'était l'antichambre des galères. On était mis là pour un lièvre volé au roi. Dans ce sépulcre enfer, que faisaient-ils? Ce qu'on peut faire dans un sépulcre, ils agonisaient, et ce qu'on peut faire dans un enfer, ils chantaient. Car où il n'y a plus l'espérance, le chant reste. Dans les eaux de Malte, quand une galère approchait, on entendait le chant avant d'entendre les rames. Le pauvre braconnier Survincent qui avait traversé la prison-cave du Châtelet disait: Ce sont les rimes qui m'ont soutenu. Inutilité de la poésie. À quoi bon la rime? C'est dans cette cave que sont nées presque toutes les chansons d'argot. C'est de ce cachot du Grand-Châtelet de Paris que vient le mélancolique refrain de la galère de Montgomery: Timaloumisaine, timoulamison. La plupart de ces chansons sont lugubres; quelques-unes sont gaies; une est tendre:

Icicaille est le théâtre
Du petit dardant.

Vous aurez beau faire, vous n’anéantirez pas cet éternel reste du cœur de l’homme, l’amour.

Dans ce monde des actions sombres, on se garde le secret. Le secret, c’est la chose de tous. Le secret, pour ces misérables, c’est l’unité qui sert de base à l’union. Rompre le secret, c’est arracher à chaque membre de cette communauté farouche quelque chose de lui-même. Dénoncer, dans l’énergique langue d’argot, cela se dit: manger le morceau. Comme si le dénonciateur tirait à lui un peu de la substance de tous et se nourrissait d’un morceau de la chair de chacun.

Qu’est-ce que recevoir un soufflet? La métaphore banale répond: C’est voir trente-six chandelles. Ici l’argot intervient, et reprend: Chandelle, camoufle. Sur ce, le langage usuel donne au soufflet pour synonyme camouflet. Ainsi, par une sorte de pénétration de bas en haut, la métaphore, cette trajectoire incalculable, aidant, l’argot monte de la caverne à l’académie, et Poulailler disant: J’allume ma camoufle, fait écrire à Voltaire: Langleviel La Beaumelle mérite cent camouflets.

Une fouille dans l’argot, c’est la découverte à chaque pas. L’étude et l’approfondissement de cet étrange idiome mènent au mystérieux point d’intersection de la société régulière avec la société maudite.

L’argot, c’est le verbe devenu forçat.

Que le principe pensant de l’homme puisse être refoulé si bas, qu’il puisse être traîné et garrotté là par les obscures tyrannies de la fatalité, qu’il puisse être lié à on ne sait quelles attaches dans ce précipice, cela consterne.

Ô pauvre pensée des misérables!

Hélas! personne ne viendra-t-il au secours de l’âme humaine dans cette ombre? Sa destinée est-elle d’y attendre à jamais l’esprit, le libérateur, l’immense chevaucheur des pégases et des hippogriffes, le combattant couleur d’aurore qui descend de l’azur entre deux ailes, le radieux chevalier de l’avenir? Appellera-t-elle toujours en vain à son secours la lance de lumière de l’idéal? Est-elle condamnée à entendre venir épouvantablement dans l’épaisseur du gouffre le Mal, et à entrevoir, de plus en plus près d’elle, sous l’eau hideuse, cette tête draconienne, cette gueule mâchant l’écume, et cette ondulation serpentante de griffes, de gonflements et d’anneaux? Faut-il qu’elle reste là, sans une lueur, sans espoir, livrée à cette approche formidable, vaguement flairée du monstre, frissonnante, échevelée, se tordant les bras, à jamais enchaînée au rocher de la nuit, sombre Andromède blanche et nue dans les ténèbres!

Chapitre III

Argot qui pleure et argot qui rit

Comme on le voit, l’argot tout entier, l’argot d’il y a quatre cents ans comme l’argot d’aujourd’hui, est pénétré de ce sombre esprit symbolique qui donne à tous les mots tantôt une allure dolente, tantôt un air menaçant. On y sent la vieille tristesse farouche de ces truands de la Cour des Miracles qui jouaient aux cartes avec des jeux à eux, dont quelques-uns nous ont été conservés. Le huit de trèfle, par exemple, représentait un grand arbre portant huit énormes feuilles de trèfle, sorte de personnification fantastique de la forêt. Au pied de cet arbre on voyait un feu allumé où trois lièvres faisaient rôtir un chasseur à la broche, et derrière, sur un autre feu, une marmite fumante d’où sortait la tête du chien. Rien de plus lugubre que ces représailles en peinture, sur un jeu de cartes, en présence des bûchers à rôtir les contrebandiers et de la chaudière à bouillir les faux monnayeurs. Les diverses formes que prenait la pensée dans le royaume d’argot, même la chanson, même la raillerie, même la menace, avaient toutes ce caractère impuissant et accablé. Tous les chants, dont quelques mélodies ont été recueillies, étaient humbles et lamentables à pleurer. Le pègre s’appelle le pauvre pègre, et il est toujours le lièvre qui se cache, la souris qui se sauve, l’oiseau qui s’enfuit. À peine réclame-t-il, il se borne à soupirer; un de ses gémissements est venu jusqu’à nous: — Je n’entrave que le dail comment meck, le daron des orgues, peut atiger ses mômes et ses momignards et les locher criblant sans être atigé lui-même. — Le misérable, toutes les fois qu’il a le temps de penser, se fait petit devant la loi et chétif devant la société; il se couche à plat ventre, il supplie, il se tourne du côté de la pitié; on sent qu’il se sait dans son tort.

Vers le milieu du dernier siècle, un changement se fit. Les chants de prisons, les ritournelles de voleurs prirent, pour ainsi parler, un geste insolent et jovial. Le plaintif maluré fut remplacé par larifla. On retrouve au dix-huitième siècle, dans presque toutes les chansons des galères, des bagnes et des chiourmes, une gaîté diabolique et énigmatique. On y entend ce refrain strident et sautant qu’on dirait éclairé d’une lueur phosphorescente et qui semble jeté dans la forêt par un feu follet jouant du fifre:

Mirlababi, surlababo,
Mirliton ribon ribette,
Surlababi, mirlababo,
Mirliton ribon ribo.

Cela se chantait en égorgeant un homme dans une cave ou au coin d'un bois.

Symptôme sérieux. Au dix-huitième siècle l'antique mélancolie de ces classes mornes se dissipe. Elles se mettent à rire. Elles raillent le grand meg et le grand dab. Louis XV étant donné, elles appellent le roi de France «le marquis de Pantin». Les voilà presque gaies. Une sorte de lumière légère sort de ces misérables comme si la conscience ne leur pesait plus. Ces lamentables tribus de l'ombre n'ont plus seulement l'audace désespérée des actions, elles ont l'audace insouciante de l'esprit. Indice qu'elles perdent le sentiment de leur criminalité, et qu'elles se sentent jusque parmi les penseurs et les songeurs je ne sais quels appuis qui s'ignorent eux-mêmes. Indice que le vol et le pillage commencent à s'infiltrer jusque dans des doctrines et des sophismes, de manière à perdre un peu de leur laideur en en donnant beaucoup aux sophismes et aux doctrines. Indice enfin, si aucune diversion ne surgit, de quelque éclosion prodigieuse et prochaine.

Arrêtons-nous un moment. Qui accusons-nous ici? est-ce le dix-huitième siècle? est-ce sa philosophie? Non certes. L'œuvre du dix-huitième siècle est saine et bonne. Les encyclopédistes, Diderot en tête, les physiocrates, Turgot en tête, les philosophes, Voltaire en tête, les utopistes, Rousseau en tête, ce sont là quatre légions sacrées. L'immense avance de l'humanité vers la lumière leur est due. Ce sont les quatre avant-gardes du genre humain allant aux quatre points cardinaux du progrès, Diderot vers le beau, Turgot vers l'utile, Voltaire vers le vrai, Rousseau vers le juste. Mais, à côté et au-dessous des philosophes, il y avait les sophistes, végétation vénéneuse mêlée à la croissance salubre, ciguë dans la forêt vierge. Pendant que le bourreau brûlait sur le maître-escalier du palais de justice les grands livres libérateurs du siècle, des écrivains aujourd'hui oubliés publiaient, avec privilège du roi, on ne sait quels écrits étrangement désorganisateurs, avidement lus des misérables. Quelques-unes de ces publications, détail bizarre, patronnées par un prince, se retrouvent dans la Bibliothèque secrète. Ces faits, profonds mais ignorés, étaient inaperçus à la surface. Parfois c'est l'obscurité même d'un fait qui est son danger. Il est obscur parce qu’il est souterrain. De tous ces écrivains, celui peut-être qui creusa alors dans les masses la galerie la plus malsaine, c’est Restif de la Bretonne.

Ce travail, propre à toute l’Europe, fit plus de ravage en Allemagne que partout ailleurs. En Allemagne, pendant une certaine période, résumée par Schiller dans son drame fameux des Brigands, le vol et le pillage s’érigeaient en protestation contre la propriété et le travail, s’assimilaient de certaines idées élémentaires, spécieuses et fausses, justes en apparence, absurdes en réalité, s’enveloppaient de ces idées, y disparaissaient en quelque sorte, prenaient un nom abstrait et passaient à l’état de théorie, et de cette façon circulaient dans les foules laborieuses, souffrantes et honnêtes, à l’insu même des chimistes imprudents qui avaient préparé la mixture, à l’insu même des masses qui l’acceptaient. Toutes les fois qu’un fait de ce genre se produit, il est grave. La souffrance engendre la colère; et tandis que les classes prospères s’aveuglent, ou s’endorment, ce qui est toujours fermer les yeux, la haine des classes malheureuses allume sa torche à quelque esprit chagrin ou mal fait qui rêve dans un coin, et elle se met à examiner la société. L’examen de la haine, chose terrible!

De là, si le malheur des temps le veut, ces effrayantes commotions qu’on nommait jadis jacqueries, près desquelles les agitations purement politiques sont jeux d’enfants, qui ne sont plus la lutte de l’opprimé contre l’oppresseur, mais la révolte du malaise contre le bien-être. Tout s’écroule alors.

Les jacqueries sont des tremblements de peuple.

C’est à ce péril, imminent peut-être en Europe vers la fin du dix-huitième siècle, que vint couper court la Révolution française, cet immense acte de probité.

La Révolution française, qui n’est pas autre chose que l’idéal armé du glaive, se dressa, et, du même mouvement brusque, ferma la porte du mal et ouvrit la porte du bien.

Elle dégagea la question, promulgua la vérité, chassa le miasme, assainit le siècle, couronna le peuple.

On peut dire qu’elle a créé l’homme une deuxième fois, en lui donnant une seconde âme, le droit.

Le dix-neuvième siècle hérite et profite de son œuvre, et aujourd’hui la catastrophe sociale que nous indiquions tout à l’heure est simplement impossible. Aveugle qui la dénonce! niais qui la redoute! la révolution est la vaccine de la jacquerie.

Grâce à la révolution, les conditions sociales sont changées. Les maladies féodales et monarchiques ne sont plus dans notre sang. Il n’y a plus de moyen âge dans notre constitution. Nous ne sommes plus aux temps où d’effroyables fourmillements intérieurs faisaient irruption, où l’on entendait sous ses pieds la course obscure d’un bruit sourd, où apparaissaient à la surface de la civilisation on ne sait quels soulèvements de galeries de taupes, où le sol se crevassait, où le dessus des cavernes s’ouvrait, et où l’on voyait tout à coup sortir de terre des têtes monstrueuses.

Le sens révolutionnaire est un sens moral. Le sentiment du droit, développé, développe le sentiment du devoir. La loi de tous, c’est la liberté, qui finit où commence la liberté d’autrui, selon l’admirable définition de Robespierre. Depuis 89, le peuple tout entier se dilate dans l’individu sublimé; il n’y a pas de pauvre qui, ayant son droit, n’ait son rayon; le meurt-de-faim sent en lui l’honnêteté de la France; la dignité du citoyen est une armure intérieure; qui est libre est scrupuleux; qui vote règne. De là l’incorruptibilité; de là l’avortement des convoitises malsaines; de là les yeux héroïquement baissés devant les tentations. L’assainissement révolutionnaire est tel qu’un jour de délivrance, un 14 juillet, un 10 août, il n’y a plus de populace. Le premier cri des foules illuminées et grandissantes c’est: mort aux voleurs! Le progrès est honnête homme; l’idéal et l’absolu ne font pas le mouchoir. Par qui furent escortés en 1848 les fourgons qui contenaient les richesses des Tuileries? par les chiffonniers du faubourg Saint-Antoine. Le haillon monta la garde devant le trésor. La vertu fit ces déguenillés resplendissants. Il y avait là, dans ces fourgons, dans des caisses à peine fermées quelques-unes même entr’ouvertes, parmi cent écrins éblouissants, cette vieille couronne de France toute en diamants, surmontée de l’escarboucle de la royauté, du régent, qui valait trente millions. Ils gardaient, pieds nus, cette couronne.

Donc plus de jacquerie. J’en suis fâché pour les habiles. C’est là de la vieille peur qui a fait son dernier effet et qui ne pourrait plus désormais être employée en politique. Le grand ressort du spectre rouge est cassé. Tout le monde le sait maintenant. L’épouvantail n’épouvante plus. Les oiseaux prennent des familiarités avec le mannequin, les stercoraires s’y posent, les bourgeois rient dessus.

Chapitre IV

Les deux devoirs: veiller et espérer

Cela étant, tout danger social est-il dissipé? non certes. Point de jacquerie. La société peut se rassurer de ce côté, le sang ne lui portera plus à la tête; mais qu'elle se préoccupe de la façon dont elle respire. L'apoplexie n'est plus à craindre, mais la phtisie est là. La phtisie sociale s'appelle misère.

On meurt miné aussi bien que foudroyé.

Ne nous lassons pas de le répéter, songer, avant tout aux foules déshéritées et douloureuses, les soulager, les aérer, les éclairer, les aimer, leur élargir magnifiquement l'horizon, leur prodiguer sous toutes les formes l'éducation, leur offrir l'exemple du labeur, jamais l'exemple de l'oisiveté, amoindrir le poids du fardeau individuel en accroissant la notion du but universel, limiter la pauvreté sans limiter la richesse, créer de vastes champs d'activité publique et populaire, avoir comme Briarée cent mains à tendre de toutes parts aux accablés et aux faibles, employer la puissance collective à ce grand devoir d'ouvrir des ateliers à tous les bras, des écoles à toutes les aptitudes et des laboratoires à toutes les intelligences, augmenter le salaire, diminuer la peine, balancer le doit et l'avoir, c'est-à-dire proportionner la jouissance à l'effort et l'assouvissement au besoin, en un mot, faire dégager à l'appareil social, au profit de ceux qui souffrent et de ceux qui ignorent, plus de clarté et plus de bien-être, c'est là, que les âmes sympathiques ne l'oublient pas, la première des obligations fraternelles, c'est, que les cœurs égoïstes le sachent, la première des nécessités politiques.

Et, disons-le, tout cela, ce n'est encore qu'un commencement. La vraie question, c'est celle-ci: le travail ne peut être une loi sans être un droit.

Nous n'insistons pas, ce n'est point ici le lieu.

Si la nature s'appelle providence, la société doit s'appeler prévoyance.

La croissance intellectuelle et morale n'est pas moins indispensable que l'amélioration matérielle. Savoir est un viatique; penser est de première nécessité; la vérité est nourriture comme le froment. Une raison, à jeun de science et de sagesse, maigrit. Plaignons, à l'égal des estomacs, les esprits qui ne mangent pas. S'il y a quelque chose de plus poignant qu'un corps agonisant faute de pain, c'est une âme qui meurt de la faim de la lumière.

Le progrès tout entier tend du côté de la solution. Un jour on sera stupéfait. Le genre humain montant, les couches profondes sortiront tout naturellement de la zone de détresse. L'effacement de la misère se fera par une simple élévation de niveau.

Cette solution bénie, on aurait tort d'en douter.

Le passé, il est vrai, est très fort à l'heure où nous sommes. Il reprend. Ce rajeunissement d'un cadavre est surprenant. Le voici qui marche et qui vient. Il semble vainqueur; ce mort est un conquérant. Il arrive avec sa légion, les superstitions, avec son épée, le despotisme, avec son drapeau, l'ignorance; depuis quelque temps il a gagné dix batailles. Il avance, il menace, il rit, il est à nos portes. Quant à nous, ne désespérons pas. Vendons le champ où campe Annibal.

Nous qui croyons, que pouvons-nous craindre?

Il n'y a pas plus de reculs d'idées que de reculs de fleuves.

Mais que ceux qui ne veulent pas de l'avenir y réfléchissent. En disant non au progrès, ce n'est point l'avenir qu'ils condamnent, c'est eux-mêmes. Ils se donnent une maladie sombre; ils s'inoculent le passé. Il n'y a qu'une manière de refuser Demain, c'est de mourir.

Or, aucune mort, celle du corps le plus tard possible, celle de l'âme jamais, c'est là ce que nous voulons.

Oui, l'énigme dira son mot, le sphinx parlera, le problème sera résolu. Oui, le Peuple, ébauché par le dix-huitième siècle, sera achevé par le dix-neuvième. Idiot qui en douterait! L'éclosion future, l'éclosion prochaine du bien-être universel, est un phénomène divinement fatal.

D'immenses poussées d'ensemble régissent les faits humains et les amènent tous dans un temps donné à l'état logique, c'est-à-dire à l'équilibre, c'est-à-dire à l'équité. Une force composée de terre et de ciel résulte de l'humanité et la gouverne; cette force-là est une faiseuse de miracles; les dénoûments merveilleux ne lui sont pas plus difficiles que les péripéties extraordinaires. Aidée de la science qui vient de l'homme et de l'événement qui vient d'un autre, elle s'épouvante peu de ces contradictions dans la pose des problèmes, qui semblent au vulgaire impossibilités. Elle n'est pas moins habile à faire jaillir une solution du rapprochement des idées qu'un enseignement du rapprochement des faits, et l'on peut s'attendre à tout de la part de cette mystérieuse puissance du progrès qui, un beau jour, confronte l'orient et l'occident au fond d'un sépulcre et fait dialoguer les imans avec Bonaparte dans l'intérieur de la grande pyramide.

En attendant, pas de halte, pas d’hésitation, pas de temps d’arrêt dans la grandiose marche en avant des esprits. La philosophie sociale est essentiellement la science de la paix. Elle a pour but et doit avoir pour résultat de dissoudre les colères par l’étude des antagonismes. Elle examine, elle scrute, elle analyse; puis elle recompose. Elle procède par voie de réduction, retranchant de tout la haine.

Qu’une société s’abîme au vent qui se déchaîne sur les hommes, cela s’est vu plus d’une fois; l’histoire est pleine de naufrages de peuples et d’empires; mœurs, lois, religions, un beau jour cet inconnu, l’ouragan, passe et emporte tout cela. Les civilisations de l’Inde, de la Chaldée, de la Perse, de l’Assyrie, de l’Égypte, ont disparu l’une après l’autre. Pourquoi? nous l’ignorons. Quelles sont les causes de ces désastres? nous ne le savons pas. Ces sociétés auraient-elles pu être sauvées? y a-t-il de leur faute? se sont-elles obstinées dans quelque vice fatal qui les a perdues? quelle quantité de suicide y a-t-il dans ces morts terribles d’une nation et d’une race? Questions sans réponse. L’ombre couvre ces civilisations condamnées. Elles faisaient eau puisqu’elles s’engloutissent; nous n’avons rien de plus à dire; et c’est avec une sorte d’effarement que nous regardons, au fond de cette mer qu’on appelle le passé, derrière ces vagues colossales, les siècles, sombrer ces immenses navires, Babylone, Ninive, Tarse, Thèbes, Rome, sous le souffle effrayant qui sort de toutes les bouches des ténèbres. Mais ténèbres là, clarté ici. Nous ignorons les maladies des civilisations antiques, nous connaissons les infirmités de la nôtre. Nous avons partout sur elle le droit de lumière; nous contemplons ses beautés et nous mettons à nu ses difformités. Là où est le mal, nous sondons; et, une fois la souffrance constatée, l’étude de la cause mène à la découverte du remède. Notre civilisation, œuvre de vingt siècles, en est à la fois le monstre et le prodige; elle vaut la peine d’être sauvée. Elle le sera. La soulager, c’est déjà beaucoup; l’éclairer, c’est encore quelque chose. Tous les travaux de la philosophie sociale moderne doivent converger vers ce but. Le penseur aujourd’hui a un grand devoir, ausculter la civilisation.

Nous le répétons, cette auscultation encourage; et c’est par cette insistance dans l’encouragement que nous voulons finir ces quelques pages, entr’acte austère d’un drame douloureux. Sous la mortalité sociale on sent l’impérissabilité humaine. Pour avoir çà et là ces plaies, les cratères, et ces dartres, les solfatares, pour un volcan qui aboutit et qui jette son pus, le globe ne meurt pas. Des maladies de peuple ne tuent pas l’homme.

Et néanmoins, quiconque suit la clinique sociale hoche la tête par instants. Les plus forts, les plus tendres, les plus logiques ont leurs heures de défaillance.

L’avenir arrivera-t-il? il semble qu’on peut presque se faire cette question quand on voit tant d’ombre terrible. Sombre face-à-face des égoïstes et des misérables. Chez les égoïstes, les préjugés, les ténèbres de l’éducation riche, l’appétit croissant par l’enivrement, un étourdissement de prospérité qui assourdit, la crainte de souffrir qui, dans quelques-uns, va jusqu’à l’aversion des souffrants, une satisfaction implacable, le moi si enflé qu’il ferme l’âme; chez les misérables, la convoitise, l’envie, la haine de voir les autres jouir, les profondes secousses de la bête humaine vers les assouvissements, les cœurs pleins de brume, la tristesse, le besoin, la fatalité, l’ignorance impure et simple.

Faut-il continuer de lever les yeux vers le ciel? le point lumineux qu’on y distingue est-il de ceux qui s’éteignent? L’idéal est effrayant à voir, ainsi perdu dans les profondeurs, petit, isolé, imperceptible, brillant, mais entouré de toutes ces grandes menaces noires monstrueusement amoncelées autour de lui; pourtant pas plus en danger qu’une étoile dans les gueules des nuages.

Livre huitième — Les enchantements et les désolations

Chapitre I

Pleine lumière

Le lecteur a compris qu’Éponine, ayant reconnu à travers la grille l’habitante de cette rue Plumet où Magnon l’avait envoyée, avait commencé par écarter les bandits de la rue Plumet, puis y avait conduit Marius, et qu’après plusieurs jours d’extase devant cette grille, Marius, entraîné par cette force qui pousse le fer vers l’aimant et l’amoureux vers les pierres dont est faite la maison de celle qu’il aime, avait fini par entrer dans le jardin de Cosette comme Roméo dans le jardin de Juliette. Cela même lui avait été plus facile qu’à Roméo; Roméo était obligé d’escalader un mur, Marius n’eut qu’à forcer un peu un des barreaux de la grille décrépite qui vacillait dans son alvéole rouillé, à la manière des dents des vieilles gens. Marius était mince et passa aisément.

Comme il n’y avait jamais personne dans la rue et que d’ailleurs Marius ne pénétrait dans le jardin que la nuit, il ne risquait pas d’être vu.

À partir de cette heure bénie et sainte où un baiser fiança ces deux âmes, Marius vint là tous les soirs. Si, à ce moment de sa vie, Cosette était tombée dans l’amour d’un homme peu scrupuleux et libertin, elle était perdue; car il y a des natures généreuses qui se livrent, et Cosette en était une. Une des magnanimités de la femme, c’est de céder. L’amour, à cette hauteur où il est absolu, se complique d’on ne sait quel céleste aveuglement de la pudeur. Mais que de dangers vous courez, ô nobles âmes! Souvent, vous donnez le cœur, nous prenons le corps. Votre cœur vous reste, et vous le regardez dans l’ombre en frémissant. L’amour n’a point de moyen terme; ou il perd, ou il sauve. Toute la destinée humaine est ce dilemme-là. Ce dilemme, perte ou salut, aucune fatalité ne le pose plus inexorablement que l’amour. L’amour est la vie, s’il n’est pas la mort. Berceau; cercueil aussi. Le même sentiment dit oui et non dans le cœur humain. De toutes les choses que Dieu a faites, le cœur humain est celle qui dégage le plus de lumière, hélas! et le plus de nuit.

Dieu voulut que l’amour que Cosette rencontra fût un de ces amours qui sauvent.

Tant que dura le mois de mai de cette année 1832, il y eut là, toutes les nuits, dans ce pauvre jardin sauvage, sous cette broussaille chaque jour plus odorante et plus épaissie, deux êtres composés de toutes les chastetés et de toutes les innocences, débordant de toutes les félicités du ciel, plus voisins des archanges que des hommes, purs, honnêtes, enivrés, rayonnants, qui resplendissaient l'un pour l'autre dans les ténèbres. Il semblait à Cosette que Marius avait une couronne et à Marius que Cosette avait un nimbe. Ils se touchaient, ils se regardaient, ils se prenaient les mains, ils se serraient l'un contre l'autre; mais il y avait une distance qu'ils ne franchissaient pas. Non qu'ils la respectassent; ils l'ignoraient. Marius sentait une barrière, la pureté de Cosette, et Cosette sentait un appui, la loyauté de Marius. Le premier baiser avait été aussi le dernier. Marius, depuis, n'était pas allé au-delà d'effleurer de ses lèvres la main, ou le fichu, ou une boucle de cheveux de Cosette. Cosette était pour lui un parfum et non une femme. Il la respirait. Elle ne refusait rien et il ne demandait rien. Cosette était heureuse, et Marius était satisfait. Ils vivaient dans ce ravissant état qu'on pourrait appeler l'éblouissement d'une âme par une âme. C'était cet ineffable premier embrassement de deux virginités dans l'idéal. Deux cygnes se rencontrant sur la Jungfrau.

À cette heure-là de l'amour, heure où la volupté se tait absolument sous la toute-puissance de l'extase, Marius, le pur et séraphique Marius, eût été plutôt capable de monter chez une fille publique que de soulever la robe de Cosette à la hauteur de la cheville. Une fois, à un clair de lune, Cosette se pencha pour ramasser quelque chose à terre, son corsage s'entr'ouvrit et laissa voir la naissance de sa gorge, Marius détourna les yeux.

Que se passait-il entre ces deux êtres? Rien. Ils s'adoraient.

La nuit, quand ils étaient là, ce jardin semblait un lieu vivant et sacré. Toutes les fleurs s'ouvraient autour d'eux et leur envoyaient de l'encens; eux, ils ouvraient leurs âmes et les répandaient dans les fleurs. La végétation lascive et vigoureuse tressaillait pleine de sève et d'ivresse autour de ces deux innocents, et ils disaient des paroles d'amour dont les arbres frissonnaient.

Qu'étaient-ce que ces paroles? Des souffles. Rien de plus. Ces souffles suffisaient pour troubler et pour émouvoir toute cette nature. Puissance magique qu'on aurait peine à comprendre si on lisait dans un livre ces causeries faites pour être emportées et dissipées comme des fumées par le vent sous les feuilles. Ôtez à ces murmures de deux amants cette mélodie qui sort de l'âme et qui les accompagne comme une lyre, ce qui reste n'est plus qu'une ombre; vous dites: Quoi! ce n'est que cela! Eh oui, des enfantillages, des redites, des rires pour rien, des inutilités, des niaiseries, tout ce qu'il y a au monde de plus sublime et de plus profond! les seules choses qui vaillent la peine d'être dites et d'être écoutées!

Ces niaiseries-là, ces pauvretés-là, l'homme qui ne les a jamais entendues, l'homme qui ne les a jamais prononcées, est un imbécile et un méchant homme.

Cosette disait à Marius:

— Sais-tu?...

(Dans tout cela, et à travers cette céleste virginité, et sans qu'il fût possible à l'un et à l'autre de dire comment, le tutoiement était venu.)

— Sais-tu? Je m'appelle Euphrasie.

— Euphrasie? Mais non, tu t'appelles Cosette.

— Oh! Cosette est un assez vilain nom qu'on m'a donné comme cela quand j'étais petite. Mais mon vrai nom est Euphrasie. Est-ce que tu n'aimes pas ce nom-là, Euphrasie?

— Si... — Mais Cosette n'est pas vilain.

— Est-ce que tu l'aimes mieux qu'Euphrasie?

— Mais... — oui.

— Alors je l'aime mieux aussi. C'est vrai, c'est joli, Cosette. Appelle-moi Cosette.

Et le sourire qu'elle ajoutait faisait de ce dialogue une idylle digne d'un bois qui serait dans le ciel.

Une autre fois elle le regardait fixement et s'écriait:

— Monsieur, vous êtes beau, vous êtes joli, vous avez de l'esprit, vous n'êtes pas bête du tout, vous êtes bien plus savant que moi, mais je vous défie à ce mot-là: je t'aime!

Et Marius, en plein azur, croyait entendre une strophe chantée par une étoile.

Ou bien, elle lui donnait une petite tape parce qu'il toussait, et elle lui disait:

— Ne toussez pas, monsieur. Je ne veux pas qu'on tousse chez moi sans ma permission. C'est très laid de tousser et de m'inquiéter. Je veux que tu te portes bien, parce que d'abord, moi, si tu ne te portais pas bien, je serais très malheureuse. Qu'est-ce que tu veux que je fasse?

Et cela était tout simplement divin.

Une fois Marius dit à Cosette:

— Figure-toi, j'ai cru un temps que tu t'appelais Ursule.

Ceci les fit rire toute la soirée.

Au milieu d’une autre causerie, il lui arriva de s’écrier:

— Oh! un jour, au Luxembourg, j’ai eu envie d’achever de casser un invalide!

Mais il s’arrêta court et n’alla pas plus loin. Il aurait fallu parler à Cosette de sa jarretière, et cela lui était impossible. Il y avait là un côtoiement inconnu, la chair, devant lequel reculait, avec une sorte d’effroi sacré, cet immense amour innocent.

Marius se figurait la vie avec Cosette comme cela, sans autre chose; venir tous les soirs rue Plumet, déranger le vieux barreau complaisant de la grille du président, s’asseoir coude à coude sur ce banc, regarder à travers les arbres la scintillation de la nuit commençante, faire cohabiter le pli du genou de son pantalon avec l’ampleur de la robe de Cosette, lui caresser l’ongle du pouce, lui dire tu, respirer l’un après l’autre la même fleur, à jamais, indéfiniment. Pendant ce temps-là les nuages passaient au-dessus de leur tête. Chaque fois que le vent souffle, il emporte plus de rêves de l’homme que de nuées du ciel.

Que ce chaste amour presque farouche fût absolument sans galanterie, non.»Faire des compliments» à celle qu’on aime est la première façon de faire des caresses, demi-audace qui s’essaye. Le compliment, c’est quelque chose comme le baiser à travers le voile. La volupté y met sa douce pointe, tout en se cachant. Devant la volupté le cœur recule, pour mieux aimer. Les cajoleries de Marius, toutes saturées de chimère, étaient, pour ainsi dire, azurées. Les oiseaux, quand ils volent là-haut du côté des anges, doivent entendre de ces paroles-là. Il s’y mêlait pourtant la vie, l’humanité, toute la quantité de positif dont Marius était capable. C’était ce qui se dit dans la grotte, prélude de ce qui se dira dans l’alcôve; une effusion lyrique, la strophe et le sonnet mêlés, les gentilles hyperboles du roucoulement, tous les raffinements de l’adoration arrangés en bouquet et exhalant un subtil parfum céleste, un ineffable gazouillement de cœur à cœur.

— Oh! murmurait Marius, que tu es belle! Je n’ose pas te regarder. C’est ce qui fait que je te contemple. Tu es une grâce. Je ne sais pas ce que j’ai. Le bas de ta robe, quand le bout de ton soulier passe, me bouleverse. Et puis quelle lueur enchantée quand ta pensée s’entr’ouvre! Tu parles raison étonnamment. Il me semble par moments que tu es un songe. Parle, je t’écoute, je t’admire. Ô Cosette! comme c’est étrange et charmant! je suis vraiment fou. Vous êtes adorable, mademoiselle. J’étudie tes pieds au microscope et ton âme au télescope.

Et Cosette répondait:

— Je t’aime un peu plus de tout le temps qui s’est écoulé depuis ce matin.

Demandes et réponses allaient comme elles pouvaient dans ce dialogue, tombant toujours d’accord, sur l’amour, comme les figurines de sureau sur le clou.

Toute la personne de Cosette était naïveté, ingénuité, transparence, blancheur, candeur, rayon. On eût pu dire de Cosette qu’elle était claire. Elle faisait à qui la voyait une sensation d’avril et de point du jour. Il y avait de la rosée dans ses yeux. Cosette était une condensation de lumière aurorale en forme de femme.

Il était tout simple que Marius, l’adorant, l’admirât. Mais la vérité est que cette petite pensionnaire, fraîche émoulue du couvent, causait avec une pénétration exquise et disait par moments toutes sortes de paroles vraies et délicates. Son babil était de la conversation. Elle ne se trompait sur rien, et voyait juste. La femme sent et parle avec le tendre instinct du cœur, cette infaillibilité. Personne ne sait comme une femme dire des choses à la fois douces et profondes. La douceur et la profondeur, c’est là toute la femme; c’est là tout le ciel.

En cette pleine félicité, il leur venait à chaque instant des larmes aux yeux. Une bête à bon Dieu écrasée, une plume tombée d’un nid, une branche d’aubépine cassée, les apitoyait, et leur extase, doucement noyée de mélancolie, semblait ne demander pas mieux que de pleurer. Le plus souverain symptôme de l’amour, c’est un attendrissement parfois presque insupportable.

Et, à côté de cela, — toutes ces contradictions sont le jeu d’éclairs de l’amour, — ils riaient volontiers, et avec une liberté ravissante, et si familièrement qu’ils avaient parfois presque l’air de deux garçons. Cependant, l’insu même des cœurs ivres de chasteté, la nature inoubliable est toujours là. Elle est là, avec son but brutal et sublime, et, quelle que soit l’innocence des âmes, on sent, dans le tête-à-tête le plus pudique, l’adorable et mystérieuse nuance qui sépare un couple d’amants d’une paire d’amis.

Ils s’idolâtraient.

Le permanent et l’immuable subsistent. On s’aime, on se sourit, on se rit, on se fait des petites moues avec le bout des lèvres, on s’entrelace les doigts des mains, on se tutoie, et cela n’empêche pas l’éternité. Deux amants se cachent dans le soir, dans le crépuscule, dans l’invisible, avec les oiseaux, avec les roses, ils se fascinent l’un l’autre dans l’ombre avec leurs cœurs qu’ils mettent dans leurs yeux, ils murmurent, ils chuchotent, et pendant ce temps-là d’immenses balancements d’astres emplissent l’infini.

Chapitre II

L’étourdissement du bonheur complet

Ils existaient vaguement, effarés de bonheur. Ils ne s’apercevaient pas du choléra qui décimait Paris précisément en ce mois-là. Ils s’étaient fait le plus de confidences qu’ils avaient pu, mais cela n’avait pas été bien loin au-delà de leurs noms. Marius avait dit à Cosette qu’il était orphelin, qu’il s’appelait Marius Pontmercy, qu’il était avocat, qu’il vivait d’écrire des choses pour les libraires, que son père était colonel, que c’était un héros, et que lui Marius était brouillé avec son grand-père qui était riche. Il lui avait aussi un peu dit qu’il était baron; mais cela n’avait fait aucun effet à Cosette. Marius baron? elle n’avait pas compris. Elle ne savait pas ce que ce mot voulait dire. Marius était Marius. De son côté elle lui avait confié qu’elle avait été élevée au couvent du Petit-Picpus, que sa mère était morte comme à lui, que son père s’appelait M. Fauchelevent, qu’il était très bon, qu’il donnait beaucoup aux pauvres, mais qu’il était pauvre lui-même, et qu’il se privait de tout en ne la privant de rien.

Chose bizarre, dans l’espèce de symphonie où Marius vivait depuis qu’il voyait Cosette, le passé, même le plus récent, était devenu tellement confus et lointain pour lui que ce que Cosette lui conta le satisfit pleinement. Il ne songea même pas à lui parler de l’aventure nocturne de la masure, des Thénardier, de la brûlure, et de l’étrange attitude et de la singulière fuite de son père. Marius avait momentanément oublié tout cela; il ne savait même pas le soir ce qu’il avait fait le matin, ni où il avait déjeuné, ni qui lui avait parlé; il avait des chants dans l’oreille qui le rendaient sourd à toute autre pensée, il n’existait qu’aux heures où il voyait Cosette. Alors, comme il était dans le ciel, il était tout simple qu’il oubliât la terre. Tous deux portaient avec langueur le poids indéfinissables des voluptés immatérielles. Ainsi vivent ces somnambules qu’on appelle les amoureux.

Hélas! qui n’a éprouvé toutes ces choses? pourquoi vient-il une heure où l’on sort de cet azur, et pourquoi la vie continue-t-elle après?

Aimer remplace presque penser. L’amour est un ardent oubli du reste. Demandez donc de la logique à la passion. Il n’y a pas plus d’enchaînement logique absolu dans le cœur humain qu’il n’y a de figure géométrique parfaite dans la mécanique céleste. Pour Cosette et Marius rien n’existait plus que Marius et Cosette. L’univers autour d’eux était tombé dans un trou. Ils vivaient dans une minute d’or. Il n’y avait rien devant, rien derrière. C’est à peine si Marius songeait que Cosette avait un père. Il y avait dans son cerveau l’effacement de l’éblouissement. De quoi donc parlaient-ils, ces amants? On l’a vu, des fleurs, des hirondelles, du soleil couchant, du lever de la lune, de toutes les choses importantes. Ils s’étaient dit tout, excepté tout. Le tout des amoureux, c’est le rien. Mais le père, les réalités, ce bouge, ces bandits, cette aventure, à quoi bon? et était-il bien sûr que ce cauchemar eût existé? On était deux, on s’adorait, il n’y avait que cela. Toute autre chose n’était pas. Il est probable que cet évanouissement de l’enfer derrière nous est inhérent à l’arrivée au paradis. Est-ce qu’on a vu des démons? est-ce qu’il y en a? est-ce qu’on a tremblé? est-ce qu’on a souffert? On n’en sait plus rien. Une nuée rose est là-dessus.

Donc ces deux êtres vivaient ainsi, très haut, avec toute l’invraisemblance qui est dans la nature; ni au nadir, ni au zénith, entre l’homme et le séraphin, au-dessus de la fange, au-dessous de l’éther, dans le nuage; à peine os et chair, âme et extase de la tête aux pieds; déjà trop sublimés pour marcher à terre, encore trop chargés d’humanité pour disparaître dans le bleu, en suspension comme des atomes qui attendent le précipité; en apparence hors du destin; ignorant cette ornière, hier, aujourd’hui, demain; émerveillés, pâmés, flottants, par moments, assez allégés pour la fuite dans l’infini; presque prêts à l’envolement éternel.

Ils dormaient éveillés dans ce bercement. Ô léthargie splendide du réel accablé d’idéal!

Quelquefois, si belle que fût Cosette, Marius fermait les yeux devant elle. Les yeux fermés, c’est la meilleure manière de regarder l’âme.

Marius et Cosette ne se demandaient pas où cela les conduirait. Ils se regardaient comme arrivés. C’est une étrange prétention des hommes de vouloir que l’amour conduise quelque part.

Chapitre III

Commencement d’ombre

Jean Valjean, lui, ne se doutait de rien.

Cosette, un peu moins rêveuse que Marius, était gaie, et cela suffisait à Jean Valjean pour être heureux. Les pensées que Cosette avait, ses préoccupations tendres, l’image de Marius qui lui remplissait l’âme, n’ôtaient rien à la pureté incomparable de son beau front chaste et souriant. Elle était dans l’âge où la vierge porte son amour comme l’ange porte son lys. Jean Valjean était donc tranquille. Et puis, quand deux amants s’entendent, cela va toujours très bien, le tiers quelconque qui pourrait troubler leur amour est maintenu dans un parfait aveuglement par un petit nombre de précautions toujours les mêmes pour tous les amoureux. Ainsi jamais d’objections de Cosette à Jean Valjean. Voulait-il promener? Oui, mon petit père. Voulait-il rester? Très bien. Voulait-il passer la soirée près de Cosette? Elle était ravie. Comme il se retirait toujours à dix heures du soir, ces fois-là Marius ne venait au jardin que passé cette heure, lorsqu’il entendait de la rue Cosette ouvrir la porte-fenêtre du perron. Il va sans dire que le jour on ne rencontrait jamais Marius. Jean Valjean ne songeait même plus que Marius existât. Une fois seulement, un matin, il lui arriva de dire à Cosette: — Tiens, comme tu as du blanc derrière le dos! La veille au soir, Marius, dans un transport, avait pressé Cosette contre le mur.

La vieille Toussaint, qui se couchait de bonne heure, ne songeait qu’à dormir une fois sa besogne faite, et ignorait tout comme Jean Valjean.

Jamais Marius ne mettait le pied dans la maison. Quand il était avec Cosette, ils se cachaient dans un enfoncement près du perron afin de ne pouvoir être vus ni entendus de la rue, et s’asseyaient là, se contentant souvent, pour toute conversation, de se presser les mains vingt fois par minute en regardant les branches des arbres. Dans ces instants-là, le tonnerre fût tombé à trente pas d’eux qu’ils ne s’en fussent pas doutés, tant la rêverie de l’un s’absorbait et plongeait profondément dans la rêverie de l’autre.

Puretés limpides. Heures toutes blanches; presque toutes pareilles. Ce genre d’amours-là est une collection de feuilles de lys et de plumes de colombe.

Tout le jardin était entre eux et la rue. Chaque fois que Marius entrait ou sortait, il rajustait soigneusement le barreau de la grille de manière qu’aucun dérangement ne fût visible.

Il s’en allait habituellement vers minuit, et s’en retournait chez Courfeyrac. Courfeyrac disait à Bahorel:

— Croirais-tu? Marius rentre à présent à des une heure du matin!

Bahorel répondait:

— Que veux-tu? il y a toujours un pétard dans un séminariste.

Par moments Courfeyrac croisait les bras, prenait un air sérieux, et disait à Marius:

— Vous vous dérangez, jeune homme!

Courfeyrac, homme pratique, ne prenait pas en bonne part ce reflet d’un paradis invisible sur Marius; il avait peu l’habitude des passions inédites, il s’en impatientait, et il faisait par instants à Marius des sommations de rentrer dans le réel.

Un matin, il lui jeta cette admonition:

— Mon cher, tu me fais l’effet pour le moment d’être situé dans la lune, royaume du rêve, province de l’illusion, capitale Bulle de Savon. Voyons, sois bon enfant, comment s’appelle-t-elle?

Mais rien ne pouvait «faire parler» Marius. On lui eût arraché les ongles plutôt qu’une des trois syllabes sacrées dont se composait ce nom ineffable, Cosette. L’amour vrai est lumineux comme l’aurore et silencieux comme la tombe. Seulement il y avait, pour Courfeyrac, ceci de changé en Marius, qu’il avait une taciturnité rayonnante.

Pendant ce doux mois de mai Marius et Cosette connurent ces immenses bonheurs:

Se quereller et se dire vous, uniquement pour mieux se dire tu ensuite;

Se parler longuement, et dans les plus minutieux détails, de gens qui ne les intéressaient pas le moins du monde; preuve de plus que, dans ce ravissant opéra qu’on appelle l’amour, le libretto n’est presque rien;

Pour Marius, écouter Cosette parler chiffons;

Pour Cosette, écouter Marius parler politique;

Entendre, genou contre genou, rouler les voitures rue de Babylone;

Considérer la même planète dans l’espace ou le même ver luisant dans l’herbe;

Se taire ensemble; douceur plus grande encore que causer;

Etc., etc.

Cependant diverses complications approchaient.

Un soir, Marius s'acheminait au rendez-vous par le boulevard des Invalides; il marchait habituellement le front baissé; comme il allait tourner l'angle de la rue Plumet, il entendit qu'on disait tout près de lui:

— Bonsoir, monsieur Marius.

Il leva la tête, et reconnut Éponine.

Cela lui fit un effet singulier. Il n'avait pas songé une seule fois à cette fille depuis le jour où elle l'avait amené rue Plumet, il ne l'avait point revue, et elle lui était complètement sortie de l'esprit. Il n'avait que des motifs de reconnaissance pour elle, il lui devait son bonheur présent, et pourtant il lui était gênant de la rencontrer.

C'est une erreur de croire que la passion, quand elle est heureuse et pure, conduit l'homme à un état de perfection; elle le conduit simplement, nous l'avons constaté, à un état d'oubli. Dans cette situation, l'homme oublie d'être mauvais, mais il oublie aussi d'être bon. La reconnaissance, le devoir, les souvenirs essentiels et importuns, s'évanouissent. En tout autre temps Marius eût été bien autre pour Éponine. Absorbé par Cosette, il ne s'était même pas clairement rendu compte que cette Éponine s'appelait Éponine Thénardier, et qu'elle portait un nom écrit dans le testament de son père, ce nom pour lequel il se serait, quelques mois auparavant, si ardemment dévoué. Nous montrons Marius tel qu'il était. Son père lui-même disparaissait un peu dans son âme sous la splendeur de son amour.

Il répondit avec quelque embarras:

— Ah! c'est vous, Éponine?

— Pourquoi me dites-vous vous? Est-ce que je vous ai fait quelque chose?

— Non, répondit-il.

Certes, il n'avait rien contre elle. Loin de là. Seulement, il sentait qu'il ne pouvait faire autrement, maintenant qu'il disait tu à Cosette, que de dire vous à Éponine.

Comme il se taisait, elle s'écria:

— Dites donc....

Puis elle s'arrêta. Il semblait que les paroles manquaient à cette créature autrefois si insouciante et si hardie. Elle essaya de sourire et ne put. Elle reprit:

— Eh bien!...

Puis elle se tut encore et resta les yeux baissés.

— Bonsoir, monsieur Marius, dit-elle tout à coup brusquement, et elle s’en alla.

Chapitre IV

Cab roule en anglais et jappe en argot

Le lendemain, c’était le 3 juin, le 3 juin 1832, date qu’il faut indiquer à cause des événements graves qui étaient à cette époque suspendus sur l’horizon de Paris à l’état de nuages chargés, Marius à la nuit tombante suivait le même chemin que la veille avec les mêmes pensées de ravissement dans le cœur, lorsqu’il aperçut, entre les arbres du boulevard, Éponine qui venait à lui. Deux jours de suite, c’était trop. Il se détourna vivement, quitta le boulevard, changea de route, et s’en alla rue Plumet par la rue Monsieur.

Cela fit qu’Éponine le suivit jusqu’à la rue Plumet, chose qu’elle n’avait point faite encore. Elle s’était contentée jusque-là de l’apercevoir à son passage sur le boulevard sans même chercher à le rencontrer. La veille seulement, elle avait essayé de lui parler.

Éponine le suivit donc, sans qu’il s’en doutât. Elle le vit déranger le barreau de la grille, et se glisser dans le jardin.

— Tiens! dit-elle, il entre dans la maison!

Elle s’approcha de la grille, tâta les barreaux l’un après l’autre et reconnut facilement celui que Marius avait dérangé.

Elle murmura à demi-voix, avec un accent lugubre:

— Pas de ça, Lisette!

Elle s’assit sur le soubassement de la grille, tout à côté du barreau, comme si elle le gardait. C’était précisément le point où la grille venait toucher le mur voisin. Il y avait là un angle obscur où Éponine disparaissait entièrement.

Elle demeura ainsi plus d’une heure sans bouger et sans souffler, en proie à ses idées.

Vers dix heures du soir, un des deux ou trois passants de la rue Plumet, vieux bourgeois attardé qui se hâtait dans ce lieu désert et mal famé, côtoyant la grille du jardin, et arrivé à l’angle que la grille faisait avec le mur, entendit une voix sourde et menaçante qui disait:

— Je ne m’étonne plus s’il vient tous les soirs!

Le passant promena ses yeux autour de lui, ne vit personne, n’osa pas regarder dans ce coin noir et eut grand’peur. Il doubla le pas.

Ce passant eut raison de se hâter, car, très peu d’instants après, six hommes qui marchaient séparés et à quelque distance les uns des autres, le long des murs, et qu’on eût pu prendre pour une patrouille grise, entrèrent dans la rue Plumet.

Le premier qui arriva à la grille du jardin s’arrêta, et attendit les autres; une seconde après, ils étaient tous les six réunis.

Ces hommes se mirent à parler à voix basse.

— C’est icicaille, dit l’un d’eux.

— Y a-t-il un cab dans le jardin? demanda un autre.

— Je ne sais pas. En tout cas j’ai levé une boulette que nous lui ferons morfiler.

— As-tu du mastic pour frangir la vanterne?

— Oui.

— La grille est vieille, reprit un cinquième qui avait une voix de ventriloque.

— Tant mieux, dit le second qui avait parlé. Elle ne criblera pas tant sous la bastringue et ne sera pas si dure à faucher.

Le sixième, qui n’avait pas encore ouvert la bouche, se mit à visiter la grille comme avait fait Éponine une heure auparavant, empoignant successivement chaque barreau et les ébranlant avec précaution. Il arriva ainsi au barreau que Marius avait descellé. Comme il allait saisir ce barreau, une main sortant brusquement de l’ombre s’abattit sur son bras, il se sentit vivement repoussé par le milieu de la poitrine, et une voix enrouée lui dit sans crier:

— Il y a un cab.

En même temps il vit une fille pâle debout devant lui.

L’homme eut cette commotion que donne toujours l’inattendu. Il se hérissa hideusement; rien n’est formidable à voir comme les bêtes féroces inquiètes; leur air effrayé est effrayant. Il recula, et bégaya:

— Quelle est cette drôlesse?

— Votre fille.

C’était en effet Éponine qui parlait à Thénardier.

À l’apparition d’Éponine, les cinq autres, c’est-à-dire Claquesous, Gueulemer, Babet, Montparnasse et Brujon, s’étaient approchés sans bruit, sans précipitation, sans dire une parole, avec la lenteur sinistre propre à ces hommes de nuit.

On leur distinguait je ne sais quels hideux outils à la main. Gueulemer tenait une de ces pinces courbes que les rôdeurs appellent fanchons.

— Ah çà, qu'est-ce que tu fais là? qu'est-ce que tu nous veux? es-tu folle? s'écria Thénardier, autant qu'on peut s'écrier en parlant bas. Qu'est-ce que tu viens nous empêcher de travailler?

Éponine se mit à rire et lui sauta au cou.

— Je suis là, mon petit père, parce que je suis là. Est-ce qu'il n'est pas permis de s'asseoir sur les pierres, à présent? C'est vous qui ne devriez pas y être. Qu'est-ce que vous venez y faire, puisque c'est un biscuit? Je l'avais dit à Magnon. Il n'y a rien à faire ici. Mais embrassez-moi donc, mon bon petit père! Comme il y a longtemps que je ne vous ai vu! Vous êtes dehors, donc?

Le Thénardier essaya de se débarrasser des bras d'Éponine et grommela:

— C'est bon. Tu m'as embrassé. Oui, je suis dehors. Je ne suis pas dedans. À présent, va-t'en.

Mais Éponine ne lâchait pas prise et redoublait ses caresses.

— Mon petit père, comment avez-vous donc fait? Il faut que vous ayez bien de l'esprit pour vous être tiré de là.

Contez-moi ça! Et ma mère? où est ma mère? Donnez-moi donc des nouvelles de maman.

Thénardier répondit:

— Elle va bien, je ne sais pas, laisse-moi, je te dis va-t'en.

— Je ne veux pas m'en aller justement, fit Éponine avec une minauderie d'enfant gâté, vous me renvoyez que voilà quatre mois que je ne vous ai vu et que j'ai à peine eu le temps de vous embrasser.

Et elle reprit son père par le cou.

— Ah çà mais, c'est bête! dit Babet.

— Dépêchons! dit Gueulemer, les coqueurs peuvent passer.

La voix de ventriloque scanda ce distique:

Nous n'sommes pas le jour de l'an,
À bécoter papa maman.

Éponine se tourna vers les cinq bandits.

— Tiens, C'est monsieur Brujon. — Bonjour, monsieur Babet. Bonjour, monsieur Claquesous. — Est-ce que vous ne me reconnaissez pas, monsieur Gueulemer? — Comment ça va, Montparnasse?

— Si, on te reconnaît! fit Thénardier. Mais bonjour, bonsoir, au large! laisse-nous tranquilles.

— C’est l’heure des renards, et pas des poules, dit Montparnasse.

— Tu vois bien que nous avons à goupiner icigo, ajouta Babet.

Éponine prit la main de Montparnasse.

— Prends garde! dit-il, tu vas te couper, j’ai un lingre ouvert.

— Mon petit Montparnasse, répondit Éponine très doucement, il faut avoir confiance dans les gens. Je suis la fille de mon père peut-être. Monsieur Babet, monsieur Gueulemer, c’est moi qu’on a chargée d’éclairer l’affaire.

Il est remarquable qu’Éponine ne parlait pas argot. Depuis qu’elle connaissait Marius, cette affreuse langue lui était devenue impossible.

Elle pressa dans sa petite main osseuse et faible comme la main d’un squelette les gros doigts rudes de Gueulemer et continua:

— Vous savez bien que je ne suis pas sotte. Ordinairement on me croit. Je vous ai rendu service dans les occasions. Eh bien, j’ai pris des renseignements, vous vous exposeriez inutilement, voyez-vous. Je vous jure qu’il n’y a rien à faire dans cette maison-ci.

— Il y a des femmes seules, dit Gueulemer.

— Non. Les personnes sont déménagées.

— Les chandelles ne le sont pas, toujours! fit Babet.

Et il montra à Éponine, à travers le haut des arbres, une lumière qui se promenait dans la mansarde du pavillon. C’était Toussaint qui avait veillé pour étendre du linge à sécher.

Éponine tenta un dernier effort.

— Eh bien, dit-elle, c’est du monde très pauvre, et une baraque où ils n’ont pas le sou.

— Va-t’en au diable! cria Thénardier. Quand nous aurons retourné la maison, et que nous aurons mis la cave en haut et le grenier en bas, nous te dirons ce qu’il y a dedans, et si ce sont des balles, des ronds ou des broques.

Et il la poussa pour passer outre.

— Mon bon ami monsieur Montparnasse, dit Éponine, je vous en prie, vous qui êtes bon enfant, n’entrez pas!

— Prends donc garde, tu vas te couper! répliqua Montparnasse.

Thénardier reprit avec l’accent décisif qu’il avait:

— Décampe, la fée, et laisse les hommes faire leurs affaires.

Éponine lâcha la main de Montparnasse qu’elle avait ressaisie, et dit:

— Vous voulez donc entrer dans cette maison?

— Un peu! fit le ventriloque en ricanant.

Alors elle s’adossa à la grille, fit face aux six bandits armés jusqu’aux dents et à qui la nuit donnait des visages de démons, et dit d’une voix ferme et basse:

— Eh bien, moi, je ne veux pas.

Ils s’arrêtèrent stupéfaits. Le ventriloque pourtant acheva son ricanement. Elle reprit:

— Les amis! écoutez bien. Ce n’est pas ça. Maintenant je parle. D’abord, si vous entrez dans ce jardin, si vous touchez à cette grille, je crie, je cogne aux portes, je réveille le monde, je vous fais empoigner tous les six, j’appelle les sergents de ville.

— Elle le ferait, dit Thénardier bas à Brujon et au ventriloque.

Elle secoua la tête et ajouta:

— À commencer par mon père.

Thénardier s’approcha.

— Pas si près, bonhomme! dit-elle.

Il recula en grommelant dans ses dents: — Mais qu’est-ce qu’elle a donc? Et il ajouta:

— Chienne!

Elle se mit à rire d’une façon terrible.

— Comme vous voudrez, vous n’entrerez pas. Je ne suis pas la fille au chien, puisque je suis la fille au loup. Vous êtes six, qu’est-ce que cela me fait? Vous êtes des hommes. Eh bien, je suis une femme. Vous ne me faites pas peur, allez. Je vous dis que vous n’entrerez pas dans cette maison, parce que cela ne me plaît pas. Si vous approchez, j’aboie. Je vous l’ai dit, le cab c’est moi. Je me fiche pas mal de vous. Passez votre chemin, vous m’ennuyez! Allez où vous voudrez, mais ne venez pas ici, je vous le défends! Vous à coups de couteau, moi à coups de savate, ça m’est égal, avancez donc!

Elle fit un pas vers les bandits, elle était effrayante, elle se remit à rire.

— Pardine! je n’ai pas peur. Cet été, j’aurai faim, cet hiver, j’aurai froid. Sont-ils farces, ces bêtas d’hommes de croire qu’ils font peur à une fille! De quoi! peur? Ah ouiche, joliment! Parce que vous avez des chipies de maîtresses qui se cachent sous le lit quand vous faites la grosse voix, voilà-t-il pas. Moi je n’ai peur de rien!

Elle appuya sur Thénardier son regard fixe, et dit:

— Pas même de vous, mon père!

Puis elle poursuivit en promenant sur les bandits ses sanglantes prunelles de spectre:

— Qu’est-ce que ça me fait à moi qu’on me ramasse demain rue Plumet sur le pavé, tuée à coups de surin par mon père, ou bien qu’on me trouve dans un an dans les filets de Saint-Cloud ou à l’île des Cygnes au milieu des vieux bouchons pourris et des chiens noyés!

Force lui fut de s’interrompre, une toux sèche la prit, son souffle sortait comme un râle de sa poitrine étroite et débile.

Elle reprit:

— Je n’ai qu’à crier, on vient, patatras. Vous êtes six; moi je suis tout le monde.

Thénardier fit un mouvement vers elle.

— Prochez pas cria-t-elle.

Il s’arrêta, et lui dit avec douceur:

— Eh bien non. Je n’approcherai pas, mais ne parle pas si haut. Ma fille, tu veux donc nous empêcher de travailler? Il faut pourtant que nous gagnions notre vie. Tu n’as donc plus d’amitié pour ton père?

— Vous m’embêtez, dit Éponine.

— Il faut pourtant que nous vivions, que nous mangions....

— Crevez.

Cela dit, elle s’assit sur le soubassement de la grille en chantonnant:

Mon bras si dodu,
Ma jambe bien faite,
Et le temps perdu.

Elle avait le coude sur le genou et le menton dans sa main, et elle balançait son pied d’un air d’indifférence. Sa robe trouée laissait voir ses clavicules maigres. Le réverbère voisin éclairait son profil et son attitude. On ne pouvait rien voir de plus résolu et de plus surprenant.

Les six escarpes, interdits et sombres d’être tenus en échec par une fille, allèrent sous l’ombre portée de la lanterne et tinrent conseil avec des haussements d’épaule humiliés et furieux.

Elle cependant les regardait d’un air paisible et farouche.

— Elle a quelque chose, dit Babet. Une raison. Est-ce qu’elle est amoureuse du cab? C’est pourtant dommage de manquer ça. Deux femmes, un vieux qui loge dans une arrière-cour; il y a des rideaux pas mal aux fenêtres. Le vieux doit être un guinal. Je crois l’affaire bonne.

— Eh bien, entrez, vous autres, s'écria Montparnasse. Faites l'affaire. Je resterai là avec la fille, et si elle bronche....

Il fit reluire au réverbère le couteau qu'il tenait ouvert dans sa manche.

Thénardier ne disait mot et semblait prêt à ce qu'on voudrait.

Brujon, qui était un peu oracle et qui avait, comme on sait, «donné l'affaire», n'avait pas encore parlé. Il paraissait pensif. Il passait pour ne reculer devant rien, et l'on savait qu'il avait un jour dévalisé, rien que par bravade, un poste de sergents de ville. En outre il faisait des vers et des chansons, ce qui lui donnait une grande autorité.

Babet le questionna.

— Tu ne dis rien, Brujon?

Brujon resta encore un instant silencieux, puis il hocha la tête de plusieurs façons variées, et se décida enfin à élever la voix.

— Voici: j'ai rencontré ce matin deux moineaux qui se battaient; ce soir, je me cogne à une femme qui querelle. Tout ça est mauvais. Allons-nous-en.

Ils s'en allèrent.

Tout en s'en allant, Montparnasse murmura:

— C'est égal, si on avait voulu, j'aurais donné le coup de pouce.

Babet lui répondit:

— Moi pas. Je ne tape pas une dame.

Au coin de la rue, ils s'arrêtèrent et échangèrent à voix sourde ce dialogue énigmatique:

— Où irons-nous coucher ce soir?

— Sous Pantin.

— As-tu sur toi la clef de la grille, Thénardier?

— Pardi.

Éponine, qui ne les quittait pas des yeux, les vit reprendre le chemin par où ils étaient venus. Elle se leva et se mit à ramper derrière eux le long des murailles et des maisons. Elle les suivit ainsi jusqu'au boulevard. Là, ils se séparèrent, et elle vit ces six hommes s'enfoncer dans l'obscurité où ils semblèrent fondre.

Chapitre V

Choses de la nuit

Après le départ des bandits, la rue Plumet reprit son tranquille aspect nocturne.

Ce qui venait de se passer dans cette rue n'eût point étonné une forêt. Les futaies, les taillis, les bruyères, les branches âprement entre-croisées, les hautes herbes, existent d'une manière sombre; le fourmillement sauvage entrevoit là les subites apparitions de l'invisible; ce qui est au-dessous de l'homme y distingue à travers la brume ce qui est au-delà de l'homme; et les choses ignorées de nous vivants s'y confrontent dans la nuit. La nature hérissée et fauve s'effare à de certaines approches où elle croit sentir le surnaturel. Les forces de l'ombre se connaissent, et ont entre elles de mystérieux équilibres. Les dents et les griffes redoutent l'insaisissable. La bestialité buveuse de sang, les voraces appétits affamés en quête de la proie, les instincts armés d'ongles et de mâchoires qui n'ont pour source et pour but que le ventre, regardent et flairent avec inquiétude l'impassible linéament spectral rôdant sous un suaire, debout dans sa vague robe frissonnante, et qui leur semble vivre d'une vie morte et terrible. Ces brutalités, qui ne sont que matière, craignent confusément d'avoir affaire à l'immense obscurité condensée dans un être inconnu. Une figure noire barrant le passage arrête net la bête farouche. Ce qui sort du cimetière intimide et déconcerte ce qui sort de l'antre; le féroce a peur du sinistre; les loups reculent devant une goule rencontrée.

Chapitre VI

Marius redevient réel au point de donner son adresse à Cosette

Pendant que cette espèce de chienne à figure humaine montait la garde contre la grille et que les six bandits lâchaient pied devant une fille, Marius était près de Cosette.

Jamais le ciel n’avait été plus constellé et plus charmant, les arbres plus tremblants, la senteur des herbes plus pénétrante; jamais les oiseaux ne s’étaient endormis dans les feuilles avec un bruit plus doux; jamais toutes les harmonies de la sérénité universelle n’avaient mieux répondu aux musiques intérieures de l’amour; jamais Marius n’avait été plus épris, plus heureux, plus extasié. Mais il avait trouvé Cosette triste. Cosette avait pleuré. Elle avait les yeux rouges.

C’était le premier nuage dans cet admirable rêve.

Le premier mot de Marius avait été:

— Qu’as-tu?

Et elle avait répondu:

— Voilà.

Puis elle s’était assise sur le banc près du perron, et pendant qu’il prenait place tout tremblant auprès d’elle, elle avait poursuivi:

— Mon père m’a dit ce matin de me tenir prête, qu’il avait des affaires, et que nous allions peut-être partir.

Marius frissonna de la tête aux pieds.

Quand on est à la fin de la vie, mourir, cela veut dire partir; quand on est au commencement, partir, cela veut dire mourir.

Depuis six semaines, Marius, peu à peu, lentement, par degrés, prenait chaque jour possession de Cosette. Possession tout idéale, mais profonde. Comme nous l’avons expliqué déjà, dans le premier amour, on prend l’âme bien avant le corps; plus tard on prend le corps bien avant l’âme, quelquefois on ne prend pas l’âme du tout; les Faublas et les Prudhomme ajoutent: parce qu’il n’y en a pas; mais ce sarcasme est par bonheur un blasphème. Marius donc possédait Cosette, comme les esprits possèdent; mais il l’enveloppait de toute son âme et la saisissait jalousement avec une incroyable conviction. Il possédait son sourire, son haleine, son parfum, le rayonnement profond de ses prunelles bleues, la douceur de sa peau quand il lui touchait la main, le charmant signe qu'elle avait au cou, toutes ses pensées. Ils étaient convenus de ne jamais dormir sans rêver l'un de l'autre, et ils s'étaient tenus parole. Il possédait donc tous les rêves de Cosette. Il regardait sans cesse et il effleurait quelquefois de son souffle les petits cheveux qu'elle avait à la nuque, et il se déclarait qu'il n'y avait pas un de ces petits cheveux qui ne lui appartint à lui Marius. Il contemplait et il adorait les choses qu'elle mettait, son nœud de ruban, ses gants, ses manchettes, ses brodequins, comme des objets sacrés dont il était le maître. Il songeait qu'il était le seigneur de ces jolis peignes d'écaille qu'elle avait dans ses cheveux, et il se disait même, sourds et confus bégayements de la volupté qui se faisait jour, qu'il n'y avait pas un cordon de sa robe, pas une maille de ses bas, pas un pli de son corset, qui ne fût à lui. À côté de Cosette, il se sentait près de son bien, près de sa chose, près de son despote et de son esclave. Il semblait qu'ils eussent tellement mêlé leurs âmes que, s'ils eussent voulu les reprendre, il leur eût été impossible de les reconnaître. — Celle-ci est la mienne. — Non, c'est la mienne. — Je t'assure que tu te trompes. Voilà bien moi. — Ce que tu prends pour toi, c'est moi. — Marius était quelque chose qui faisait partie de Cosette et Cosette était quelque chose qui faisait partie de Marius. Marius sentait Cosette vivre en lui. Avoir Cosette, posséder Cosette, cela pour lui n'était pas distinct de respirer. Ce fut au milieu de cette foi, de cet enivrement, de cette possession virginale, inouïe et absolue, de cette souveraineté, que ces mots: «Nous allons partir», tombèrent tout à coup, et que la voix brusque de la réalité lui cria: Cosette n'est pas à toi!

Marius se réveilla. Depuis six semaines, Marius vivait, nous l'avons dit, hors de la vie; ce mot, partir! l'y fit rentrer durement.

Il ne trouva pas une parole. Cosette sentit seulement que sa main était très froide. Elle lui dit à son tour:

— Qu'as-tu?

Il répondit, si bas que Cosette l'entendait à peine:

— Je ne comprends pas ce que tu as dit.

Elle reprit:

— Ce matin mon père m'a dit de préparer toutes mes petites affaires et de me tenir prête, qu'il me donnerait son linge pour le mettre dans une malle, qu'il était obligé de faire un voyage, que nous allions partir, qu'il faudrait avoir une grande malle pour moi et une petite pour lui, de préparer tout cela d'ici à une semaine, et que nous irions peut-être en Angleterre.

— Mais c’est monstrueux! s’écria Marius.

Il est certain qu’en ce moment, dans l’esprit de Marius, aucun abus de pouvoir, aucune violence, aucune abomination des tyrans les plus prodigieux, aucune action de Busiris, de Tibère ou de Henri VIII n’égalait en férocité celle-ci: M. Fauchelevent emmenant sa fille en Angleterre parce qu’il a des affaires.

Il demanda d’une voix faible:

— Et quand partirais-tu?

— Il n’a pas dit quand.

— Et quand reviendrais-tu?

— Il n’a pas dit quand.

Marius se leva, et dit froidement:

— Cosette, irez-vous?

Cosette tourna vers lui ses beaux yeux pleins d’angoisse et répondit avec une sorte d’égarement:

— Où?

— En Angleterre? irez-vous?

— Pourquoi me dis-tu vous?

— Je vous demande si vous irez?

— Comment veux-tu que je fasse? dit-elle en joignant les mains.

— Ainsi vous irez?

— Si mon père y va?

— Ainsi, vous irez?

Cosette prit la main de Marius et l’étreignit sans répondre.

— C’est bon, dit Marius. Alors j’irai ailleurs.

Cosette sentit le sens de ce mot plus encore qu’elle ne le comprit. Elle pâlit tellement que sa figure devint blanche dans l’obscurité. Elle balbutia:

— Que veux-tu dire?

Marius la regarda, puis éleva lentement ses yeux vers le ciel et répondit:

— Rien.

Quand sa paupière s’abaissa, il vit Cosette qui lui souriait. Le sourire d’une femme qu’on aime a une clarté qu’on voit la nuit.

— Que nous sommes bêtes! Marius, j’ai une idée.

— Quoi?

— Pars si nous partons! Je te dirai où. Viens me rejoindre où je serai!

Marius était maintenant un homme tout à fait réveillé. Il était retombé dans la réalité. Il cria à Cosette:

— Partir avec vous! es-tu folle? Mais il faut de l’argent, et je n’en ai pas! Aller en Angleterre? Mais je dois maintenant, je ne sais pas, plus de dix louis à Courfeyrac, un de mes amis que tu ne connais pas! Mais j’ai un vieux chapeau qui ne vaut pas trois francs, j’ai un habit où il manque des boutons par devant, ma chemise est toute déchirée; j’ai les coudes percés, mes bottes prennent l’eau; depuis six semaines je n’y pense plus, et je ne te l’ai pas dit. Cosette! je suis un misérable. Tu ne me vois que la nuit, et tu me donnes ton amour; si tu me voyais le jour, tu me donnerais un sou! Aller en Angleterre! Eh! je n’ai pas de quoi payer le passeport!

Il se jeta contre un arbre qui était là, debout, les deux bras au-dessus de sa tête, le front contre l’écorce, ne sentant ni le bois qui lui écorchait la peau ni la fièvre qui lui martelait les tempes, immobile, et prêt à tomber, comme la statue du désespoir.

Il demeura longtemps ainsi. On resterait l’éternité dans ces abîmes-là. Enfin il se retourna. Il entendait derrière lui un petit bruit étouffé, doux et triste.

C’était Cosette qui sanglotait.

Elle pleurait depuis plus de deux heures à côté de Marius qui songeait.

Il vint à elle, tomba à genoux, et, se prosternant lentement, il prit le bout de son pied qui passait sous sa robe et le baisa.

Elle le laissa faire en silence. Il y a des moments où la femme accepte, comme une déesse sombre et résignée, la religion de l’amour.

— Ne pleure pas, dit-il.

Elle murmura:

— Puisque je vais peut-être m’en aller, et que tu ne peux pas venir!

Lui reprit:

— M’aimes-tu?

Elle lui répondit en sanglotant ce mot du paradis qui n’est jamais plus charmant qu’à travers les larmes:

— Je t’adore!

Il poursuivit avec un son de voix qui était une inexprimable caresse:

— Ne pleure pas. Dis, veux-tu faire cela pour moi de ne pas pleurer?

— M’aimes-tu, toi? dit-elle.

Il lui prit la main.

— Cosette, je n’ai jamais donné ma parole d’honneur à personne, parce que ma parole d’honneur me fait peur. Je sens que mon père est à côté. Eh bien, je te donne ma parole d’honneur la plus sacrée que, si tu t’en vas, je mourrai.

Il y eut dans l’accent dont il prononça ces paroles une mélancolie si solennelle et si tranquille que Cosette trembla. Elle sentit ce froid que donne une chose sombre et vraie qui passe. De saisissement elle cessa de pleurer.

— Maintenant écoute, dit-il. Ne m’attends pas demain.

— Pourquoi?

— Ne m’attends qu’après-demain.

— Oh! pourquoi?

— Tu verras.

— Un jour sans te voir! mais c’est impossible.

— Sacrifions un jour pour avoir peut-être toute la vie.

Et Marius ajouta à demi-voix et en aparté:

— C’est un homme qui ne change rien à ses habitudes, et il n’a jamais reçu personne que le soir.

— De quel homme parles-tu? demanda Cosette.

— Moi? je n’ai rien dit.

— Qu’est-ce que tu espères donc?

— Attends jusqu’à après-demain.

— Tu le veux?

— Oui, Cosette.

Elle lui prit la tête dans ses deux mains, se haussant sur la pointe des pieds pour être à sa taille, et cherchant à voir dans ses yeux son espérance.

Marius reprit:

— J’y songe, il faut que tu saches mon adresse, il peut arriver des choses, on ne sait pas, je demeure chez cet ami appelé Courfeyrac, rue de la Verrerie, numéro 16.

Il fouilla dans sa poche, en tira un couteau-canif, et avec la lame écrivit sur le plâtre du mur:

16, rue de la Verrerie.

Cosette cependant s’était remise à lui regarder dans les yeux.

— Dis-moi ta pensée. Marius, tu as une pensée. Dis-la-moi. Oh! dis-la-moi pour que je passe une bonne nuit!

— Ma pensée, la voici: c’est qu’il est impossible que Dieu veuille nous séparer. Attends-moi après-demain.

— Qu’est-ce que je ferai jusque-là? dit Cosette. Toi tu es dehors, tu vas, tu viens. Comme c’est heureux, les hommes! Moi, je vais rester toute seule.

Oh! que je vais être triste! Qu’est-ce que tu feras donc demain soir, dis?

— J’essayerai une chose.

— Alors je prierai Dieu et je penserai à toi d’ici là pour que tu réussisses. Je ne te questionne plus, puisque tu ne veux pas. Tu es mon maître. Je passerai ma soirée demain à chanter cette musique d’Euryanthe que tu aimes et que tu es venu entendre un soir derrière mon volet. Mais après-demain tu viendras de bonne heure. Je t’attendrai à la nuit, à neuf heures précises, je t’en préviens. Mon Dieu! que c’est triste que les jours soient longs! Tu entends, à neuf heures sonnant je serai dans le jardin.

— Et moi aussi.

Et sans se l’être dit, mus par la même pensée, entraînés par ces courants électriques qui mettent deux amants en communication continuelle, tous deux enivrés de volupté jusque dans leur douleur, ils tombèrent dans les bras l’un de l’autre, sans s’apercevoir que leurs lèvres s’étaient jointes pendant que leurs regards levés, débordant d’extase et pleins de larmes, contemplaient les étoiles.

Quand Marius sortit, la rue était déserte. C’était le moment où Éponine suivait les bandits jusque sur le boulevard.

Tandis que Marius rêvait, la tête appuyée contre l’arbre, une idée lui avait traversé l’esprit; une idée, hélas! qu’il jugeait lui-même insensée et impossible. Il avait pris un parti violent.

Chapitre VII

Le vieux cœur et le jeune cœur en présence

Le père Gillenormand avait à cette époque ses quatre-vingt-onze ans bien sonnés. Il demeurait toujours avec mademoiselle Gillenormand rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, n° 6, dans cette vieille maison qui était à lui. C'était, on s'en souvient, un de ces vieillards antiques qui attendent la mort tout droits, que l'âge charge sans les faire plier, et que le chagrin même ne courbe pas.

Cependant, depuis quelque temps, sa fille disait: mon père baisse. Il ne souffletait plus les servantes; il ne frappait plus de sa canne avec autant de verve le palier de l'escalier quand Basque tardait à lui ouvrir. La Révolution de Juillet l'avait à peine exaspéré pendant six mois. Il avait vu presque avec tranquillité dans le Moniteur cet accouplement de mots: M. Humblot-Conté, pair de France. Le fait est que le vieillard était rempli d'accablement. Il ne fléchissait pas, il ne se rendait pas, ce n'était pas plus dans sa nature physique que dans sa nature morale; mais il se sentait intérieurement défaillir. Depuis quatre ans il attendait Marius, de pied ferme, c'est bien le mot, avec la conviction que ce mauvais petit garnement sonnerait à la porte un jour ou l'autre; maintenant il en venait, dans de certaines heures mornes, à se dire que pour peu que Marius se fît encore attendre... — Ce n'était pas la mort qui lui était insupportable, c'était l'idée que peut-être il ne reverrait plus Marius. Ne plus revoir Marius, ceci n'était pas entré un seul instant dans son cerveau jusqu'à ce jour; à présent cette idée commençait à lui apparaître, et le glaçait. L'absence, comme il arrive toujours dans les sentiments naturels et vrais, n'avait fait qu'accroître son amour de grand-père pour l'enfant ingrat qui s'en était allé comme cela. C'est dans les nuits de décembre, par dix degrés de froid, qu'on pense le plus au soleil. M. Gillenormand était ou se croyait, par-dessus tout incapable de faire un pas, lui l'aïeul, vers son petit-fils; — je crèverais plutôt, disait-il. Il ne se trouvait aucun tort, mais il ne songeait à Marius qu'avec un attendrissement profond et le muet désespoir d'un vieux bonhomme qui s'en va dans les ténèbres.

Il commençait à perdre ses dents, ce qui s'ajoutait à sa tristesse.

M. Gillenormand, sans pourtant se l'avouer à lui-même, car il en eut été furieux et honteux, n'avait jamais aimé une maîtresse comme il aimait Marius.

Il avait fait placer dans sa chambre, devant le chevet de son lit, comme la première chose qu'il voulait voir en s'éveillant, un ancien portrait de son autre fille, celle qui était morte, madame Pontmercy, portrait fait lorsqu'elle avait dix-huit ans. Il regardait sans cesse ce portrait. Il lui arriva un jour de dire en le considérant:

— Je trouve qu'il lui ressemble.

— À ma sœur? reprit mademoiselle Gillenormand. Mais oui.

Le vieillard ajouta:

— Et à lui aussi.

Une fois, comme il était assis, les deux genoux l'un contre l'autre et l'œil presque fermé, dans une posture d'abattement, sa fille se risqua à lui dire:

— Mon père, est-ce que vous en voulez toujours autant?...

Elle s'arrêta, n'osant aller plus loin.

— À qui? demanda-t-il.

— À ce pauvre Marius?

Il souleva sa vieille tête, posa son poing amaigri et ridé sur la table, et cria de son accent le plus irrité et le plus vibrant:

— Pauvre Marius, vous dites! Ce monsieur est un drôle, un mauvais gueux, un petit vaniteux ingrat, sans cœur, sans âme, un orgueilleux, un méchant homme!

Et il se détourna pour que sa fille ne vît pas une larme qu'il avait dans les yeux.

Trois jours après, il sortit d'un silence qui durait depuis quatre heures pour dire à sa fille à brûle-pourpoint:

— J'avais eu l'honneur de prier mademoiselle Gillenormand de ne jamais m'en parler.

La tante Gillenormand renonça à toute tentative et porta ce diagnostic profond: — Mon père n'a jamais beaucoup aimé ma sœur depuis sa sottise. Il est clair qu'il déteste Marius.

«Depuis sa sottise», signifiait: depuis qu'elle avait épousé le colonel.

Du reste, comme on a pu le conjecturer, mademoiselle Gillenormand avait échoué dans sa tentative de substituer son favori, l'officier de lanciers, à Marius. Le remplaçant Théodule n'avait point réussi. M. Gillenormand n'avait pas accepté le quiproquo. Le vide du cœur ne s'accommode point d'un bouche-trou. Théodule, de son côté, tout en flairant l'héritage, répugnait à la corvée de plaire. Le bonhomme ennuyait le lancier, et le lancier choquait le bonhomme. Le lieutenant Théodule était gai sans doute, mais bavard; frivole, mais vulgaire; bon vivant, mais de mauvaise compagnie; il avait des maîtresses, c'est vrai, et il en parlait beaucoup, c'est vrai encore; mais il en parlait mal. Toutes ses qualités avaient un défaut. M. Gillenormand était excédé de l'entendre conter les bonnes fortunes quelconques qu'il avait autour de sa caserne, rue de Babylone. Et puis le lieutenant Gillenormand venait quelquefois en uniforme avec la cocarde tricolore. Ceci le rendait tout bonnement impossible. Le père Gillenormand avait fini par dire à sa fille: — J'en ai assez, du Théodule. J'ai peu de goût pour les gens de guerre en temps de paix. Reçois-les si tu veux. Je ne sais pas si je n'aime pas mieux encore les sabreurs que les traîneurs de sabre. Le cliquetis des lames dans la bataille est moins misérable, après tout, que le tapage des fourreaux sur le pavé. Et puis, se cambrer comme un matamore et se sangler comme une femmelette, avoir un corset sous une cuirasse, c'est être ridicule deux fois. Quand on est un véritable homme, on se tient à égale distance de la fanfaronnade et de la mièvrerie. Ni fier-à-bras, ni joli cœur. Garde ton Théodule pour toi.

Sa fille eut beau lui dire: — C'est pourtant votre petit-neveu, — il se trouva que M. Gillenormand, qui était grand-père jusqu'au bout des ongles, n'était pas grand-oncle du tout.

Au fond, comme il avait de l'esprit et qu'il comparait, Théodule n'avait servi qu'à lui faire mieux regretter Marius.

Un soir, c'était le 4 juin, ce qui n'empêchait pas que le père Gillenormand n'eût un très bon feu dans sa cheminée, il avait congédié sa fille qui cousait dans la pièce voisine. Il était seul dans sa chambre à bergerades, les pieds sur ses chenets, à demi enveloppé dans son vaste paravent de Coromandel à neuf feuilles, accoudé à sa table où brûlaient deux bougies sous un abat-jour vert, englouti dans son fauteuil de tapisserie, un livre à la main, mais ne lisant pas. Il était vêtu, selon sa mode, en incroyable, et ressemblait à un antique portrait de Garat. Cela l'eût fait suivre dans les rues, mais sa fille le couvrait toujours, lorsqu'il sortait, d'une vaste douillette d'évêque, qui cachait ses vêtements. Chez lui, excepté pour se lever et se coucher, il ne portait jamais de robe de chambre. — Cela donne l'air vieux, disait-il.

Le père Gillenormand songeait à Marius amoureusement et amèrement, et, comme d'ordinaire, l'amertume dominait. Sa tendresse aigrie finissait toujours par bouillonner et par tourner en indignation. Il en était à ce point où l'on cherche à prendre son parti et à accepter ce qui déchire. Il était en train de s'expliquer qu'il n'y avait maintenant plus de raison pour que Marius revînt, que s'il avait dû revenir, il l'aurait déjà fait, qu'il fallait y renoncer. Il essayait de s'habituer à l'idée que c'était fini, et qu'il mourrait sans revoir «ce monsieur». Mais toute sa nature se révoltait; sa vieille paternité n'y pouvait consentir. — Quoi! disait-il, c'était son refrain douloureux, il ne reviendra pas! — Sa tête chauve était tombée sur sa poitrine, et il fixait vaguement sur la cendre de son foyer un regard lamentable et irrité.

Au plus profond de cette rêverie, son vieux domestique, Basque, entra et demanda:

— Monsieur peut-il recevoir monsieur Marius?

Le vieillard se dressa sur son séant, blême et pareil à un cadavre qui se lève sous une secousse galvanique. Tout son sang avait reflué à son cœur. Il bégaya:

— Monsieur Marius quoi?

— Je ne sais pas, répondit Basque intimidé et décontenancé par l'air du maître, je ne l'ai pas vu. C'est Nicolette qui vient de me dire: Il y a là un jeune homme, dites que c'est monsieur Marius.

Le père Gillenormand balbutia à voix basse:

— Faites entrer.

Et il resta dans la même attitude, la tête branlante, l'œil fixé sur la porte. Elle se rouvrit. Un jeune homme entra. C'était Marius.

Marius s'arrêta à la porte comme attendant qu'on lui dît d'entrer.

Son vêtement presque misérable ne s'apercevait pas dans l'obscurité que faisait l'abat-jour. On ne distinguait que son visage calme et grave, mais étrangement triste.

Le père Gillenormand, hébété de stupeur et de joie, resta quelques instants sans voir autre chose qu'une clarté comme lorsqu'on est devant une apparition. Il était prêt à défaillir; il apercevait Marius à travers un éblouissement. C'était bien lui, c'était bien Marius!

Enfin! après quatre ans! Il le saisit, pour ainsi dire, tout entier d'un coup d'œil. Il le trouva beau, noble, distingué, grandi, homme fait, l'attitude convenable, l'air charmant. Il eut envie d'ouvrir ses bras, de l'appeler, de se précipiter, ses entrailles se fondirent en ravissement, les paroles affectueuses le gonflaient et débordaient de sa poitrine; enfin toute cette tendresse se fit jour et lui arriva aux lèvres, et par le contraste qui était le fond de sa nature, il en sortit une dureté. Il dit brusquement:

— Qu’est-ce que vous venez faire ici?

Marius répondit avec embarras:

— Monsieur....

M. Gillenormand eût voulu que Marius se jetât dans ses bras. Il fut mécontent de Marius et de lui-même. Il sentit qu’il était brusque et que Marius était froid. C’était pour le bonhomme une insupportable et irritante anxiété de se sentir si tendre et si éploré au dedans et de ne pouvoir être que dur au dehors. L’amertume lui revint. Il interrompit Marius avec un accent bourru:

— Alors pourquoi venez-vous?

Cet «alors» signifiait: si vous ne venez pas m’embrasser. Marius regarda son aïeul à qui la pâleur faisait un visage de marbre.

— Monsieur....

Le vieillard reprit d’une voix sévère:

— Venez-vous me demander pardon? avez-vous reconnu vos torts?

Il croyait mettre Marius sur la voie et que «l’enfant» allait fléchir. Marius frissonna; c’était le désaveu de son père qu’on lui demandait; il baissa les yeux et répondit:

— Non, monsieur.

— Et alors, s’écria impétueusement le vieillard avec une douleur poignante et pleine de colère, qu’est-ce que vous me voulez?

Marius joignit les mains, fit un pas et dit d’une voix faible et qui tremblait:

— Monsieur, ayez pitié de moi.

Ce mot remua M. Gillenormand; dit plus tôt, il l’eût attendri, mais il venait trop tard. L’aïeul se leva; il s’appuyait sur sa canne de ses deux mains, ses lèvres étaient blanches, son front vacillait, mais sa haute taille dominait Marius incliné.

— Pitié de vous, monsieur! C’est l’adolescent qui demande de la pitié au vieillard de quatre-vingt-onze ans! Vous entrez dans la vie, j’en sors; vous allez au spectacle, au bal, au café, au billard, vous avez de l’esprit, vous plaisez aux femmes, vous êtes joli garçon; moi je crache en plein été sur mes tisons; vous êtes riche des seules richesses qu’il y ait, moi j’ai toutes les pauvretés de la vieillesse, l’infirmité, l’isolement! vous avez vos trente-deux dents, un bon estomac, l’œil vif, la force, l’appétit, la santé, la gaîté, une forêt de cheveux noirs; moi je n’ai même plus de cheveux blancs, j’ai perdu mes dents, je perds mes jambes, je perds la mémoire, il y a trois noms de rues que je confonds sans cesse, la rue Charlot, la rue du Chaume et la rue Saint-Claude, j'en suis là; vous avez devant vous tout l'avenir plein de soleil, moi je commence à n'y plus voir goutte, tant j'avance dans la nuit; vous êtes amoureux, Ça va sans dire, moi, je ne suis aimé de personne au monde, et vous me demandez de la pitié! Parbleu, Molière a oublié ceci. Si c'est comme cela que vous plaisantez au palais, messieurs les avocats, je vous fais mon sincère compliment. Vous êtes drôles.

Et l'octogénaire reprit d'une voix courroucée et grave:

— Ah çà, qu'est-ce que vous me voulez?

— Monsieur, dit Marius, je sais que ma présence vous déplaît, mais je viens seulement pour vous demander une chose, et puis je vais m'en aller tout de suite.

Vous êtes un sot! dit le vieillard. Qui est-ce qui vous dit de vous en aller?

Ceci était la traduction de cette parole tendre qu'il avait au fond du cœur: Mais demande-moi donc pardon! Jette-toi donc à mon cou! M. Gillenormand sentait que Marius allait dans quelques instants le quitter, que son mauvais accueil le rebutait, que sa dureté le chassait, il se disait tout cela, et sa douleur s'en accroissait, et comme sa douleur se tournait immédiatement en colère, sa dureté en augmentait. Il eût voulu que Marius comprît, et Marius ne comprenait pas; ce qui rendait le bonhomme furieux. Il reprit:

— Comment! vous m'avez manqué, à moi, votre grand-père, vous avez quitté ma maison pour aller on ne sait où, vous avez désolé votre tante, vous avez été, cela se devine, c'est plus commode, mener la vie de garçon, faire le muscadin, rentrer à toutes les heures, vous amuser, vous ne m'avez pas donné signe de vie, vous avez fait des dettes sans même me dire de les payer, vous vous êtes fait casseur de vitres et tapageur, et, au bout de quatre ans, vous venez chez moi, et vous n'avez pas autre chose à me dire que cela!

Cette façon violente de pousser le petit-fils à la tendresse ne produisit que le silence de Marius. M. Gillenormand croisa les bras, geste qui, chez lui, était particulièrement impérieux, et apostropha Marius amèrement:

— Finissons. Vous venez me demander quelque chose, dites-vous? Eh bien quoi? qu'est-ce? Parlez.

— Monsieur, dit Marius avec le regard d'un homme qui sent qu'il va tomber dans un précipice, je viens vous demander la permission de me marier.

M. Gillenormand sonna. Basque entr'ouvrit la porte.

— Faites venir ma fille.

Une seconde après, la porte se rouvrit, mademoiselle Gillenormand n'entra pas, mais se montra; Marius était debout, muet, les bras pendants, avec une figure de criminel; M. Gillenormand allait et venait en long et en large dans la chambre. Il se tourna vers sa fille et lui dit:

— Rien. C'est monsieur Marius. Dites-lui bonjour. Monsieur veut se marier. Voilà. Allez-vous-en.

Le son de voix bref et rauque du vieillard annonçait une étrange plénitude d'emportement. La tante regarda Marius d'un air effaré, parut à peine le reconnaître, ne laissa pas échapper un geste ni une syllabe, et disparut au souffle de son père plus vite qu'un fétu devant l'ouragan.

Cependant le père Gillenormand était revenu s'adosser à la cheminée.

— Vous marier! à vingt et un ans! Vous avez arrangé cela! Vous n'avez plus qu'une permission à demander! une formalité. Asseyez-vous, monsieur. Eh bien, vous avez eu une révolution depuis que je n'ai eu l'honneur de vous voir. Les jacobins ont eu le dessus. Vous avez dû être content. N'êtes-vous pas républicain depuis que vous êtes baron? Vous accommodez cela. La république fait une sauce à la baronnie. Êtes-vous décoré de Juillet? avez-vous un peu pris le Louvre, monsieur? Il y a ici tout près, rue Saint-Antoine, vis-à-vis la rue des Nonaindières, un boulet incrusté dans le mur au troisième étage d'une maison avec cette inscription: 28 juillet 1830. Allez voir cela. Cela fait bon effet. Ah! ils font de jolies choses, vos amis! À propos, ne font-ils pas une fontaine à la place du monument de M. le duc de Berry? Ainsi vous voulez vous marier? à qui? peut-on sans indiscrétion demander à qui?

Il s'arrêta, et, avant que Marius eût eu le temps de répondre, il ajouta violemment:

— Ah çà, vous avez un état? une fortune faite? combien gagnez-vous dans votre métier d'avocat?

— Rien, dit Marius avec une sorte de fermeté et de résolution presque farouche.

— Rien? vous n'avez pour vivre que les douze cents livres que je vous fais?

Marius ne répondit point. M. Gillenormand continua:

— Alors, je comprends, c'est que la fille est riche?

— Comme moi.

— Quoi! pas de dot?

— Non.

— Des espérances?

— Je ne crois pas.

— Toute nue! et qu'est-ce que c'est que le père?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Et comment s'appelle-t-elle?

— Mademoiselle Fauchelevent.

— Fauchequoi?

— Fauchelevent.

— Pttt! fit le vieillard.

— Monsieur! s'écria Marius.

M. Gillenormand l'interrompit du ton d'un homme qui se parle à lui-même.

— C'est cela, vingt et un ans, pas d'état, douze cents livres par an, madame la baronne Pontmercy ira acheter deux sous de persil chez la fruitière.

— Monsieur, reprit Marius, dans l'égarement de la dernière espérance qui s'évanouit, je vous en supplie! je vous en conjure, au nom du ciel, à mains jointes, monsieur, je me mets à vos pieds, permettez-moi de l'épouser.

Le vieillard poussa un éclat de rire strident et lugubre à travers lequel il toussait et parlait.

— Ah! ah! ah! vous vous êtes dit: Pardine! je vais aller trouver cette vieille perruque, cette absurde ganache! Quel dommage que je n'aie pas mes vingt-cinq ans! comme je te vous lui flanquerais une bonne sommation respectueuse! comme je me passerais de lui! C'est égal, je lui dirai: Vieux crétin, tu es trop heureux de me voir, j'ai envie de me marier, j'ai envie d'épouser mamselle n'importe qui, fille de monsieur n'importe quoi, je n'ai pas de souliers, elle n'a pas de chemise, ça va, j'ai envie de jeter à l'eau ma carrière, mon avenir, ma jeunesse, ma vie, j'ai envie de faire un plongeon dans la misère avec une femme au cou, c'est mon idée, il faut que tu y consentes! et le vieux fossile consentira. Va, mon garçon, comme tu voudras, attache-toi ton pavé, épouse ta Pousselevent, ta Coupelevent... — Jamais, monsieur! jamais!

— Mon père!

— Jamais!

À l’accent dont ce «jamais» fut prononcé, Marius perdit tout espoir. Il traversa la chambre à pas lents, la tête ployée, chancelant, plus semblable encore à quelqu’un qui se meurt qu’à quelqu’un qui s’en va. M. Gillenormand le suivait des yeux, et au moment où la porte s’ouvrait et où Marius allait sortir, il fit quatre pas avec cette vivacité sénile des vieillards impérieux et gâtés, saisit Marius au collet, le ramena énergiquement dans la chambre, le jeta dans un fauteuil, et lui dit:

— Conte-moi ça!

C’était ce seul mot, mon père, échappé à Marius, qui avait fait cette révolution.

Marius le regarda égaré. Le visage mobile de M. Gillenormand n’exprimait plus rien qu’une rude et ineffable bonhomie. L’aïeul avait fait place au grand-père.

— Allons, voyons, parle, conte-moi tes amourettes, jabote, dis-moi tout! Sapristi! que les jeunes gens sont bêtes!

— Mon père! reprit Marius.

Toute la face du vieillard s’illumina d’un indicible rayonnement.

— Oui, c’est ça! appelle-moi ton père, et tu verras!

Il y avait maintenant quelque chose de si bon, de si doux, de si ouvert, de si paternel en cette brusquerie, que Marius, dans ce passage subit du découragement à l’espérance, en fut comme étourdi et enivré. Il était assis près de la table, la lumière des bougies faisait saillir le délabrement de son costume que le père Gillenormand considérait avec étonnement.

— Eh bien, mon père, dit Marius.

— Ah çà, interrompit M. Gillenormand, tu n’as donc vraiment pas le sou? Tu es mis comme un voleur.

Il fouilla dans un tiroir, et y prit une bourse qu’il posa sur la table:

— Tiens, voilà cent louis, achète-toi un chapeau.

— Mon père, poursuivit Marius, mon bon père, si vous saviez! je l’aime. Vous ne vous figurez pas, la première fois que je l’ai vue, c’était au Luxembourg, elle y venait; au commencement je n’y faisais pas grande attention, et puis je ne sais pas comment cela s’est fait, j’en suis devenu amoureux. Oh! comme cela m’a rendu malheureux! Enfin je la vois maintenant, tous les jours, chez elle, son père ne sait pas, imaginez qu’ils vont partir, c’est dans le jardin que nous nous voyons, le soir, son père veut l’emmener en Angleterre, alors je me suis dit: Je vais aller voir mon grand-père et lui conter la chose. Je deviendrais fou d’abord, je mourrais, je ferais une maladie, je me jetterais à l'eau. Il faut absolument que je l'épouse, puisque je deviendrais fou. Enfin voilà toute la vérité, je ne crois pas que j'aie oublié quelque chose. Elle demeure dans un jardin où il y a une grille, rue Plumet. C'est du côté des Invalides.

Le père Gillenormand s'était assis radieux près de Marius. Tout en l'écoutant et en savourant le son de sa voix, il savourait en même temps une longue prise de tabac. À ce mot, rue Plumet, il interrompit son aspiration, et laissa tomber le reste de son tabac sur ses genoux.

— Rue Plumet! tu dis rue plumet? — Voyons donc! — N'y a-t-il pas une caserne par là? — Mais oui, c'est ça. Ton cousin Théodule m'en a parlé. Le lancier, l'officier. — Une fillette, mon bon ami, une fillette! — Pardieu oui, rue Plumet. C'est ce qu'on appelait autrefois la rue Blomet. — Voilà que ça me revient. J'en ai entendu parler de cette petite de la grille de la rue Plumet. Dans un jardin. Une Paméla. Tu n'as pas mauvais goût. On la dit proprette. Entre nous, je crois que ce dadais de lancier lui a un peu fait la cour. Je ne sais pas jusqu'où cela a été. Enfin ça ne fait rien. D'ailleurs il ne faut pas le croire. Il se vante. Marius! je trouve ça très bien qu'un jeune homme comme toi soit amoureux. C'est de ton âge. Je t'aime mieux amoureux que jacobin. Je t'aime mieux épris d'un cotillon, sapristi! de vingt cotillons que de monsieur de Robespierre. Pour ma part, je me rends cette justice qu'en fait de sans-culottes, je n'ai jamais aimé que les femmes. Les jolies filles sont les jolies filles, que diable! il n'y a pas d'objection à ça. Quant à la petite, elle te reçoit en cachette du papa. C'est dans l'ordre. J'ai eu des histoires comme ça, moi aussi. Plus d'une. Sais-tu ce qu'on fait? On ne prend pas la chose avec férocité; on ne se précipite pas dans le tragique; on ne conclut pas au mariage et à monsieur le maire avec son écharpe. On est tout bêtement un garçon d'esprit. On a du bon sens. Glissez, mortels, n'épousez pas. On vient trouver le grand-père qui est bonhomme au fond, et qui a bien toujours quelques rouleaux de louis dans un vieux tiroir; on lui dit: Grand-père, voilà. Et le grand-père dit: C'est tout simple. Il faut que jeunesse se passe et que vieillesse se casse. J'ai été jeune, tu seras vieux. Va, mon garçon, tu rendras ça à ton petit-fils. Voilà deux cents pistoles. Amuse-toi, mordi! Rien de mieux! C'est ainsi que l'affaire doit se passer. On n'épouse point, mais ça n'empêche pas. Tu me comprends?

Marius, pétrifié et hors d'état d'articuler une parole, fit de la tête signe que non.

Le bonhomme éclata de rire, cligna sa vieille paupière, lui donna une tape sur le genou, le regarda entre deux yeux d'un air mystérieux et rayonnant, et lui dit avec le plus tendre des haussements d'épaules:

— Bêta! fais-en ta maîtresse.

Marius pâlit. Il n'avait rien compris à tout ce que venait de dire son grand-père. Ce rabâchage de rue Blomet, de Paméla, de caserne, de lancier, avait passé devant Marius comme une fantasmagorie. Rien de tout cela ne pouvait se rapporter à Cosette qui était un lys. Le bonhomme divaguait. Mais cette divagation avait abouti à un mot que Marius avait compris et qui était une mortelle injure à Cosette. Ce mot, fais-en ta maîtresse, entra dans le cœur du sévère jeune homme comme une épée.

Il se leva, ramassa son chapeau qui était à terre, et marcha vers la porte d'un pas assuré et ferme. Là il se retourna, s'inclina profondément devant son grand-père, redressa la tête, et dit:

— Il y a cinq ans, vous avez outragé mon père; aujourd'hui vous outragez ma femme. Je ne vous demande plus rien, monsieur. Adieu.

Le père Gillenormand, stupéfait, ouvrit la bouche, étendit les bras, essaya de se lever, et, avant qu'il eût pu prononcer un mot, la porte s'était refermée et Marius avait disparu.

Le vieillard resta quelques instants immobile et comme foudroyé sans pouvoir parler ni respirer, comme si un poing fermé lui serrait le gosier. Enfin il s'arracha de son fauteuil, courut à la porte autant qu'on peut courir à quatre-vingt-onze ans, l'ouvrit, et cria:

— Au secours! au secours!

Sa fille parut, puis les domestiques. Il reprit avec un râle lamentable:

— Courez après lui! rattrapez-le! Qu'est-ce que je lui ai fait? Il est fou! il s'en va! Ah! mon Dieu! ah! mon Dieu! cette fois il ne reviendra plus!

Il alla à la fenêtre qui donnait sur la rue, l'ouvrit de ses vieilles mains chevrotantes, se pencha plus d'à mi-corps pendant que Basque et Nicolette le retenaient par-derrière, et cria:

— Marius! Marius! Marius! Marius!

Mais Marius ne pouvait déjà plus entendre, et tournait en ce moment-là même l'angle de la rue Saint-Louis.

L'octogénaire porta deux ou trois fois ses deux mains à ses tempes avec une expression d'angoisse, recula en chancelant et s'affaissa sur un fauteuil, sans pouls, sans voix, sans larmes, branlant la tête et agitant les lèvres d'un air stupide, n’ayant plus rien dans les yeux et dans le cœur que quelque chose de morne et de profond qui ressemblait à la nuit.

Livre neuvième — Où vont-ils?

Chapitre I

Jean Valjean

Ce même jour, vers quatre heures de l’après-midi, Jean Valjean était assis seul sur le revers de l’un des talus les plus solitaires du Champ de Mars. Soit prudence, soit désir de se recueillir, soit tout simplement par suite d’un de ces insensibles changements d’habitudes qui s’introduisent peu à peu dans toutes les existences, il sortait maintenant assez rarement avec Cosette. Il avait sa veste d’ouvrier et un pantalon de toile grise, et sa casquette à longue visière lui cachait le visage. Il était à présent calme et heureux du côté de Cosette; ce qui l’avait quelque peu effrayé et troublé s’était dissipé; mais, depuis une semaine ou deux, des anxiétés d’une autre nature lui étaient venues. Un jour, en se promenant sur le boulevard, il avait aperçu Thénardier; grâce à son déguisement, Thénardier ne l’avait point reconnu; mais depuis lors Jean Valjean l’avait revu plusieurs fois, et il avait maintenant la certitude que Thénardier rôdait dans le quartier. Ceci avait suffi pour lui faire prendre un grand parti. Thénardier là, c’étaient tous les périls à la fois. En outre Paris n’était pas tranquille; les troubles politiques offraient cet inconvénient pour quiconque avait quelque chose à cacher dans sa vie que la police était devenue très inquiète et très ombrageuse, et qu’en cherchant à dépister un homme comme Pépin ou Morey, elle pouvait fort bien découvrir un homme comme Jean Valjean. Jean Valjean s’était décidé à quitter Paris, et même la France, et à passer en Angleterre. Il avait prévenu Cosette. Avant huit jours il voulait être parti. Il s’était assis sur le Champ de Mars, roulant dans son esprit toutes sortes de pensées, Thénardier, la police, le voyage, et la difficulté de se procurer un passeport.

À tous ces points de vue, il était soucieux.

Enfin, un fait inexplicable qui venait de le frapper, et dont il était encore tout chaud, avait ajouté à son éveil. Le matin de ce même jour, seul levé dans la maison, et se promenant dans le jardin avant que les volets de Cosette fussent ouverts, il avait aperçu tout à coup cette ligne gravée sur la muraille, probablement avec un clou.

16, rue de la Verrerie.

Cela était tout récent, les entailles étaient blanches dans le vieux mortier noir, une touffe d’ortie au pied du mur était poudrée de fin plâtre frais. Cela probablement avait été écrit là dans la nuit. Qu’était-ce? une adresse? un signal pour d’autres? un avertissement pour lui? Dans tous les cas, il était évident que le jardin était violé, et que des inconnus y pénétraient. Il se rappela les incidents bizarres qui avaient déjà alarmé la maison. Son esprit travailla sur ce canevas. Il se garda bien de parler à Cosette de la ligne écrite au clou sur le mur, de peur de l’effrayer.

Au milieu de ces préoccupations, il s’aperçut, à une ombre que le soleil projetait, que quelqu’un venait de s’arrêter sur la crête du talus immédiatement derrière lui. Il allait se retourner, lorsqu’un papier plié en quatre tomba sur ses genoux, comme si une main l’eût lâché au-dessus de sa tête. Il prit le papier, le déplia, et y lut ce mot écrit en grosses lettres au crayon:

DÉMÉNAGEZ.

Jean Valjean se leva vivement, il n’y avait plus personne sur le talus; il chercha autour de lui et aperçut une espèce d’être plus grand qu’un enfant, plus petit qu’un homme, vêtu d’une blouse grise et d’un pantalon de velours de coton couleur poussière, qui enjambait le parapet et se laissait glisser dans le fossé du Champ de Mars.

Jean Valjean rentra chez lui sur-le-champ, tout pensif.

Chapitre II

Marius

Marius était parti désolé de chez M. Gillenormand. Il y était entré avec une espérance bien petite; il en sortait avec un désespoir immense.

Du reste, et ceux qui ont observé les commencements du cœur humain le comprendront, le lancier, l'officier, le dadais, le cousin Théodule, n'avait laissé aucune ombre dans son esprit. Pas la moindre. Le poète dramatique pourrait en apparence espérer quelques complications de cette révélation faite à brûle-pourpoint au petit-fils par le grand-père. Mais ce que le drame y gagnerait, la vérité le perdrait. Marius était dans l'âge où, en fait de mal, on ne croit rien; plus tard vient l'âge où l'on croit tout. Les soupçons ne sont autre chose que des rides. La première jeunesse n'en a pas. Ce qui bouleverse Othello, glisse sur Candide. Soupçonner Cosette! il y a une foule de crimes que Marius eût faits plus aisément.

Il se mit à marcher dans les rues, ressource de ceux qui souffrent. Il ne pensa à rien dont il pût se souvenir. À deux heures du matin il rentra chez Courfeyrac et se jeta tout habillé sur son matelas. Il faisait grand soleil lorsqu'il s'endormit de cet affreux sommeil pesant qui laisse aller et venir les idées dans le cerveau. Quand il se réveilla, il vit debout dans la chambre, le chapeau sur la tête, tout prêts à sortir et très affairés, Courfeyrac, Enjolras, Feuilly et Combeferre.

Courfeyrac lui dit:

— Viens-tu à l'enterrement du général Lamarque?

Il lui sembla que Courfeyrac parlait chinois.

Il sortit quelque temps après eux. Il mit dans sa poche les pistolets que Javert lui avait confiés lors de l'aventure du 3 février et qui étaient restés entre ses mains. Ces pistolets étaient encore chargés. Il serait difficile de dire quelle pensée obscure il avait dans l'esprit en les emportant.

Toute la journée il rôda sans savoir où; il pleuvait par instants, il ne s'en apercevait point; il acheta pour son dîner une flûte d'un sou chez un boulanger, la mit dans sa poche et l'oublia. Il paraît qu'il prit un bain dans la Seine sans en avoir conscience. Il y a des moments où l'on a une fournaise sous le crâne. Marius était dans un de ces moments-là. Il n'espérait plus rien; il ne craignait plus rien; il avait fait ce pas depuis la veille. Il attendait le soir avec une impatience fiévreuse, il n’avait plus qu’une idée claire, — c’est qu’à neuf heures il verrait Cosette. Ce dernier bonheur était maintenant tout son avenir; après, l’ombre. Par intervalles, tout en marchant sur les boulevards les plus déserts, il lui semblait, entendre dans Paris des bruits étranges. Il sortait la tête hors de sa rêverie et disait: Est-ce qu’on se bat?

À la nuit tombante, à neuf heures précises, comme il l’avait promis à Cosette, il était rue Plumet. Quand il approcha de la grille, il oublia tout. Il y avait quarante-huit heures qu’il n’avait vu Cosette, il allait la revoir; toute autre pensée s’effaça et il n’eut plus qu’une joie inouïe et profonde. Ces minutes où l’on vit des siècles ont toujours cela de souverain et d’admirable qu’au moment où elles passent elles emplissent entièrement le cœur.

Marius dérangea la grille et se précipita dans le jardin. Cosette n’était pas à la place où elle l’attendait d’ordinaire. Il traversa le fourré et alla à l’enfoncement près du perron. — Elle m’attend là, dit-il. — Cosette n’y était pas. Il leva les yeux et vit que les volets de la maison étaient fermés. Il fit le tour du jardin, le jardin était désert. Alors il revint à la maison, et, insensé d’amour, ivre, épouvanté, exaspéré de douleur et d’inquiétude, comme un maître qui rentre chez lui à une mauvaise heure, il frappa aux volets. Il frappa, il frappa encore, au risque de voir la fenêtre s’ouvrir et la face sombre du père apparaître et lui demander: Que voulez-vous? Ceci n’était plus rien auprès de ce qu’il entrevoyait. Quand il eut frappé, il éleva la voix et appela Cosette. — Cosette! cria-t-il. Cosette! répéta-t-il impérieusement. On ne répondit pas. C’était fini. Personne dans le jardin; personne dans la maison.

Marius fixa ses yeux désespérés sur cette maison lugubre, aussi noire, aussi silencieuse et plus vide qu’une tombe. Il regarda le banc de pierre où il avait passé tant d’adorables heures près de Cosette. Alors il s’assit sur les marches du perron, le cœur plein de douceur et de résolution, il bénit son amour dans le fond de sa pensée, et il se dit que, puisque Cosette était partie, il n’avait plus qu’à mourir.

Tout à coup il entendit une voix qui paraissait venir de la rue et qui criait à travers les arbres:

— Monsieur Marius!

Il se dressa.

— Hein? dit-il.

— Monsieur Marius, êtes-vous là?

— Oui.

— Monsieur Marius, reprit la voix, vos amis vous attendent à la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie.

Cette voix ne lui était pas entièrement inconnue. Elle ressemblait à la voix enrouée et rude d'Éponine. Marius courut à la grille, écarta le barreau mobile, passa sa tête au travers et vit quelqu'un, qui lui parut être un jeune homme, s'enfoncer en courant dans le crépuscule.

Chapitre III

M. Mabeuf

La bourse de Jean Valjean fut inutile à M. Mabeuf. M. Mabeuf, dans sa vénérable austérité enfantine, n'avait point accepté le cadeau des astres; il n'avait point admis qu'une étoile pût se monnayer en louis d'or. Il n'avait pas deviné que ce qui tombait du ciel venait de Gavroche. Il avait porté la bourse au commissaire de police du quartier, comme objet perdu mis par le trouveur à la disposition des réclamants. La bourse fut perdue en effet. Il va sans dire que personne ne la réclama, et elle ne secourut point M. Mabeuf.

Du reste, M. Mabeuf avait continué de descendre.

Les expériences sur l'indigo n'avaient pas mieux réussi au Jardin des plantes que dans son jardin d'Austerlitz. L'année d'auparavant, il devait les gages de sa gouvernante; maintenant, on l'a vu, il devait les termes de son loyer. Le mont-de-piété, au bout des treize mois écoulés, avait vendu les cuivres de sa Flore. Quelque chaudronnier en avait fait des casseroles. Ses cuivres disparus, ne pouvant plus compléter même les exemplaires dépareillés de sa Flore qu'il possédait encore, il avait cédé à vil prix à un libraire-brocanteur planches et texte, comme défets. Il ne lui était plus rien resté de l'œuvre de toute sa vie. Il se mit à manger l'argent de ces exemplaires. Quand il vit que cette chétive ressource s'épuisait, il renonça à son jardin et le laissa en friche. Auparavant, et longtemps auparavant, il avait renoncé aux deux œufs et au morceau de bœuf qu'il mangeait de temps en temps. Il dînait avec du pain et des pommes de terre. Il avait vendu ses derniers meubles, puis tout ce qu'il avait en double en fait de literie, de vêtements et de couvertures, puis ses herbiers et ses estampes; mais il avait encore ses livres les plus précieux, parmi lesquels plusieurs d'une haute rareté, entre autres les Quadrains historiques de la Bible, édition de 1560, la Concordance des Bibles de Pierre de Besse, les Marguerites de la Marguerite de Jean de La Haye avec dédicace à la reine de Navarre, le livre de la Charge et dignité de l'ambassadeur par le sieur de Villiers-Hotman, un Florilegium rabbinicum de 1644, un Tibulle de 1567 avec cette splendide inscription: Venetiis, in oedibus Manutianis; enfin un Diogène Laërce, imprimé à Lyon en 1644, et où se trouvaient les fameuses variantes du manuscrit 411, treizième siècle, du Vatican, et celles des deux manuscrits de Venise, 393 et 394, si fructueusement consultés par Henri Estienne, et tous les passages en dialecte dorique qui ne se trouvent que dans le célèbre manuscrit du douzième siècle de la bibliothèque de Naples. M. Mabeuf ne faisait jamais de feu dans sa chambre et se couchait avec le jour pour ne pas brûler de chandelle. Il semblait qu'il n'eût plus de voisins, on l'évitait quand il sortait, il s'en apercevait. La misère d'un enfant intéresse une mère, la misère d'un jeune homme intéresse une jeune fille, la misère d'un vieillard n'intéresse personne. C'est de toutes les détresses la plus froide. Cependant le père Mabeuf n'avait pas entièrement perdu sa sérénité d'enfant. Sa prunelle prenait quelque vivacité lorsqu'elle se fixait sur ses livres, et il souriait lorsqu'il considérait le Diogène Laërce, qui était un exemplaire unique. Son armoire vitrée était le seul meuble qu'il eût conservé en dehors de l'indispensable.

Un jour la mère Plutarque lui dit:

— Je n'ai pas de quoi acheter le dîner.

Ce qu'elle appelait le dîner, c'était un pain et quatre ou cinq pommes de terre.

— À crédit? fit M. Mabeuf.

— Vous savez bien qu'on me refuse.

M. Mabeuf ouvrit sa bibliothèque, regarda longtemps tous ses livres l'un après l'autre, comme un père obligé de décimer ses enfants les regarderait avant de choisir, puis en prit un vivement, le mit sous son bras, et sortit. Il rentra deux heures après n'ayant plus rien sous le bras, posa trente sous sur la table et dit:

— Vous ferez à dîner.

À partir de ce moment, la mère Plutarque vit s'abaisser sur le candide visage du vieillard un voile sombre qui ne se releva plus.

Le lendemain, le surlendemain, tous les jours, il fallut recommencer. M. Mabeuf sortait avec un livre et rentrait avec une pièce d'argent. Comme les libraires brocanteurs le voyaient forcé de vendre, ils lui rachetaient vingt sous ce qu'il avait payé vingt francs, quelquefois aux mêmes libraires. Volume à volume, toute la bibliothèque y passait. Il disait par moments: J'ai pourtant quatre-vingts ans, comme s'il avait je ne sais quelle arrière-espérance d'arriver à la fin de ses jours avant d'arriver à la fin de ses livres. Sa tristesse croissait. Une fois pourtant il eut une joie. Il sortit avec un Robert Estienne qu'il vendit trente-cinq sous quai Malaquais et revint avec un Alde qu’il avait acheté quarante sous rue des Grès. — Je dois cinq sous, dit-il tout rayonnant à la mère Plutarque. Ce jour-là il ne dîna point.

Il était de la Société d’horticulture. On y savait son dénûment. Le président de cette société le vint voir, lui promit de parler de lui au ministre de l’Agriculture et du Commerce, et le fit. — Mais comment donc! s’écria le ministre. Je crois bien! Un vieux savant! un botaniste! un bonhomme inoffensif! Il faut faire quelque chose pour lui! Le lendemain M. Mabeuf reçut une invitation à dîner chez le ministre. Il montra en tremblant de joie la lettre à la mère Plutarque. — Nous sommes sauvés! dit-il. Au jour fixé, il alla chez le ministre. Il s’aperçut que sa cravate chiffonnée, son grand vieil habit carré et ses souliers cirés à l’œuf étonnaient les huissiers. Personne ne lui parla, pas même le ministre. Vers dix heures du soir, comme il attendait toujours une parole, il entendit la femme du ministre, belle dame décolletée dont il n’avait osé s’approcher, qui demandait: Quel est donc ce vieux monsieur? Il s’en retourna chez lui à pied, à minuit, par une pluie battante. Il avait vendu un Elzévir pour payer son fiacre en allant.

Tous les soirs avant de se coucher il avait pris l’habitude de lire quelques pages de son Diogène Laërce. Il savait assez de grec pour jouir des particularités du texte qu’il possédait. Il n’avait plus maintenant d’autre joie. Quelques semaines s’écoulèrent. Tout à coup la mère Plutarque tomba malade. Il est une chose plus triste que de n’avoir pas de quoi acheter du pain chez le boulanger, c’est de n’avoir pas de quoi acheter des drogues chez l’apothicaire. Un soir, le médecin avait ordonné une potion fort chère. Et puis, la maladie s’aggravait, il fallait une garde. M. Mabeuf ouvrit sa bibliothèque, il n’y avait plus rien. Le dernier volume était parti. Il ne lui restait que le Diogène Laërce.

Il mit l’exemplaire unique sous son bras et sortit, c’était le 4 juin 1832; il alla porte Saint-Jacques chez le successeur de Royol, et revint avec cent francs. Il posa la pile de pièces de cinq francs sur la table de nuit de la vieille servante et rentra dans sa chambre sans dire une parole.

Le lendemain, dès l’aube, il s’assit sur la borne renversée dans son jardin, et par-dessus la haie on put le voir toute la matinée immobile, le front baissé, l’œil vaguement fixé sur ses plates-bandes flétries. Il pleuvait par instants, le vieillard ne semblait pas s’en apercevoir. Dans l’après-midi, des bruits extraordinaires éclatèrent dans Paris. Cela ressemblait à des coups de fusil et aux clameurs d’une multitude.

Le père Mabeuf leva la tête. Il aperçut un jardinier qui passait, et demanda:

— Qu’est-ce que c’est?

Le jardinier répondit, sa bêche sur le dos, et de l’accent le plus paisible:

— Ce sont des émeutes.

— Comment! des émeutes?

— Oui. On se bat.

— Pourquoi se bat-on?

— Ah! dame! fit le jardinier.

— De quel côté? reprit M. Mabeuf.

— Du côté de l’Arsenal.

Le père Mabeuf rentra chez lui, prit son chapeau, chercha machinalement un livre pour le mettre sous son bras, n’en trouva point, dit: Ah c’est vrai et s’en alla d’un air égaré.

Livre dixième — Le 5 juin 1832

Chapitre I

La surface de la question

De quoi se compose l’émeute? De rien et de tout. D’une électricité dégagée peu à peu, d’une flamme subitement jaillie, d’une force qui erre, d’un souffle qui passe. Ce souffle rencontre des têtes qui parlent, des cerveaux qui rêvent, des âmes qui souffrent, des passions qui brûlent, des misères qui hurlent, et les emporte.

Où?

Au hasard. À travers l’État, à travers les lois, à travers la prospérité et l’insolence des autres.

Les convictions irritées, les enthousiasmes aigris, les indignations émues, les instincts de guerre comprimés, les jeunes courages exaltés, les aveuglements généreux; la curiosité, le goût du changement, la soif de l’inattendu, le sentiment qui fait qu’on se plaît à lire l’affiche d’un nouveau spectacle et qu’on aime au théâtre le coup de sifflet du machiniste; les haines vagues, les rancunes, les désappointements, toute vanité qui croit que la destinée lui a fait faillite; les malaises, les songes creux, les ambitions entourées d’escarpements; quiconque espère d’un écroulement une issue; enfin, au plus bas, la tourbe, cette boue qui prend feu, tels sont les éléments de l’émeute.

Ce qu’il y a de plus grand et ce qu’il y a de plus infime; les êtres qui rôdent en dehors de tout, attendant une occasion, bohèmes, gens sans aveu, vagabonds de carrefours, ceux qui dorment la nuit dans un désert de maisons sans autre toit que les froides nuées du ciel, ceux qui demandent chaque jour leur pain au hasard et non au travail, les inconnus de la misère et du néant, les bras nus, les pieds nus, appartiennent à l’émeute.

Quiconque a dans l’âme une révolte secrète contre un fait quelconque de l’État, de la vie ou du sort, confine à l’émeute, et, dès qu’elle paraît, commence à frissonner et à se sentir soulevé par le tourbillon.

L’émeute est une sorte de trombe de l’atmosphère sociale qui se forme brusquement dans de certaines conditions de température, et qui, dans son tournoiement, monte, court, tonne, arrache, rase, écrase, démolit, déracine, entraînant avec elle les grandes natures et les chétives, l’homme fort et l’esprit faible, le tronc d’arbre et le brin de paille.

Malheur à celui qu’elle emporte comme à celui qu’elle vient heurter! Elle les brise l’un contre l’autre.

Elle communique à ceux qu’elle saisit on ne sait quelle puissance extraordinaire. Elle emplit le premier venu de la force des événements; elle fait de tout des projectiles. Elle fait d’un moellon un boulet et d’un portefaix un général.

Si l’on en croit de certains oracles de la politique sournoise, au point de vue du pouvoir, un peu d’émeute est souhaitable. Système: l’émeute raffermit les gouvernements qu’elle ne renverse pas. Elle éprouve l’armée; elle concentre la bourgeoisie; elle étire les muscles de la police; elle constate la force de l’ossature sociale. C’est une gymnastique; c’est presque de l’hygiène. Le pouvoir se porte mieux après une émeute comme l’homme après une friction.

L’émeute, il y a trente ans, était envisagée à d’autres points de vue encore.

Il y a pour toute chose une théorie qui se proclame elle-même «le bon sens»; Philinte contre Alceste; médiation offerte entre le vrai et le faux; explication, admonition, atténuation un peu hautaine qui, parce qu’elle est mélangée de blâme et d’excuse, se croit la sagesse et n’est souvent que la pédanterie. Toute une école politique, appelée juste milieu, est sortie de là. Entre l’eau froide et l’eau chaude, c’est le parti de l’eau tiède. Cette école, avec sa fausse profondeur, toute de surface, qui dissèque les effets sans remonter aux causes, gourmande, du haut d’une demi-science, les agitations de la place publique.

